TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTIE Prince IAMES, by the grace of God King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland; Defendor of the Faith, &c.

IT may of some, and not without iust cause (most gracious and dread Soueraigne) be imputed vnto me for no small presumption, to present vnto your royall Maiestie (a prince of so great learning and iudgement) these homely fruits of mine endeuors and paines, taken in the Generall Historie of the Turkes, and strange successe of their great and mightie Othoman Empire. Whereunto for all that I was the rather induced, not only by the rare and wonderfull clemencie ioyned vnto many other the great and most resplendent vertues of your heroicall mind; the least whereof is sufficient to haue exalted vp weake and feeble spirits; but also by the encouragement of the right Worshipfull my most especial good friend Sir Peter Manwood knight of the Bath, the first mouer of mee to take this great worke in hand, and my continuall and only comfort stay, and helper therein. Which to do, I was also the more desirous, seeing diuers little volumes, and small parts of the Historie presented vnto the greatest Princes: as the little Treatise of Paulus Iouius de Rebus Turcicis, dedicated vnto the great and mightie Emperour Charles the fift; and the small Historie of Cœlius Secundus, de Bello Melitensi, vnto her late sacred Maiestie, of most happie and blessed memorie, the rare Phœnix of her sex, who now resteth in glorie: with diuers others of like sort by the learned Authors hereof still commended, some to one great Prince of their times, some to others: all filling me with good hope that this whole and continuat Historie of that Northern and warlike Nation (which in short time by God his appointment hath brought such fatall mutation to a great part of the world, as former times haue seldome or neuer seene) and that euen from the first beginning thereof (not together to my knowledge by any one before written) should with your most noble Maiestie find no lesse grace and fauour, than hath almost euery part thereof with other the aforelaid and such like most mightie and famous Princes: and the rather, for that your Majestie hath not disdained in your Lepanto or Heroicall Sing, with your learned Muse to adorne and set forth the greatest & most glorious victory that euer was by any the Christian confederate Princes obtained against these the Othoman Kings or Emperors, rors. Besides that the matter and argument of this History and such like (so much concerning the state and good of the Christian commonweale in generall, neuer by any so much impugned or indangered, as by these the naturall and capitall enemies thereof) of right vnto none so properly belongeth, as vnto your most excellent Maiestie, with the rest of the Christian princes, sitting at the helme of your estates; who onely by your vnited forces (the barbarous enemies greatest terror) are able to giue remedy thereunto: in the chiefest ranke of whom, your sacred Maiesty, for glory, honor, strength, and power (God long preserue the same) is now second vnto none. Thus perswaded and encouraged, I in all humble and dutifull manner doe present vnto your Maiestie these my weake endeauors, according to my ability and meanes continued for some few yeres more: which how vnworthy soeuer they be of so great and princely fauor, as well for the meanesse of mee the author, as for the plainnesse of the stile; yet if for the worthinesse of the matter, or of your own great and infinit clemencie, you vouchsafe them your Maiesties fauorable regard, they shall no doubt liue no lesse fortunat, than if they had beene more happily borne or brought to light: seruing (if to no other vse) yet as faire warnings vnto such great ones as God hath here vpon earth exalted aboue the rest vnto the highest degrees of power and of state, for the good gouernment and defence of his church and people. Accept them, I beseech you, most mightie monarch, into your gracious protection, so shall I (if God spare life) bee comforted and encouraged vnder so mighty a fauour to proceed to amend what shall bee found amisse, and adde what future times and better helpe shall discouer and minister for the perfection of this history: and according to my bounden necessitty in all humilitie pray vnto the great God of all might and power whom all kings and princes reigne) to his glorie long to preserue your most royall Maiestie in blessed health and peace to rule and reigne ouer vs and these your great kingdomes, so happily by you vnited: and so likewise (his will so being) your most noble posteritie after you, euen to the woulds end.

Your Maiesties most humble and obedient subiect,

Richard Knolles.

The Authors induction to the Christian Reader vnto the Historie following.

THe long and still declining state of the Christian Commonweale, w the vtter ruine and subuersion of the Empire of the East, and ma other most glorious kingdomes and prouinces of the Christians, nei to be sufficiently lamented, might with the due consideration ther worthily moue euen a right stony heart to ruth: but therewith al so call to remembrance the dishonor done vnto the blessed name of our Sa uior Christ Iesus, the desolation of his Church heremilitant vpon eart the dreadfull danger daily threatned vnto the poore remainder ther of, the millions of soules cast headlong into eternall destruction, the i finit number of wofull Christians (whose grieuous gronings vnder t heauy yoke of infidelity no tongue is able to expresse) with the carele nesse of the great for the redresse thereof, might giue iust cau vnto any good Christian to sit do and with the heauy Prophet to say as he did of Ierusalem: O how hath the Lord darkned the daug ter of Sion in his wrath! and cast down from heauen vnto the earth the beauty of Israel, a remembred not his footstoole in the day of his wrath! All which miseries (with many others great as greater there can none be) the Prince of darknesse and author of all mischiefe hath by t persecuting princes of all ages, and antient heretikes his ministers, labored from time to time to bri vpon the Church of God, to the obscuring of his blessed name, and vtter subuersion of his most sacr word; but yet by none, no not by them all together so much prouailed, as by the false Prophet Mah met, borne in an vnhappie houre, to the great destruction of mankind: whose most grosse and bla phemous doctrine first fantasied by himselfe in Arabia, and so by him obtruded vnto the worl and afterwards by the Sarasin Caliphes (his seduced successors) with greater forces maintained, wa by them, together with their empire, dispersed ouer a great part of the face of the earth, to the vnspea kable ruine and destruction of the Christian Religion and State especially in Asia and Africke, wit some good part of Europe also. But the vnitie of this great Mahometan Monarchie being once dissol-ued, and it diuided into many kingdomes, and so after the maner of worldly things drawing vnto the fatall period of it selfe, in processe of time became of farre lesse force than before, and so lesse dreadfull vnto the Christian princes of the West, by whom thise Sarasins were againe expulsed out of all the parts of Europe, excepting one corner of Spain, which they yt held within the remembrance of our fathers, vntil that by their victorious forces, they were then at length happily remoued also, after that they had possessed the same aboue the space of 700 yeares. And this declination of the Sara-sins, the first Champions of the Mahometan superstition (who thigh they had lost much, yet held they many kingdomes both in Asia and Africke, taken for the most part from the Christians) arise the Turks, an obscure and base people, before scarce known vnto the world, yet fierce and courageous, who by their valor first aspired vnto the kingdom of Persia, with diers other large prouinc from whence they were about 170 yeres after againe expulsed by the Tartis, and enforced to re selues into the lesser Asia: where taking the benefit of the discord of the Christian princes of the East, and the carelesnesse of the Christians in general, they in some good measure repaired their former lo ses again, and maintained the state of a kingdome at Iconium in Cilicia (now of them cal nia) holding in their subiection the greatest part of that fruitfull countrey, still seeking to gaine from the Christians wh t they had before lost vnto the Tartars. But the kingdom of the Turkes declining also, by the dismembring of the same, there stept vp among the Turkes in Bythinia, one Osman or O-thoman, of the Oguzian tribe or family, a man of great spirit and valor, who by little & little grow ing vp among st the rest of his countrymen, and other the Christians on that side of Asia, at last became another Romulus, tooke vpon him the name of a Sultan or king, & is right worthily accoun-

ed the first founder of the mightie Empire of the Turkes: which continued by many discents directly in the line of himselfe, euen vnto Achmat, who now reigneth, is from a small beginning become the greatest terrour of the world, holding in subiection many great and mighty kingdoms in Asia, Europe, and Africke, is grown to that height of pride, as that it threatneth destruction vnto the rest of the Kingdomes of the earth; labouring with nothing more than with the weight of it selfe. In the greatnesse whereof is swallowed vp both the name and Empire of the Sarasins, the glorious Empire of the Greekes, the renowned kingdomes of Macedonia, Peloponesus, Epirus, Bulgaria, Seruia, Bosna, Armenia, Cyprus, Syria, Ægypt, Iudea, Tunes, Algiers, Media, Mesopotamia, with a great part of Hungarie, as also of the Persian kingdom, & all those churches and places so much spoken of in holy Scripture (the Romans only excepted,) and in briefe so much of Christendome as far exceedeth that which is thereof at this day left. So that at this present if you consider the beginning, progresse, and perpetuall felicitie of this the Othoman Empire, there is in this world nothing more admirable and strange, if the greatnesse and lustre thereof, nothing more magnificent or glorious; if the power and strength thereof, nothing more dreadfull or dangerous: which wondering at nothing but at the beauty of it selfe, and drunk with the pleasant wine of perpetuall felicitie, holdeth all the rest of the world in scorn, breathing out nothing but still bloud and war, with a full persuasion in time to rule ouer all, prefining vnto it selfe no other limits than the vttermost bounds of the earth, from the rising of the Sun vnto the going downe of the same. The causes whereof are many and right lamentable, but for the most part so shut vp in the counsils of the great, as that for me to seeke after them, were great folly: yet amongst the rest, some others there be, so pregnant and manifest, as that the blind world taketh therof as it were a generall knowledge, and may therefore without offence of the wiser sort (as I hope) euen in these our nice dayes be lightly touched. The first and greatest, is the iust and secret iudgement of the Almightie, who in iustice deliuereth the hands of these mercilesse miscreants, nation after nation, kingdome vpon kingdome, as the most terrible executioners of his dreadfull wrath, to be punished for their sins: others in the meane while, no lesse sinfull than they, in his mercie enioying the benefit of a longer time, calling them vnto repentance. Then, the vncertaintie of worldly things, which subiect to perpetuall change, cannot long stay in one state, but as the sea is with the wind, so are they in like sort tossed vp and down with the continuall surges and wanes of alteration and change; so that being once grown to their height, they neuer stay not long, but fall again as fast as euer they rise, and so come to nothing: as we see all the great monarchies that euer yet were vpon earth haue done, when their course being run; ouer whom Time now triumpheth, as no doubt at length it shall ouer this so great a Monarchie also, when it shall but then liue by fame, as the others now do. Next to these causes from aboue (without offence be it said) is the small care the Christian princes, especially those that dwelt further off, haue had of the common fate of the Christian common weale, whereof euen the very greatest are to account themselues but as the principall members of one and the same bodie, and haue, or ought to haue, as sharpe a feeling of anothers harmes, as hath the head of the wrongs done vnto the feet, or rather as if it were done vnto themselues: in stead of which Christian compassion and vnitie, they haue euer, and euen yet at this time are so diuided among themselues with endlesse quarrels, partly for questions of religion (neuer by the sword to be determined) partly for matters touching their own proper state and soueraigntie, and that with such distrust and implacable hatred, that they neuer could as yet (although it haue bin long wished) ioyne their common forces against the common enemie: but turning their weapons one against another (the more to be lamented) haue from time to time weakned themselues, and opened a way for him to deuoure them one after another: whereas with their combined forces (the greedie enemie greatest terror) they might long since not onely haue repressed his furie, and abated his pride, but with small danger and much glorie (God fauoring their so honorable attempts) haue againe recouered from him most of those famous Christian kingdomes, which hee by force against all right holdeth: this day in most miserable subiection and thraldome: many millions of the poore oppressed Christians in the meane time out of the furnace of tribulation, in the anguish of their soules crying in vaine vnto their Christian brethren for reliefe. By ciuill discord the noble countrey of Grecia perished, when as the father rising against the son, and the son against the father, and brother against brother, they to the mutuall destruction of themselues called in the Turke, who like a greedie Lyon lurking in his den lay in wait for them all. So perished the kingdomes of Bulgaria, Seruia, Bosna, and Epirus, with the famous Island of the Rhodes and Cyprus, which were by the Christian princes their neighbors, by whom they might haue easily beene relieued. So the most flourishing and strong kingdom of Hungarie (in the reliques whereof the fortune of the Turkish empire hath longer stucke, than in the conquest of any other kingdome, by it attempted whatsoeuer) diuided in it selfe by the ambition of princes, and ciuile discord, the weaker still his aid the mighty power of the Turke, is long since for the most part become vnto him a prey; the poore remainders thereof being at this day hardly defended by the forces of the Christian Emperor, and of the Princes his Confederates, seldome times meeting together with such cheerefulnesse or expedition as the necessitie of so great a matter requireth. Vnto which so great a cause of the common decay, may be added the euill choice of our souldiers employed in those warres, who taken vp hand ouer head, out of the promiscuous vulgar people, are for most part vntrained men, seruing rather for shew, and the filling vp of number, than for vse; and in no respect to be compared with the Turkes Ianizaries, and other his most expert souldiers, continually euen from their youth exercised in feats of armes. Not to speake in the meane time of the want of the antient martiall discipline, the wholesome preseruatiue of most puissant armies, which breedeth in the proud Enemie a contempt of the Christian forces, with a full persuasion of himselfe, that he is not by such disordered and weake meanes to be withstood. But to come neerer vnto the causes of the Turks greatnesse, and more proper vnto themselues, as not depending of the improuident carelesnesse, weakenesse, discord, and imperfections of others: first, in them is to be noted an ardent and infinite desire of soueraigntie, wherewith they haue long since promised vnto themselues the Monarchie of the whole world, a quick motiue to their so haughty designes: Then, such a rare vnitie and agreement among st them, as well in the manner of their Religion (if it be so to be called) as in matters concerning their State (especially in all their enterprises to be taken in hand for the augmenting of their Empire) as that thereof they call themselues Islami, that is to say, men of one mind, or at peace among themselues; so as it is not to be maruelled, if thereby they grow strong themselues, and dreadfull to others: ioyne vnto this their courage, conceiued by the wonderfull successe of their perpetuall fortune, their notable vigilancie in taking the aduantage of euery occasion for the inlarging of their Monarchie; their frugalitie and temperatenesse in their dyet and other manner of liuing, their straight obseruing of their antient militarie discipline, their cheerefull and almost incredible obedience vnto their Princes and Sultans; such, as in that point no Nation in the world was to be worthily compared vnto them: all great causes why their Empire hath so mightily encreased, and so long continued. Whereunto may be added the two strongest sinewes of euery well gouerned Commonweale; Reward propounded to the good, and Punishment threatened vnto the offendor; where the prize is for vertue and valour set vp, and the way layd open for euery common person, be he neuer so meanely borne, to aspire vnto the greatest honours and preferments both of the Court and of the field, yea euen vnto the neerest affinitie of the great Sultan himselfe, if his valour or other worth shall so deserue: when as on the contrary part the disloyall or cowardly is to expect from the same soueraigne power nothing but disgrace, death, and torture. And yet these great ones, not contented by such commendable and lawfull meanes still to extend or establish their farre spreading Empire, if that point once come in question, they sticke not in their diuelish policie to breake and infringe the Lawes both of Nations and Nature. Their leagues, grounded vpon the Law of Nations, be they with neuer so strong capitulations concluded, or solemnity of oath confirmed, haue with them no longer force than standeth with their owne profit, seruing indeed but as snares to intangle other Princes in, vntill they haue singled out him whom they purpose to deuoure; the rest fast bound by their leagues, still looking on, as if their owne turn should neuer come, yet with no more assurance of their safety by their leagues, than had the other whom they see perish before their faces. As for the kind law of Nature, what can be thereunto more contrary, than for the father most vnnaturally to embrue his hands in the bloud of his owne children? and the brother to become the bloudy executioner of his owne brother? a common matter among the Othoman Emperors. All which most execrable and inhumane murthers, they couer with the pretended safety of their State, as thereby freed from the feare of all aspiring competitors (the greatest torment of the mighty) and by the preseruation of the integritie of their Empire, which they thereby keepe whole and entire vnto themselues, and so deliuer it as it were by hand from one to another, in no part dismembered or impaired. By these and such like means is this barbarous Empire (of almost nothing) growne to that height of maiesty and power, as that it hath in contempt all the rest, being it selfe not inferiour in greatnesse and strength vnto the greatest monarchies that euer yet were vpon the face of the earth the Roman Empire onely excepted. Which how farre it shall yet further spread none knoweth, but he that holdeth in his hand all the kingdomes of the earth, and with his word boundeth in the raging sea, so that it can not further passe. Moued with the greatnesse and glory of this so mighty dreadfull an Empire, growne for the most part out of the ruine of the Christian commonweale, with the vtter subuersion of many great and flourishing kingdomes, and wofull fall of many most puissant and mighty princes, not without griefe to be remembred; I long since (as many others haue) entred into the heauy consideration thereof, purposing so to haue contented my selfe with a light view of that which might well be for euer of all good Christians lamented, but hardly or neuer remedied; vntill that afterwards led with a more earneſt deſire to know the ſtrange and fatall mutations by this barbarous Nation in former time brought vpon a great part of the world, as alſo ſo much as I might to ſee ſo great a terroure of the preſent time, and in what termes it ſtandeth with the reſt, I had with long ſearch and much labour, mixt with ſome pleaſure and mine owne reaſonable contentment, paſſed through the whole melancholly courſe of their tragicall Hiſtorie: yet without purpoſe euer to haue commended the ſame or any part thereof vnto the remembrance of poſteritie, as deeming it an argument of too high a reach, and fitter for ſome more happy wit, better furniſhed with ſuch helpes both of nature and art as are of neceſſity requiſite for the vndertaking of ſo great a charge, than was my ſelfe, of many thouſands the meaneſt. Not vnmindefull alſo of that which the Poet (keeping decorum) ſaith in like caſe, though far leſſe matter, of himſelfe:

The causes of the greatnesse and increase of the Turkes &

Cum canerem Reges & prælia, Cynthius aurem Velit, & admonuit: Paſtorem Tityre pingues Paſcere oportet oues, deductum ducere carmen.

When I did ſing of mighty Kings, or elſe of bloudy warre, Apollo pluckt me by the eare, and ſaid I went too farre: Beſeemes a Shepheard Titterus, his fatlings for to feed,
And for to ſit his rurall ſong vnto his ſlender reed.

Beſides that, ſo many difficulties euen at the firſt preſented themſelues vnto my view, as to ouer-come the ſame, if I ſhould take the labour in hand, ſeemed to me almoſt impoſſible: for beſide the ſea and world of matter I was to paſſe through (requiring both great labour and time) full of the moſt rare example both of the better and worſe fortune in men of all ſort and condition, yeelding more plea-ſure vnto the Reader, than facilitie to the Writer; I ſaw not any (among ſo many as had taken this argument in hand) whom I might as a ſure guide or loadſtarre long follow in the courſe of this ſo great an Hiſtory: many right worthy and learned men (whoſe memory my ſoule honoureth) contenting themſelues to haue with their learned pennes enrolled in the records of neuer-dying Fame, ſome, one great expedition or action, ſome another, as in their times they fell out; yea, the Turkiſh Hiſto-ries and Chronicles themſelues (from whom the greateſt light for the continuation of the Hiſtorie was in reaſon to haue been expected) being in the declaration of their owne affaires (according to their barbarous manner) ſo ſparing and ſhort, as that they may of right bee accounted rather ſhort rude notes, than iuſt Hiſtories, rather pointing things out, than declaring the ſame, and that with ſuch obſcuritie, by changing the antient and vſuall names as well of whole kingdomes, countries, and Prouinces, as of cities, townes, riuers mountaines, and other places, yea and oftentimes men themſelues into other ſtrange and barbarous names of their owne deuiſing; in ſuch ſort as might well ſtay an intentiue Reader, and depriue him of the pleaſure, together with the profit he might otherwiſe expect by the reading thereof; whereunto to giue order, perſpicuitie, and light, would require no ſmall trauell and paine: Not to ſpeake in the meane time of the diuerſitie of reports in the courſe of the whole Hiſtorie, ſuch as is oftentimes moſt hard, if not altogether impoſſible to reconcile. Not-withſtanding all which difficulties, with many others more proper vnto my ſelfe, hauing with long labour and diligent ſearch paſſed through the courſe of the whole Hiſtorie, and ſo in ſome reaſonable ſort ſatisfied my ſelfe therein, thought it not amiſſe, as well for the worthineſſe of the matter, as for the Zeale I beare vnto the Chriſtian Commonweale, and for the ſatisfying alſo of ſome others my good friends much deſirous of the ſame, to make proofe if out of the diſperſed Workes of many right worthy men, I could ſet downe one orderly and continuate Hiſtorie of this ſo mighty an Empire, with the great and fatall mutation or rather ſubuerſion of many right ſtrong and flouriſhing Kingdomes and States (the proper worke of all mighty riſing Empires, ſtill encreaſing by the fall of others) wherewith this proud Monarchie hath alreadie daunted a great part of the world, being ſo many and ſo ſtrange, as that moe, or more wonderfull were not euer to be ſeene in any of the greateſt Monar-chies of antient time or memorie; and ſo together, and as it were vnder one view, and at one ſhew, lay open vnto the Chriſtian Reader, what I was glad to ſeeke for out of the confuſed Labours of many: A Worke ſo long and laborious, as might well haue deterred a right reſolute and conſtant minde from the vndertaking thereof, being as yet to my knowledge not vndergone or performed by any: Wherein, among ſuch varieties, or more truly to ſay, contrarieties of Writers, I conducted not my ſelfe, as a blinde man lead by his Guide, happely of no better ſight than him-ſelfe, to tread the ſteppes of this or that one man, going for a while before me, and by and by leauing me again stumbling in the darke: but out of the learned and faithfull works of many, according to my simple iudgment to make choice of that was most probable, still supplying with the perfections of the better, what I found wanting or defectiue in the weaker, propounding vnto my selfe no other mark to aime at, than the very truth of the historie; as that which is it self of power to giue life vnto the deadletter, and to couer the faults escaped in the homely penning or compiling therof. Which the better to perform, I collected so much of the history as possibly I could, out of the writings of such as were themselues present, and as it were eye-witnesses of the greatest part of that they writ, and so as of all others best able, most like also to haue left vnto vs the very truth. Such is the greatest part of so much of the historie of the Greeke empire as I haue (for the better vnderstanding of the rising of the Turks in this history set down, gathered out of the doings of Niceras Choniates, Nicephorus Gregoras, and Laonicus Chalcocondiles, all writing such things as they themselues saw, or were for most part in their time, and neere vnto them done. Such are the wonderfull and almost incredible wars betwixt old Amurath the second, and his foster childe the fortunat prince of Epirus, of the Turkes commonly called Scanderbeg, and by that waiward tyrant at his death together with his kingdome deliuered, as it were by inheritance, vnto his son, the great and cruell Sultan Mahomet. all written by Marinus Barletius, himselfe an Epirot, and in all those troublesome times then liuing in Scodra, a city of the Venetians ioyning vpon Epirus. Such is the wofull captiuity of the Imperiall city of Constantinople, with the miserable death of the Greeke Emperor Constantinus Palæologus, and the fatall ruine of the Greeke empire, written by Leonardus Chiensis, Archbishop of Mytilene, being himselfe then present, and there taken prisoner. Such is the lamentable historie of the Rhodes, taken for most part out of Ia. Fontanus his three bookes de bello Rhodio, a learned man then present, and in great credit with Villerius the great Master, at such time as that famous Iland, after it had by him and the other worthy knights of the Order, bin most wonderfully of long defended, was to the great ruth of Christendom taken by the great Sultan Solyman. Such is the most tragicall history of Baiazet, Solymans youngest son, collected out of the notable Epistles of Augerius Busbequius, Legationis Turcicæ, he himselfe then lying embassador for the Emperor Ferdinand at Constantinople, and present in Solymans campe, at such time as he himselfe in person went ouer with his army into Asia, to countenance his eldest son Selymus, who succeeded him in the empire, against his valiant yonger brother Baiazet, and beside well acquainted with the great Bassaes, Achmet, Rustan, Haly, and others, oftentimes mentioned in the history following. Such is also the history of the taking of the antient city of Tripolis in Barbary from the knights of Malta, by Sinan the proud Bassa, written by Nicholas Nicholay lord of Arfeuile, present at the same time with the lord of Aramont, then embassador for the French king vnto Solyman. So might I say also of the miserable spoile of the fruitfull and pleasant Islands of the Mediterranean, made by Lutzis Bassa, Solyman his brother in law, and great Admirall; with the submitting of the Iland of Naxos to the Turks obeisance, written by Iohn Crispe, at that time duke of the same Iland. And so likewise of diuers other parts of the history, too long to rehearse. But forasmuch as euery great and famous action had not the fortune to haue in it a Cæsar, such as both could and would commend vnto posterity by writing that whereof they might truly say, They were themselues a great part, many right excellent Generals contenting themselues with the honor of the field, and their glory there woon, leauing the honorable fame thereof to be by others reported) for lacke of such most certain Authors, or rather (as I before said) eye witnesses, I gathered so much as I could of that remained, out of the workes of such as being themselues men of great place, and well accquainted with the great and worthy personages of their time, might from their mouths, as from certaine Oracles, report the vndoubted truth of many most famous exploits done both by themselues and others: as might Pau: Iouius from the mouth of Muleasses king of Tunes, from Vastius the great Generall from Auria the prince of Melphis, Charles the Emperor his Admirall, and such others: or els out of the writings of such as were themselues great trauellers into the Turks dominions, and withall, diligent obseruers of their affairs and state, as were the Physitions Pantaleon, Minadoie, and Leunclauius (of all others a most curious searcher of their antiquities and histories) vnto which great clerkes, and some others of that learned profession, we may worthily attribute the greatest light & certainty of that is reported of a great part of the Turkish affaires. But these in the course of so long an history failing also (as by conferring the histories hereafter written, together with their histories, is easily to be perceiued) to perfect that I had taken in hand, I tooke my refuge vnto the writings of such other learned and credible authors, as of whose integritie and faithfulnesse the world hath not to my knowledge at any time yet doubted: yea for these few late yeares I was glad out of the German and Italian writers in their owne owne language in part to borrow the knowledge of these late affaires: as also from the credible and certain report of some such honorable minded gentlemen of our owne country, as haue either for their honors sake serued in these late wars in Hungary, or vpon some other occasions spent some good times in trauelling into the Turks dominions, but especially vnto the Imperiall citie of Constantinople, the chiefe seat of the Turkish Empire, and place of the great Turks abode: amongst whom, I cannot but deseruedly remember my kind friend and cousin M. Rog. Howe, vnto whose discreet & curious obseruations during the time of his late abode at Constantinople, I iustly account my selfe for many things beholden. In which course of my proceeding, if the Reader find not himselfe so fully satisfied as he could desire, I would be glad by him my selfe to be better informed, as being no lesse desirous to learne the truth of that I know not, than willing to impart to others that little which I know.

Thus much I thought good to set downe, to persuade the Christian Reader of the truth of the history following, wherein he shall find matter enough to wonder at, and no lesse strange than that whatsoeuer it is that is written of the greatest Monarchies of antient time, vnto whom for power and maiestie it yeeldeth little: but so much the more worthy our consideration than they. for that their periods already run, and so their furie ouer past, this in our time so flourisheth, and at this present so mightily swelleth, as if it would ouerflow all, were it not for the mercy of God first, and then by the force of some few of the Christian princes neerest vnto so great a danger, with their so great charge, to their immortall glorie, and benefit of the Christian commonweale, mightily checked and kept within some bounds and compasse. This history for the most part thus, as is aforesaid passed through, and brought to some good perfection, was yet by me againe laied aside, and like enough heuen as an abortiue fruit to haue perished in the birth before it was growne to perfection, had I not, many times fainting in the long and painefull trauell therewith, by my especiall good and honourable friend, Sir Peter Manwood of S. Stephens in the countie of Kent, knight of the honorable Order of the Bath, a great louer and fauorer of learning (and in whose keeping it so for the most part many yeares in safety rested) been still comforted, and as it were againe reuiued, and finally encouraged to take it in hand; and as at first to perfect it; so now againe to continue it: vnto whom (being the onely furtherer, stay, and help of these my labors) thou art for such pleasure as thou findest therein in courtesie beholden, and I for euer bounden. Now, what I for my part haue in this my long trauell performed, I leaue it to thy good discretion to consider, contenting my selfe in so great matter to haue bin willing to haue done something; wishing no longer to liue, than in some measure to be profitable to the Christian common-weale, which long since in my nursing mothers house Lincolne Colledge in Oxford, where I was sometime Fellow, I did purpose to performe, as it should please God in time to giue me means and occasion: In which mind I hope by the goodnesse and mercy of Christ my Sauior so long as I liue to continue. Onely this fauour (to conclude with) I request of thee, that if in this so long and perplexed an history (by piece meale of so many diuersly handled) written by me in a world of troubles and cares, in a place that affoorded no means of comfort to proceed in so great a worke, thou chance to light vpon some things otherwise reported than thou hast elsewhere read them (as I doubt not but thou maiest) not therefore forthwith to condemne what thou here findest, beeing haply taken from a more certaine reporter than was that whereunto thou giuest more credit, or at leastwise not written by me, as meaning in any thing to preiudice thy better Iudgement, but to leaue it to thy good choice in such diuersity of reports to follow that which may seeme vnto thee most true. By which courtesie thou hast already encouraged me to ioyne vnto my former historie a continuation for some few yeares, in this edition, and yet mayst (God giue me life and health) hereafter incourage me to performe some other worke to thy no lesse contentment. So wishing thee all happinesse, I bid thee farewell. From Sandwich the last of March, 1610.

Thine in all dutifull kindnesse,

R. KNOLLES.

THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF THE TVRKES, BEFORE THE RISING OF THE OTHOMAN FAMILIE, WITH ALL THE NOTABLE EXPEDITIONS OF THE CHRISTIAN PRINCES AGAINST THEM.

THE glorious Empire of the Turkes, the present terrour of the world, hath amongst other things nothing in it more wonderful or strange, than the poore beginning of it selfe, so small and obscure, as that it is not well known vnto themselues, or agreed vpon euen among the best writers of their Historics, from whence this barbarous nation, that now so triumpeth ouer the best part of the world, first crept out or tooke their beginning. Some (after the manner of most nations) deriue them from the Troians, led thereunto by the affinitie of the words Turci & Teucri, supposing (but with what probability I know not) the word Turci or Turks to haue bin made of the corruption of the word Teucri, the common name of the Troians: as also for that the Turks haue of long most inhabited the lesser ASIA, wherein the antient & most famous city of TROY sometime stood. No great reason in my deeming; yet giue the authors thereof leaue therewith to please themselues, as well as some others, which dwelling much further off, borrow, or rather force their beginning from thence, without any probabilitie at all; and that with such earnestnes, as if they could not elsewhere haue found any so honorable ancestors. Othersome report them to haue first come out of PERSIA, and of I wot not what city there to haue taken their name: neither want there some which affirme them to haue taken their beginning out of ARABIA, yea & some out of SYRIA, with many other far fet deuices concerning the beginning & name of this people: all seruing to no better purpose, than to shew the vncertaintie thereof. Among others, Philip of MORNAY the noble & learned Frenchman, in his worthie worke concerning the trunesse of the Christian religion, seemeth (and that not without good reason) to deriue the Turks, together with the Tartars, from the Iewes, namely from the ten Tribes, which were by Salmanaser king of ASSIRIA, in the time of Oseas king of ISRAEL, carried away into captiuitie, & by him confined into MEDIA, & the other vnpeopled countries of the North: whose going thither is not vnaptly described by Esdras, where among the great hords of the Tartars, in the farthest part of the world Northward, euen at this day are found some, that stil retaine the names of Dan, Zabulon, and Nepthaly, a certaine argument of their discent: whereunto also the word Tartar or Tatar, signifying in the Syrian tongue, remnants or leauings; and the word Turke, a word of disgrace, signifying in Hebrew, banished men, seemeth right well to agree. Besides that, in the Northern countries of RVSSIA, SARMATIA, & LYTHVANIA, are found greater store of the Iewish nation, than elsewhere, and so neerer vnto the Tartarians stil the moe: whereunto Io. Leunclauius the most curious searcher out of the Turks antiquities & monuments, addeth as a farther coniecture of the discent of those barbarous Northern people from the Iewes, That in his trauell through LIVONIA into LYTHVANIA in the Countrie trie neere vnto the metropolitan citie of RIGA, hee found there the barbarous people of the Lettoes, quite differing in language from the other country people of the Curons & Estons, no lesse barbarous than themselues; who had always in their mouths as a perpetual lamentation, which they with dolefull moans daily repeared abroad in the fields, Ieru, Ieru, Masco Lon: whereby they were thought to lament ouer IERVSALEM and DAMASCO, as forgetfull of all other things in their antient country, after so many worlds of yeres, and in a desolate place so far distant thence. And Munster in his description of LIVONIA, repeating the like words, reporteth, That this rude people being demanded what they meant by these words so often & so lamentably by them without cause vttered: answered, That they knew no more, than that they had bin so of long taught by their ancestors. But to leaue these opinions cõcerning their beginning, so diuers and vncertain, & to follow greater probabilities: as concerning the place from whence they came, it is vpon better ground thought by diuers others, and those of the best Historians, That this barbarous nation which hath of late brought such fatall mutations vpon so great a part, not of Christendome only, but euen of the whole world, took their first beginning out of the bare and cold country of SCYTHIA: induced thereunto both by the authority of the greatest Cosmographers, as by most apparant reasons. Pomponius Mela the describer of the world, reckning vp the people neere vnto the great riuer TANAIS (the bounder of EVROPE from ASIA Eastward) amongst others maketh mention of the Turkes, in these words, Geloni vrbem ligneam habitant. Iuxta Thyrsagetæ Turcæq; vastas syluas occupant alunturq; venando. Tum continuis rupibus late aspera & deserta regio ad Arympheos vsque permittitur: The Geloni inhabit a city of wood, and fast by, the Thyrsagets & Turks possesse the vast forrests, and liue by hunting. Then, a rough and desart country, with continual rocks, is spaciously extended euen as far as vnto the Arympheians. Pliny also in like manner reckning vp the Nations about the fennes of MÆOTIS, agreeing with that Mela reporteth, saith, Deinde, Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Messeniani, Costobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, Tussagetæ, Turcæ, vsque ad solitudines saltuosis conuallibus asperas, vltra quos Arymphei qui ad Ripheos pertinent montes: Next vnto them, are the Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Messeniani, Costobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, the Thussagets and Turks, vnto the desarts rough with woodie valleys: beyond whom are the Arympheians, which border vpon the Riphean mountaines. And Ptolomie in the description of SARMATIA ASIATICA, maketh mention of the Tusci, whom many learned men suppose to haue bin the same nation with the Turks. Vnto which antient testimonies of reuerend antiquitie, adde the manners and conditions of the Turks, their antient attire, their gesture, their gate, their weapons, and manner of riding and fight, their language and dialect, so well agreeing with the Scythians; and a man shall find matter enough sufficient to perfuade him in reason, that the Turkes haue vndoubtedly taken their beginning from the Scythes; whom they in so many things resemble, and with whom of all other nations they best agree.

The great agreement betwixt the Turkes and Scythians.

Now it hath been no lesse doubted also, among the writers of the Turks histories, at what time, and for what causes the Turkes (to the trouble of the world) left their naturall seats in the cold country of SCYTHIA, to seek themselues others in more pleasant & temperat countries more Southerly, than it had bin of their originall beginning. Blondus and Platina report them, enforced with a generall want, to haue forsaken their natiue Countrie, and followed their better fortune, in the yeare of our Lord 755: with whom also Segonius agreeth in the cause of their departure, but not in the time or place whẽ or wherby they departed: for they (as he saith) issued out of their dwelling places in the yere of Grace 844, by the straits of the mountaine CAVCASVS: whereas the other with greater probabilitie suppose them to haue come forth by the Caspian straits: which the Turkes also (as saith Sabellicus) affirme of themselues, their ancestors (as they say) being by their neighbors driuen out of the Caspian mountains. Some others there be that report them to haue forsaken their natiue country, neither inforced therunto by necessity, or the power of others; but for their valor sent for by the Sultan of PERSIA, to aid him in his wars: vnaduisedly supposing that to haue bin the cause of their first comming out, which indeed hapned long time after, as in the proces of this history shall appeare. But whatsoeuer the aforesaid causes of want, or of the enemies power, might inforce them vnto, a greater power no doubt it was that stir'd them vp, euen the hand of the Almightie, who being the author of al kingdoms vpon earth, as wel those which he hath appointed as scourges wherewith to punish the world, as others more blessed, will haue his worke and purpose

When and for what causes the Turks left their antient and naturall seats in Scythia, to seek others in the Countries more Southerly.

A purpose full of Diuine maiestie, to appeare in the stirring of them vp from right small beginnings, in the increasing and establishing of their greatnesse and power, to the astonishment of the world; and in the ruine and destruction of them againe, the course of their appointed time once runne. As for the difference of the time of their comming forth, before remembred, it may reasonably be referred to the diuers emotions of that people, who beeing not vnder the command of any one, but of their diuers gouernors, as the manner of that people was, are not to be thought to haue come forth all at once, either for one cause; but at diuers times, some sooner, some later, and that for diuers causes. This people thus stirred vp, and by the Caspian ports passing thorow the Georgian Country, then called IBERIA, neere vnto the Caspian sea, first seised vpon a part of the greater ARMENIA, and that with so strong hand, that it is by B their posteritie yet holden at this day, and of them called TVRCOMANIA; of al other the most true progenie of the antient Turkes. In which great Countrey they of long vnder their diuers leaders, in the manner of their liuing most resembling their ancestors, roamed vp and downe with their families and heards of cattell, after the manner of the Scythian Nomades, their countrey men, without any certaine places of abode, yet at great vnitie among themselues, as not hauing much to lose, or wherefore to striue.

Armenia, now called Turcomania, the first seat of the Turks after their first comming out of Scythia.

The first kingdome of the Turks erected in PERSIA by Tangrolipix, Chiefetaine of the Selzuccian Familie: with the successe thereof.

D THis wandring & vnregarded people, but now the terror of the world, thus first seated in ARMENIA, long time there liued in that wide country, after their rude and woonted manner, (from which the Turcoman nation their posteritie in that place, euen at this day, as we said, much differeth not) and not onely notably defended the Countrey, thus by them at the first possessed, but still incroching farther & farther, and gaining by other mens harms, became at length dreadful vnto their neighbors, and of some fame also farther off: whereunto the effœminate cowardise of those delicate people of ASIA, with whom they had to do, gaue no lesse furtherance than their owne valour; being neuertheless an hardie rough people, though not much skilfull or trained vp in the feats of warre.

The fame of these Turks, together with their fortune, thus daily increasing, and the mighty empire of the Sarasins as fast declining, which vnder their Chaliphs, the successors of the false E Prophet Mahomet, hauing in lesse than the space of two hundred yeares ouerspread not onely the greatest part of ASIA and AFRICKE, euen vnto GADES & the pillers of Hercules; but also passing ouer that strait, had ouerwhelmed almost all SPAINE; & not there staying, but passing the Pirenei, had pierced euen into the heart of France, and diuers other parts of Christen-dome, as namely ITALY, SICILY, the famous Island of the RHODES, with many others of the MEDITERRANEAN: now diuided in it selfe, and rent into many Kingdomes, turned their vi ctorious arms from the Christians, vpon one another, to the mutual destruction of themselues & their empire. Amongst other the Sarasin Sultans, which forgetting their obedience to their great Caliph, tooke vpon them the soueraigntie of gouernment (which admitteth no partner) was one Malomet Sultan of PERSIA, a right great prince, who hardly beset on the one side F with the Indians, and on the other with the Caliph of BABYLON his mortall enemie, prayed aid of the Turks his neighbors, who were now come euen to the side of ARAXIS, the bounds of his empire: vnto which his request the Turkes easily granted, in hope thereby to find a way for them afterwards to enter into PERSIA, and so sent him 3000 hardie men vnder the leading of one Togra Mucalet, the sonne of Mikeil a valiant captaine, and chiefe of the Selzuccian tribe

Togra, otherwise called Tangrolipix, sent to aid the Persian Sultan.

tribe or familie; whom the Greekes commonly call Tangrolipix, and some others, Seldnck, or Sadock, names (as I suppose) corrupted of the great familie whereof he was descended By the aid of this Tangrolipix (for now we wil so call him, as by the name most vsed) Mahomet the Persian Sultan ouercame Pisasiris the Caliph of BABYLON, his Arabians being not able to endure the force of his Turkish Archers. This war thus happily ended, the Turkes desiring to returne home, requested of the Sultan leaue to depart, and with a safe conuoy to bee conducted vnto the riuer ARAXIS, and there to haue the passage of that swift riuer opened vnto them, which was by the Persians strongly kept by two Castles built vpon each end of the bridge, wherby the riuer was to be passed. But Mahomet loath to forgo such necessarie men, by whom he had obtained so great a victory, and purposing to imploy them further in his seruice against the Indians, would by no meanes hearken vnto their request; but seeming therewith to be discontented, commanded them to speake no more thereof, threatning them violence if they should more presume to talke of their departure. The Turks therfore doubtful of their estate, and fearing further danger, secretly withdrew themselues into the desart of CARAVONITIS: and for that they were in number but few, and not able to come into the open field against so many millions of the Sarasins, liued as they might, by continuall incursions and roads which they made out of the desart forrest into the countries adioyning: wherewith Mahomet greatly incensed, sent out an army of twentie thousand men, vnder the conduct of ten of his best Captaines, against them: who for want of water and other necessaries, doubting to enter the desart, encamped themselues in the side of the forrest, there to consult what course to take. But Tangrolipix, who with his Turks lay a great way off in the couert of the woods and mountains, vnderstanding of the comming of his enemies, and of the manner of their lying, thought it best vpon the sudden by night to set vpon the Sarasins and Persians, if so happily hee might ouerthrew them by policie, whom he was not able to encounter in plain battell. Vpon which resolution hauing trauelled 2 days long march in the desart, the third day at night he suddenly set vpon his enemies, lying negligently in their trenches, & by his vnexpected comming brought such a feare vpon them, that they without longer stay betook themselues to flight, euery man shifting for himselfe, without regard of others. This victorie so happily gained, and Tangrolipix now (beyond his hope) throughly furnished with armor, horses, and aboundance of all things needfull for the wars, kept the woods and forrests no longer as a theefe or out-law, but shewed himselfe in the open field, where daily repaired vnto him numbers of rogues & vagabonds seeking after spoyle; with many other desperate vallains, who for feare of punishment were glad of such a refuge: so that in a short space his armie was growne to be fifty thousand strong; and so much the stronger, for that they had nothing to trust vnto more than the valor of themselues. Whilest Tangrolipix thus increaseth, Mahomet inraged with the ouerthrow of his armie, in his furie caused all those ten captains which had the leading thereof, to haue their eyes pluckt out; threatning also to attire all the soldiers that fled out of the battel, in womans apparel, and so disgraced to carry them about as cowards; and withall raised a great armie for the suppressing of the Turks. All things being now in readinesse, he set forward; when by the way the souldiers whom hee had so threatned to disgrace, suddenly fled to the enemy: with whose comming Tangrolipix greatly encouraged and strengthned, resolued to giue the Sultan battell. And so boldly comming on, met with him at ISPAHAN a city of PERSIA, where was fought betwixt them a most terrible battell, with wonderfull slaughter on both sides. In the heat of which battel, Mahomet vnaduisedly riding to and fro to encourage his soldiers, falling with his horse, brake his necke: vpon which mischance both the armies comming to agreement, by common consent proclaimed Tangrolipix Sultan in his stead, and so made him King of PERSIA, and of all the other large dominions vnto that kingdome belonging.

Mahomet the Persian Sultan goeth himselfe with an armie against Tangrolipix.

Tangrolipix by consent of the souldiers made Sultan of Persia.

This was the first kingdome of the Turks, begun by the good fortune of Tangrolipix, about 214 yeres after their comming out of SCYTHIA, in the yere also of our Lord, 1030, Constantinus Monomachus then raigning, or a little before (according to the Turks account) in the raign of Romanus Argirus, Constantine his predecessor. Tangrolipix by rare fortune, thus of a meane captain become king of PERSIA, forthwith commanded the garrison which kept the bridge ouer the riuer ARAXIS, to be remooued, and so free passage to be giuen vnto the Turkes his countrymen, at their pleasure to come ouer: who in great multitudes repaired into PERSIA, where they were by the new Sultan well prouided for, & by little & little promoted vnto the greatest Tangrolipix first Sultan of the Turks.

A greateſt dignities of that kingdome; the Perſians and Saraſins, the antient inhabitants thereof, being by theſe new come gueſts now kept vnder, and as it were troden vnder foot. Together with this kingdome, the Turkes receiued the Mahometane ſuperſtition, from which they before not much abhorred, as men vſing circumciſion: So that hard it is to ſay whether Nation loſt more; the Perſians and Saraſins by the loſſe of ſo great a kingdome; or the Turks, by imbracing ſo great a vanitie.

When the Turks firſt receiued the Mahometan ſuperſtition.

Tangrolipix with his Turkes thus poſſeſſed of the kingdome of PERSIA, held not himſelfe therewith long content, but made war vpon his neighbor princes, eſpecially againſt Piſaſiris the Caliph of BABYLON, whom he in diuers battels ouerthrew; and hauing at length ſlaine him, ioyned his kingdome vnto his owne. After that, he ſent Cutlu-Muſes his couſin, with an B armie againſt the Arabians, by whom hee was ouerthrowne and put to flight. But returning by MEDIA, he requeſted of Stephan the Greeke Emperonrs Lieutenant, leaue to paſſe with his armie by the confines of his countrie: which his requeſt Stephan not onely reiected, but alſo by ſtrong hand ſought to ſtop his paſſage; but ioyning battell with him, was by the Turkes eaſily ouerthrowne, and himſelfe taken. So Cutlu-Muſes returning to Tangrolipix & recounting vnto him the ſucceſſe of his warres, perſuaded him to turne his forces into MEDIA, as a moſt fruitfull country, and eaſie to be ſubdued. But he highly offended with the ouerthrow giuen by the Arabians, would not hearken vnto him, but raiſing a new armie in hope of better fortune, went againſt the Arabians in perſon himſelfe. Cutlu-Muſes in the meane time fearing the Sultans diſpleaſure, fled with his followers and fauourites; and taking for his refuge C PASAR a ſtrong citie of the Chorafmians, reuolted from him; which the Sultan ſeeming not to regard, held on his intended journy againſt the Arabians, by whom hee was alſo put to the worſt, and enforced with diſhonour to returne. After that, he with part of his army beſieged Cutlu-Muſes, who by the ſtrength of the place, and valour of the people, for a great while notably defended himſelfe. In the meane time Tangrolipix, not vnmindfull what Cutlu-Muſes had before ſaid vnto him, concerning the eaſines of the conqueſt of MEDIA (a countrey, as he ſayd, defended but by women) ſent Aſan his brothers ſon, ſirnamed the Deafe, with a conueni-ent army to inuade the ſame: who entring into the frontiers of that prouince, was there by the Emperours lieutenant ouerthrown, and himſelfe with the greateſt part of his army ſlaine. With which loſſe the Sultan rather inraged than diſcouraged, ſent Habramy Alim his brother D againe, with an army of an hundred thouſand fighting men: with which ſo great a power the Emperors lieutenant thought it not good to encounter, vntill hee had procured further ayd from the Emperour, eſpecially out of IBERIA; and therefore kept himſelfe with ſuch power as he had, within his ſtrong and fenced places. Which Alim perceiuing, & out of hope to draw him vnto battell, roaming vp and downe the Countrey, at laſt beſieged ARZEN, an open rown, but full of rich Merchants, by whom it was (contrarie to his expectation) notably defended for the ſpace of ſixe dayes; vntill that at length the Turkes ſeeing no other way to win it, ſet fire vpon it in diuers places; by force whereof the inhabitants were enforced for ſafeguard of their liues to flie, and to leaue the towne with an infinite wealth to the ſpoyle of the enemie. By this time was Liparites Gouernor of IBERIA, come with a great power to the ayd of the E Emperors Lieutenant in MEDIA: whereof Alim hauing intelligence, without delay haſted with his armie towards his enemies: and meeting with them a little before night, had with them a cruell fight; wherein the victorie fel vnto the Chriſtians, who had the Turks in chaſe a great part of the night. Neuertheles Liparites valiantly fighting in another wing of the battel, was there taken, & ſo carried away priſoner: for whoſe ranſome the Emperor ſent a great ſum of mony, with certain preſents to the Sultan; all which he ſent back againe, & frankly ſet Liparites at libertie, wiſhing him neuer to beare armes more againſt the Turks. And with him ſent the Seriph, a man of great place among the Mahumetans, his Embaſſador vnto the Emperor. Who comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, amongſt other things, proudly demanded of the Emperour, to become tributarie vnto the Sultan, and ſo to bee at peace with him for euer: F Which his vnreaſonable demand was by the Emperour with no leſſe diſdaine ſcornefully reiected, and the Seriph ſo diſmiſſed. Which contempt of his Embaſſadour the Sultan taking in euill part, as alſo not a little mooued with the death of his nephew, and loſſe of his armie, with all his power inuaded the Roman prouinces; but being come as far as COIME without any notable harme doing, for that the countrey people hearing before of his comming, had in time conueighed themſelues with their ſubſtance into their ſtrong holds, whereof there was great store in those countries; and hearing also that the Greeke Emperour was raising a great power to come against him at CESAREA; not daring to proceed any further, leauing so many enemies behind him, he fretting in himselfe, returned into MEDIA, where finding the people all fled into their strong townes, he layd siege vnto MANTZICHIERT, a citie standing in a plaine champian Countrey, but strongly fortified with a triple wall and deepe ditches. This Citie hee furiously assaulted by the space of thirtie dayes without intermission, but all in vaine, the same being still notably defended by Basilius Gouernour thereof, and the other Christians therein. The Sultan wearie of this siege, and about to haue risen, was by Alcan one of his chiefe Captaines, perswaded yet to stay one day, for him to make proofe in, what he were able to doe for the gaining thereof: whereunto the Sultan yeelded, committing the whole charge of the assault vnto him. Alcan the next day diuiding the Armie into two parts, and placing the one part vpon the higher ground, of purpose with the multitude of their shot to haue ouerwhelmed the defendants; with the other part of the Armie, furnished with all things needfull for the assault, approched to the walls: the Sultan in the mean time, with certaine of the chiefe Turkes, from an high place beholding all that was done. But this so forward a Captaine in the middest of his endeauour lost himselfe, being slaine with a great number of his followers in approching the wall. His dead bodie knowne by the beautie of his Armor, was by two valiant young men that sallyed out of the gate, drawne by the haire of his head into the Citie, and his head beeing forthwith cut off, was cast ouer the wall among the Turks: wherewith the Sultan discouraged, and out of hope of gaining the citie, rose with his army, pretending himselfe with other his vrgent affaires to be called home, and threatning withal, the next spring to returne with greater power, and to do great matters. But not long after, great discord arose betwixt the Sultan and his brother Habramie Alim, insomuch that the Sultan sought by diuers meanes to haue taken him out of the way: which Habramie perceiuing, fled to his Nephew Cutlu-Muses, and ioyning his forces with his, denounced warre vnto the Sultan his brother; who meeting with them not far from PASAR, ouercame them in plain battell, wherein Habramie was taken, and presently by the commandement of his brother put to death. But Cutlu-Muses, with his cousin Melech and 6000 Turkes, fled into ARMENIA; and by messengers sent of purpose, requested of the Emperor Constantinus Monomachus, to bee receiued into his protection. But the Sultan with his armie following them at the heeles, they for their more safetie were glad to flie into ARABIA. The Sultan afterwards turning into IBERIA, did there great harme, spoyling the countrey before him: against whom the Emperor sent Michael Acoluthus, a valiant captaine. Of whose approch the Sultan hearing, and that he would vndoubtedly ere long giue him battell, (deeming it no great honour vnto him to ouercome the Emperors seruant, but an eternall dishonour to be of him ouerthrowne) retired with his armie backe againe to TAVRIS, leauing behind him one Samuch with 3000 Turkes, to infest the frontiers of the Emperors territories: which both he and other the Turks Captaines afterward more easily did, for that Monomachus the Emperour hauing prodigally spent the treasures of the Empire, to increase his reuenue, had imposed a tribute vpon the frontier countries of his Empire, woont before to bee free from all exactions; in lieu whereof they were bound to defend the passages from all incursions of the enemie: but now pressed with new impositions, had dissolued their woonted garrisons, and left an easie entrance for the barbarous enemies into the prouinces confining vpon them. Besides that, the Emperors immediately following, and especially Constantinus Ducas, abhorring from wars, and giuen altogether to the hoording vp of treasure, gaue little countenance, and lesse maintenance, vnto men of seruice, which in short time turned to the great weakening, and in fine to the vtter ruine of the Constantinopolitan empire. At the same time also the gouernment of the Constantinopolitan empire, by the death of Constantinus Ducas the late Emperour, came to his wife Eudocia with her 3 sons, Michael, Andronicus, and Constantinus, all very yong: whose sex & tender yeres the barbarous nations hauing in contempt, at their pleasure grieuously spoyled the prouinces of the empire, namely MESOPOTAMIA, CILICIA, CAPADOCIA, yea and sometimes as farre as CŒLESIRIA. The report wherof much troubled the Empresse, & gaue occasion for many that loued her not, to say, That so troubled an Estate required the gouernement of some worthie man. Wherefore she fearing lest that the Senate making choice of some other, she and her children should be remoued from the gouernment, thought it best for the preseruation of her state and her childrens, to make choice of some notable and valiant man for her husband, that

A for her and hers, ſhould take vpon him the managing of ſo weightie affaires. But to checke this her purpoſe (the only remedy of her troubled thoughts) ſhe had at the death of the late Emperor Conſtantine her husband, at ſuch time as the ſoueraigntie was by the Senate confirmed vnto her and her ſonnes, ſolemnly ſworn neuer more to marry; which her oath was for the more aſſurance conceiued into writing, and ſo deliuered vnto the Patriarch to keepe. This troubled her more, than to find out the man whom ſhe could thinke worthy of her ſelfe, with ſo great honor. She held then in priſon one Diogenes Romanus, a man of great renowne and honourably diſcended; whoſe father hauing married the neece of the Emperor Romanus Argirus, and aſpiring to the empire, being conuicted thereof, ſlew himſelfe for feare to be enforced by torments, to bewray his confederates. This Dogenes was by the late Emperor Conſtantine, for his good ſeruice B againſt the Scythes (who then much troubled the empire) highly promoted, with moſt honorable teſtimonie in the charters of his promotions, That ſuch honours were beſtowed vpon him, not of the Emperors meere bountie, but as the due rewards of his worthy deſerts. Notwithſtanding after the death of the Emperor, he ſicke of his fathers diſeaſe, and ſwelling with the pride of ambition, ſought by ſecret meanes to haue aſpired vnto the empire: whereof the empreſſe hauing intelligence, cauſed him to bee apprehended and brought in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE, where beeing found guiltie of the foule treaſon, and ſo committed to ſafe keeping, was ſhortly after brought forth to the iudgement ſeat againe, to receiue the heauie ſentence of death. In which wofull plight, ſtanding as a man out of hope and now vtterly forlorne, he mooued all the beholders with a ſorrowfull compaſſion: for beſide that he was a man of exceeding C ſtrength, ſo was hee of incomparable feature and beautie, adorned with many other rare qualities and vertues anſwerable thereunto: wherewith the Empreſſe mooued with the reſt, or pierced with a ſecret good liking, is hard to ſay, reuoked the ſentence of condemnation ready to haue bin pronounced vpon him, and gaue him pardon. And ſhortly after hauing ſet him at libertie, ſent for him as he was going into CAPADOCIA his natiue countrie, and made him Generall of all her forces, with a full reſolution in her ſelfe to marry him, and to make him Emperor, if ſhe might by any meanes get the writing out of the Patriarchs hand, wherein her oath for neuer marrying againe was compriſed. For the compaſſing whereof, ſhee entred into a deepe deuice ful of feminine policie with one of her Eunuches, whom ſhe purpoſed to vſe as her pander for the circumuenting of the Patriarch. This craftie Eunuch inſtructed by his Miſtreſſe, D comming to the Patriarch Ioannes Xiliphilines, a man both for his place and integritie of life much honored, told him in great ſecret, that the Empreſſe had ſo far ſet her good liking vpon a yong gentleman, a nephew of his called Barda (then a gallant of the court) as that ſhe could bee content to take him to her husband, and to make him Emperor, if ſhe might by his holineſſe be perſuaded, that ſhe might with ſafe conſcience do it, and by him be diſcharged of the raſh oath ſhe had vnaduiſedly taken, neuer to marrie againe, whereof hee had the keeping. The Patriarch otherwiſe a contemner of worldly honours, yet mooued with ſo great a preferment of his Nephew, promiſed the eunuch to doe therein whatſoeuer the Empreſſe had deſired, which he accordingly performed. And ſo ſending for the Senators one by one, in whoſe good liking the matter chiefly reſted, he with much grauity propounded vnto them the dangerous eſtate of the E common-weale, with the troubles daily increaſing, and the continual feare of forrein enemies, not to be repreſſed by the weake hand of a woman, or the authoritie of young children, but requiring (as hee ſaid) the valiant courage of ſome worthy man. After that, he began to finde great fault with the raſh oath which the Empreſs had taken a little before the death of her husband, neuer to marry; and vtterly condemning the ſame, as contrary to the word of God, & vniuſtly exacted of her, rather to ſatisfie the iealous humor of the Emperor her late husband, than for any good of the common-weale: hee in fine perſuaded them, that the vnlawfull oath might be reuoked, and the Empreſs ſet at libertie at her pleaſure, by their good liking to make choice of ſuch a man for her husband, as might better vndertake ſo weightie affaires of the empire, more fit for a man, than for ſo tender a Lady and three young children. The greater part of the F Senate thus perſuaded by the Patriarch, and the reſt with gifts and promiſes ouercome by the Empreſſe, the patriarch deliuered vnto her the writing ſhe ſo much deſired, and diſcharged her of her oath: whereupon ſhee forthwith calling vnto her, certaine of her ſecret friends, married Diogenes, whom ſhe cauſed to be proclaimed Emperour. Now thought Endocia after the manner of a woman, to haue had her husband (whom ſhe euen from the bottom of diſpair had exalted ted to the higheſt type of honour) in all things loyall and pliant: whereunto he for a while at the firſt forced himſelfe, but afterwards (beeing a man of a proud nature, and haughty ſpirit) became weary of ſuch obſeruance, and began by little and little to take euery day more and more vpon him. And for that the imperiall prouinces in the Eaſt, were in ſome part loſt, and the reſt in no ſmall danger; he, as well for the redreſſe thereof, as for his owne honour, and to ſhew himſelfe an Emperour indeed, and not the ſeruant of the Empreſſe, left the court, and paſſed ouer into ASIA, although it were with a ſmall army and euill appointed: for why, it was no eaſie matter for him to furniſh out the army with all things neceſſarie, which by the ſloth and ſparing of the late Emperours, had, to the great danger and diſhonor of the empire, bin vtterly neglected. Neuertheleſſe the Turkiſh Sultan, who at the ſame time with a great power inuaded the prouinces of the empire, hearing of his comming, and that he was a man of great valour, and doubting what power he might bring with him, retired himſelfe; and diuiding his army, ſent the one part thereof into the South part of ASIA, and the other into the North, which ſpoiled all the countrey before them as they went, and ſuddenly ſurpriſing the citie of NEO-CESARIA, ſacked it, and ſo laded with the ſpoile thereof departed. But the Emperor vnderſtanding thereof, and not a little grieued therewith, drawing out certaine bands and companies of the beſt and moſt readieſt ſouldiers in his army, and with them coaſting the countrey to get betwixt the Turks and home, vſed therein ſuch expedition, that he was vpon them before they were aware, and ſo ſuddenly charging them, brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that they betooke themſelues to their heeles, leauing behind them for haſte, their baggage and carriages, with all the priſoners and bootie they had before taken at NEO-CESARIA, and in their late expedition: yet was there no great number of them ſlain, for that the Chriſtians forewearied with long trauel, were not able far to follow the chace. From thence taking his way vnto SIRIA, he ſent part of his armie to MELITENA, and carried himſelfe from ALEPPO, a great booty both of men and cattel. At which time alſo the citie of HIERAPOLIS was yeelded vnto him, where hee ſhortly after built a ſtrong caſtle. But whilſt he there ſtaied, newes was brought vnto him, that the other part of his army which he had ſent away, was ouerthrowne by the Turks; for the reliefe of whom, he roſe with all haſt and marched towards them: but being in number farre inferiour vnto his enemies, hee was by them as hee lay encamped, incloſed round in ſuch ſort, as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible for him to haue eſcaped. At which time alſo the gouernour of ALEPPO traiterouſly reuolted from him, and ioyned his forces with the enemy, making now no other reckoning, but aſſuredly to haue taken him. But whileſt the Turks thus dreame of nothing but of a moſt glorious victorie, and were in mind diuiding the ſpoile, the Emperour without ſo much as the ſounding of a trumpet, ſuddenly iſſuing out of his trenches, when they leaſt thought he durſt ſo haue done, and reſolutely charging them home, put them to flight, and had of them a notable victorie, had he throughly proſecuted the ſame. After that, hauing taken diuers towns he came to ALEXANDRIA, in CILICIA, and there all about in the countrey bilited his army, becauſe of the approach of winter, and ſo returned himſelfe to CONSTANTINOPLE. The next ſpring the Turks, according to their vſuall manner inuading the frontiers of the Empire, did much harme about NEO-CESARIA: whereof the Emperor aduertiſed, went thither with his armie, and quickly repreſſing their furie, tooke his iourney to the riuer EVPHRATES, where leauing part of his armie with Philaretus for the keeping of thoſe frontiers, he himſelfe retired Northward into CAPADOCIA. But after his departure, the Turks ſeting vpõ Philaretus, put him to flight with his garriſons: and taking the ſpoile of the frontiers, entered into CAPADOCIA, waſting all as they went: and afterwards turning into CILICIA, ſacked ICONIVM a rich and populous citie. Whereof the Emperour vnderſtanding at SEBASTIA, made towards them: but hearing by the way that they had ranſackt the citie, and were for feare of his comming already retired, he ſent Chatagurio gouernor of ANTIOCH, with part of his armie to MOPSIPHESTIA, to ſtop the Turks of their paſſage. But they in the plaines of THARSVS were before diſtreſſed by the Armenians, and ſtript of all their rich prey: and hearing farther of the approach of the Emperors power, fled by night and ſo eſcaped: which the Emperor vnderſtanding, and hauing now well quieted thoſe prouinces, and the yeare farre ſpent, returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE. But after his departure, the Turks againe inuading the frontier prouinces, he ſent Manuel Comnenus, a valiant young man, Generall againſt them; who ſo preuailed, that the Emperor enuiyng at his honor, tooke from him a great part of his armie, and ſent him with a ſmall

A power into SIRIA. But as hee was vpon the way, he was by the Turkes entrapped neere vnto SEBASTIA, and there taken, moſt part of his armie being at the ſame time ouerthrowne and ſlaine: with which loſſe, the Emperour troubled, made great preparation to goe himſelfe in perſon againſt his enemies; who encouraged with the former victorie, ceaſed not to infeſt his territories. In the mean time by great fortune came Manuel Commenus home, together with the Turke that tooke him; who being fallen into the diſpleaſure of the Sultan, fled vnto the Emperor with his priſoner, of whom he was honorably entertained. All things now in a readines, for ſo great an expedition as the Emperor had in perſon purpoſed, he ſet forward: and after long trauell hauing paſſed CESAREA, he incamped at a place called CRYAPEGA: where for ſeuere execution done vpon certaine mutinous ſouldiers, one of the legions of his armie
B roſe in mutinie againſt him: whom (for all that) he quickly pacified with the terror of the reſt of his army, which he threatned to turne vpon them if they proceeded to forget their dutie. After that, remouing to THEODOSOPOLIS, he diuided his army, and ſent Ruſelius one of his beſt captains, with one part thereof againſt Chliat, and another part he ſent to beſiege MANTZICIERTS, retaining with himſelfe the reſt, being of no ſtrength. The Turkes in MANTZICIERTS finding themſelues not able long to hold out, fel to compoſition, and yeelded the citie. But ſhortly after, the ſouldiers left there in garriſon for the keeping thereof, going out to ſeeke for forrage, were by the Turks ſuddenly oppreſſed: which the Emperour vnderſtanding, ſent thither one Nicephorus Bryennius, with certaine companies to relieue the citie; who encountring with the Turks, and finding himſelfe too weake, ſent vnto the Emperor for aid:
C who not knowing the ſtrength of the enemies, blamed him of cowardiſe, yet ſent vnto him Nicephorus Baſilacius with part of his armie; who ioining his forces with Bryennius, and giuing the Turkes battell, put them to flight. But following too faſt vpon them vnto their trenches, and Bryennius making no great haſt after, he had his horſe ſlain vnder him, and ſo on foot heauily laden with armour, and not able to ſhift for himſelfe, was there taken and brought to the Sultan: who honourably entreated him, and oftentimes queſtioning with him concerning the Emperour, and ſhewing him his owne power, examined him alſo of the Emperours.

Tangrolipix was now dead, and the Sultan now in field againſt the Emperour, was Axan his ſon, a man of great wiſedom & diſcretion; who conſidering the doubtful euent of battel, ſent embaſſadors vnto the Emperor to intreat with him of peace. But hee (perſuaded by ſome of D his captains, that this motion made by the Sultan for peace, proceeded but of a meere feare and diſtruſt he had in his owne power, or els to gaine time vntill ſome greater ſtrength came) had ſmall regard of the embaſſadors or their meſſage, but proudly willed them to tel their maſter, That if he were deſirous of peace, he ſhould get him farther off, and leaue the place wherin he lay encamped, for him to lodge in: and ſo without other anſwer, comanded them away. Now had the Emperor (as is before ſaid) ſent away part of his army by Ruſelius againſt Chliat, whom he ſent now for in haſt again: but he hearing of the approach of the Sultan, by the perſuaſion of Tarchoniates, one of his captaines, was retired for his more ſafetie backe into the Romane frontiers, leauing the Emperour deſtitute of his helpe. At which time alſo a companie of the Scythians which ſerued in the Emperours campe, reuolted vnto the Turkes; not without

Who ſomewhat troubled with the Emperors ſo ſudden a reſolution, as being yet in ſom hope of peace, yet hauing put themſelues in order of battel, receiued the enemies charge; ſtill giuing a little ground, as men not greatly deſirous either to fight or to flie. This fight continuing long, and the day now declining, the Emperour doubting leaſt the Sultan ſhould ſend part of his army to aſſault his campe (from which he was now drawne ſomewhat far, and had left the ſame but weakly manned) cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, & ſo began orderly to retire himſelfe with them that were about him: which others a far off in the battell beholding, and F ſuppoſing him to haue fled, began themſelues to flie amaine. Of which ſo ſhamefull flight and ſudden feare Andronicus (the ſonne of Iohn Ducas, the late Emperour Conſtantine his brother, and by him created Cæſar, who with his ſonnes ſecretly enuied at the honour of Diogenes) was the cauſe: for he commanding a great part of the army, gaue it firſt out vnto ſuch as were about him, that the Emperor fled: and to increaſe the feare, turning his horſe about, fled towards the camp as fast as he could: after whom al the rest most disorderly followed: which the emperor be holding, and therewith not a little troubled, made a stand, labouring in vaine to haue staid the rest: for now the Turks incouraged with the sudden flight of the Christians, began hardly to pursue them, as men already ouerthrown by the hand of God; whom for al that the emperor with such as yet stood with him, for a space notably resisted. But being forsaken by the greater part of his army, & oppressed with the multitude of his enemies, being wounded himselfe, and his horse slain vnder him, he was with taken al imbrued his own bloud, & the bloud of his enemies, of whom he had wounded and slain many. The Sultan aduertised of his taking, at the first beleeued it not, supposing it rather to haue been some other great man: vntill that he was both by them, whom he had but a little before sent embassadour vnto him, and by Basilacius one of his captaines then prisoner with him, assured that it was vndoubtedly hee, which Basilacius brought before him to see if he knew him, fel downe prostrate at his feet, as before his dread Lord and Soueraigne. The Emperor brought before the Sultan, and humbling himselfe in such sort as best beseemed his heauie fortune, the Sultan presently took him vp, and thus cheerfully spoke vnto him: Grieue not noble Emperor (said he) at thy mishap, for such is the chance of war, ouerwhelming somtimes one somtimes another: neither feare thou any harme, for I will vse thee not as my prisoner, but as an Emperor: which he accordingly did, presently appointing him a princely pauillion, with all things answerable to his estate, setting him oftentimes at his owne boord, and for his sake enlarging such prisoners as he required. And after he had thus for certain daies honorably vsed him, and discoursed with him of many things, he concluded a perpetuall peace with him, vpon promise of a marriage to be made betwixt their children, and so with a safe conuoy sent him away with greater honor than was at an enemies hand to haue bin expected. The Emperour in Turkish attire, which the Sultan had bestowed vpon him, comming to THEODOSOPOLIS, there staid the curing of his wounds, & afterwards accompanied with the Sultans embassadors, set forward toward CONSTANTINOPLE. But all was now there changed: for vpon the report of his captiuity, Iohn the Cæsar with Psellus one of the chiefe Senators, and others of the same faction, which alwaies enuied at the honour of Diogenes, presently took the imperiall gouernment from Eudocia the Empresse, and thrusting her into a monasterie which she had built neere to PROPONTIS, set vp Michael Ducas her eldest son, Emperour, in stead of Diogenes: whose simplicity, Cæsar his vncle abusing with the rest, did now what they list. And hearing that Diogenes was now (contrary to their expectation) set at libertie by the Sultan, and comming towards the emperiall city, sent out letters euery way in the new Emperors name, vnto all the gouernours of the prouinces whereby he was to passe, not to receiue him as Emperour, or to do him any honor: which Diogenes vnderstanding, staid at the castle of DOCIA, whither some of his friends with such power as they were able to make, resorted vnto him. Against whom, Cæsar with the contrary faction first sent his son Constantine, and after that Andronicus his eldest sonne, both Diogenes his mortall enemies, with a great army: by whom Diogenes, with his friends and followers, were ouerthrowne and discomfited. Diogines himselfe flying to the citie of ADANA, was there hardly besieged by Andronicus, and in the end glad to yeeld himselfe, vpon condition, that hee should resigne the empire, and so for euer after to lead a priuate life. For whose safetie, certaine of the chiefe of the clergie sent of purpose from Michael the Emperor, gaue their faith: so Diogenes all attired in black, yeelded himselfe to Andronicus; by whom he was brought to COTAI, then the metropoliticall citie of PPHRIGIA, there to expect what further order should be taken for him from the court: during which time he fell sicke, being (as many supposed) secretly poisoned. But whilst he there lay languishing, an heauier doome came from the young Emperour, That he should haue his eies put out: which was forthwith in most cruell manner done; the clergie men that had before for his safetie gaged their faith, crying out in vaine against so horrible a cruelty. Thus depriued of his sight, he was conueyed into the Island of PROTA, where his eies for lack of looking to, putrifying, and worms breeding in them, with such an odious smel as that no man could abide to come nigh him, he in short time after died, when he had raigned three yeares, eight monethes. All which miserie was thought to haue happened vnto him through the malice of Cæsar, without the knowledge of the youug Emperour his nephew.

Axan hearing of the miserable end of the late Emperor Diogines, was therwith much grieued and the more, for that the league which he had to his good content so lately made with him,

A was thereby come to nought: wherfore in reuenge thereof, he with great power inuaded the imperiall prouinces; not for ſpoile & booty only, as in former time, but now to conquer and to hold the ſame. Againſt whom, Michael the Emperor ſent Iſaac Comnenus his Lieutenant, with a great army: who meeting with the Turks, & ioyning battell, was by them ouerthrown with all his armie, and taken priſoner; and glad afterwards for a great ſumme of mony to redeeme himſelfe. After which ouerthrow, the Emperor ſent his vncle Cæſar with another army againſt them, who was by Ruſelius, that had before reuolted from the Emperour, ouerthrowne at the riuer SANGARIVS, and taken priſoner; whom he for all that, ſhortly after ſet at libertie againe, and ioyning with him againſt the Turks, were both together by them diſcomfited and taken priſoners, but afterwards redeemed; Cæſar by the Emperour, and Ruſelius
B by his wife. This Ruſelius was a notable traitour, who ioyning with the Turks, did what hee liſt in the prouinces of the empire in the leſſer ASIA: for the repreſſing of whom, the Emperor ſent Alexius Comnenus, a young man, but verie politick and couragious; who ſecretly practiſing with the Turks that were great with Ruſelius, had him at laſt by them for a ſum of money betraied into his power: who forthwith ſent him to CONSTANTINOPLE to the Emperor, by whom he was impriſoned, but afterward ſet at libertie and employed againſt Bryennius and his brother, then vp in rebellion againſt the Emperour.

But to come neerer to the Turkiſh affaires. Cutlu-Muſes with his couſin Melech and o-C thers, were for feare of Tangrolipix their couſin fled into ARABIA, as is before declared, now in the beginning of the raigne of Axan, returned: and as the enuious competitors of his kingdom, hauing raiſed a great power of their friends and partakers, were now ready to haue tried the matter with him by plaine battell. Againſt whom alſo, the Sultan on the other ſide had brought into the field his whole forces, and was now likewiſe ready to haue incountred them neere vnto the city of ERES. But whilſt the Turks thus diuided, ſtood ready to deſtroy themſelues, the Caliph of BABILON (from whom though the Turks had taken all temporal ſoueraignty, yet in matters of religion ſtill held him in great reuerence and eſteem, as their chiefe Biſhop, and the ſucceſſor of their great Prophet) conſidering that nothing could be more dangerous to his ſect and religion, than that ciuil diſcention, the late confuſion and vtter ruine of the Saraſin empire, and authority of the Caliphs; and fearing the like effect in theſe new Saraſins, now the chiefe ſtay of the Mahometan ſuperſtition: ſetting aſide al pontifical formality, D whereby he was bound not to go out of his own houſe, came with all ſpeed, euen as the armies were now ready to ioyn battell, and thruſting himſelfe into the middeſt betwixt them, what with the reuerence of his perſon, what with his effectuai perſuaſion, wrought ſo much, and preuailed ſo far with both parties, that they were content to lay down their weapons, and to ſtand to his order, and iudgment: which was, That Axan the Sultan ſhould ſtil inioy his kingdom and territories, whole and entire vnto himſelfe as he did: and that Cutlu-Muſes and his ſons, aided by him, and ſo inuading the prouinces of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, ſhould thereof ſubdue ſo much as they could vnto themſelues, and to be thereof accounted the only Lords and gouernors: which order as it was vnto the Turks, and for the maintenance of the E Mahometan ſuperſtition, very wholſome and commodious, ſo was it vnto the Chriſtian commonweale and religion moſt dangerous and hurtful, as in proceſſe of time by proofe it appeared. For by this mean, in ſhort time after, Cutlu-Muſes with his couſins and ſons ſubdued all MEDIA, with a great part of ARMENIA, CAPADOCIA, PONTVS, and BYTHINIA and ioa great part of the leſſer ASIA. By the aid of this Cutlu-Muſes, and the fauor of the ſoldiers Nicephorus Botoniates aſpiring vnto the empire of CONSTANTINOPLE, diſplaced his maſter the Emperor, Michael Ducas, after he had raigned ſix years and ſix moneths, and in the habit of a Monke thruſt him into an Abbey: which vſurper by the iuſt iudgement of God, was at length requited euen with the ſame meaſure, & in like manner ſerued by Comnenus; who thruſting him out, ſucceeded himſelfe in the empire. Much it was that this Cutlu-Muſes, with his ſons and kinſmen did for the inlarging of the Turkiſh empire, by the helpe of the great F Perſian Sultan: whoſe forces, together with their own, in diuers countries cõducted by theſe worthie leaders his nigh kinſmen, & doing great matters, gaue occaſion for themſelues to be accounted Sultans, though indeed they were none, neither their names ſuch as are by ſom antient writers, and others of later time alſo reported; but vnto the Turks themſelues by thoſe names, either for Sultans, vnknown. family, hath Aithonus, and others following his report, deriued their Dogrisla, Aspasalemus, Me- G leclas, and Belchiaroc, whom they suppose to haue orderly succeeded Zaaoc, otherwise called Tangrolipix, in the Turkish empire, and to haue done great matters: whereas both by the report of the Turkes themselues, & the relation of the Greeks, it appears plainly, Axan (more truly called Ax-han, that is to say, the White king) to haue beene the son of Tangrolipix, and to haue succeeded him in the empire: and that by him the emperor Diogenes was taken, and not by Aspasalemus as they vainely imagine. As for Aspasalemus, whom the Turks by that name know not either any thing of his doings, it seemeth to haue beene a name corrupted of As- pam Sallarius, the brother of Tangrolipix and Habrami, and not his sonnes son as they would haue it. In like manner Meleclas also seemeth to haue been forged of Melech the son of Habra- H mi, Tangrolipix his brother, and not of Aspasalemus, as some without any good ground report.
Whom they finding to haue beene all great men in the Selzuccian family, with some others also, haue both corrupted their names, and giuen vnto them an imaginarie soueraigntie and succession in the Turks first empire, such as beside that the Turks themselues acknowledge not, is easily to be refelled out of the histories of the Greeks, who had with them still much to do. Wherefore leauing those supposed princes of the Turks, with their imaginarie sucthen had vnder his iurisdiction, all, as far as LAODICIA in SIRIA; yet not with so large pri-priuiledge as had Cutlu-Muses, vnto whom and his posteritie he had yeelded the absolute honour of a Sultan or King, ouer such conntries and prouinces as they should win from the Christians: but vnto these others his kiusmen, he gaue the gouerment of the aforesaid cities of DAMASCO and ALEPPO, in the frontiers of his dominion in SIRIA, conditionally that that they should still remaine his vassals, and hold of him as of their soueraigne, whatsoeuer they had, who neuertheless in short time mightily preuailed vpon the Egyptian, stil increasing the Turkish territorie with the losse of the Sarasins, whose name together with their empire, was now by the Turks almost quite driuen out of ASIA. K

But these proud branches of the Turkish Empire, thus ouerspreading the lesser ASIA, with the greatest part of SIRIA, were in short time after by the mercie of God, and the valour of the most Christian and most religious princes of the West, cut shorter, and brought againe into some better order. The full discourse whereof, worthy eternall memorie, by others inrolled in the antient records of fame, I purpose not at large to follow, but in breif to touch, for the orderly continuation of the present historie, hasting to the doings of this victorious nation of latter times, wherein we are to make a longer stay, as more pertinent vnto the dangerous estate of the present time.

Peter a French Hermit goeth on pilgrimage to Ierusalem.

It fortuned that whilest Cutlu-Muses and his sons, supported by the Sultan Axan their kinsman, thus mightily preuailed against the Christians in the lesser ASIA on the one side, and L Melech with his cousin against the Egiptian Caliph in SIRIA on the other: that one Peter a French Hermite mooued with a deuout zeale, according to the manner of that time, went to visit the sepulchre of our Sauior, with the other holy places at IERVSALEM: who comming into SIRIA, thē for the most part possessed by the Turks, & Sarasins, diligently noted by the way as he trauelled, the maners & fashions of these barbarous nations, their gouernmēt, their cities, their power and strength; but aboue all, the grieuous miseries of the poore oppressed Christians, that there liued in most miserable thraldom among them, without hope of releas:

temnd than feared: yet vnder such simple & homly feature lay vnregarded a most subtil sharp M & pearching wit, fraught with discretion and sound iudgment, stil applying to some good vse what he had in his long & painful trauel most curiously obserued. He commeth to IERVSA-LEM, & performing his deuotions there, saw the grieuous misery of the poore deuout Christians, so greatly & heauy, as that greater or more intollerable could none be: wherwith not a little

A little grieued, he entred into a deepe discourse thereof with Simon the Patriarke and Abbot of the monasterie of the Christians (there before built by certaine Italian Merchants) and with the master of the Hospitalers, by whom he was fully informed thereof, as of whatsoeuer else he required. After much graue conference, it was at length agreed vpon amongst them, that the Patriarke and the grand Master, should in their own, and the names of the other oppressed Christians, write their letters vnto the Pope & the other Christian Princes, concerning their miseries; & to craue their aid for the recouerie of those holy places out of the hands of those cruell Infidels: of which letters the deuout Hermit promised himself to be the trustie carrier, and of their petitions the most carefull soliciter. Whereupon the Patriarke and grand Master, in the name of the poore oppressed Christians wrot their letters vnto this effect:

B We the citisens of the holy Citie, and countreymen of Christ Iesus, dayly suffer those things which Christ our King suffered but once, in the last dayes of his mortalitie. Wee are dayly buffeted, scourged, and pierced: euery day some of vs are brained, beheaded, or crucified. We would flie from citie to citie, vnto the remotest parts of the earth, and remoone out of the middle of that land where Christ our Sauior wrought our redemption, to lead a poore exiled and vagrant life; were it not impietie to leaue the Land (sacred with the b rth, doctrine, death, resurrection, and ascension of our Sauiour) without inhabitants and Priests; and that there should first lacke such as would indure death and wo-raome, than such as wo-ld inflict the same; and that there should not be which would willingly die for Christ, as in battell, so long as there were any that would fight against them. These things truly wee most miserably suffer: yet was there a time when as our ancestors feared no such thing, either to themselues or their posteritie.

C And now perhaps the Christian kingdomes of the West line likewise without the least suspicion of feare: but let them be moued by our example & testimony. The strength of the Turks is daily increased, & ours diminished: The continuall gaining of new kingdomes giueth them courage: They haue alreadie deuoured the whole world, in hope. The forces of the Turks are fiercer and stronger than the forces of the Sarasins, their policies deeper, their attempts more desperat, their endeauors greater, and their successe fortunater. Yet haue the Sarasins attempted both Romes: they haue besieged Constantinople, and haue wasted not onely the sea coasts of Italie, but euen the heart of the land also. Then why should the kingdomes of the West presume themselues to stand in safetie and out of all perill, when as the ch.ese fortresses of the worla haue beene so indangered? What may the rest of Christendome promise vnto it selfe, seeing that

D Ierusalem (the seat and spectacle of the Christian Religion) hath beene besieged, taken, sacked, rased, and triumphed vpon? Seeing that of the Christian profession remaine but the poore and weake rel ques, i.s comparison of the antient whole entire bodie? This land, which is dayly besprinkled with our bloud, yea the bloud it selfe crieth out for reuenge. And we your most humble suppliants, prostrate at your feet, call vpon the helpe, aid, mercie, faith, and religion, of you most blessed Father, of the Kings, Princes, and Potentates; Christians not in name and profession onely, but in heart, soule, and sprit. Before the tempest thunder, before the lightning fall vpon you, auert from you and your children the storme hanging ouer your heads: defend vs your poore suppliants, deliuer your rel.gion from most wicked and accursed s.ccrie. You shall in so doing deserue immortall fame, and God shall requite your so great valour in this world with terrestriall kingdomes, and in the world to come with eternall blisse, whose sacred in-

The Letters of Simon Patriarke of Ierusalem, and of the graund Master of the Hospitaleis, vnto the Pope and other Christian Princes, in the behalfe of the oppressed christians in Ierusalem.

Rome and Constantinople, which was also called Noua Roma, or new Rome.

With these letters, and plentie of other secret instructions, the deuout hermit returning into Italie, and comming to Rome, deliuered his letters vnto Vrban the second of that name, then Pope, with a ful discourse of the miseries of the Christians vnder the Turkish thraldom, which he had seene at Ierusalem and other places as he trauelled; requesting his holy care for the redresse thereof: with whom he so preuailed, that shortly after, hee calling a Councell at Claremont in France, among other things, propounded the miserie of the poore oppressed Christians at Ierusalem, as an especiall matter to be considered of. And hauing caused the aforesaid letters, directed vnto him and the other Christian Princes, to be openly read in the

F Councell, whereunto three hundred and ten Bishops were then out of diuers parts of Christendome assembled, with the Embassadors of all countries, much moued the whole assembly to compassion: at which time also the hermit (whose flowing eloquence fully counteruailed what wanted in his feature, standing vp in the midst of the Councell, deliuered his message in the name of the afflicted Christians, with their heauie groanings and teares: which as they could could not be in letters expreſſed, ſo were they not hardly by the religious hermit (as by him G who hauing but lately ſeene both the miſerie of the men, and deſolation of the places, and at the heart touched with the griefe thereof) ſo liuely repreſented, as that it mooued the whole aſſemblie with the like ſimpathie of heauineſſe and griefe. Which the Pope perceiuing, tooke thereupon occaſion to enter into a large diſcourſe concerning that matter, with many effectuall reaſons perſuading the Fathers and Princes there preſent, of the neceſſitie of ſo religious a Warre to be taken in hand, for the deliuerance of their oppreſſed brethren out of the thraldome of the Infidells; and now as well with their preſent Decree, as afterwards at their returne home into their Countreys, by all meanes to further the ſame. Which notable perſuaſion, with the heauie complaint of the Hermit, and the equitie of the Cauſe, ſo much mooued the whole Councel, and the reſt there preſent, that they all as men inſpired with one H Spirit, declared their conſent by their often crying out, Deus vult, Deus vult, God willeth it, God willeth it: which words ſo then vttered by way of applauſe, were in the great and moſt ſacred expedition following, much vſed of the deuout Chriſtians, as the fortunate ſignall of their cheerefull forwardneſſe, euen in their moſt dangerous enterpriſes. Strange it were to tell, and hardly to be beleeued (but that the antient Hiſtories beare witneſſe of the like) how farre in ſhort dayes ſpace the report of this religious decreed warre was by flying Fame diſperſed.

An expedition agreed vpon by the Councel, for the relief of the Chriſtians oppreſſed in the Holy land.

The Councell diſſolued, and the reuerend Fathers returning euerie man home into his owne countrey, it pleaſed God by their effectuall perſuaſions ſo to worke with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, and people in generall, that in all countries and Prouinces in Chriſtendom, I were ſhortly to be ſeene men of all ſorts in great number, with red Croſſes on their breſts (the cogniſance of that ſacred expedition) readie of themſelues to ſpend both life and goods for the defence of the Chriſtian Religion, and recouerie of the Holy Land. The number of whom is of diuers diuerſly reported, but of moſt ſuppoſed to haue been three hundred thouſand fighting men: Of whom the chiefe Commanders were, Godfrey Duke of Lorrain, with his two brethren, Euſtace and Baldwin, all of the honourable Houſe of Buillon; Hugh ſyrnamed the Great, brother to Philip then the French King; Raymond and Robert Earles of Flanders; Robert Duke of Normandie, William the Conquerors ſonne; Stephan de Valoys Earle of Chartiers; Ademar Biſhop of Podie, the Popes Legat; and Peter the Hermit, not to be numbred amongſt the leaſt, as chiefe author of this moſt famous expedition: vnto whome manie K other honourable Princes ioyned themſelues, as partakers of their trauels, though not with like charge.

The chiefe commanders of the Chriſtians in their expedition into the Holy Land.

The firſt that ſet forward in this expedition, was one Gualter Senſanier a noble gentleman, with a great band of men: not long after whom followed Peter the Hermit, with fortie thouſand moe; who both trauelling thorow Germanie, Hungaria, and Bulgaria, were glad oftentimes, eſpecially in the further part of Hungarie and Bulgaria, to open themſelues a way with the ſword; and ſo with much labour, and no leſſe loſſe, came at length to Conſtantinople: where they were not greatly welcome vnto the Emperour Alexius Comnenus; who guiltie vnto himſelfe of the vnlawfull meanes whereby he had extorted the Empire from Nicephorus his predeceſſour, had that expedition of the Chriſtians into the Eaſt, in diſtruſt, as purpoſed againſt himſelfe: vntill that fully reſolued to the contrarie, by the Hermit and others; L and that a farre greater power was comming after, for the inuaſion of the Turkes, and recouerie of the Holy Land; he was content to relieue them now wearie of their long trauell: and afterward to make roome for them that were to come, ſhipped them ouer the ſtrait of Boſphorus into Aſia; who marching forward into Bithynia, encamped their Armie in the countrey not farre from the Citie of Nice. In the meane time Godfrey with his brethren, and diuers other Princes that had ioyned themſelues vnto him, with the Germaines and Loranois, and the greateſt part of the Armie, followed the ſame way that the Hermit had taken before him. At which time alſo Hugh the French Kings brother, with the Legare, the two Roberts (the one Duke of Normandie, and the other Earle of Flanders) and the reſt of the French M Commaunders, paſſing ouer the Mountaines into Italie, came to Rome, with a wonderfull great Armie: where taking their leaue of the Pope, becauſe they would be leſſe troubleſome vnto the Cities and Countreys whereby they were to paſſe, they diuided their great Armie into three parts; whereof the one part went to Brunduſium, and the other to Bary, and the third

A third to Hydruntum, vnto whom also Bohemund one of the great Princes of Apulia, joyned himselfe with twelue thousand good souldiers that followed him. From these three ports the Christian armie departing, and crossing the Adriaticke, arriued in safetie at Dirrachium, and nigh thereabout vpon the coast of Dalmatia: from whence they trauelled by land thorow Macedonia, to Constantinople; were they met with the Duke Godfrey and the rest of the Armie: whom also at the first, Alexius the Emperor is reported to haue but coldly entertained, as jealous of his owne estate; vntill that better persuaded of their designements and good meaning towards him, confirmed by many rich Presents sent vnto him by these strange Princes, he joyned with them in league: wherein it was agreed, That the Emperor during the time of this expedition should furnish them with new supplies of men, armour, victuals, and whatsoeuer else they should want: in regard whereof, the Princes on the other side promised to restore againe vnto the empire, what prouinces, countries, or cities they should happily gain out of the hands of the Turks and Sarasins, the Citie of Ierusalem onely excepted: which agreement was afterward on the suspicious Emperors part but slenderly performed. Neuertheless this league so made, hee granted them passage, and so transported them ouer the strait into Asia: only Bohemund, for an old grudge betwixt the Emperour Alexius and his father, would not come to Constantinople, but marching with his armie thorow the vpper Mysia and Thracia, came sooner than any man had thought, vnto the strait of Hellespontus, and so passed.

Godfrey duke of Buillon, and the other Christian Princes, meete together at Cõstantinople.

Now had Gualter, and the Hermit Peter, with their armie, lien two moneths in the countrey about Nice, expecting the comming of the rest of the Christian Princes: for why, they thought it not good before their comming to attempt any thing against the enemie, whome they knew to lie not farre off verie strong. But the common souldiers wearie of so long lying, and nought doing, and pinched with some wants; and withall disliking of Gualter their chiefe Commander, and the Hermit Peter, (of whose integritie and holinesse they had a greater opinion, than of his prowesse and direction) rose vp in mutinie, and displacing Gualter, made choice of one Raymund a valiant Germaine Captaine, for their Generall: by whose conduct they tooke Exorgum, a towne of purpose forsaken of the Turks. For they long before vnderstanding what a tempest of warre was growing vpon them out of Europe, sought by all meanes to cut off these that were alreadie come ouer, as the forerunners of a greater Armie following; and therefore had left them this Towne, as a bait to traine them out of their Trenches. And after that the Christians were thus possessed of the Towne, hauing layd certaine strong ambushes, they draue out certaine heards of cattell the more to allure them: all which certaine companies of the Christians brought in without any losse, the Turks stil winking thereat. With which bootie the Christians encouraged, went out three thousand of them to take in a little towne not farre off; who were by the Turks cut off and slaine euerie mothers sonne, as they were about to haue diuided the spoyle. Which ouerthrow reported into the towne, discouraged euen the chiefe commanders of the armie, so that they resolued no more to trie the fortune of the field, before the comming of their friends. Neuertheless the common soldiers condemning them of cowardise, chose them a new Generall, one Godfrey Burel, whom they now requested not, but enforced to go out to reuenge the death of their fellows. Which their rashnesse not long after turned to their owne destruction: for ten thousand of them going out of Exorgum, to forrage the countrey, were by the Turkes intrapped, and almost all slaine, except some few, which by speedie flight escaped. The Turkes prosecuting their victorie, layd hard siege to them in the towne also, vntill they had partly with famine, and partly with the sword consumed the most part of them. The Hermit with the poore remainder of his armie tooke his refuge to Cinite, a towne not farre off, before abandoned by the Turks; where with much adoo he defended himselfe vntil the comming of Duke Godfrey and the rest of the Princes.

Cutlu-Muses the Turke was now dead, hauing left vnto his son Sultan Solyman many large countries and prouinces, altogether gained from the Christians in Asia, whom he held in great subiection and thraldome. This warrelike Prince hauing discomfited and almost brought to nought the hermits forces, was no lesse careful for the withstanding of the great army following: which now being come into Bithynia, & lying before Nicomedia, remouing thence, laid siege to the city of Nice, called in antient time Antigonia, of Antigonus, the son of Philip that built it; and afterwards Nicea, of Nicea the wife of King Lysimachus. In this city dwelt many deuout Greeks, Christians; but in such thraldome vnto the Turks, that they could not do any G thing for the deliuerie of themselues. This siege indured longer than the Christian Princes had at the first supposed: who although they to the vttermost of their power forced the citie on three sides, yet was it still notably defended, new supplies stil comming from the Turks by the lake of Ascanius ioyning vpon the other side of the Citie. But after that the Christians, possessed of the lake, began on that side also to lay hardly vnto the citie, the Turkes discouraged, and seeing themselues beset round with their enemies, yeelded vp the citie the fift of Iu-1097 lie, in the yeare 1097, after it had been fiftie days besieged. But whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege, the Turks assailed that quarter of the campe where the Legat lay; by whom they were notably repulsed, and with great losse inforced to retyre vnto the mountains. In this Ci- H tie, amongst the rest of the Turks, was taken Solymans wife, with two of her children, whome the Princes sent prisoners to Constantinople. This city so woon, was according to the agreement before made, restored vnto Alexius the Emperour, whose fleet had in that siege done good seruice, by taking the lake from the Turks.

The city of Nice thus won, the Christian Princes remoouing thence with their armie, and marching thorow the countrie came the fourth day after vnto a riuer which watred many rich pastures: where as they were about to haue incamped, for the commodiousnesse of the place, and refreshing of the armie, suddenly news was brought into the quarter where Bohemund lay, now busie in casting vp his trenches, That the Turkes with a great armie were readie euen at hand to charge him. For Solyman hauing raised a great power of his owne, and aided by the Sultan of Persia his kinsman, was now come with an armie of 60000 strong to giue the Chri- I stians battell: of whose approch Bohemund aduertised, left the fortifying of his trenches, and putting his soldiers in array, set forward to meet him; sending word to the rest of the Princes that lay a far off, to be readie as occasion should require, to relieue him. These two armies con-A cruell battell fought betwixt the Turkes and the Christians. ducted by their most resolute chieftaines, meeting together, ioyned a most fierce and terrible battel, where in a short space the Turks lay slaine vpon heaps, in such sort that they serued the Christians in stead of bulwarks. But whilest Bohemund thus preuaileth in the battel, certain of the Turks horsemen wheeling about, brake in to Bohemunds camp (not as then altogether fortified, & but slenderly manned) where among the women, and other weake persons there left, they raised a great tumult & outcry, to the great appaling of them that were fighting in the bat-tel: which Bohemund perceiuing, withdrew himselfe with certain companies vnto the campe, K from whence he with great slaughter repulsed the enemie. But returning again into the battel, he found there a great alteration: for his soldiers whom before he had left as it were in possession of a most glorious victorie, were now so hardly laid vnto by the Turks, as that they were readie to haue turned their backes and fled. Neuertheless by his comming in, the battel was notably restored, and again made doubtful: when the enemie perceiuing how much the assaulting of the campe had troubled the Christians in battell, sent out certain troupes of horsemen again to assault the same; and had not failed vndoubtedly to haue taken it, being as aforesaid not yet fortified, had not Hugh the French Kings brother come in good time to the rescue: who comming in with 30000 horsemen, after hee had relieued the campe, entring directly into the battell, was notably incountred by a squadron of fresh soldiers of the Turks, by them L of purpose reserued for such euent. There began a battell more terrible than the first, with most doubtfull victorie: but at the length the Turks wearie of the long and cruell fight, and seeing most of their fellows slaine, began by little and little to giue ground, and so retyred into the mountains, which were not far off. In this battell, which continued a great part of the day, were slaine of the Turks 40000, and of the Christians about 2000. The next morning Bohemund, with the French Kings brother, came againe into the field, in such order as if they should presently haue giuen or receiued battell: where after they had stayd a great while, and saw no enemie to appeare, they fel to the honest burial of their dead; which were easily known from the Turks, by the red crosses vpon their garments, the cognisance of their sacred warre-that he had got the victorie: yet by the way as he went he burnt vp the countrey villages, and destroied or carried away whatsoeuer else he thought might stand the Christians in any stead, if they should further follow after him, leauing nothing for them but the bare ground.

After this victorie, Bohemund and the Christian Princes, without resistance marching thorow

A through the hot and drie countries of the lesser Asia, came to Antiochia a Citie of Pisidia, which they tooke with smal labour: and so marching vnto Iconium the principall citie of Cilicia, neere vnto the mountaine Taurus, were there also of the citisens courteously receiued, where they stayed certaine dayes for the refreshing of the armie. From thence they set forward toward Heraclea, where a great power of the Turks were reported to be assembled. But they, together with the garrison souldiers, vpon the approch of the victorious armie of the Christians, forsooke the citie & fled: the citisens being Christians (as they were yet generally in all the prouinces of the lesser Asia, but in great subiection to the Turks) and now rid of their cruel masters the Turkish garrisons, came forth, & meeting the Princes, gladly yeelded themselues with their citie vnto them, as vnto their deliuerers. Here the Christian Princes fully in-

B structed of the great feare and desperation of the Turks, who now in no place durst abide their comming; for the more speedy taking in of those countries but lately oppressed by the Turks, diuided their armie into two parts, leauing the one part thereof with Baldwin and Tancred in Cilicia, for the full subduing thereof, (who in short time tooke the cities of Tarsus, Edessa, and Manussa, with all the rest of the country, the Turkes not daring any where to abide their comming:) the other part of the army in the mean time entring into the lesser Armenia, tooke the same from the Turkes, which the Princes gaue to one Palmurius an Armenian, who had in that expedition done them great seruice. From thence they tooke their way into Capadocia, which they also subdued, driuing out the Turks in euery place, and tooke the cities of Cæsarea and Socor, where they staied a few days for the refreshing of the armie: with like successe they passed thorow the rest of the prouinces of the lesser Asia, of late possessed by the Turks,

C still chasing them out before them, and setting at libertie the poore oppressed Christians of those countries. Whereof Solyman (craving aid of Axan the Persian Sultan his cousin) grieuously complained, by his letters to him directed in this sort: The famous citie of Nice, with the countrey of Romania, which we by your aid and power haue gotten from the kingdome of the Greeks, and of your bountie possessed, the Christians of the kingdome of France haue again taken from vs. Thus was the late erected kingdome of the Turks in the lesser Asia, by these valiant Christian champions againe brought low, and they glad to retyre themselues further off into the mountains and more Easterne countries, vntill this heat was ouerpast; and that they, taking the benefit of the troubled state of the Greeke empire (afterwards rent in sunder by ambition and ciuil discord, D the ruine of the greatest monarchies) recouered not onely their former state, but became also dreadfull vnto the Greeke Emperors themselues: vpon whom they dayly gained in one corner or other, still maintaining the honour of their estate vntill the rising of the Othoman Familie, as in the processe of this Historie shall God willing be declared.

These victorious Princes (then, and to the worlds end famous) not contented, to their immortall praise, to haue thus driuen the Turks out of the lesser Asia, and recouered so many countries; bound themselues, as wel the Princes as the common soldiers, by solemne oath, neuer to returne againe into their countries, vntill they had accomplished that sacred war with the conquest of the Holy citie. So mounting together the high mountain Taurus, and descending thence as into another world, they came to the citie Maresia, which they tooke without

E resistance, the Turks there in garrison being by night before for feare fled: where the Christians for the refreshing of themselues certaine days staid. In the mean time Robert Earle of Flanders with 1000 men at armes, was sent out to giue summons vnto a citie called Artasia, about 15 miles distant from Antioch: when as the citisens beholding the ensignes of the Christians, suddenly tooke vp armes against the Turks there in garrison, which had of long holden them in subiection, and preuailing vpon them, slew them euery mothers son: whose heads they presented vnto the Earle, and receiued him into their citie. The Turkes to reuenge the death of their friends, and to recouer againe the citie before the comming of the rest of the armie, sent out about 10000 men out of Antioch; for thither was assembled a great power of them to haue hindred the further proceedings of the Christians: & being come neere to Artasia, they sent before certain stragling companies, of purpose to draw the new come Christians out of F the citie, lying in the mean time in ambush with the rest, of purpose to intrap them. With these stragling companies the Flemings sallying out lustily, encountred, & easily put them to flight; the Turkes indeed flying of purpose to bring them within the danger of the other, lying in ambush. cloſed round with their enemies, and there had vndoubtedly periſhed, had not the Citiſens (being Chriſtians) preſently ſallied out and right worthily relieued them. G

Shortly after, the Chriſtian Princes marching forward with their armie, were incountred by the Turke at the riuer Orontes, who had there thought to haue ſtayd their further paſſage: with whom Robert Duke of Normandie, who had the leading of the vantgard, had a hard conflict, vntill that the Turks, diſcouraged with the fight of the armie ſtill comming on, forſooke the bridge, and betooke themſelues to flight. So the Chriſtians paſſing the riuer, came and incamped with their armie before the famous citie of Antioch, the one and twentieth day of October, in the yere 1097: the gouernor whereof vnder the Perſian Sultan was one Caſſianus, (of ſome alſo honored with the name of a King) who at the comming of the Chriſtians, had with him in the citie ſeuen thouſand horſemen, and twentie thouſand foot of the Turkes, with great ſtore of victuals, and all manner of other prouiſions neceſſarie for the defence thereof. Antioch in Syria beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The deſcription of the famous citie of Antioch.

This citie, called in antient time Epidaphane, or Epiphane, and of the Hebrewes, Reblatha, ſometime the ſeat of the Syrian Kings, and afterwards the metropoliticall citie of Syria, hauing vnder it an hundred and fiftie Biſhops, (famous for many things, and amongſt others, for that it was the ſeat of the bleſſed Apoſtle S. Peter, and firſt place whereas the profeſſors of the Chriſtian religion tooke then the name of Chriſtians) ſituate vpon the riuer Orontes, about twelue miles from the ſea, and was then ſtrongly fortified both by Nature & Art, being compaſſed about with a double wall, the vttermoſt whereof was of hard ſtone, and the other of bricke, with 460 towers in the ſame, and an inpregnable caſtle at the Eaſt end thereof, whereunto was joyning a deepe lake, comming out of the great riuer, which watred the South ſide of the citie. Round about this ſtrong citie (one of the moſt aſſured refuges of the Turks) although it were in circuit great, lay the Chriſtian Princes encamped, except on that ſide which being defended with the high broken mountaines, is not there to be beſieged. Vpon whom the Turks out of the citie, during the time of the ſiege made many a fierce and deſperat ſallie, being ſtill by the Chriſtians moſt valiantly repulſed: eſpecially at the bridge which the Chriſtians had made of boats for their more commodious paſſage too and fro ouer the riuer. In this ſort was the ſiege continued vntill the beginning of Februarie, with many a bloudie skirmiſh. At which time ſuch abundance of raine fell, as that hardly could a man finde any place to lie drie in; and the ſcarcitie of victual grew ſo great in the campe, that many (horrible it is to ſay) to aſſuage their hunger, were glad to eat the dead bodies of their late ſlaine enemies. In theſe extremities many died of hunger and cold; yea their horſes alſo periſhed for want of meat, ſo that in the whole camp were ſcarcely left two thouſand horſes fit for ſeruice, the reſt being either all dead, or brought ſo low, as that they were altogether vnſeruiceable. Theſe miſeries dayly increaſing, diuers men of great account, whom no terror of the enemie could haue diſmaid, began ſecretly to withdraw themſelues out of the campe, with purpoſe to haue ſtolne home; among whom were Peter the hermit author of this war, and Tancred the nephew of Bohemund, who taken by the way, and brought backe with the reſt as fugitiues, were ſharply reprehended by Hugh the French Kings brother, as cowards, and traitors to their brethren and fellow ſoldiers, & ſo inforced to take a new oath for their fidelitie and perſeuerance. Bohemund in the mean time going to Arthuſia a town not far off, by good fortune cut off a great part of the Turks there in garriſon: who after their vſuall manner ſallying out to haue cut off the forragers of the Chriſtians, were now themſelues caught tardie: whereby the countrey for a time was more open for the diſtreſſed Chriſtian ſoldiers to ſeeke abroad for reliefe. But this libertie ſo lately gained laſted not long, when newes was brought vnto the campe, That the Turks in great number, out of the prouinces about Aleppo and Damaſco, were comming vnto the reliefe of their beſieged friends in Antioch. Neuertheleſſe the Chriſtians truſting to their own ſtrength, & the ſtrength of the place wherin they were incamped, lay ſtil, & at their comming ſo incountred them, that they ſlew 2000 of them, and put the reſt to flight. In which conflict the Chriſtians got great ſtore of prouiſion and victuals which the Turkes had thought to haue put into the city. The heads of the ſlaine Turks the Chriſtians ſet vpon ſtakes before the citie, to the more terrour of the defendants. This ouerthrow of the Turkes, wherein Caſſianus had loſt his eldeſt ſonne, with others of his beſt captains, ſo daunted the beſieged, that they requeſted a truce for a time of the Chriſtian princes: which granted, they of the city came oftentimes into the campe, and they of the campe likewiſe into the city: Caſſianus ſtil expecting reliefe I K L M

A liefe from the Persian Sultan. Whilest the Christians Princes were thus busie in Asia, the Venetians with a great flees of two hundred gallies scowring the seas, vnder the conduct of Henry Contarenus the Bishop, and of Vitalis the Dukes son, meeting with the gallies of Pisa at the Rhodes, and falling out with them, had with them a great fight, wherin the Venetians hauing the vpper hand, tooke eighteene of their gallies, & in them fiue thousand souldiers: whome they seeing to be marked with the red crosse, the cognisance of the sacred war, they presently set at libertie, together with the gallies, detaining only thirty of the better sort as hostages. After that, the Venetians sailing into Ionia, tooke the citie of Smyrna, and spoiled al along the coasts of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, before for feare abandoned by the Turks.

The truce before taken between the Turks and the Christians at the siege of Antioch, being B in short time after broken by the death of one Vollo a Frenchman, slaine by the Turkes; the war was againe begun, and the citie more hardly laid vnto than before. At which time the gouernor, who in the time of this long siege, which had now continued nine months, had lost most part of his best souldiers, was glad for the defence of so great a citie, to vse the seruice of diuers Christians, then dwelling in the citie. Among whom was one Pirrhus, a citizen of great reputation, vnto whom he had committed the guarding of a tower, called the two Sisters; but afterward S. Georges tower. This Pirrhus had secret intelligence with Bohemund Prince of Tarentum, with whom hee agreed to giue him there entrance into the citie, vpon condition, that he should of the other Christian Princes procure the gouernment of the citie to himself; and that he, with the rest of the Christian citizens in the citie, might bee at his hands well C vsed: which thing being easily obtained, all things agreed vpon, Bohemund with his souldiers were by night by Pirrhus let into the citie, who made way for the rest of the armie to enter. The citie thus taken, many of the Turks fled into the castle, the rest were put to the sword, man, woman, & child; and among them also many of the Christians, the furious souldiers taking of them no knowledge. Great wealth was there found, but small store of victuals. Cassianus the late gouernor flying out of the city to saue himselfe, in wandring thorow the mountains, fel into the hands of the Christian Armenians, who lately thrust out of Ierusalem, were fled thither for refuge, by whom he was there slaine. In the citie were slaine about ten thousand persons. Thus was the famous city of Antioch, which the Turks had long before by famin taken from the Christians, againe recouered the third day of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord God, 1098.

D The poore oppressed Christians in Ierusalem hearing of this so notable a victorie, gaue secret thanks vnto God therfore, & began to lift vp their heads in hope that their deliuerie was now at hand. Of this victorie, the Princes of the armie by speedy messengers & letters certified their friends in all countries, so that in short time, the fame thereof had filled a great part of the world. Among others, Bohemund Prince of Tarentum, vnto whom the citie was deliuered, sent the ioyfull newes thereof vnto Roger his brother prince of Apulia: whose letters as the most certain witnesses of the history before reported, I thought it not amisse here to set down:

E I suppose you to haue vnderstood by the letters of your sonne Tancred, both of the great feare of some of vs, and the battels which wee haue of late with our great glorie fought. But concerning the truce, and the proceeding of the whole action, I had rather you should be certified by my letters, than the letters of others. King Cassianus had required a time of truce: during which, our souldiers had free recourse into the citie without danger, vntill that by the death of Vollo a Frenchman, slaine by the enemie, the truce was broken. But whilst it yet seemed an hard matter to winne the citie, one Pyrrhus a citizen of Antioch, of great authoritie and much deuoted vnto mee, had conference with mee concerning the yeelding vp of the citie; yet vpon condition, That the gouernment thereof should be committed to mee, in whom he had reposed an especiall trust. I conferred of the whole matter with the Princes and great commanders of the armie, and easily obtained that the gouernment of the citie was by their general consent allotted vnto mee. So our armie entring by a gate opened by Pyrrhus, tooke the citie. Within a few dayes after, the towne Aretum was by vs assaulted, but not without some losse and danger to our per- F son, by reason of a wound I there receiued. I assure you much of the valor of your son Tancred, of whom I and the whole armie make such account and reckoning, as is to be made of a most valiant and resolute Generall. Farewell. From Antioch.

Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of Antioch, Corbanas (the Persian Sultan his lieutenant)

Edessa in vaine beseged by the Turks, lieutenant) with a great armie besieged Edessa, with purpose after the taking thereof, to haue relieued the citie of Antioch. But this being notably defended by Baldwin left there of purpose with a strong garrison for the defence thereof; the Turke fearing in the meane time to lose Antioch, the safest refuge of the Turks in all those parts, rose with his armie, and set forward against the Christians: where by the way, it was his fortune to meet with Sansadolus, Cassianus his son, but lately fled from Antioch, by whom he vnderstood of the losse of the citie; and by what meanes the same was most like againe to be recouered: vpon which hope, Corbanas with his mightie armie kept on his way, with a full resolution to set all vpon the fortune of a battel. Whose comming much troubled the Christians: for that although they were possessed of the citie, yet was the castle still holden by the Turks. Neuertheless leauing the Earle of Tholous in the city, with a competent power for the keeping in of them in the castle, they tooke the field with the whole strength of the armie, & so in order of battell expected the comming of their enemies: who couragiously comming on, as men before resolued to fight, ioyned with them a most terrible and bloudie battell. Neither were they in the citie in the mean time idle; for that the Turks in the castle hauing receiued in vnto them certaine supplies from Corbanas, sallied out vpon them that were left for the safegard of the citie, and had with them a cruell conflict. Thus both within the citie and without, was to be seene a most dreadful fight of resolute men, with great slaughter on both sides: yet after long fight & much effusion of bloud, the fortune of the Christians preuailing, the Turkes began to giue ground, and afterwards betook themselues to plain flight, whom the Christians hardly pursuing, made of them a wonderfull slaughter. In this battell were slain of the Turks aboue an hundred thousand, and of the Christians about foure thousand two hundred. There was also taken a great prey; for besides horses and other beasts for burden, were taken also fiue thousand camels with their lading. The next day, being the 28 of Iune, the castle was by the Turks (now dispairing of relicfe) yeelded vp vnto the Christians.

Corbanas the Sultans lieutenant, with a great armie commeth to recouer againe the citie of Antioch.

Antioch thus taken, Hugh the French kings brother, syrnamed the Great, was sent from the rest of the Princes to Constantinople, to haue deliuered the citie vnto Alexius the Emperor according to the agreement before made. But he, guiltie in conscience of his owne foule dealing with them, vnto whom he had sent no relicfe at all during the long and hard siege of Antioch; neither performed any thing of that he had further promised, and therefore knowing himselfe hated of them; had in distrust so great an offer of the princes, so euill deserued, and therfore refused to accept therof. Whereupon Bohemund by the general consent of the whole armie was chosen Prince, or (as some call him) King of Antioch.

After this long siege and want of victuals, ensued a great plague in the army of the Christians, the Autumne following, whereof it is reported fiftie thousand men to haue died, and amongst them many of great accouat. But the mortalitie ceasing, the Christians in Nouember following, by force tooke Rugia, and Albaria, two cities, about two dayes iourney from Antioch: where dissention arising betwixt Bohemund and Raimund, who of all others only enuied at his preferment vnto the principalitie of Antioch: Bohemund for the common causes sake, gaue way vnto his aduersarie, & retired with his souldiers backe againe to Antioch; after whom followed the Duke Godfrey, and the Earle of Flanders with their regiments. The rest of the Princes wintred some at Rugia, some at Albaria, from whence Raimund made sundrie light expeditions further into the enemies countrey: but the Spring approching, the Christian Princes with all their power tooke the field againe. Bohemund with them that remained with him, departing from Antioch, besieged Tortosa. Raimund in the meane time with the rest, besieging the citie of Tripolis: who become much more insolent than before, by reason of some fortunate roades hee had made vpon the enemies the last winter, ceased not still to maligne Bohemund and his proceedings: matter enough to haue diuided the whole power of the Christians, & to haue turned their weapons vpon themselues: which Bohemund well considering, rose with his army; and because he would not with his presence trouble the proceeding of the religious war, retired himselfe to Antioch. After whose departure, Godfrey & the Earle of Flanders, tooke Gabella, a citie about twelue miles from Laodicia, and from thence returned againe to the siege of Tortosa, whether Raimund came also with his armie, hauing before driuen the gouernour of Tripolis to such composition as pleased himselfe, and to furnish him with such things as he wanted. Thus was Tortosa hardly on three sides besieged by the Christians, but so notably defended by the Turkes, that after three moneths hard siege, the Christians were glad to depart thence: and marching long the sea side, spoiled the countrey about Sidon. But forasmuch as that citie was not easily to be won, they left it, and encamped before Ptolemais, which they also passed by: the gouernour thereof sending them out victuals, with such other things as they wanted; and vpon summons giuen, promising to yeeld the citie after they had once woon the citie of Ierusalem. From thence they came to Cesarea in Palestine, where they solemnly kept the feast of Whitsontide; and so to Rama, which they found for feare forsaken of the Infidels. Marching from Rama, and drawing neere to Ierusalem, they in the vantgard of the armie, vpon the first descrying of the Holy citie, gaue for ioy diuers great shouts and outcries, which with the like applause of the whole army was so doubled and redoubled, as if therewith they would haue rent the very mountaines, and pierced the highest heauens. There might a man haue seene the deuout passions of these most worthy and zealous Christians, vttered in right diuers manners: some, with their eyes and hands cast vp towards heauen, called aloud vpon the name and helpe of Christ Iesus; some, prostrate vpon their faces, kissed the ground, as that whereon the Redeemer of the world sometime walked: others, ioyfully saluted those holy places which they had heard so much of, and then first beheld: in briefe, euery man in some sort expressed the ioy he had conceiued of the sight of the Holy citie, as the end of their long trauell.

This most antient and famous citie, so much renowned in holy Writ, is scituate in an hillie countrey; not watred with any riuer or fresh springs, as other famous cities for most part be; neither yet was it wel seated for wood, or pasture ground: but what wanted in these, and such other benefits of nature, was by the extraordinary blessings of the most highest so supplied, as that the Iews there dwelling, so long as they kept the ordinances of the Lord, were of al other people in the world iustly accounted the most happie and fortunate. Yet in those so blessed times, was this citie for the sin of the people oftentimes deliuered into the enemies hand, and the glorie therof defaced; as wel appeareth by the whole course of the historie of holy scripture, as also by the antient & approoued histories, as well of the Iewes themselues, as others. Neuertheless it stil rose againe (though not in like glorie as before in the time of king Dauid, Salomon, & the other next succeeding kings) and so was still repeopled by the Iews, vntill that at last according to the foretelling of our Sauiour Christ, it was with a great and of all others most lamentable destruction, vtterly rased and destroied by the Romans, vnder the leading of Vespatian the Emperour, and his noble sonne Titus, fortie yeares after our Sauiour his precious death and passion. Since which time, it was neuer vntill this day againe repaired, or yet well inhabited by the Iews; but lying buried in the ruins of it selfe, all the raigne of Domitian, Nerua, and Traian, vntill the time of the great Emperour Ælius Adrianus, it was again by him re-edified about the yeare 136, and after the name of him called Ælia; who together with the name changed also in some part the antient situation of the city. For wheras before it was seated vpon the steep rising of an hil, in such sort that towards the East and the South it ouerlooked the whole ground, hauing only the Temple and the castle called Antonia, in the highest part of the citie; Adrian translated the whole citie vnto the very top of the hill, so that the place where our blessed Sauior suffered his most bitter passion, with the Spulchre wherein he was also laid, and from whence he in glory rose again, before without the citie, were then inclosed within the wals therof, as they are at this day to be seen. Yet for all that, the Emperor being dead, in processe of time this new built citie recouerd again the antient name of Ierusalem, whereby it hath euer since, and is at this day yet knowne. This city so re-edified, the Emperor first gaue vnto the Iewes, whom he afterwards thrust out againe for their rebellion, and gaue it to the Christians to inhabit; ouer whom, one Marke, first Bishop of the Gentiles there, had the charge. But forasmuch as the Roman Emperors were at that time altogether Idolaters and persecutors of the poore Christians, the Church also at Ierusalem, with others, endured sundry & many grieuous persecutions, vnder the emperors Antonius, Commodus, Seuerus, Maximinus, Valerianus, Aurelianus, Diocleſianus, and Maxentius, vntill that at length Constantine the Great, conuerted vnto the faith of Christ about the yeare of Grace 320, suppressing the Pagan Idolatry, gaue generall peace to the afflicted Church: wherby the Christian church at Ierusalem, for the space of three hundred yeares after, happily flourished vnder the Greeke emperors, vntill the time of the emperor Phocas; who hauing most cruelly slain the good Empe-Ierusalem re-edified by the great Emperour Aelius Adrianus.

A briefe discourse of the state & fortune of the Holy citie of Ierusalem, from the destruction there of, vnder Vespatianus the Emperor, and Titus his sonne, vntill it was now agian erecouered out of the hands of the Infidels by Godfrey of Baillon and the other Christian princes of the west.

by vnto Choſroe the Perſian King, in reuenge of the death of Maurice his father in law, with all his power to inuade Syria: who as a tempeſt bearing downe all before him, tooke alſo by force the citie of Ieruſalem, hauing that yere, which was about the yere ſix hundred and ten, ſlain almoſt an hundred thouſand Chriſtians. But Phocas the vſurper beeing by them of his guard moſt cruelly ſlaine, and Heraclius ſucceeding in his ſtead, Choſroe was by him againe driuen out of Syria, and the holy citie againe recouered, about the yere 624. In theſe great wars againſt the Perſians, Heraclius had vſed the help of the Arabians, called Scenite, a warlike peo- H B ple of Arabia Deſerta, altogether giuen to the ſpoile: who, the wars now ended, expecting to haue receiued their pay, were contrary to their expectation, and without al reaſon reiected by them that ſhould haue paid them, with very foule and contumelious words; as, that there was not mony enough to pay the Chriſtian ſoldiers of the Latines & the Greeks, much leſſe thoſe vile dogs (whom they ſo called, for that they had but a little before receiued the damnable doctrine of the falſe Prophet Mahomet, the great ſeducer of the world, who euen in that time flouriſhed.) Vpon which diſcontentment they at their returne reuolted from the empire, and ioined themſelues vnto their great Prophet, & ſo afterwards vnto the Caliphs his ſucceſſors, extending his doctrine, together with his ſoueraigntie, to the vtmoſt of their power: and that with ſo good ſucceſſe, that in ſhort time they had ouerrun all Æ~~gypt~~, Syria, the land of Promiſe, and taken the holy citie. With theſe (the diſciples of Mahomet and his ſucceſſors, the Saraſins, for ſo now they would be called) the Greeke Emperours enſuing had for certaine yeres diuers conflicts, with diuers fortune, for the poſſeſſion of Syria. But at length wearied out, and by them ouercome, they left the aforeſaid countries wholly to their deuotion. Hereby it came to paſſe, that the Saraſins for the ſpace of 370 yeres following held theſe countries, with many others in great ſubiection, oppreſſing ſtill the poore Chriſtians in Ieruſalem with moſt grieuous tributes and exactions: vnto whom they yet left a third part of the citie for them to dwell in, with the Temple of the Sepulchre of our Sauior, and mount Sion; not for any deuotion, either vnto them, or thoſe places, but for that it yeelded them a great profit by the recourſe of deuout Chriſtians trauelling thither: reſeruing in the meane time vnto themſelues, the other two parts of the citie, with the Temple of Saloman, before re-edified by the Chriſtians. Now whileſt the Saraſins thus triumph it in the Eaſt, and not in the Eaſt only, but ouer a great part of the Weſt alſo; contenting themſelues with ſuch tributes as they had impoſed vpon the ſubdued nations and countries; vp ſtart the Turks, a vagrant, fierce, and cruell people; who firſt breaking into Aſia (as is before declared) and by rare fortune aſpiring vnto the kingdome of Perſia, ſubdued the countries of Meſopotamia, Syria, with the greateſt part of the leſſer Aſia, and Iudæa, together with the Holy citie: who both there and in all other places, held the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians in ſuch ſubiection and thraldome, as that the former gouernment of the Saraſins ſeemed in compariſon of this to haue bin but light and eaſie. Neither was there any end or releaſe of theſe ſo great miſeries to haue bin expected, had not God in mercy by the weake means of a poore hermit, ſtirred vp theſe moſt worthy Princes of the Weſt to take vp arms in their defence, who hauing with their victorious armies re-couered the leſſer Aſia, with a great part of Syria, were now come vnto this Holy citie. L Ieruſalem beſie-ged by the Chriſtians.

The gouernor of Ieruſalem vnderſtanding by his eſpials, of the proceedings of the Chriſtians, had before their approch, got into the citie a very ſtrong garriſon of right valiant ſouldiers, with good ſtore of all things neceſſarie for the holding out of a long ſiege. The Chriſtians with their army approching the city, encamped before it on the North; for that toward the Eaſt, & the South, it was not wel to be beſieged, by reaſon of the broken rocks and moun-taines. Next vnto the citie lay Godfrey the Duke, with the Germans and Loranois: neere vnto him lay the Earle of Flanders, and Robert the Norman: before the Weſt gate lay Tancred and the Earle of Tholous: Bohemund and Baldwin were both abſent; the one at Antioch, the other at Ediſſa. The Chriſtians thus ſtrongly encamped, the fift day after gaue vnto the citie a fierce aſſault, with ſuch cheerefulneſſe, as that it was verily ſuppoſed, it might haue beene euen then M woon, had they beene ſufficiently furniſhed with ſcaling ladders: for want whereof, they were glad to giue ouer the aſſault and retire. But within a few days after, hauing ſupplied that defect, and prouided all things neceſſarie, they came on againe afreſh, and with all their power gaue vnto the citie a moſt terrible aſſault, wherein was on both ſides ſeene great valour, po-licie,

A licie, and cunning, with much ſlaughter, vntil that at length the Chriſtians wearie of the long fight, and in that hot countrey, and moſt feruent time of the yeare, fainting for lacke of water, were glad againe to forſake the aſſault, and to retire into their trenches: only the well of Siloe yeelded them water, and that not ſufficient for the whole campe; the reſt of the wels which were but few, being before by the enemie either filled vp or elſe poiſoned.

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Ieruſalem: a fleet of the Genowaies arriued at Ioppa; at which time alſo a great fleete of the Ægyptian Sultans lay at Aſcalon, to haue brought reliefe to the beſieged Turkes in Ieruſalem, whereof the Genowaies vnderſtanding, and knowing themſelues too weake to encounter them at ſea, took all ſuch things out of their ſhips as they thought good, and ſo ſinking them, marched by land vnto the campe. There was B amongſt theſe Genowaies diuers enginers, men (after the manner of that time) cunning in making of all manner of engines fit for the beſieging of cities: by whoſe deuice, a great mouing tower was framed of timber and thick plancks, couered ouer with raw hides, to ſaue the ſame from fire: out of which the Chriſtians might in ſafety greatly annoy the defendants. This tower being by night brought cloſe to the wall, ſerued the Chriſtians in ſtead of a moſt ſure fortres in the aſſault the next day: where whilſt they ſtriue with warlike valor & doubtful victory on both ſides, from morning vntil midday, by chance the wind fauouring the Chriſtians, caried the flame of the fire into the face of the Turks, wherwith they had thought to haue burnt the Tower, with ſuch violence, that the Chriſtians taking the benefit therof, & holpen by the tower, gained the top of the wal: which was firſt footed by the Duke Godfrey, & his brother C Euſtace, with their followers, and the enſignes of the Duke there firſt ſet vp, to the great encouraging of the Chriſtians, who now preſſing in on euery ſide, like a violent riuer that had broken ouer the banks, bare down all before them. All were ſlain that came to hand, men, women, & children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition: the ſlaughter was great, & the ſight lamentable, all the ſtreets were filled with bloud and the bodies of the dead, death triumphing in euery place. Yet in this confuſion, a wonderful number of the better ſort of the Turks, retiring to Salomons temple, there to do their laſt deuoire, made there a great and terrible fight, armed with deſpaire to indure any thing; & the victorious Chriſtians no leſſe diſdaining, after the winning of the citie, to find there ſo great reſiſtance. In this deſperat conflict, fought with wonderful obſtinacie of mind, many fel on both ſides: but the Chriſtians came on ſo fiercely, D with deſire of bloud, that breaking into the temple, the foremoſt of them were by the preſſe of them that followed after, violently thruſt vpon the weapons of their enemies, & ſo miſerably ſlaine. Neither did the Turks thus oppreſſed, giue it ouer, but as men reſolued to die, deſperatly fought it out with inuincible courage, not at the gates of the Temple only, but euen in the midſt thereof alſo, where was to be ſeene great heaps, both of the victors and the vanquiſhed; ſlaine indifferently together. All the pauement of the Temple ſwam with bloud, in ſuch ſort, that a man could not ſet his foot, but either vpon ſome dead man, or ouer the ſhooes in bloud. Yet for all that, the obſtinate enemie ſtill held the vaults and top of the Temple, when as the darkeneſſe of the night came ſo faſt on, that the Chriſtians were glad to make an end of the ſlaughter, & to ſound a retrait. The next day (for that proclamation was made, for mercy to E be ſhewed vnto all ſuch as ſhould lay downe their weapons) the Turks that yet held the vpper part of the Temple, came downe and yeelded themſelues. Thus was the famous citie of Ieruſalem with great bloudſhed, but far greater honor, recouered by theſe worthy Chriſtians, in the yeare 1099, after it had beene in the hands of the Infidels aboue foure hundred yeares.

The Genowaies come to the ſiege.

A moſt cruell and bloudie fight, betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, euen in the Temple of Ieruſalem.

The next day after, hauing buried the dead, and cleanſed the citie, they gaue thanks to God with publicke praiers and great reioycing. The poore Chriſtians before oppreſſed, now ouercome with vnexpected ioy, welcomed their victorious brethren with great ioy & praiſe; and the ſoldiers embracing one another, ſparing to ſpeake of themſelues, freely commended each others valour. Eight daies after, the princes of the armie meeting together, began to conſult F about the choice of their king: among whom was no ſuch difference, as might well ſhew which was to preferred before the others. And although euery one of them for proweſſe and deſert, ſeemed worthy of ſo great an honor, yet by the generall conſent of all, it was giuen to Robert Duke of Normandie: who about the ſame time hearing of the death of the Conquerour his father, and more in loue with his fathers new gotten kingdome in England, in hope thereof, refuſed the kingdome of Hieruſalem, then offered vnto him: which at his returne he found found possessed by William Rufus his yonger brother, and so in hope of a better, refusing the worse, vpon the matter lost both.

Godfrey Duke of Buillon by the generall consent of the Christian army chosen first king of Ierusalem.

After whose departure, Godfrey of Buillon Duke of Loraine (whose ensigne was first displaid vpon the walls) was by the generall consent both of the Princes and the armie, saluted King. He was a great soldier, and indued with many heroical vertues, brought vp in the court of the Emperour Henrie the fourth, and by him much employed. At the time of his inauguration, he refused to be crowned with a crowne of gold: saying, That it became not a Christian man there to weare a crown of gold, where Christ the Sonne of God had for the saluation of mankind, sometime worne a crowne of thorne. Of the greatest part of these proceedings of the Christians, from the time of their departure from Antioch, vntill the winning of the Holy Citie, Godfrey by letters briefly certified Bohemund, as followeth:

After long trauell, hauing first taken certaine townes, wee came to Ierusalem: which citie is enuironed with high hils, without riuers or fountaines, excepting onely that of Salomons, and that a very little one. In it are many Cisternes, wherein water is kept, both in the citie and the countrey thereabout. On the East, are the Arabians, the Moabits and Ammonits. On the South, the Idumæans, Ægyptians and Philistians: Westward alongst the sea coast, lie the cities of Ptolemais, Tyrus, and Tripolis: and Northward, Tiberias, Cesarea, Philippi with the countrey Decapolis and Damasco. In the assault of the Citie, I first gained that part of the wall that fell to my lot to assaile, and commanded Baldwin to enter the citie: who hauing slaine certaine companies of the enemies, broke open one of the gates for the Christians to enter Raymond had the citie of Dauid, with much rich spoile yeelded vnto him. But when wee came vnto the Temple of Saloman, there wee had a great conflict, with so great slaughter of the enemie, that our men stood in bloud aboue the ancles: The night approching wee could not take the vpper part of the Temple, which the next day was yeelded, the Turkes pittifully crying out for mercie: and so the Citie of Ierusalem was by vs taken, the fifteenth of Iuly, in the yeare of our redemption 1099, thirtie nine dayes after the beginning of the siege, foure hundred and nine yeares after it fell into the hands of the Sarasins in the time of Heraclius the Emperour. Besides this, the Princes with one consent saluted mee (against my will) King of Ierusalem: who although I feare to take vpon mee so great a kingdome, yet I will doe my deuoire, that they shall easily know mee for a Christian King, and well deseruing of the vniuersall Faith, but loue you me as you do, and so farewell. From Ierusalem.

Whilest these things were in doing at Ierusalem, such a multitude of the Turkes, and Sarasins their confederates (now in their common calamitie all as one) were assembled at Ascalon (a citie about fiue and twentie miles from Ierusalem) to reuenge the iniuries they had before receiued, as had not before met together in all the time of this sacred war. Against whom, Godfrey (the late Duke, and now King) assembled the whole forces of the Christians in those countries, and leauing a strong garrison in the new woon citie, set forward: and meeting with them, ioined a most dreadfull and cruell battell; wherein (as most report) were slaine of the Infidels, an hundred thousand men, and the rest put to flight. The spoile there taken, far exceeded all that the Christians had before taken in this long expedition. Godfrey after so great a victorie, returning to Ierusalem, gaue vnto God most humble thanks. The rest of the Princes returned either to their charge, as did Bohemund to Antioch, Baldwin to Edessa, Tancred into Galiley, whereof hee was created Prince; or else hauing now performed the vttermost of their vowes, returned with honour into their owne countries. This was of all others the most honourable expedition that euer the Christians tooke in hand against the Infidels, and with the greatest resolution performed; for the most part, by such voluntarie men, as moued with a deuout zeale, to their immortall praise, spared neither life nor liuing in defence of the Christian faith and religion; all men worthy eternall fame and memorie. Not long after, ensued a great pestilence (the ready attendant of long war & want) whereof infinit numbers of people died, and among the rest Godfrey, the first Christian King of Ierusalem, neuer to be sufficiently commended: who with the generall lamentation of all good Christians, was honourably buried

Whose tombe is yet at this day there to be seene, with an honourable inscription thereupon. 1100

After the death of Godfrey, the Christians made choice of Baldwin his brother, Countie of Edessa, who leauing his former gouernment to Baldwin syrnamed Burgensis, his neere kinsman, came to Ierusalem honorably accompanied, and was there by the Patriarke on Christmas day with all solemnitie crowned king, in the yere 1101. He aided by the Venetians & Genoways at sea, and by Bohemund King of Antioch, by land, tooke from the Infidels the citie of Cesarea 1101 B Stratonis, standing vpon the sea side, and ouerthrew certaine companies of the Ægyptian Sultans at Rama. But vnderstanding that the Christian Princes of the West were comming to his aid with a new power, he glad thereof, went to meet them, and safely conducted them to Ierusalem alongst the sea coast, by the cities of Berythus, Sidon, Tyre, and Ptolemais, all yet holden by the enemie. At which time the Turkes at Ascalon hauing receiued great aid from the Arabians and Ægyptians, inuaded the country about Rama; where betwixt them and the Christians was fought a most cruell battell, wherein the Christians receiued a most notable ouerthrow, many of their great commanders being there slaine; and among the rest, Stephan Earle of Charters, (but lately returned home from the former expedition, & now come backe againe) and Stephen Earle of Burgondie and Tholous: yea the King himselfe hardly escaped the enemies hands, and after many dangers came at length to Ioppa, after it had been constant-C ly before reported him to haue been in that battell also slaine. Who hauing there in haste repaired his armie, came againe speedily vpon his enemies, fearing as then nothing lesse; and ouerthrew them with such a slaughter, as that they had small cause to rejoyce of their former victorie. Neither were the rest of the Christian Princes in the other parts of Syria and Palestine, in the mean time idle, but sought by all means to inlarge their territories. Tancred prince of Galilie hauing raised a great power, tooke Apamea the metropoliticall citie of Cœlesyria, and after much toyle woon also the citie of Laodicea. Balan also the Gouernor of Edessa, besieging the citie of Carras, had brought the besieged Turks to such extremitie, that they were about to haue yeelded the citie; when suddenly he was set vpon by a great armie of the D Turks sent from the Persian Sultan for the reliefe of the besieged, & being there ouerthrown, was himselfe there taken, with Benedict the Bishop, and one Ioscelin his kinsman: who after fiue yeares captiuitie, found meanes with the Turke that had taken them, to redeeme themselues, to the great offence of the Persian Sultan, and of the Sultan Solyman.

King Baldwin after the late victory, liued for a season at some good rest in Ierusalem, vnmolested of his enemies: but knowing his greatest safetie among such warlike people, to consist in arms, he vpon the sudden raised the whole strength of his kingdome, and laid siege to Ptolemais, otherwise called Acon, a city of Phœnicia, standing vpon the riuage of the sea; where he found such resistance, that he was glad to raise his siege and depart, hauing done nothing more than spoyled the pleasant places about the citie. By the way in his returne backe againe E it fortuned him to meet with certaine companies of the enemies aduenturers, by whom he was in a skirmish mortally wounded, although he died not thereof in long time after: for albeit that the wound was by his surgeons healed vp, yet was the griefe thereof so great, that at length it brought him to his end. Yet he notwithstanding the former repulse, the next yere incouraged by the comming of the Genoa fleet, laid hard siege againe to Ptolemais both by sea and land, which after twentie dayes siege was by composition yeelded vnto him. King Baldwin mortally wounded.

Shortly after, the gouernor of Aleppo, with certaine other of the Turks great captaines in those quarters, hauing ioyned their forces together, and so inuaded the countrey about Antioch, were by Tancred (whom Bohemund at his departure into Italie had left gouernuor of that citie) notably incountred and put to flight. At which time also the Caliph of Ægypt sending great forces both by sea and land against the King of Ierusalem, was in both places discomfi-F ted, at land by the Christians, and at sea by tempest. Ptolemais woon by K. Baldwin.

Bohemund in the mean time, with a great armie of voluntarie men and others (wherein he is reported to haue had fiue thousand horse, and forty thousand foot) returning towards the Holy Land, in reuenge of many iniuries done by Alexius the Emperour, vnto the souldiers of this ſacred war, contrarie to his faith and promiſe to them before giuen; by the way landed his men in Epirus, and grieuouſly ſpoyled the countrey about Dirrachium, part of the Empe- G rors dominion. Neither made he an end of ſpoyling, vntill he had inforced the Emperour for redreſſe of ſo great harmes, to make peace with him, and again by ſolemne oath to promiſe all ſecuritie and kindneſſe vnto all ſuch Chriſtian ſouldiers as ſhould haue occaſion to trauell too or fro thorow his countries, during the time of this religious war. After which agreement he put to ſea againe, and ſo returned for Ieruſalem: but whileſt he ſtayed at Antioch, he ſhortly after there died in the yeare 1108, leauing the principalitie thereof vnto his young ſonne Bohemund a child, vnder the tuition of his nephew Tancred.

Robemund dieth at Antioch.

Yet were the cities Berytus, Sidon, and Tyre, alongſt the ſea coaſt, in the enemies poſſeſſi- H on: for the gaining whereof Baldwin the King raiſed a great armie, and ſo came and laid ſiege to Berytus, which after many ſharpe aſſaults he at length won, the 23 day of Aprill, in the yere 1111 1111, and put to ſword moſt part of them that he found therein. The ſame yeare alſo he, aſſi-Sidon woon. ſted by a fleet ſent vnto him out of Norway, beſieged the citie of Sydon: which the citiſens (ſeeing themſelues now beſet both by ſea and land) at length yeelded vnto him by compoſi- I tion, the 19 day of December. After which victorie he diſmiſſed the fleet, and returned himſelfe in triumph to Ieruſalem. Now of all the famous cities alongſt the ſea coaſt of Phœnicia and Paleſtine, from Laodicea to Aſcalon, was only the citie of Tyre that remained in the enemies hands: which citie Baldwin alſo hardly beſieged; neuertheleſſe it was ſo well defended by the Turks, that after he had all in vain lien before it by the ſpace of foure moneths, he was glad to riſe with his armie and depart.

It fortuned that within two yeres after, the Turks with a mightie armie ſent from the Perſi- K an Sultan, inuaded the country of Cœliſyria, where ſpoiling al before them as they went, they came and incamped vpon the ſea coaſt neere vnto Tyberias. Againſt whom Baldwin gathered the whole ſtrength of his kingdome; with whom alſo Tancred (who now raigned in Antioch, the young Bohemund being dead) with the Countie of Tripolis, and the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, joyned their forces: who all together marching forward, came and incamped not far from the enemie, being in number far more than they. Mendus, Generall of the Turks armie (for ſo I find him called) vnderſtanding of their approch, ſent out certain companies of his men to skirmiſh with them: againſt whom the Chriſtians alſo ſent out others, who incountring them, eaſily put them to flight, being before commanded ſo to doe, of purpoſe to draw the Chriſtians into the danger of a great ſtrength, lying in ambuſh to intrap them: which accor- L ding to the Turks deſire fel out; for the Chriſtians fiercely purſuing the flying enemie, fel into the ambuſh, and ſo before they were wel aware, were beſet on euerie ſide with their enemies: vnto the reſcue of whom other companies of Chriſtians comming in, & others likewiſe from the Turks, both the great armies were at length drawn into the field, where betwixt them was joined moſt fierce & terrible battel, with great ſlaughter on both ſides: but at length the multitude of the Turks preuailing, the Chriſtians were put to the worſe, and ſo glad to flie: after whom the fierce enemie hardly followed, not without great ſlaughter. In which flight the King himſelfe hardly eſcaped, with Arnolphus the Patriarke. Whileſt Baldwin was thus buſied abroad, the Turks and Saraſins from Aſcalon came and beſieged Ieruſalem, being then but weakly manned: but hearing of the Kings comming, and that the armie of the Chriſtians dai- L ly increaſed with new ſupplies out of the Weſt by ſea, they retyred home againe, hauing burnt certaine ſtorehouſes full of corne, and ſpoyled ſuch things as was ſubiect to their furie.

Long it were to recount all the hard conflicts and combats this King had with the Saraſins and Turks, which for breuitie I paſſe ouer, contented to haue briefly touched the greateſt. In the laſt yere of his raigne, hauing for certaine yeres before liued in ſome reaſonable peace, he made an expedition into Ægypt, where he with much difficultie woon Pharamia, a ſtrong ci- M tie vpon the ſea coaſt, which he joyned vnto his owne Kingdome. After that, he went to the mouth of the riuer Nilus, and with great admiration learned the nature of that ſtrange riuer: and hauing therein taken abundance of fiſh, returned into the city, and there with the ſame feaſted himſelfe with his friends. But after dinner he began to feele the griefe of his old wound, and growing thereof ſicker & ſicker, returned with his armie toward Ieruſalem, where by the way neere vnto a citie called Laris, he died (to the great griefe of all the Chriſtians) in the 1118 yeare 1118. His dead bodie being brought backe vnto Ieruſalem, was there royally buried,

A neere vnto his brother Godfrey, after he had raigned eighteene yeares: whose sepulchre is yet there also to be seene, fast by the sepulchre of his brother.

The late King thus dead and buried, the Christians with one consent made choice of his cousin Baldwin, syrnamed Brugensis, gouernor of Edessa: who by the name of Baldwin the second, was the second of Aprill in the yeare 1118, solemnly crowned King of Ierusalem. He was of stature tall and well proportioned, of countenance comely and gracious, hauing his haire thin and yellow, his beard mingled with some gray haires hanging downe to his brest; his colour fresh and liuely for one of his yeares. He was a man of great courage, and therefore no lesse redoubted of his enemies, than beloued of his subiects, who had in him reposed great hope both for the defence and inlarging of that new gained kingdome. Against him the same

B Summer the Caliph of Ægypt, aided by the King of Damasco and the Turks, in reuenge of the losse he had in the expedition the yere before receiued, raised a great power to inuade him both by sea and land. Against whom Baldwin also opposed himselfe with his whole strength, and so came and incamped within the sight of his enemies. In which sort, when both armies had lien the one facing the other by the space of three moneths, they both rose; the Christians fearing the multitude of the Turks, and the Turks the valour of the Christians, and so retired without any notable thing doing.

This yeare died Alexius the Greeke Emperour, who euen from the beginning of this sacred warre secretly repined at the good successe of the Christians in Syria, although his empire were thereby greatly inlarged: after whom succeeded Calo Ioannes his sonne, who al the

C time of his raign right worthily defended his territories in the lesser Asia, against the inuasion of the Turks.

Not long after, Gazi one of the greatest Princes of the Turks in the lesser Asia, with the king of Damasco, and Debeis King of Arabia, joyning their forces together, with a great army inuading the countrie about Antioch, came and incamped not far from Aleppo: against whom Roger Prince of Antioch, not expecting the comming of Baldwin and the other Christian Princes his confederats, but presuming of his owne strength, went forth with greater courage than discretion, whereunto his successe was answerable; for incountring with them at too much odds, he was by them in a great battell ouerthrowne, wherein himselfe was slaine, with most part of his armie. Of which so great a slaughter, the place wherein this battel was fought was

D afterward called the field of bloud. But whilest the Turks after so great a victorie, carelesly and at pleasure roame vp and down the country, Baldwin setting vpon them, ouerthrew them with a great slaughter, and so put them to flight. After this victorie gained by the Christians the fourteenth of August in the yeare 1120, King Baldwin in great triumph entred into Antioch, 1120 and so joyned that principalitie vnto his owne kingdome.

The yere following, the Turks with another armie inuaded the same countrey againe: for repressing of whom, whilest Baldwin and the other Christian Princes were making their preparations, it fortuned that Gazi their great commander suddenly died of an Apoplexie; vpon whose death they retired without any further harm doing. Neuertheless the next Spring, the 1122
King of Damasco aided by the Arabians, entred againe with a great power into the countrey

E about Antioch, and there did some harme: for the Antiochians now destitute of their owne Prince, and Baldwin (who had taken vpon him their protection) being farre off, and otherwise busied at Ierusalem, were much more subiect vnto the inrodes of their enemies (still at hand) than before when they had a Prince of their owne still present amongst them. But Baldwin aduertised thereof, was making toward them with a most puissant armie, sooner than they had thought it could haue bin possible. Of whose approch the Turks vnderstanding, retired againe out of the country: after whom the King thinking it not good to make further pursuit, turned a little out of the way, and tooke by force Garaze, one of the strongest castles of the Kings of Damasco, built but the yere before; which because it was not without great charge and danger to be holden, he rased down to the ground.

F Baldwin notwithstanding that he had many times thus honourably repulsed his enemies, wisely considering how he was on the one side beset with the Turks, & on the other side with the Sarasins (which yet raigned in Ægypt, the kingdome of Ierusalem lying as it were in the mouth of them both) thought it good betime to craue aid of the Christian Princes of Europe; and to that purpose had sent diuers his Embassadors vnto diuers of them, but especially vnto the Venetians, whom of all others he thought fittest at his need to yeeld him reliefe by sea. It fortuned in the meane time, that Balac the Persian Sultan with a great armie of the Turks inuaded the country about Antioch; whereof Baldwin vnderstanding (although he certainly knew he should ere long receiue aid from the other Christian Princes his friends, but especially from the Venetians, and might therefore with great reason haue protracted the war vntil their comming, yet being therewith much moued, or else his destinie so requiring) raised such forces as he had of his own, and without longer staying for his friends, with greater courage than good speed set forward; and so joyning battell with the enemie, was therin ouerthrown, with the greatest part of his armie, and himselfe taken prisoner in the fight, with certain other of his best commanders; who all together were carried away captiues vnto Carras. G

Vpon the report of this ouerthrow, and taking of the King, the Caliph of Ægypt on the other side tooke occasion with all his power to inuade the kingdome of Ierusalem; & hauing in himselfe purposed the vtter ruine thereof, beside the great armie which he sent thither by land (which lay incamped not far from Ascalon) he put to sea an huge fleet also of 700 saile, for the distressing of the sea townes, which he well knew were not otherwise to be won. This fleet of the Sarasin Kings (for Ægypt with the kingdomes of Tunes and Morocco were yet in possession of the Sarasins) arriuing at Ioppa, there put ashore their land forces, and hardly besieged the town both by sea and land. But whilest they thus lay in great hope to haue won the town, Dominicus Michael duke of Venice, stirred vp by Calixtus then Bishop of Rome, was come to Cyprus with a fleet of two hundred saile, for the reliefe of the Christians in Syria and the Holie land: and hearing of the distresse of Ioppa, nothing dismaid with the number of the enemies fleet, hasted thither, and came so suddenly vpon them, that he had (as some report) ouerthrowne them before they could put themselues in order, or be in readinesse to fight: or as some others say, after a great & doubtful fight, hauing sunke or taken a great number of them, and put the rest to flight, he obtained of them a most glorious victorie. With like good fortune also were the Sarasins ouerthrowne in a notable battell at land, neere vnto Ascalon, by the Lord Eustace, vnto whom the defence of the kingdome was committed after the taking of the King, who not long after his great a victorie died. H I

Tyre besieged by the Christians.

Ioppa relieued (as is aforesaid) the Duke of Venice trauelled by land to Ierusalem, where he was honorably receiued by Guarimund the Patriarke, and the confederation before made betwixt King Baldwin and the Venetians, vpon the same conditions solemnly againe renued. K

The Sarasins thus notably discomfited both by sea and land, and the Christians thereby not a little incouraged, and joining their forces together with the Venetians, came and the first of March laid siege vnto the antient and strong city of Tyre: which they hauing beset both by sea and land, gaue thereunto many a sharpe assault; which the Turks as men fighting for their liues and wiues right valiantly repulsed. In which sort the siege was continued longer than the Christians had at the first thought should haue needed: yet at length after foure moneths siege, the Turks sore weakened with often assaults, and hardly pinched with want of food, all their store being spent, yeelded the citie by composition. Thus was the citie of Tyre (the most famous port of Phœnicia) yeelded vnto the Christians the nine and twentieth of Iune, in the yeare 1124. The third part of this citie was giuen to the Venetians, according to the composition made betwixt them and the Kings of Ierusalem, That of all such cities as were by their helpe woon from the Infidels in Syria, they should haue a third part, with one street, and free traffique in all the rest of the cities of the Kingdome of Ierusalem. Shortly after was King Baldwin set at libertie for the ransome of an hundred thousand ducats, after he had been eighteene moneths prisoner among the Turks. L

The Duke of Venice hauing now spent almost three yeares in this sacred expedition, and well confirmed the state of the Christians in Syria, returning home, by the way tooke the Islands of Chios, Rhodus, Samos, Mitylen, and Andrus, with the citie of Modon in Peloponesus; all places belonging vnto the Greeke Empire. Which hee did in reuenge of the iniuries done by the Emperor in the time of his absence, who enuying at the successe of the Christians in Syria, as had his father Alexius before him, had in the absence of the duke infested the territories of the Venetians, for the which he was now iustly requited, with the losse of a good part of his owne. M

Baldwin also not vnmindfull of the iniuries vnto him before done by the Turks, in requitall thereof,

A thereof, inuaded the countrey about Damaſco, and there in three notable battells ouerthrew the king, and ſpoyled the country: wherein he tooke ſo great a prey, that therewith he redeemed his daughter, whom he had at the time of his deliuerance left in hoſtage with the Turkes for the payment of his ranſome. He alſo ouerthrew the Saraſins at Aſcalon, who aided by the Caliph of Ægypt, had ſundrie times inuaded the countrey about Ieruſalem. And ſo hauing well repreſſed his enemies, for a ſpace liued in peace.

Not long after, Hugh Paganus firſt Maſter of the Templars (an Order of knights firſt begun in the raigne of this Baldwin) before ſent to craue aid of the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt, againſt the Turks and Saraſins, returned with a great number of zealous Chriſtians, readie to lay down their liues for defence of the Chriſtian faith & religion: with whom Baldwin & the B other Chriſtian Princes of Syria joyning their forces, ſet forward and beſieged Damaſco, the regall ſeat of the Turks in thoſe quarters. But ſuch was the ſtrength of this citie, with the valor of the defendants, and contagiouſneſſe of the aire, that the Chriſtians (the heauens as it were then fighting againſt them) were glad to raiſe their ſiege, in vaine begun, and ſo to retyre.

Damaſco in vain beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Whileſt things thus paſſed in Syria, Fulke Countie of Turin, Mayn, and Aniou, a man almoſt of threeſcore yeres, hauing as he thought beſt diſpoſed of his things at home, had for deuotion ſake taken vpon him an expedition into the Holy land. In the time of which his preparations, Embaſſadors came vnto him from King Baldwin, offering him in marriage Meliſenda (or as ſome call her, Margaret) his eldeſt daughter, with the ſucceſſion into the kingdome of Ieruſalem in dowrie, if he ſhould ſuruiue the King; and in the meane time to content himſelfe C with the cities of Tyre and Ptolemais: of which offer he accepted, and ſo held on his journey before intended. It fortuned about three yeres after, that the king fell dangerouſly ſick, & feeling his death drawing on, hauing layd aſide all regall dignitie, cauſed himſelfe to be remooued out of his owne palace, into the Patriarkes houſe, which was neerer vnto the temple of the ſepulchre: and there calling vnto him Fulke the Countie, his ſon in law, with his daughter and his ſonne Baldwin, then but two yeares old, in the preſence of the Patriarke, and diuers other Princes and great Commanders, commended vnto them the gouernment and defence of the kingdome, appointing Fulke to ſucceed him. And taking vnto himſelfe the habit and profeſſion of a Monke (if he ſhould haue longer liued) preſently after gaue vp the ghoſt the two and D twentieth day of Auguſt, in the yeare 1131; whereof he raigned with much trouble thirteen yeres, and was ſolemnly buried in the temple vpon mount Caluarie, with the other two kings Godfrey and Baldwin his predeceſſors.

The death of Baldwin the ſecond, the third King of Ieruſalem.

The Kings funerall ended, the Princes of the kingdome with one accord made choice of Fulke the old Countie, Earle of Aniou, for their King: who the 16 day of September, was with all ſolemnitie by William the Patriarke crowned in Ieruſalem. This man in the beginning of his raigne, beſides his troubles abroad, was alſo vext with domeſticall and inteſtine diſcord: Pontius Countie of Tripolis, ſeeking by force of arms to haue rent the dukedome of Antioch from the kingdom: and Hugh Countie of Ioppa, for feare of due puniſhment for his treaſon, joyning himſelf with the Saraſins of Aſcalon, and ſo with them infeſting the territories of Ieruſalem, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian ſtate, and aduantage of the infidels. Which trouble-E ſome broyles were yet afterwards by the King, partly by force, partly by the mediation of the Patriarke and other Princes (who ſeeing the danger thereof like to enſue, had interpoſed themſelues) well againe appeaſed. Vengeance yet neuertheleſſe ſtill following both the aforeſaid traitors: Pontius being ſhortly after ſlaine by the Turks, and Hugh dying in exile.

Beſides theſe domeſticall troubles, the Turks alſo inuaded the countrey about Antioch, where they were by the ſudden comming of the King ouerthrowne, with the loſſe of their tents, & exceeding great riches. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the diſquieting of the ſtate of that new erected kingdome, not long after, Iohn the Conſtantinopolitan Emperor, (together with the empire, inheritour alſo of his fathers malice, againſt the proceeding of the Chriſtians in Syria) with a puiſſant armie paſſing thorow the leſſer Aſia, and by the way taking F by force Tarſus the metropoliticall citie of Cilicia, with the whole prouince thereunto belonging, came and beſieged Antioch; which Fulke but a little before had, together with Conſtance the daughter and heire of the late Duke of Antioch, giuen in marriage to Raymund Countie of Poitou, for that purpeſe ſent out of France. But in this ſo dangerous a ſtate of that Chriſtian kingdome, the other zealous Chriſtian Princes interpoſed themſelues as me-

that was in possession thereof. And in fine brought it to this end, that Raymund for the present submitting himselfe vnto the Emperor, should from thence forth hold his dukedome of him as of his Lord and Soueraigne: vpon which agreement the Emperour returned vnto Tarsus, where he wintred, and so afterwards vnto Constantinople.

Much about the same time, Sanguin one of the Turks great Princes, inuading the countrey about Tripolis, besieged the castle of Mont-Ferrand: vnto the reliefe whereof Fulke comming with his armie, was by the Turks ouerthrowne, and for the safegard of his life glad to take the refuge of the castle, the Countie himselfe being in that battell taken prisoner. After which victorie, the Turks layed harder siege vnto the castle than before; the besieged in the meane time being no lesse pinched within with famine, than pinched without by the enemie. H
In this the Kings hard distresse, the other Princes hauing raised the whole power of the kingdome, were comming to his reliefe: whereof the Turke vnderstanding, offered of himselfe to giue them all leaue freely to depart, and to set the Countie at libertie, so that they would deliuer vnto him the castle: of which his offer they gladly accepting, yeelded vp the strong Hold, and so departed. The King by the way meeting with the armie, thanked his friends for their forwardnesse, and so returned to Ierusalem.

About foure yeares after, Iohn the Constantinopolitan Emperour with a great armie came againe into Syria, with purpose to haue vnited the famous citie of Antioch vnto his Empire, and so to haue made a way into the kingdome of Ierusalem, whereafter he had now a good while longed. But comming thither in hope to haue found the Cilicians and Sirians readie to haue receiued him, he was deceiued of his expectation, being shut out by the Latines, and not suffered to enter but vpon his oath, and that with some few of his followers; and so after due reuerence done vnto him, quietly to depart without any stirre or innouation in the citie. In reuenge of which disgrace, at his departure he gaue the suburbs of the city as a prey to his greedie soldiers, pretending the same to be done for want of victuals; who made hauock of whatsoeuer came to hand, not sparing the verie fruit trees, but cutting them downe to dresse their meat withall. Hauing thus vnder colour of necessitie reuenged the disgrace receiued, he returned into Cilicia, and there wintred: where one day for his disport hunting of the wild boare, and hauing wounded him with his boare speare, the wild beast therewith inraged, and with all his force bearing forward vpon the weapon, forced the Emperours hand backward vpon the K point of a poysoned arrow that was hanging in a quiuer at his backe, and so was therewith lightly wounded. Neuertheless as light as the wound was, such was the strength of the poyson, that the griefe thereof stil increasing, and his hand & arme more and more swelling, there was no remedie to be found, but that his arme must be cut off: which desperat and vncertaine cure he abhorring, and in the extremitie of his paine oftentimes pleasantly saying, That the Greeke Empire was not to be gouerned with one hand; ouercome with the strength of the poyson, died. In whose place succeeded his youngest sonne Emanuel, Alexius and Andronicus his two elder sonnes being both dead at his setting forth vnto this so vnhappie an expedition.

The death of Calo Ioannes the Greeke Emperour.

It fortuned about this time also, that the kingdome of Ierusalem being now at peace, that Fulke the King, with the Queene his wife, lying at the citie of Ptolemais in the time of Autumne, it pleased the Queene for her disport to walke out of the Citie, vnto certaine pleasant L fountains there by in the country; for whose companie the King would needs go also, with certaine of his courtiers: where by the way it chanced that certaine boyes running along the field, put vp an hare that was sitting in a furrow; after which all the Courtiers on horsebacke gallopped amaine, with notable outcry and hollowing. Amongst the rest, the King to be partaker of the sport, forcing his horse to the vttermost of his power, in the midst of his course fell, together with his horse foundring vnder him, and in falling, chanced to fall his head vnder the horse: with whose weight, and the hardnesse of his saddle, he was so crushed, that the braines came out both at his nose and eares. In this pittifull case being taken vp for dead, and with great heauinesse being carried backe, he yet breathing lay speechlesse three dayes, and so M died the thirteenth of Nouember, in the yeare of Grace 1142. His dead bodie afterwards brought to Ierusalem, was there with great magnificence, and the generall lamentation of all his subiects, buried with the other Kings his predecessors.

The miserable death of Fulke, fourth King of Ierusalem.

Now had the late King left behind him two sons, Baldwin about the age of thirteen yeres, and

A and Almerick about the age of seuen. Of the elder of these two, the Christian Princes made choice, who by the name of Baldwin the third, was together with Melesinda his mother, partner with him in the kingdome, vpon Christmas day with great solemnitie crowned King of Ierusalem, in the yeare 1142. About which time, Sanguin the Turke, taking hold of the discord betwixt Raymund Prince of Antioch, & Ioscelin Countie of Edessa, came and with a great power besieged Edessa, the Countie being at the same time absent: and did so much, that at length he tooke the citie by vndermining of it, where the bloudie Turke exercised all manner of cruelty vpon the poore Christians in the citie. By the losse of this famous city, so large a territorie fell againe into the hands of the Turks, as that three Archbishopricks were thereby drawne from the Church of Antioch. The Turke encouraged with this victorie, straight-

B waies after besieged Cologenbar, another strong towne of the Christians: one night drinking liberally with his friends, he was by one of them in his drunkennesse stabbed, and so slaine, and the siege raised. In whose stead Noradin his sonne succeeded.

Baldwin, in the first yeare of his raigne, recouered from the Turkes the Castle of Sobal, a strong hold beyond Iordan, which hee notably fortified, for the defence of that side of his kingdome against the incursions of the Turks. But the next yeare vndertaking an expedition against the King of Damasco, he was by Noradin the Turke, the Kings sonne in law, so hardly beset in his returne, as that it was accounted a thing miraculous, how he with his armie escaped his hands.

The report of the losse of Edessa, with the miseries there endured by the Christians, being bruted thorow all parts of Christendome, greatly moued the Christian Princes of the West.

C Whom Eugenius the third, then Bishop of Rome, ceased not both by himselfe and by his Legates to stir vp to take that sacred war in hand. And therein wrought so effectually, that almost in euery prouince of Christendome preparation was made for the reliefe of the distressed Christians in Syria. Of all others, Conrade the third then Emperor of Germanie, was most forward, who aided by the German Princes and others, with an incredible number of voluntarie men out of all parts of Christendome, had raised a most puissant army, and therewith set forward on this sacred expedition. Of this his deuout purpose he had before certified Emanuel the Greeke Emperour, thorow whose countries he was to passe, crauing that he might by his good fauor so doe, and for his money to be relieued with victuals, and other such things as he Conrade third Emperour of Germanie taketh vpon him an expedition into the Holy Land.

D should haue need of for himselfe or his people; promising in most quiet and peaceable manner to passe, without any harme doing vnto his territories or subiects. Al which the Greek Emperor, commending his zeale, seemed in most large terms willingly to condescend vnto. Neuertheles he inwardly repined the iar, wishing indeed no better successe to the Christians in this so honourable an expedition, than did the Infidels themselues, as by the sequel of his doings wel appeared. For Conrade with his populous army, indeed a terror vnto the Greeks, entring into the frontiers of the Constantinopolitan empire, found al things in shew friendly (for why Emanuel had before giuen out strait command, that good store of victuals & all other necessaries should be ready at all places to be sold as the army was to passe:) but they were not farre

E come into the country, but that in the taile of the army stil followed certain strong companies of the Greeks, to keepe the soldiers from straggling from their enfignes, roaming about in the country, now & then cutting them short, as they tooke them at aduantage. And stil the further that they trauelled, the more it was to be seen in the countenances of the discontented Greks, how vnwelcome guests they were. Yet stil on they went thorow the countries of their dissembling friends, little differing from open enemies, vntil they came to Phillippopolis: in departing from whence, such discord rose between them that were in the rereward of the army, & the Greeks that followed them, that it was like to haue come to plain battell, had not those broils, by the discretion of some of the wiser sort, bin in good time appeased. So marching on they came to Adrianople, & in few days after to the plain called Cherobachi, thorow which the riuer Melas hath his course; which in Summer being almost dry, in Winter or any other great downefall of water, right suddenly ouerfloweth his bankes, and so drowneth the whole

F country, that then it seemeth no more a riuer, but a sea; and swelling with the wind, is not to be passed ouer but by great boats. This riuer then suddenly rising by night, by reason of the great rain that then fell, in such aboundance, as if the floud gates of heauen had bin opened, so ouerflowed the place wherein the armie lay encamped vpon the side thereof, that with the violence violence of the water were carried away not only many weapons, saddles, garments, and such other the souldiers necessaries, but euen the horses and mules, with their burdens, yea & great numbers of armed men themselues also, a most miserable & lamentable thing to behold. Many valiant men there fel without fight, and died no men killing them: to be tal, helped not; neither did valor stand them in any stead; they perished like hay, & were caried away like chaffe, with such outcries and lamentation, that they which saw it, verily said, That the wrath of God was broke into the camp: such a sudden inundation had ouerwhelmed all, that happie was he could make shift for himselfe, without regarding one another. This misfortune sore troubled the Emperor with his whole army. Neuertheless, the water being againe fallen, and all put in so good order, as in such a confusion was possible, he marched on to the imperial citie: which the suspicious and malicious Greeke had before notably fortified & so strongly manned with armed men glistring vpon the wals, in such sort as if it should haue presently bin assaulted.

Conrade the Emperour not suffered to enter into Constantinople.

Conrade approching the citie, was not suffered to enter, but persuaded by the Greek Emperour forthwith to transport his armie ouer the strait, with promise to supplie his wants with whatsoeuer he should require. Which was don with such hast, as if nothing had bin farther to haue bin regarded, but only to haue them shipped ouer: in which seruice the Greekes spared no labour, or kinde of vessell, that might serue to transport them. The Greeke Emperour in the meane time, by men secretly appointed for that purpose, keeping account of the number that passed, vntill that they wearied with the multitude, ceased further to number them. But when they were once shipt ouer, then began the couert malice of the Greek Emperor forthwith to appeare. For, besides that they trusting vnto his promises, had brought little or no prouisions ouer with them, the countrey people by his appointment brought nothing vnto them to sell, as before: and they of the towns and cities shut their gates against them as they marched, not affording them any thing, but at an extream rate, for which they would first receiue their mony by ropes cast down from the wals, and then deliuer them what they pleased therfore, yea and oftentimes nought at all. Among many other vile practises, not beseeming Christians, the mischieuous Greeke, to poison the souldiers, mingled lime with the meale which they sold vnto the armie, whereof many of the hungrie soldiers greedily feeding, died. Whether the Greeke Emperour were priuie thereunto, or no, is not certainly knowne; but certain it is, that he caused counterfeit mony to be coined, of purpose to deceiue them: and in briefe, there was no kinde of mischiefe to bee practised against them, which either hee himselfe deuised not, or set not others to deuise; to the intent that their posteritie, terrified by this so vnfortunat an expedition, might for euer be afraid to take the like in hand againe. And that nothing might be wanting that malice could deuise, he had secret intelligence with the Turkes themselues, concerning the strength of the army, plotting vnto them the means how the same might best be defeated: whereby it came to passe, that some part thereof was by Pamplano, a captaine of the Turks, ouerthrowne neere Bathis, and many slain. But attempting to haue done the like vnto that part of the armie that passed thorow Phrygia, they were themselues ouertaken in their owne deuice and ouerthrowne, with a great slaughter. After which, the Turks in great number, to stay the Christians further passage, kept the riuer Mœander, encamping vpon the farther banke of that winding riuer, with a most huge army. There these worthy Christians right well declared, that it was but their patience, that the Grecian legions that had before so long followd them, with their countries & cities they had passed by, were not to them become a prey. For the Emperor comming vnto the riuer side, where was neither bridge nor boat to passe ouer, & finding the great army of the Turks on the other side, ready to giue him battell if he should aduenture the riuer, with their archers standing vpon the very bank side: he retired a little out of the danger of the shot, and there encamping, commanded his soldiers to refresh themselues and their horses that night, and to be ready against the next morning to ioyne battell with their enemies they were so far come to seek for. Little rest serued him that night; early in the morning before day he arose, and arming himself, put his whole army in order of battel: as did also the enemie on the other side of the riuer, with their batalions orderly placed, and their archers vpon the banke side, ready to giue the first charge on the Christians, if they should aduenture to come ouer. Both armies thus standing in readines the one in sight of the other, & nothing but the winding riuer betwixt them, the Emperor before resolued to fight, with cheerefull countenance and speech encouraged his men as followeth.

That

A notable speech of Conrade the Emperour, to encourage his souldiers to aduenture the riuer Meander.

That this expedition was of vs taken in hand, for Christ his sake, and for the glorie of God, and not of man, you know right well fellow souldiers. For, for this cause hauing contemned a pleasant life at home, voluntarily seperated from our neereſt and deereſt friends, we indure miseries in forraine countries; wee are exposed vnto dangers, wee pine with hunger, wee quake with cold, wee languish with heat; wee haue the earth our bed, the heauen our couering: and although wee be noble, famous, renowned, rich, ruling ouer nations; yet weare we alwaies our gorgets as necessarie bonds, & are with them and our armuor loaded, as was the greateſt seruant of Christ, Peter, surcharged with two chaines, and kept with foure quaternions of soldiers. But these Barbarians (diuided from vs by this riuer) to be the enemies of the crosse of Christ, whom wee of long haue desired to encounter withall, in whose bloud (as Dauid saith) we haue vowed to wash our selues: Who is there that knoweth not, except he be altogether blockish and will not with open eyes see, nor open eares heare? If wee wish to ascend straight way into heauen, (for neither is God vniust, that hee knoweth not the cause of this our iourney, or will not in recompence giue vnto vs the immortall fields, and shadie dwellings of Paradice, which hauing forsaken our owne dwellings, haue chose rather for his sake to die than to liue) if wee call to remembrance what things these men of vncircumcised hearts doe commit against our friends and countreymen, if wee remember what grieuous tortures they inflict vpon them, or if wee be any thing touched with the compassion of the innocent bloud, vnworthily spilt; stand now courageously, and fight valiantly, and let not any feare or terrour daunt vs. Let these Barbarians know, that by how much Christ our master and instructer doth excell their false prophet and seducer, authour of their vaine impietie; so much are wee superiours vnto them in all things. Seeing therefore wee are an holy campe, and an armie gathered by the power of God, let vs not cowardly lose our selues, or feare for Christ his sake honourably to aduenture our liues. For if Christ died for vs, how much more right is it that we for him should die also? Vnto this so honourable an expedition let vs also giue an honourable end: let vs fight in Christs name, with a most assured hope of an easie victorie. For none of them (I trust) shal be able to abide our force, but shall all giue way, euen to our first charge. But if wee shall die (which God forbid) there shall be an honourable place of our buriall, whersoeuer we shall for Christ fall. Let the Persian archer for Christ his sake, strike me, I will die in assured hope: and with that arrow, as with a chariot, I wil come vnto that rest, which shal be to me deerer than if I should with a base ordinarie kind of death in my sinnes end my dayes in a bed. Now at length let vs take reuenge of them, with whose impure feet our kinsmen and Christian brethren troden downe, are gone into that common sanctuarie, in which Christ our Sauiour, equall and associate to his Father, is become a companion of the dead. Wee are those mightie men, wee all haue drawne our swords, which stand about the liuely and diuine sepulchre, as about Salomons bed. Wherefore we that be free borne, let vs take out of the way these Agarens, the children of the bondwoman: and let vs remoone them as stones of offence out of the way of Christ: whom (I know not why) the Grecians feed vp as greedie wolues to their owne destruction, and with shame fat them with their bloud; when as with courragious mindes and thoughts beseeming wise men, they ought so to haue beene driuen from their prouinces and cities, as rauening wilde beasts from their flocks. Now for as much as this Riuer, as it seemeth, is not, but by some aduenture to be passed ouer, I my selfe will shew you the way, and be the first that shall take it. Let vs, serred together, forcibly breake into the riuer. And wee shall well enough ride thorow it. I know that the water beaten backe by our force, will bee at a stand, and breake the course, returning as it were backward. By not vnlike meanes the Israelites in antient time on foot passed ouer Iordan, the course of the riuer being staid. This attempt shall be spoken of in all posterstie, it shall by no tract of time be worne out or forgotten, but stil remaine in fresh remembrance, to the great dishonour of the Turkes, whose dead bodies ouerthrowne at this riuer, shall lie like a mountaine, and be seene as a Trophey of our victorie, vnto the worlds end, and our immortall praise and glorie.

Hauing thus said, and the signall of battell giuen, euery man hauing before by deuout praier commended himselfe vnto almightie God, he was the first that put spurs to his horse, & tooke the riuer; after whom followed the rest, so close & so forcibly, with such a terible outcry, that the course of the water, being by the force of their horses staid, and as it were beaten back towards the fountain, the whole army passed ouer with lesse trouble than was feared. And then charging the Turks, already discouraged to haue seen them so desperatly, & contrary to their expectation, to haue passed the riuer; after some smal resistance put them to flight, wherin such infinit numbers of them fel, the Christians like fierce lions pursuing the chace, that al the valies lies ran with bloud, and the fields were couered with the bodies of the dead. Many of the Italians were wounded with the Turks arrows, and but few or none slain. But what a multitude of the enemies there fell, the sundrie and hugie heapes of bones, to bee compared vnto great hils, did long time after well declare; whereat euery man that trauelled that way did worthily wonder, as did I my selfe (saith Nicetas Choniates) in reporting this historie. Not much vnlike that, is reported of the Cimbers, slaine by Marius in such number, that of their bones the countrey people about Marcellis where the field was fought, long time after made walls for the defence of their vineyards.

After this so great a victory, the Christians without resistance came to Iconium, the chiefe seat of the Turkish Kings in the lesser Asia, which they hardly besieged. Neuertheless, such was the strength of the citie, being strongly fortified both by Nature and Art, together with the valour of the defendants, that lying there long, they little preuailed, pressed in the meane time with greater extremities & wants in the camp, than were the besieged in the citie: whereupon ensued such a mortalitie, people dayly without number dying in the army; that the Emperor was glad to raise his siege and to returne into his countrey. The chiefe cause as well of this so great a mortalitie, as of the ouerthrow of so notable an action, most men ascribe vnto the malice of the Greekes; who not without the priuitie of their Emperour (as it was commonly bruited) mingled lime with the meale which they brought to sell into the armie, whereof the hungrie souldiers desirously feeding, were therewith poisoned, and so miserably died. Of the certaine time of this iourney of the Emperours into Asia, Authours agree not; howbeit must referre it vnto the yeare 1146.

Iconium vaine besieged by the christians.

This expedition, though not so fortunat as it was at the first wel hoped of, yet profited the Christian common weale in this, That the Turks therewith throughly busied, and doubtful of the euent thereof, Baldwin in the meane time fortified Gaza (sometimes a famous citie of the Philistines, but as then ruinous) which serued as a most sure bulwarke for the defence of that part of his kingdome towards Ægypt: and also for the distressing of Ascalon, the only refuge of the Ægyptians, then left in that countrey: which strong citie standing vpon the sea side, he with all the power of his kingdome afterward besieged both by sea and land; vnto the reliefe whereof, the Caliph of Ægypt, after it had beene fiue moneths by the Christians besieged, sent a strong fleet of threescore and ten gallies. At which time also on the other side Noradin the Turke, who had now got into his hand all the kingdome of Damasco, to withdraw the Christians from the siege of Ascalon, besieged Paneada, from whence he was by the valour of the citizens repulsed, as was also the Caliphs fleet at sea, and the siege at Ascalon continued. Where at length the Christians after long batterie had made a breach in the wall, but giuing thereunto an assault, they were with great losse of their men repulsed, and the breach againe by the enemie repaired; who to the greater despight of the Christians, hanged ouer the wals in ropes the dead bodies of their slaine: with which spectacle the chiefe commanders of the armie were so moued, that they with all their power returned againe to the assault, with a full resolution to gage thereon their whole forces: which they so couragiously performed, that the besieged discouraged with the great slaughter of their men, and now with true valour ouercome, craued parley; and so couenanting that they might with their liues in safety depart, agreed to yeeld vp the citie, which they accordingly performed. The spoile of the citie was giuen to the soldiers, and the gouernment thereof vnto Almericke the Kings brother, Earle of Ioppa. By this victorie, great securitie was gained vnto that side of the kingdome, the enemy hauing now no place left in those parts whereon to set his foot.

The honourable expedition of Lewis the French king, by the malice of the Greekes, and enuie of other Christian princes of Syria frustrated and brought to nought.

About the same time also (or as some write, euen at the same time together with the Emperor) Lewis the French King, the eight of that name, tooke vpon him the like expedition for the reliefe of the Christians in the Holy Land: who setting forward with all the chiualrie of France, and accompanied with diuers other great Princes, with a right puissant army came to Constantinople, where he was by Emanuel the Emperor honorably receiued, with all the outward shews of feigned courtesie that could be deuised. But hauing passed the strait, and landed in Asia, he found nothing answerable to that the dissembling Greeke had before most largely promised. And to distresse him the more, was by false guides before corrupted by the Emperour, conducted thorow the most desolate and barren countries, where by the way a wonderfull number of his souldiers perished of hunger and thirst: many of them also being cut off in the the strait and difficult passages, or as they straied from the army by the Greeks themselues, appointed by the malicious Emperour for that purpose. Yet after many dangers passed, and his armie sore wasted, he came at length into Syria, and laid siege vnto Damasco, the royal seat of Noradin the Turkish king; which he so notably impugned, that the defendants were almost out of hope to be able for any long time to hold out. Neither had it otherwise happened, had not enuie, the inseparable attendant of all honourable actions, frustrated so great an hope: for the besieged Turks being brought to great extremity, and now euen at the point to haue yeelded the citie, certaine of the Christian Princes of that countrey, vnderstanding that the king had promised the gouernment of that so famous a citie, vnto Philip Earle of Flanders, if it should be won; & secretly grudging to haue a stranger preferred before themselues, corrupted also (as some say) with the Turks gold, fraudulently persuaded the King to remoue from that part of the city where he lay, and might in fine haue taken the same, vnto another far stronger: where, after he had lien a great while, striuing with no small extremities, he was enforced for want of victuals to raise his siege and to depart. And so without any thing done worth the remembrance, returned againe into France, detesting the very name of Emanuel the Greeke Emperor; by whose sinister dealing, so notable an expedition was brought to be of none effect, to the great discouraging of all other Christian Princes for taking the like againe in hand.

Now had the state of the Christians in Syria, for certaine yeres after the aforesaid expeditions, rested in good peace: when Noradin the Turke (moued with some iniuries done by the Christians vnto the Turkes and Arabians, who by the leaue of King Baldwin dwelt in the forest of Lybanus) came and straitly besieged Paneada, a citie of the Christians there by: vpon whom the Christians in the citie, now brought vnto great extremitie, made a most desperate sallie, and had with the Turks a sharpe and cruell fight: but oppressed with the multitude, and inforced to retire, they were so hardly pursued, that the Turks together with them entred the citie, and put to sword al that came in their way. Neuertheles, the greater part of the citizens (by good fortune) had in good time before retired themselues into the castle, which was of great strength, and there stood vpon their gard. Of whose distresse, with the taking of the city, Baldwin hearing, raised a great army, & so set forward to relieue them. But Noradin hearing of his comming, and doubtfull of his owne strength, after hee had taken the spoile of what hee could, set fire on the city, and so departed. The citizens thus deliuered, repaired again the wals of the city, the Kings power still defending them. Noradin with his power all the while lying close in the woods not farre off, still awaiting the offer of some good opportunitie to take the Christians at aduantage, which shortly after fel out according to his owne desire: for the king doubting no such matter, but supposing him to haue bin quite gone, hauing at his returne sent away all his footmen, followed after himselfe, accompanied only with his horsmen, and they also not very strong: but as he was passing the riuer Iordan, he was suddenly set vpon by Noradin & the Turks, and after a sharp conflict ouerthrown: the king himself with some few hardly escaped to Sapher, a town there by; most part of his nobility being there either slaine or taken prisoners: among the rest, Bertrand of Blanquefort, master of the Templars, with diuers others of great name, fel at that time into the enemies hands, & so were carried away prisoners.

Paneade taken and sacked by the Turks.

Paneade againe repaired by the christians.

After this victorie, Noradin strengthened with new supplies from Damasco, came againe and besieged Paneade, in good hope, that the citizens discouraged with so great an ouerthrow of the king, and out of hope to bee by them relieued, would now either yeeld the city, or else not be able long to hold it out. But the king, contrary to his expectation, had in shorter time than was thought possible, raised a great power; and aided by the prince of Antioch, and the countie of Tripolis, was marching to the reliefe of his citie: of which approch Noradin vnderstanding, although hee had made diuers breaches in the wals, and brought the citizens almost vnto vtter despaire, rose with his armie and departed. And so Baldwin hauing now twice relieued the besieged citie, returned also to Ierusalem.

Many an hard conflict with the Turks had this young king afterwards, during the fortunate time of his raigne: wherein that troublesome kingdom happily flourished amidst the miscreants; all which to recount, were long and tedious. Yet among other things, it is worth the remembrance, how that Noradin the Turke, then King of Damasco, besieging Sueta, a castle belonging to the kingdome of Ierusalem, was in a set battell by Baldwin ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the losse of the greatest part of his armie. King Baldwin had before married ried Emanuel the Greeke Emperors neece: and now the ſame Emperor by Guido Stephanus, and G Triſillus his embaſſadours, requeſted to haue giuen him againe in marriage one of the Kings nigh kinſwomen. Vnto whom the King, after mature deliberation had concerning the matter, offered him Matilde, an honourable Lady, the ſiſter of the countie of Tripolis; whom the Em-perour refuſed: and afterward by the conſent of the king, made choice of Mary the daughter of Raimund Prince of Antioch lately dead. Which the countie of Tripolis taking in euill part, in reuenge therof, by certaine men of warre whom he put to ſea, grieuouſly infeſted the frontiers of the Emperours dominions. Now during the time that the marriage was in ſolemnizing, the king made his abode at Antioch, at which time hee fortified the caſtle of Pontiſter vpon the riuer Orantes, againſt the incurſions of the enemies. But lying there, he according to his wonted manner, to preuent ſickneſſe, vpon the approch of Winter tooke phyſicke H of Barac a Iew, the countie of Tripolis his phyſitian. After the taking whereof, hee fell pre-ſently into the bloudie flix, and afterward into a conſumption: whereby it was verily ſuppo-ſed, that he was poyſoned by the Iew; and the rather, for that ſome little part of the ſame medicine that was left, being giuen to a dogge, he thereof in ſhort time dyed. The King thus lan-guiſhing in paine, to change the aire, remooued firſt to Tripolis, and afterward to Berytus, where hee departed this troubleſome life, to liue with his Sauiour Chriſt in bliſſe for euer.

His dead bodie was afterward with generall mourning of his ſubiects cõueied to Ieruſalem, and there ſolemnly enterred by the bodie of his father. He departed the 13 of Februarie, in in the yeare of Grace 1163, when he had raigned 21 yeares. He was a man ſo gracious, that not onely his friends, but euen the Infidels themſelues (as it is reported) lamented his death. I Inſomuch that Noradin King of Damaſco, his antient enemie, being incited by ſome of his captains to inuade his kingdome at ſuch time as his funerals were in ſolemnizing, refuſed ſo to doe, anſwering, That compaſſion and regard was to be had of the iuſt ſorrow of the Chriſtians his ſubiects; for that they had loſt ſuch a King, the like was hardly againe to be found in the world.

The death of king Baldwin lamented by his enemies.

But leauing the kingdome of Ieruſalem, with the greater part of Seruia, thus victoriouſly gained from the Infidels; let vs for the orderly continuation of our hiſtorie, againe returne to ſee the proceedings of the Turkes at the ſame time in the leſſer Aſia alſo: wherein they yet held the ſtate of a kingdome, though not ſo great as before the comming of the Princes of the Weſt into thoſe countries. After the death of Sultan Solyman (with whom Duke God- frey and the other Chriſtian Princes had much to doe as they paſſed into Syria) as is afore- K ſaid, one Muhamet ſucceeded him: betwixt whom and Maſut, Sultan of Iconium, great diſ-cord aroſe, which at length broke out into open war, to the further weakning of that late ſhaken kingdome. For the maintenance of which quarrell, as profitable for his ſtate, Iohn Com- nenus the Greeke Emperor, gaue aid to Maſut, againſt his enemie Muhamet. Neuertheleſſe in ſhort time the two Infidels (profeſſing both one ſuperſtition) became friends, & ioyning their forces, ouerthrew the Emperour with his whole armie, as he lay at the ſiege of Iconium, at which time he himſelfe with much adoe eſcaped by flight. Maſut afterwards hauing got into his hands the whole kingdom of the Turks, at the time of his death diuided the ſame among his three ſons: vnto Clizaſtblan his eldeſt ſon he gaue Iconium his chiefe city, with the towns L and prouinces ſubiect thereunto: vnto Iagupaſan his other ſon (or rather as ſome will haue it, his ſon in law) he allotted Amaſia and Ancyra, with the fruitfull countrey of Cappadocia, and the places adioyning: but vnto Dadune his other ſon (or ſon in law) he gaue the great cities of Ceſarea and Sebaſtia, with the large countries thereabouts, all ſometime a part of the Greeke empire, but then the portions of the Turks. Long it was not after this diuiſion of the kingdome, but that theſe brethren after the manner of ambitious men, forgetfull of the bonds both of loue & nature, fell at diſcord among themſelues; the Sultan ſeeking the deſtruction of Iagupaſan, and hee likewiſe of him, and that not by ſecret meanes, but euen by open force of armes. Emanuel the Greeke Emperor in the mean time wiſhing the deſtruction of them both, heartily reioycing thereat, and by his embaſſadours ſecretly animating the one againſt the M other, yet in open ſhew more fauouring of the part of Iagupaſan than of the Sultan, by whoſe aid hee obtained againſt him many notable and bloudie victories: inſomuch that the Sultan wearie of the quarrell, was glad not onely by his embaſſadours to ſeeke the Emperours fauor, but euen in perſon himſelfe to goe and meet him, as he came with his army out of Syria,

A and ſo to accompanie him vnto Conſtantinople, where he was together with the Emperour moſt honorably receiued, with all the ſignes of ioy and triumph that could poſſibly be deui-ſed. The Emperor no leſſe rejoycing to be ſued vnto by ſo great a Prince, than did the Sultan at his ſo honorable entertainment.

Among other queint deuices of many, for the ſolemniſing of ſo great a triumph, there was Another fooliſh Icarus.
an actiue Turke who had openly giuen it out, That againſt an appointed time he would from the top of an high tower in the tilt yard flie by the ſpace of a furlong: the report whereof had filled the citie with a wonderfull expectation of ſo ſtrange a noueltie. The time prefixed Nicetas Choniates, rerum ab imper. Manuele Comneno, geſtar. lib. 3. fol. 143. being come, and the people without number aſſembled, the Turke according to his promiſe, vpon the top of an high tower ſhewed himſelfe, girt in a long and large white garment, gathe-B red into many pleits and foldings, made of purpoſe for the gathering of the wind: wherwith the fooliſh man had vainely perſuaded himſelfe to haue houered in the aire, as doe birds vpon their wings, or to haue guided himſelfe as are ſhips with their ſailes. Standing thus houering a great while, as readie to take his flight; the beholders ſtill laughing, and crying out, Flie Turke, flie, how long ſhall we expect thy flight? The Emperor in the meane time ſtill diſſua-ding him from ſo deſperate an attempt; and the Sultan betwixt feare and hope hanging in doubtfull ſuſpence what might happen to his countreyman. The Turke, after he had a great while houered with his armes abroad, (the better to haue gathered the wind, as birds do with their wings) and long deluded the expectation of the beholders, at length finding the winde fit, as he thought, for his purpoſe, committed himſelfe with his vaine hope vnto the aire: but C in ſtead of mounting aloft, this fooliſh Icarus came tumbling downe with ſuch violence, that he brake his necke, his arms, his legs, with almoſt all the bones of his bodie. This fooliſh flight of the Turke gaue ſuch occaſion of ſport and laughter vnto the vulgar people (alwaies readie to ſcoffe and jeaſt at ſuch ridiculous matters) that the Turks attending vpon the Sultan could not walke in the ſtreets vnderided; the artificers in their ſhops ſhaking their arms, with their tooles in their hands, as did the Turke, and ſtill crying out, Flie Turke, flie: whereof the Emperor hearing, although he could not chuſe but thereat ſmile himſelfe, as not ignorant of the ſcoffes and taunts of the vulgar people; yet in fauour of the Sultan, who was not a little grie-ued therewith, he commanded ſuch their inſolencie to be reſtrained.

The ſolemnitie of the triumph ouerpaſſed (which by an ominous earthquake at the ſame time hapning, was ſomwhat obſcured) the Emperor to ſhew his wealth, & to gratifie the Sul-D tan, gaue vnto him many rich and royal preſents, with ſuch a maſſe of treaſure, as that he much wondred thereat. In requitall whereof, and in token of his thankfulneſſe, he again honored the Emperor with the name of his father, and terming himſelfe by the name of his ſon, promiſed to reſtore vnto him the citie of Sebaſtia, with the territorie thereunto belonging, then part of Dadune his inheritance. Neuertheleſſe all this was nothing elſe but meere diſſimulation, as afterward by proofe appeared: for returning home, he thruſt Dadune indeed out of Sebaſtia, which he ſpoyled, with the country thereabout; but forgetfull of his promiſe, kept it wholly to himſelfe; and by force tooke alſo from him the city of Cæſarea, with the country of Amaſia, by him before but lately poſſeſſed. In like manner he bent his forces alſo vpon Iagupaſan E his other brother, who in the verie preparation of thoſe wars died: by whoſe vntimely death the citie of Ancyra, with all his dominions in Capadocia, fell into the Sultans hands. Who now poſſeſſed of all his fathers kingdome, and ſwelling with pride, forgetting all former cur-teſies, inuaded the Emperors territories, & tooke from him the citie of Laodicea in Phrygia, where he did great harme, as alſo in the country thereabouts, killing the people as he went, or elſe carrying them away with him captiues. For the repreſſing of which outrages, the Emperor with a ſtrong armie paſſed ouer into Aſia, and there in the frontiers of his territories fortified Dorileum againſt the incurſions of the Turks. In performing whereof, he, to the example and ſtirring vp of others, carried the firſt basket of ſtones himſelfe vpon his ſhoulders; and vſed ſuch further diligence, that in ſhort time the citie was compaſſed about with ſtrong wals, F and deepe ditches, maugre the Turks, who ceaſed not with continuall alarmes and skirmiſhes to haue hindred the worke. With like care, and for like purpoſe he alſo fortified Subleum, another ſtrong Hold; and leauing in either place a ſtrong garriſon, returned againe to Conſtantinople. Neuertheleſſe the Turks ceaſed not with continuall inrodes to doe what harmes they might vpon the frontiers of the Empire, although not altogether with ſo good ſucceſſe as before, being many times cut off by the garriſons of the late fortified towns: which grieuances ſtill increaſing, cauſed the Emperor to expoſtulate with the Sultan, as with an vnthankfull man, and forgetfull of ſo great kindneſſe before done vnto him, as the eſtabliſhment of him in his kingdome came vnto: who with no leſſe vehemencie vpbraided him againe with inconſtancie and breach of promiſe, as well for fortifying the aforeſaid places, contrarie to the league betwixt them, as for that hauing promiſed much more, he had thereof performed nothing. Thus vnkindneſſe dayly growing vpon euerie triſle (as it commonly falleth out among men of great ſpirit, and jealous of their owne honors) it was dayly expected, when the matter ſhould fall out into open and bloudie war; both of them being men of great valour, and apt to reuenge the leaſt iniurie to them offered. Yet was it the Sultans manner, warily to mannage his wars by his politique and expert captaines; whereas the Emperour being of an hotter nature, and couragious aboue meaſure, commonly in all his great expeditions aduentured his own perſon, without reſpect what danger might thereof inſue vnto himſelfe or his ſtate. Long it was not but that the Emperour, fully reſolued to be reuenged of ſo many wrongs done vnto him and his ſubiects by the Turks, raiſed the whole power of his Empire, both in Europe and Aſia, in ſuch ſort as if he had therewith purpoſed, not only to haue raſed to the ground Iconium the regall ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultan, but euen vtterly to haue deſtroyed the whole Nation of the Turks. Thus with a moſt puiſſant and populous armie, wel appointed of all things neceſſarie, he paſſed ouer into Aſia, and ſo in good order marching thorow Phrygia, Laodicea, Chonas, (called in antient time Paſſas) S. Archangel, Lampis, Cælænas, (where the head of the great and famous riuer Mæander riſeth, whereinto the riuer Marſyas falleth) and from thence to Chonia, he with euill lucke, and worſe ſpeed, paſſed by Myriocephalon, an old ruinous caſtle, ominous by the name thereof, as by the euent in ſhort time after it prooued. And albeit that he marched verie circumſpectly, ſtill intrenching his armie in euery place where he lodged; yet could he make but ſmal ſpeed, by reaſon of the multitude of his carriages, and of the baſe people that attended the ſame. The Turks in the meane while oftentimes ſhewing themſelues in troupes, and in places of aduantage skirmiſhing ſometime with one part of the armie, and ſometime with another, but neuer daring to aduenture the fortune of a juſt battell: yet by ſuch meanes were the victuallers of the armie oftentimes cut off, and the paſſages for the Emperor made verie dangerous. And the more to diſtreſſe the Chriſtians in their long trauell, they found the countrey before them of purpoſe deſtroyed by the Turks, and the water in many places poyſoned, whereof the Chriſtians vnaduiſedly drinking, fell into many grieuous diſeaſes, eſpecially the flix, and thereof died in great number. The Sultan in the mean time, although he had in readineſſe a right puiſſant armie of his owne, and had procured great aid from the Perſian Sultan his kinſman and chiefe ſupporter; yet fearing the doubtful euent of war, & loath to aduenture his whole eſtate vpon the fortune of a battell, ſought by his embaſſadors ſent for that purpoſe, to grow to ſome peace with the Emperour, and that vpon ſuch honorable conditions, as by the wiſer ſort were thought not to be at any hand refuſed: which large offers, the Sultan as deſirous of peace, made vnto him not once, but againe & again: which the Emperor neuertheleſſe (repoſing great confidence in his owne power, and prickt forward by the gallants of the court, better acquainted with the braue triumphs of peace, than the hard wars of the Turks) proudly reiected, and ſo diſmiſſing the Embaſſadors, ſcornfully willed them to tel their Maſter, That he would giue him anſwer vnto his requeſts vnder the wals of Iconium. Which cauſed the Sultan, now out of all hope of any reconciliation to be made betwixt the Emperour and him, with all his power to take the ſtraits of Zibrica, whereby the armie of the Chriſtians, departing from Myriocephalon, muſt of neceſſity paſſe. The entrance into theſe ſtraits was by a long valley, on either ſide incloſed with high mountaines, which towards the North riſing and falling according as the hils gaue leaue, opened into diuers large vallies, which by little and little growing againe ſtraiter and ſtraiter, with high and craggie rocks hanging ouer on either ſide, and almoſt touching one another, gaue vnto the painful trauveller a moſt hard and difficult paſſage.

Into this ſo dangerous a valley the Emperor, not fearing the enemies force, deſperatly entred with his armie, hauing neither prouided for the cleering of the paſſages, or ſafetie of his carriages, in no other order than as if he had marched thorow the plaine and champaine countrey, although it were before told him (that which he ſhortly after, but too late ſaw) that the ene-enemie had ſtrongly poſſeſſed both the ſtraits & mountains, to hinder his farther paſſage. The vauward of his armie was conducted by Iohn and Andronicus the ſons of Angelus Conſtantine, acompanied with Macroducas Conſtantine and Lapardas Andronicus: in the right wing was Baldwin the Emperors brother in law; and in the left Maurozomes Theodorus: after them followed the drudges and ſcullions, with an infinit number of carters and other baſe people, attending vpon the carriages, with the baggage of the whole armie: next vnto theſe came the Emperor with the main battel, conſiſting for the moſt part of right valiant & worthie ſoldiers: the rereward was ſhut vp by Andronicus Contoſtephanus, with a number of moſt reſolute men. They were not far entred into theſe ſtraits, but that the Turks from the mountains and broken cliffs ſhewed themſelues on euery ſide, deliuering their deadly ſhot from the vpper ground, vpon the Chriſtians below, as thick as haile: neuertheleſſe the ſons of Angelus, with Macroducas and Lapardas, and the vantgard, caſting themſelues into a three ſquare battell in forme of a wedge, with their targuets in manner of a penthouſe caſt cloſe together ouer their heads, and their archers on euery ſide luſtily beſtowing their ſhot among the thickeſt of their enemies, by plain force droue them out of the ſtraits they had before poſſeſſed, and cauſed them to retire farther off into the mountains, and ſo hauing made themſelues way, with little or no loſſe paſſed thoſe dangerous ſtraits; vntil that at length hauing recouered the top of a hill very commodious for their purpoſe, as the caſe ſtood, they there ſtaied, & preſently incamped themſelues. And haply with like good fortune might the reſt of the armie haue paſſed alſo, had they in like order, and with like courage preſently followed after: but failing ſo to do, & troubled with the multitude of their carriages, which could not poſſibly make any way thorow thoſe ſtrait & rough paſſages, (but troubled themſelues one another, as alſo the whole armie) they were from the vpper ground miſerably ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkiſh archers, whoſe arrows fel as thick vpon them from the mountains, as if it had bin a perpetual tempeſt or ſhoure of haile, to the great diſordring & diſmaying of the whole armie: which the Turks quickly perceiuing, and therewith encouraged, in great numbers came downe from the mountaines, where they had before houered ouer the heads of the Chriſtians, and forcibly entring the plaine ground, and comming to handie blows, firſt ouerthrew the right wing; where Baldwin himſelfe ſeeking to reſtore his diſordred companies, and to ſtay the furie of the enemie (now raging in the bloud of the Chriſtians) with a troup of valiant horſmen breaking into the thickeſt of them, as became a worthie captaine, was there compaſſed in with the multitude of his enemies, and ſlaine, together with all his followers, and the greateſt part of the whole wing by him commanded. With this victorie the Turks were ſo encouraged, that comming downe with all their power, they ſtopped all the ways whereby the Chriſtians were to paſſe, who as men couped vp in thoſe dangerous ſtraits, were not able either to defend themſelues, or to helpe one another: but incloſed as deere in a toyle, and one troubling another, were the cauſe both of the deſtruction of themſelues & others. For by reaſon of the ſtraitneſſe of the place, neither could they that were before, retire, neither they that were behinde in the rereward, come forward to relieue the one the other, as need required: the carriages alſo, which were many, & in the midſt of the armie, ſeruing them to no other purpoſe, than to the hurt of themſelues. There were the beaſts that ſerued for burden, together with the ſoldiers, ouerwhelmed with the Turks ſhot, the vallies lay ful of dead bodies, the riuers ran mingled with the bloud of men and beaſts, in ſuch terrible manner as is not by pen to be expreſſed. For the Chriſtians not able either to go forward or retire, were there in thoſe ſtraits ſlain like ſheepe: if any courage or ſparke of valour were by any ſhewed againſt the enemie, fighting at ſo great aduantage, it was but loſt, ſeruing to little or no purpoſe. And to increaſe their miſeries, the Turks in ſcorne ſhewed vpon the point of a lance the head of Andronicus Bataza, the Emperors nephew, who comming with an armie out of Paphlagonia, and Heraclea Pontica, againſt the Turks of Amaſia, was now by the way by them ouerthrown and ſlaine. The report whereof, confirmed by the ſight of his head, and the conſideration of the deſperate danger wherein the whole armie preſently ſtood, ſo troubled the Emperor, that he was at his wits end; and with drie teares (if it may be ſo ſaid) diſſembling his inward grief, as one out of comfort, ſtood doubtful which way to turn himſelfe. For the Turks hauing ſuffered the vantgard to paſſe, with all their power charged the Emperours maine battell, as his chiefe ſtrength, nothing doubting, but that hauing once ouerthrowne it, they ſhould eaſily and at pleaſure ouerthrow the reſt. Oftentimes had had the Emperor attempted to haue driuen the enemy out of thoſe ſtraits, and ſo to haue opened away for his armie to haue paſſed, but all in vaine, the power of the Turks ſtil increaſing, and they at great aduantage notably maintaining the paſſages before by them taken. Neuertheleſſe ſeeing no leſſe danger in ſtaying ſtil, than in going forward, he with a few of his beſt ſoldiers, armed with deſpaire, and reſolued to die, (vnto which kind of men nothing is terrible) ſet forward directly vpon his enemies, willing the reſt with like reſolution euery man to make for himſelfe the beſt ſhift he could. And ſo with many wonds and ſturdie blows both giuen and receiued, he by plaine force and might of hand brake thorow the thickeſt of his enemies, and ſo eſcaped out of thoſe ſtraits as out of a trap: but yet not without many wounds receiued in his perſon, and himſelfe ſo wearied as that he was not able to lift vp his helmet, being beaten cloſe to his head, and in his targuet were found ſticking 30 of the Turks arrows, or thereabouts, the manifeſt tokens of his danger. The other legions ſeeking to follow the Emperour, (for other way they had none) were on euery ſide hardly aſſailed by the Turks, and infinite numbers of them ſlaine, beſide many others that periſhed in thoſe ſtraits, ouerborn and trodden to death by their own fellows. Yea ſuch as had the fortune to eſcape out of one of theſe perrilous ſtraits, were forthwith ſlaine in the next: for this ſo dangerous a paſſage thorow the mountains, was diuided (as is aforeſaid) into ſeuen vallies, which giuing faire and broad entrances, the farther a man went, grew ſtil ſtraiter and ſtraiter, all which ſtraits the Turks had before ſtrongly poſſeſſed. At which time alſo, the more to increaſe the terrour of the day, the light ſand raiſed with the feet of the men and horſes, was with the violence of a moſt tempeſtuous wind which then blew, carried ſo forcibly and thicke, that both the armies grapling together as if it had bin in the darkneſſe of the night, killed whomſoeuer they met withall, without reſpect of friend or foe; by which errour many were euen of their own friends ſlaine. In euery place lay great heaps of Turks ſlain together with the Chriſtians, and with them great number of horſes and other beaſts for carriage; ſo that thoſe vallies where this bloudie conflict was, ſeemed to be nothing elſe but a large burying place of the Turks & Chriſtians with their horſes: but the greater number was of the Chriſtians that periſhed, and they not altogether of the common ſort, but euen of the braueſt captaines, and the Emperours neereſt kinſmen. The violence of the wind ceaſing, and the day cleering vp, there was of all others to be ſeene (a moſt wofull ſpectacle) men yet aliue, ſome wounded, ſome whole, couered ſome to the middle, ſome to the necke, with dead carkaſes, in ſuch ſort as that they were not able with any ſtrugling to get out: who with their hands caſt vp towards heauen, with ruthfull voices cried out for helpe to ſuch as paſſed by; but al in vain, for euery man poſſeſſed with the common feare, and by their danger meaſuring their own, paſſed by them without compaſſion, as more careful of their own ſafetie, leauing them yet liuing, as men to be numbred among the dead.

A moſt miſerable ſpectacle.

The Emperor himſelfe, as a man almoſt now ſpent, being got out of the danger, ſtood a while to breath himſelfe vnder the ſhadow of a wild peare tree, without any page or man to attend him; whom a poore common ſouldier eſpying, and mooued with compaſſion, came vnto him, and offering him the beſt ſeruice he could, helped him vp with his helmet, and buckled vp his armor, which before hung dangling here & there about him: when in the mean while a Turke comming in vpon him, had taken his horſe by the bridle, in hope to haue led him away priſoner: whom for al that, the Emperor as wearie as he was, with the trunchion of his broken lance which he had yet in his hand, ſtrucke down to the ground, and ſo cleered himſelf of him. Preſently after came alſo another ſort of the ſtragling Turks, readie alſo to haue ſeiſed vpon him, and to haue taken him priſoner; of whom he ſlew one with the aforeſaid horſemans ſtaffe, and with his ſword ſtrucke off the head of another of them, and ſo kept them off, vntill that by the comming in of ten of his own ſouldiers he was relieued. Departing thence with purpoſe to haue joyned himſelfe vnto the legions that were gone before in the vauward, he had not gone far, but that he was much troubled by other Turks that he met, and the heapes of the dead bodies that lay in his way: yet at laſt, hauing with much labour and more danger paſſed the ſtraits, & a riuer running thereby, being glad in many places to ride ouer the dead bodies of his own people, & ſome other of his own ſoldiers now reſorting vnto him, he there ſaw Iohn Cataculene, a noble & right valiant gentleman that had maried his niece, fighting alone againſt a great number of the Turks, to be compaſſed in and ſlaine; whom he was no way able to relieue. Which Turks alſo ſeeing him paſſe by, followed after him, as after a moſt rich prey, in hope hope to haue either preſently taken or ſlaine him: whom neuertheleſſe he (encouraging the ſmall companie he had about him) notably repulſed; and ſo ſometime marching forward, and again as occaſion required making a ſtand, came at length long looked for, but moſt welcome, vnto the legions that were gone before, not ſo ſorrie for their owne hard eſtate, as carefull of his danger.

But before he could come to thoſe his legions, he readie to faint for thirſt, commanded water to be brought him out of the riuer that ran faſt by; which after he had taſted, & by the vnpleaſant taſt thereof perceiued the ſame to be infected, he fetching a deep ſigh, ſaid, O how vnfortunatly haue I taſted Chriſtian bloud! whereunto an audacious and malapert ſoldier there preſent, and more bitter than the cruell time it ſelfe, replied, Emperor, thou didſt not now, thou diddeſt not now, I ſay, firſt, but long ſince, and oftentimes drinke the bloud of the Chriſtians, euen vntil thou waſt drunke againe, at ſuch time as thou didſt with moſt grieuous exactions vexe and deuoure thy poore ſubjects. Which reproachfull ſpeech the Emperor put vp in ſilence, making as if he had not heard it. With like patience he alſo forbare the ſame railing companion, at ſuch time as he ſeeing his treaſures hardly beſet, and in danger to be taken by the Turks, to animate his ſoldiers, willed them to do what they could to reſcue the ſame, and to take it for their labour: This treaſure (ſaid this impudent fellow) ſhould before haue been giuen vnto thy ſoldiers, rather than now, when as it cannot be recouered but with great danger and bloudſhed: and therefore if thou be a man of valour, as thou wouldeſt be accounted, and as the preſent caſe requireth, valiantly charge the Turks (now readie to carrie it away) thy ſelfe, and ſo recouer thyne euill gotten goods. Whereunto the Emperour anſwered no more but, Good words ſouldier, & ſo put it vp, as did Dauid the railings of Shimei. Shortly after the comming of the Emperor vnto thoſe legions of his vauntgard (the onely remainder of his armie that was left whole and vnbroken) came alſo Andronicus Contoſtephanus, who had the leading of the rereward, with diuers other of great place, who had by good fortune eſcaped the furie of the Turks. The miſeries of that day (not well to be expreſſed) being ended by the comming on of the night, the Chriſtians ſate in the campe, oppreſſed with a generall heauines, leaning their heads vpon their elbows, & conſidering the preſent danger wherein they were, ſcarcely accounted themſelues among the liuing: the Turks in the mean time to increaſe their feare, all the night running about the campe, and crying aloud vnto ſuch of their countreymen in the campe, as had abiured their religion, or for other reſpects had taken part with the Imperials, that they ſhould that night get them out of the campe, wheras otherwiſe if they ſtayd vnto the morning, they ſhould be all but loſt men. In this ſo great an extremitie the Emperor not knowing not what to do, calling together his chiefe commanders, declared vnto them the deſperat danger they were in, together with his reſolution; which was, ſecretly himſelfe to flie, and to leaue the reſt, euerie man to make what ſhift he could for himſelfe. Which his baſe determination, ſo foule as fouler could not be, they all wondering at, as proceeding from a diſtraughted mind; and by chance ouerheard by one of the common ſoldiers that ſtood without the tent, the ſame ſoldier fetching a deepe ſigh, in deteſtation therof cried out with a loud voyce, What meanes the Emperor? And ſo turning himſelfe vnto him, ſaid, Art not thou he that haſt thruſt vs into this deſolate and ſtrait way, and caſt vs headlong into deſtruction? and haſt as it were in a morter incloſed vs in theſe rockes and mountains, readie as it were to ouerwhelme vs. What had we to do with this vaile of mourning, and mouth of hell? Wherefore came we into theſe miſchieuous and rough ſtraits? What can we particularly complaine of the Barbarians, which in theſe inextricable windings and ſtraits haue thus intangled and beſet vs? Was it not thou that broughtſt vs hither? And wilt thou now, as ſheepe appointed to the ſlaughter, thy ſelfe betray vs? With which ſo ſharpe a reprehenſion the Emperor throughly pierced, changed his former determination for flight, reſoluing now to ſtand by it, whatſoeuer hapned. But what ſhould he now doe, beſet with his enemies ſtill readie to deuoure him? Help he ſaw none, either in himſelf, or to be expected from others, nought remained but death and deſpaire. In this extremity, al mans help now failing, it pleaſed the moſt mighty (which chaſtiſeth & healeth again, which ſtiketh, and yet giueth life, and ſuffereth not the ſtaffe of the ſinners always to rage into the portion of the juſt) with mercifull eye to looke downe vpon theſe diſtreſſed men, and with an vnwonted kind of clemencie to touch the Sultans heart, in ſuch ſort, as that he which but the other day ſtood in dread of the Emperour, and now hauing him as it were in his power, was ouercome with his miſerie: or as in times paſt he by Huſai ouerthrew the councell of Achitophel, and changed the mind of Absalon to follow such aduice as should bring him to destruction: so then also he turned the mind of the Turkish Sultan, that (persuaded by certain of the chiefe men about him, who in time of peace had vsed to receiue great gifts and Presents from the Emperor) he of his own accord by his Embassadors offered peace vnto the Emperor, before that he in so great distresse sued vnto him for any; and that vpon the selfe same conditions they had made their leagues before. The Turks in the meane time ignorant of the Sultans resolution, early in the morning were readie to assault the Emperors campe, in hope at once to haue ouerthrown his whole power; and with a barbarous outcrie still riding about it, came so nigh, that with their arrows they slew diuers of the Christians within their own trenches: against whom the Emperor sent out Iohn the son of Constantinus Angelus, and after him, Macroducas Constantinus, but to little or no purpose. In the mean time came one Gabras, a man of greatest reputation among the Turks, Embassador from the Sultan; by whose commandement the Turks ceased further to assault the campe. This Gabras comming vnto the Emperour, and after the manner of the Barbarians, honoring him with reuerence done euen down to the ground; first presented him with a goodly horse, whose furniture was all of siluer, as if it had bin for triumph, and a raire two edged sword. Afterwards falling into a large discourse concerning a peace to be made, and with many kind words as with an inchantment appeasing the Emperours heauinesse conceiued of his late losse; he among other pleasant conceits then vttered, seeing the Emperor in a rich robe of yellow ouer his armor, told him, that the colour was not fit for war, as ominous, and portending euil lucke: whereat the Emperor a little smiling, gaue it him, with the fortune thereof; and receiuing the horse and sword sent him from the Sultan, signed the peace. Amongst other conditions of the peace (which the dangerousnesse of the time suffered not the Emperor curiously to examine) one was, That Dorileum and Subleum, before by him fortified, and the ground of this vnfortunat war, should be again rased. Peace thus beyond all hope being concluded, and the emperor deliuered of a great feare, purposed another way to return home, to auoid the sight of the slaine: yet was he by his guides, euen of purpose as it was thought, led back the same way, to behold with his eys those miserable spectacles of the slain, which could not with any teares be sufficiently lamented: for the straits were made plain, the vallies were raised into hils, and the forests lay couered with the carkasses of the slain: no man passed by, but with heauines and griefe, calling by name vpon their friends and familiars there lost. Hauing again passed those dolefull straits, the Turks were again in the taile of the armie: for it was reported, That the Sultan repenting himselfe to haue suffred his enemies so to scape out of his hands, had giuen leaue to such as would, to pursue them, but followed not himselfe with his whole power, as before; for most of the better sort of his soldiers loaded with the spoile, were now returned home. Yet these that followed after the army, slew many, especially such as were weake or wounded, and so vnable to follow the rest: although the Emperour to help the matter, had for the repressing of them placed the best of his captains and souldiers in the rereward. Being come to Chonas, and now out of feare of his enemies, he gaue vnto euery one of his hurt souldiers mony to pay for the curing of their wounds, and to bring them into their countries; and comming to Philadelphia, there stayed for the refreshing of himself after so great miseries. In his return he rased Subleum, according to his promise, but not Dorileum: wherof the Sultan by his Embassadors complaining; he answered, That what he had, inforced thereunto by necessitie, promised, he greatly forced not to performe. In reuenge wherof, the Sultan sent out one of his most valiant captains, called Atapack, with 24000 good soldiers chosen out of his whole armie, with strait charge to wast & destroy all the Emperors prouinces and towns euen vnto the sea side, without sparing man, woman, or child; and in token thereof, to bring with him some of the sea water, an oare, and some of the sea sand: who according to his charge spoiled Phrygia, with the cities along the riuer Mæander, euen vnto the sea side: and so returning with a rich prey, by the way spoyled what before he had left vntouched. But in passing the riuer Mæander, when he feared least, he fell into the hands of Iohn Bataza the Emperours nephew, and of Ducas Constantine a most valiant Captaine; of purpose sent against him by the Emperour with a great power: where hee was by them slaine, together with all his Armie, and the rich bootie he had taken, all againe recouered. Manie other hard conflicts passed after this, betwixt the Imperialls and the Turkes, the one continually seeking to annoy the other; all which, for that therein nothing fel out much worth the

remembrance, I for breuitie willingly passe ouer. In these endlesse troubles died Emanuel the Greeke Emperor, when he had by the space of eight and thirty yeres worthily gouerned that great empire, hauing in the time of his sickneesse but a little before his death taken vpon him the habit of a Monke, in token he had forsaken the world. All the time of his raigne he was no lesse iealous of the Christian Princes of the West, than of the Turks in the East; and therfore euer dealt with them vnkindly. In time of war he was so laborious, as if he had neuer taken felicitie but in paine: and againe in peace so giuen ouer to his pleasure, as if he had neuer thought of any thing els. After whose death the Turkish Sultan, without resistance inuading the frontiers of the empire, tooke Sozopolis, with diuers towns therabout in Phrygia, and long besieged the famous city of Attalia, and so daily encroched more and more vpon the prouinces of the empire, ioyning the same vnto his owne; which was no great matter for him to doe, the Greeke empire being then no better gouerned than was the chariot of the Sun (as the Poets feigne) by Phaeton, far vnfit for so great a charge: for Alexius Comnenus, otherwise called Porphyrogenitus, being then but a childe of about 12 yeares old, succeeding his graue father in the empire, after the manner of children altogether following his pleasure; his mother with his fathers kinsmen & friends, who aboue all things ought to haue had an especial care of his education, neglecting the old Emperors trust in them reposed, followed also their owne delights, without the regard of the ruine of the commonweale. Some enamoured with the beautie of the yong empresse, gaue themselues all to brauerie, & the courting of her: othersome in great authority, with no lesse desire in the mean time, with the common treasures filled their empty cofers: and a third sort there was (of all the rest most dangerous) who neither respecting their sensual pleasure, n or the heaping vp of wealth, looked not so low, aiming at the very empire it selfe. As for the common good, that was of al other things of them al least regarded. Among these third sort of the ambitious, was old Andronicus, the cousin of the late Emperor Emanuel, a man of an haughty & troublesome spirit, whom he the said Emperor Emanuel had for his aspiring, most part of the time of his raigne kept in prison, or else in exile, as he now was, being by him not long before, for feare of raising of new troubles, confined to liue far off from the court at Oenum: who now hearing of the death of the Emperor Emanuel, of the factions in court, of the childishnes of the yong Emperor Alexius, giuen wholly to his sports; & the great men put in trust to haue seen to his bringing vp, & to the gouernment of the empire, some like Bees to flie abroad into the country, seeking after mony as the Bees do for hony; some others in the meane time like hogs, lying still and fatting themselues with great and gainfull offices, wallowing in all excesse & pleasure, to haue no regard of the honor or profit of the common weale: thought it now a fit time (in such disorder of the state) for him to aspire vnto the empire after which he had all his life time longed. That he was generally beloued of the Constantinopolitans, yea & of some of the nobility also, he doubted not: for them hee had long before by his popular behauior gained, together with the distrust of the late Emperor, iealous of his estate; which as it cost him his liberty, so missed it not much but that it had cost him his life also: but now that hee was dead, wanted nothing more than some faire colour for the shadowing of his foule purpose. Among many and right diuers things by him thought vpon, was a clause in the oath of obedience which he had giuen to the Emperor Emanuel & Alexius his son, (which oath he had deliuered vnto him in writing) That if he should see, heare, or vnderstand of any thing dangerous or hurtful to their honor, empire, or persons, he should forthwith bewray it, and to the vttermost of his power withstand it: which words (not so to haue beene wrested) as best seruing for his purpose, he took first occasion for to work vpon. And as he was a stout and imperious man, thereupon writ diuers letters vnto the yong Emperour his cousin, vnto Theodosius the Patriarch, and other such as he knew well affected vnto the late Emperour Emanuel: wherin among other things which he wished to be amended in the present gouernment, he seemed most to complain of the immoderate power and authority of Alexius, then President of the Counsell: who in great fauour with the young Emperour, and more inward with the empresse his mother than was supposed to stand with her honor, ruled al things at his pleasure, insomuch, as that nothing don by any the great officers of the empire, or by the emperor himselfe, was accounted of any force, except his approbation were therunto annexed: wherby he was grown vnto such an excessiue pride, hauing all things in his power, as that no man could without danger, as vpon the venemous Basiliske, look vpon him. Of which his so excessiue excessiue and insolent power Andronicus by his letters now greatly complained, moued thereunto (as he would haue it beleeued) with the care he had of the yong Emperors safety, which could not (as he said) long stand with the others great power, so which he therfore (as in duty bound) wished to be abridged: aggrauating withall the infamous report of Alexius his too much familiaritie with the empresse; which first muttered in court, afterwards flew (as he said) throughout the whole world. The reformation of which things, as tending to the danger of the person of the Emperour, & dishonor of the state, he forsooth as one in conscience bound, with great grauity and eloquence (beeing a very learned man) both in open speech and writing most earnestly desired: and therby so wrought, as that he was generally accounted for a man of great experience (as indeed he was) and a faithful counsellor to the state, a thing much to haue bin wished. Wherefore leauing Oenum, the place whereto hee was by the Emperour Emanuel in a sort banished, trauelling towards Constantinople, hee gaue it out in euery place where he came, what he had sworne, and what he would for his oathes sake do: vnto whom men desirous of the change of the state, & such as gaue credit vnto the report long before giuen out, That he should at length become Emperor; flockt in great numbers, as birds about n owle, to see him, and with vain praises to chatter about him. In this sort he came as far as Paphlagonia; in euery place honorably receiued, as if he had bin a deliuerer of his countrie sent from God. And in t he imperial city he was not longed for of the vulgar people only, as their light and load star, but diuers of the nobility also by secret messengers and letters, perswaded him to hasten his comming, and to take vpon him the gouernement; assuring him, that there would be none to resist him, or to oppose themselues against his shadow, but all ready to receiue him: especially Mary the yong Emperors sister by the fathers side, with her husband Cesar (who beeing a woman of great spirit, and grieuing much to see her fathers Empire made a prey vnto Alexius the president, & the Empresse her step mother, whom she naturally hated) had raised a great and dangerous tumult in the citie against them both, which was not without much bloodshed appeased: and now ceased not by often and most earnest letters (to her own destruction and her husbands, as it afterwards fel out) to prick forward Andronicus and to hasten his comming: who by letters and messengers daily comming vnto him from the court still more and more encouraged, leauing behind him the country of Paphlagonia, came to Heraclea in Pontus, and stil on towards the imperiall citie, with great cunning and dissimulation winning the hearts of the people as he went. For who was so stonie hearted, whom his sweet words and aboundant teares flowing from his gracious eyes, as from two plentiful fountains down by his hoary cheeks, might not haue moued? All that he did or desired, was (as he said) for the common good and liberty of the Emperor. By which means he had drawn vnto him a wonderfull number of the rude countrey people by the way as he came. But comming into Bythinia, he was by Iohn Ducas gouernor of the great city of Nice, shut out as an enemy to the state, and so at Nicomedia also. Neuertheless, passing by those cities, he held stil on his way, vntill at length he was neere vnto a castle called Charace, encountred by Andronicus Angelus, sent with a great power against him, by the great president Alexius; who otherwise as an effeminat man, giuen ouer to his pleasure, spending the greatest part of the night in rioting by candle light, and most part of the day in his bed, with curtaines close drawne as if it had beene night: yet doubtful now of the comming of his enemy, left nothing vndon which he thought might helpe for the assuring of his state. Many of the nobilitie of whom he stood in doubt, he gained vnto him by means of the Emperors mother; who by her rare beautie, sweet words, & gracious behauior, as with a line drew al men to her. Other some hee ouercame with gifts and great summes of money, whereof hee now made no spare: And so wrought the matter, that no man of any account or marke went ouer to Andronicus. Who neuertheless with such followers as hee had, ioyning battell with Angelus (sent against him, as is before saide) ouerthrew him and put him to flight. Wherewith Alexius much troubled, in great displeasure and without reason, called Angelus (now fled to Constantinople) to an account for the money deliuered vnto him for the defraying of the charges of that vnfortunate warre: who seeing his misfortune to be so taken as if he had framed it himselfe, and of purpose betraid the army committed to his charge; by the counsell of his six sonnes, being all men of great valor and wisedome, first tooke the refuge of his owne house: but finding himselfe there in no safety, with his wife and his said sonnes (two of which came afterwards to be Emperours) presently presently fled ouer the strait to Andronicus: who seeing of him comming towards him, is reported to haue vsed this text of Scripture, Behold I will send mine Angell before thy face, to prepare thy wayes, alluding to his name of Angelus, as the presage of his good successe. Wherefore incouraged with the comming of these noblemen his kinsmen, he without longer stay marched directly vnto the sea side, and there a little aboue Chalcedon encamped almost right ouer against Constantinople: causing many great fires (moe than needed) to be made in his armie, to make it seeme vnto them of the citie greater than indeed it was; and with the sight thereof to keep the citizens in suspence, with the doubtful expectation of some great matter to ensue. Wherein he was no whit deceiued; for they hauing him now as it were in sight, leauing their worke, ran some to the sea side, some vp to the hils and high towers to behold his armie a far off, willing with their friendly lookes, if it had bin possible, to haue drawn him ouer the strait into the citie. Alexius knowing himselfe not able by land to encounter with so strong an enemie, (for now some which on foot could not go ouer to Andronicus, were secretly in heart already with him; other some thought themselues sufficiently to shew their fidelitie to the Emperor, if sitting stil at home, they should take part with neither: for so haue subtill heads and aspiring mindes, for the furtherance of their desires, taught the common people both to say & thinke) thought it best by sea to auert the present danger: and therefore commanded all the Emperors gallies (being before rigged vp and ready) to be strongly manned and put to sea, for the keeping of Propontis and the strait of Bosphorus, that Andronicus should not that way passe. Now had hee determined to haue made especiall choice of some assured friend of his own to be General of this fleet, as he had done of the captains & m sters, being all his own kinsmen or domesticall seruants: but as he was about to haue so done, Contostephanus (surnamed the great captain) opposed himselfe against it, challenging that honor due vnto himself, before all others: so that ouercome by his authoritie (which was no time for Alexius now to dispute) he was glad to commit the charge and trust of the whole fleet vnto him, as Generall. Thus hauing (as hee thought) made the sea sure, he sent ouer vnto Andronicus, as from the Emperor, (for all was done in his name) one George Xiphilinus, with letters and other instructions, whereof the effect was, to command him forthwith in peace to returne to the place from whence he came, & not farther to trouble the state: promising him in so doing, the Emperors fauor, with many great honors and preferments to be afterward bestowed vpon him; which otherwise might turn to his vtter destruction. Which letters Xiphilinus hauing deliuered, and done his message, is reported to haue secretly aduised Andronicus to proceed in his purpose, and not in any case to yeeld to that which was of him required: wherwith Andronicus encouraged, proudly reiected the graces offered, & willed the messenger to tel them that sent him, that if they would haue him to returne vnto the place from whence he came, they should first displace the proud president Alexius; & call him vnto an account for the villanies he had don; then the Emperours mother they should deprive of her honors, & shut her vp as a Nun into some cloyster, there to learn to amend her life; & last of al, that the Emperor according to his fathers wil, should take vpon himself the gouernment, & not be ouertopt by others, by whose too much authority, his maiesty & honor was (as he said) too much impaired. But within a few days after, Contostephanus, the great captain & General, caried ouer al the gallies to Andronicus, leauing nothing but their names for the president in his rols to look vpon. whose reuolt aboue al other things encouraged Andronicus, & cast Alexius euen into the bottome of despaire. For now Andronicus his friends flocked together in the city, not secretly as before, but openly in al places: and such as wisht a change in the state, impudently scoffing at Alexius, passed ouer the strait to Chalcedon in great numbers to Andronicus, where hauing filled their eys with beholding of his goodly person, his cheerfull countenance, & reuerent age; and their eares with his sweet words & great promises, returned home merry & ioyful, as if they had bin in some terrestrial paradice, filling the city with his praises. After that, Andronicus his two sons, Iohn and Manuel, with diuers others, whom the president had cast in prison, were set at liberty, & other of his chiefe fauorits laid fast in their rooms. As for Alexius the president himself, with all his friends & faction in the court, they were taken & committed to the keeping of the guard: a right strange alteration. But about midnight, Alexius himself was secretly conueied out of the court to the Patriarchs house, & there kept with a stronger guard than before. A wonderfull change, & worth marking, a man so honorably born, but yesterday in greatest honor, attended vpon vpon with many thousands, all at his command, hauing the power to spill or saue: to day in bond, in disgrace, in miserie and despaire, and not so much as a page to wait vpon him. Which he taking very grieuously, yet complained of nothing more, than that they which had the keeping of him, would not suffer him to sleepe or take any rest. Of whose miserie, the Patriarch taking pitie (although he had of him very euill deserued) yet cheered him vp with comfortable words, perswading him with patience to endure his hard fortune, and not with such speeches as tended not his present state, to prouoke his keepers to vse him euill. Within a few daies after early in a morning, he was brought out of the Patriarchs house, and set vpon a very little and lade, and so with a ragged clout vpon the top of a reed in manner of an ensigne, carried before him in derision, was brought to the sea side, and there cast into a little boat, was so brought to Andronicus, by whose commandement, with the generall consent of the nobilitie, he for his euil gouerment shortly after had his eys put out. This was the miserable end of the intemperate power, or rather of the insolent soueraignitie of Alexius: who, had he with more moderation and vigilancie gouerned, might both haue kept Andronicus out of the citie, and himselfe from so great miserie; hauing at his command all the Emperors treasure, his gallies, with most part of the strength of the empire. Now came the noblemen ouer apace to Andronicus: the last that came, was the reuerend Patriarch Theodosius, with the chiefe of the clergie: of whose approch, Andronicus hearing, went out of his tent to meet him, and falling downe (as great as he was) flat at his horses feet, and in a while after arising againe, kissed the Patriarchs foot, calling him, the Emperors Sauiour, the louer of vertue, the defender of the truth; and comparing him with the famous Father Iohn Chrysostome, omitted not any honorable title hee could possibly deuise to giue him. But the deuout Patriarch, that had neuer seene Andronicus before, hauing now well viewed him, and marked his sterne countenance, his subtil nature, his craftie and dissembling manners, his exceeding stature, being almost ten foot high, his stately gate, his proud looke, his continual severitie, and melancholie silence; as it were pitying them that to their owne destruction had called such a man, said, Hitherto I haue heard, but now I haue also seene, and plainly knowne: and fetching a deep sigh, adioyning thereunto that saying of the Prophet Dauid: As we haue heard, so haue we also seene. In which words, he couertly quipped the dissembled meering and submission of Andronicus: and withall called to remembrance the words of the Emperour Emanuel, wherewith he had many times so painted forth Andronicus vnto the Patriarch, as if he would most liuely haue represented him vnto his view.

All things in the citie and in the pallace set in order according to Andronicus his mind, by his two sons, and leaue giuen vnto the Emperors friends to come ouer vnto him, and to be acquainted with him; at length Andronicus himselfe departing from Damalum, in a gallie crossed the strait, oftentimes by the way merrily singing that saying of the heauenly Psalmist: Returne my soule into thy rest, because the Lord hath done well vnto thee, hauing deliuered my life from death, mine eyes from teares, and my feet from falling. The Emperour with his mother Xene, then lay not in the pallace at Constantinople, but at another princely house of his in the countrey neere vnto Philopatium, as Andronicus had appointed: whither Andronicus first went, and comming vnto his presence, most humbly prostrat before him, with sobbing and teares, as his deceitfull manner was, kissed his feet. As for the Empresse his mother, he lightly saluted her, and as it were but for fashion sake, not dissembling in his countenance the old grudge he bare against her. And so without longer stay went vnto his tent prouided for him not far off; round about which, all the great noblemen had pitched their tents also, flocking vnto him as chickens seeking for refuge vnder the hens wings. Hauing there staied with the Emperour a good while, he was desirous to go vnto the imperiall citie, and to see the late Emperor Emanuel his cousins graue. Where entering into the monasterie of our Lady, where he was buried, and comming to his tombe, he wept bitterly, and roared as it were mainely out. So that diuers of the standers by, ignorant of his dissembling nature, by way of admiration said; O what a wonderfull thing is this! O how he loued the Emperor, his cousin, although his fierce and cruell persecutor! And when one of his kinsemen would haue pulled him from the tombe, saying that hee had sorrowed for him enough; he would not be remoued, but requested them to suffer him yet a little to tarrie by the tombe, for that he had something in secret to say vnto the dead: and so with his hands cast vp and close together, as if he had praied, and his eys fast fixed vpon the tombe, he moued his lips, and secretly said something, but what, no man could tel. Some said it was was some charme or incantation. But others more pleasantly conceited, said, and (as it afterward appeared) more truly, that Andronicus did triumph ouer the dead Emperor Emanuel, and reuell with his ghost, with these or like words: I haue thee now fast, my cruel persecutor, by whom I haue bin driuen to many great extremities: and hauing wandred almost all the world ouer, haue thereunto bin made by thee a common by-word. But now this tombe rising vp with seuen tops, & prison, out of which thou canst not start, holdeth thee oppressed with a dead sleepe, out of which thou shalt not be awaked, but by the sounding of the last trumpe. And now will I be reuenged of thy posteritie, and satisfie my selfe as a Lyon with a fat prey, and take sharpe reuenge of all the wrongs thou hast done me, when I haue once possessed my selfe of this royall citie.

After that, visiting al the Emperors stately houses, but staying in no place long, he disposed of al matters of state, according to his own pleasure. Vnto the yong Emperor he allowed hunting, and other his vain delights, with keepers ioined vnto him, to watch not only his going in & out, but also that no man should talke with him of any matter of importance: for all the gouernment of the state he tooke vnto himselfe: not for that he wished so well therunto, aboue others, but so to driue from the court al them of the contrary faction to himself, that were able to do any thing, & had before borne some sway. The soldiers, whose help he had vsed in aspiring to the gouernment, he rewarded with great bounty; all their offices and preferments hee bestowed either vpon his own children, or other his great fauourits; diuers of the nobility of whom he liked not, were by him in short time driuen into exile: some were by him depriued of their sight, and some others cast in prison, not knowing any cause why, more than that they were by him secretly condemned, for that they were of the nobility, or had done some good seruice for the state, or exiled for their personage, or some other thing that grieued Andronicus, or els for the sparke of some old displeasure which yet lay hid as fire raked vp in the ashes. So that the state of that time began to grow most miserable: & the trecherie euen of men neerest in blood, seeking the destruction one of another, for to serue their own turns, or to gratify Andronicus, most horrible: not only one brother betraid another, but euen the father his son, and the son his father, if Andronicus would haue it so. Some accused their neerest kinsmen, that they derided Andronicus his proceedings; or that without regard of him, they more fauoured Alexius the yong emperor, then, a great offence. Yea, such was the mischiefe of the time, that many in accusing others, were themselues accused; & charging others of treason against Andronicus, were themselues charged by them whom they accused, & so clapt vp both together in one prison. Neither were they of the nobility onely, which were enemies to Andronicus, thus hardly dealt withal, but euen some of his great fauorits & followers also: for some whom but yesterday he had vsed most kindly, & enrolled among his best friends, vpon them to day hee frowned & tyranized most cruelly: so that you might haue seen the same man the same to day (as it is reported of Xerxes his admiral) to be crowned & beheaded, to be graced & disgraced: insomuch that the wiser sort deemed Andronicus his praisings, the beginning of a mans disgrace; his bounty, his vndoing; & his kindnes, his dearth. The first that tasted of his tiranny, was Mary the daughter of Emanuel the emperor, who for the hate she bare to Alexius the late President, & the empresse her mother in law had (as is aforesaid) aboue al other, wisht for his comming; but was now by one Pterigionites (somtime an eunuch of her fathers, corrupted by Andronicus, hauing in his aspiring mind purposed the vtter destruction of all Emanuels posteritie) cunningly poisoned; as was her husband Cæsar, who liued not long after her, poisoned also (as was supposed) with the same cup that his wife was. Now among others of the late emperors house, none had euer stood more in his light, than had the faire empresse Xene, the yong emperors mother, whom now he ceased not most bitterly (though wrongfully) to accuse, as an vtter enemie both to the emperor & the state, making as if he would leaue al, and again depart, if she were not remoued from the Emperor her son: and by his cunning so incensed the giddy headed vulgar people against her, that they came flocking to Theodosius the good Patriarch, ready to teare him out of his cloaths, if he consented not to the remouing of the empresse, as Andronicus had desired. So a counsel being called of such his fauorits and others, as were not like indifferently to heare her cause, but assuredly to condemne her; the guiltlesse empresse after many things falsly laid to her charge, was accused of treason: as that she should by her letters haue solicited Bela king of Hungarie, her brother in law, to inuade Brantizoba and Belligrade, two strong places belonging to the empire. Whereupon shee was condemned, and shamefully cast

With which speech, Andronicus peirced to the heart as with a sword, in great rage start vp and said, These are they which encouraged the wicked president to all his villanies, lay hands vpon them. Wherupon they of his guard in threatning manner shook their weapons & swords at them, as if they would euen presently haue slain them: and the tumultuous common people, catching them by their cloaks as they came out, pulling them some one way some another, were so fierce vpon them, as that they had much adoe to escape out of their hands with life. Now lay the faire Empresse (but H

Yet was not the crueltie of Andronicus against her, so any thing assuaged, but greening that she yet breathed, shortly after assembled the former counsell, the ministers of his wrath, demanding of them, What punishment was by law appointed for such as betraied any towne or prouince of the Empire? whereunto answere beeing giuen in writing, That it was by the law, death, he could no longer hold, but that he must in great choler breake out against the poore empresse, as if it had bin she that had done it: and therupon the wicked counsellors crying out with one voice, That she was to be taken out of the way, as they had before agreed; by and by without longer stay, a damned writing was subscribed by the yong Emperor her son, as if it had bin with the bloud of his owne mother, whereby she was (I abhor to write it) most vnworthily condemned to die. The men appointed to see this most horrible & cruell execution done, were Manuel Andronicus his eldest son, and Georgius Augustus, his neere kinsman; who both dismaid at the very mentioning of the matter, not regarding the emperors command, said plainly, that they neuer before consented to the death of the empresse, but had clean hands of so hainous an offence, & therefore would now much lesse see her innocent body dismembred in their sight. At which vnexpected answer Andronicus much troubled, with his fingers oftentimes pluckt himself by the hoary beard, and with burning eyes casting somtime vp his head, & somtime downe, sighed at his own most miserable tyrannical estate, fretting inwardly, that they which were neerest vnto him, whom he thought he might euen with K

The miserable death of the empresse. this great empresse, cruelly strangled in prison, by these two wicked men, the mercilesse executioners of Andronicus his wrath. Her dead bodie lately adorned with all the graces of nature, euen to the admiration of the beholders, was without more adoe secretly raked vp in the sand fast by the seaside: a poore sepulchre for so great a person.

What might not Andronicus now do to others, that durst thus cruelly to deale with the yong L emperors own mother, & neerest friends? yet was all couered vnder the pretence of the common good, and safety of the state and empire. And the more to shadow Andronicus his secret purposes, as not proceeding of any priuate or hidden malice, or aspiring humor, from which he of all men would seeme most free; and the more to manifest his deuotion & loyaltie to the young Emperour his cousin, he was the onely persuader vnto the rest of the nobilitie, to haue him solemnly crowned (which as yet by reason of his tender age he was not, and in the time of his coronation, with his own shoulders supported him vp, as he was after the manner of that solemnitie) carried vnto the great church, and so back againe; the Crocodiles teares full plenteously running downe his aged face, as if it had bin for exceeding ioy: which many of the meaner sort beholding, and deeming therof the best, highly commended his kindnes, accoun- M ting the yong Emperor thrice happie, in so graue a gouernour, and faithfull counsellor; who in loue and kind affection towards him, seemed not inferior to his naturall father: so cunningly had hee vnder the vaile of pietie, shadowed his most execrable treacherie; as that in the very plotting thereof, he was accounted most louing and kinde. But hidden treason, be it neuer so

A so wel dissembled, must at length shew it selfe. So Andronicus hauing got into his power both the Emperor and the empire, and the chiefe friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being taken out of the way, or else driuen into exile, thought it now high time for himselfe to aspire vnto that high soueraignetie, after which he had so many yeres longed. Wherfore calling together a councel of his flatterers and fauorits, whom he had for such purpose promoued vnto the high- The slie practises of Andronicus in aspiring to the Empire.
est places of state (all or the most part of the graue councellors and friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being now displaced, or otherwise taken out of the way) he as a man only carefull of the common good, declared vnto them the dangerous state of the empire, by reason of a rebellion raised in BYTHINIA at NICE, by Isaack Angelus, and Theodorus Catacuzenus; & another at B PRVSA, by Theodorus Angelus; requiring their graue aduice for the suppressing thereof: who not ignorant of their lords purpose (as thereof before sufficiently instructed) answered with one consent, That of such great mischiefes there would be no end, except hee were ioyned in fellowship of the Empire together with Alexius, by his grauitie and deepe wisedome to supplie what wanted for the good gouernment of the State in the yong Emperor his cousin. At which speech the by-standers (being in number many, and for the most part the followers of Andronicus his flatterers) gaue a great shout, and as if it had bin alreadie granted, with one applause cried out, Long liue Alexius and Andronicus the Greeke Emperors; and that with such auehemencie, as if they would therewith haue rent the verie heauens. The bruit thereof flying abroad into the citie, forthwith you might haue seene euery street and corner of the citie full
C. of the vulgar people, with some also of better sort, swarming together like Bees, & sounding the praises of Andronicus (who now was come out of his house into the court, with a world of people following him) and crying out, Long liue the Emperors Alexius and Andronicus. With which loud acclamation, mixt with the heauie sighings of many men, (for all were not mad of that frenzie) the yong Emperor awaked, and seeing the court full of people, and Andronicus by them saluted his fellow in the Empire; knowing now no other remedy, thought it best to yeeld vnto the time, & so with the rest flattering the old tyrant, welcommed him sul force against his will, by the name of his friend & companion in the empire: which he now in dissembling manner seeming vnwilling to take vpon him, & refusing the place offred, was by the rout of his flattering fauorites enforced to his own great contentment, to yeeld to their re-D quest: some of them with both their hands carrying him vp, vntil they had as it were against his wil placed him in the imperiall seat, prepared for him fast by the yong emperor: others in the meane time no lesse busied in pulling off his priuat attyre, and putting vpon him the imperiall roabes.

The next day, when this participation of the empire should be published, & they both proclaimed emperors, the name of Andronicus was set before the name of Alexius: whereof his fauorits (though some others interpreted it otherwise) gaue this reason, That it fitted not with the maiesty of the empire, that the name of a boy should be set before the name of so reuerend graue, wise, & excellent a man as was Andronicus his companion in the Empire. Shortly after, Andronicus being brought into the great temple to be crowned, then first began to shew to the E people a chereful countenance, & setting aside his sterne looke, after his long deuotion done, filled the vain peoples heads with many large promises of a more happy form of gouernment than before. All which proued nothing but meere dissimulation and deep deceit, that cheerefulnes of countenance & speech serued but for a while to couer his inward, secret, & most inhuman crueltie. And the more to deceiue the world, the ceremonies of his coronation past, at such time as he should for consummation and confirmation of al, receiue the sacred & dreadful mysterie, the pledge of our redemption, not without due reuerence to be named, much lesse with impure hands touched: after he had receiued the bread, and taken the cup in his hand, he with a most deuout countenance framed of purpose to deceiue, & his eyes cast vp to heauen, as if his soule had there already bin (the fairest maske of hypocrisie) swore by those dreadful mysteries, & most soleinnly protested in the hearing of the people standing by, that he had taken vp-F on him the fellowship of the empire for no other end or purpose but to assist Alexius his cosin in the gouernment, & to strengthen his power: whereas his secret meaning was nothing lesse, as shortly after appeared. For after a few dayes spent in feigned deuotions for the prosperous beginning of his empire, hee forthwith turned his mind vnto other his more secret, but most wicked and execrable designes. And hauing aboue all things purposed the death of the yong

Emperor

Emperor, he called together them of the Councell, his owne creatures and corrupt ministers G of his wickednesse, who had now oftentimes in their mouths that saying of the Poet, and that the old age of an Eagle was better than the youth of a Larke. So by the generall con-Alexius deprived of the Empire. sent of that wicked assembly (vnworthy the name of a graue councel) a decree was made, That H Alexius should (as a man vnfit to gouern the State) be depriued of all imperiall dignitie, and commanded to liue a priuat life. Which disloyall decree of the conspirators was yet scarcely Alexius condemned. published, but that another more cruell came out of the same forge, That he should forthwith be put to death, as one vnworthie longer to liue. For the execution of which so horrible a sentence Stephanus Hagiochristophorites (one of the chiefe ministers of Andronicus his villanies, and by him promoted euen vnto the highest degrees of the honours of the court) with Constanti- nus Trypsicus, and one Theodorus Badibrenus, captaine of the tormentors) were sent out; who en-Alexius the emperor cruelly strangled. tring his chamber by night, without compassion of his tender age, or regard of his honour or innocency, cruelly strangled him with a bow string: which detestable murther so performed, I Andronicus shortly after comming in, spurned the dead body with his foot, railing at his father the late Emperor Emanuel, as a forsworne and iniurious man; and at his mother, as a common whore. The head was forthwith strook off from this miserable carkasse (the mirror of honors vnstabilitie) and left for the monstrous tyrant to feed his eyes vpon: the bodie wrapped vp in lead, was in a boat carried to sea by Io. Camaterius, and Theodosius Chumenus, two of Andronicus his noble fauorits; who with great ioy and glee returned with the same boat to the Court, as if they had done some notable exployt. But long continueth not the ioy of the mischieuous, vengeance still following them at the heeles; as it did these two, who not long after, with the rest that conspired the innocent Emperors death, all or most part of them came to shameful or miserable ends. Thus perished Alexius the Emperor, not yet ful fifteen yeres old, in the third yeare of his raigne: which time he liued more like a seruant than an Emperor, first vnder the command of his mother, and afterwards of the tyrant which brought him to his end. K

An vnequall marriage. Who ioyeth now but old Andronicus, made yong again, as should seem, by his new gained honors? for shortly after the murder committed, he married Anne the French kings daughter (as some report) before betroathed to yong Alexius; a tender & most beautiful lady, not yet full 11 yeres old, an vnfit match for three score and ten. And in some sort as it were to purge himselfe & his partakers of the shamefull murther by them committed, & to stop the mouths of the people, he by much flattery & large promises procured of the bishops a general absolu-tion for them all, from the oath of obedience which they had before giuen vnto the emperor Emanuel, & Alexius his son. Which obtained, he for a while had the same Bishops in great honor, and shortly after in greater contempt, as men forgetfull of their duties and calling. After with diuers others: some he burnt, as Mamalus one of the Emperor Alexius his chiefe Secretaries; all men of great honor and place. For colour whereof he pretended himselfe to be sorby the iust doome of the Iudges, whereunto he was himselfe (as he said) to giue place; & that M the heauinesse of the heart, flowing from the eyes as showers of raine out of the Clouds: in good men the most certaine signes of greatest griefe, & surest testimonies of inward torment:

A but in Andronicus you are not so, you are far of another nature, you proceed of ioy, you promise not vnto the distressed pittie or compassion, but death & destruction! how many mens eys haue you put out? how many haue you drowned? how many haue you deuoured? Most of the nobilitie that fauored the late emperor Emanuel and Alexius his son, thus taken out of the way by Andronicus, strook such a feare into the rest, that for safegard of their liues they betook themselues to flight, some one way, some another, neuer thinking themselues in safety so long as they were within the greedie Tyrants reach; whereof shortly after entued no small troubles, to the shaking of the state of the whole empire. Isaac Comnenus the emperor Emanuels nigh kinsman, took his refuge into Cyprvs, & kept that Iland to himselfe. Alexius Comnenus, Emanuels brothers son, fled into Sicilia, & there stir'd vp William king of that Iland, against B Andronicus, who with a great army landed at Dyrrachivm, tooke the city, & so from thence without resistance passing thorow the heart of Macedonia, spoiling the country before him as he went, met his fleet at Thesalonica, which famous city he also tooke by force, & most miserably spoiled it, with al the country thereabout, so that he brought a great feare vpon the imperial city itself. Vnto which so great euils Andronicus (intangled with domestick troubles, and not knowing whom to trust) was not able to giue remedy; although for shew he had (to no purpose) sent out certain of his most trustie ministers with such forces as he could well spare.
For the maiestie of his authoritie growing stil lesse & lesse, & the number of his enemies both at home & abroad daily increasing, & the fauor of the vnconstant people (who now began to speake hardly of him) declining, he vncertain which way to turn himselfe, rested wholly vpon C tyrannie, proscribing in his feare, not only the friends of such as were fled, & whom he distru-sted, but somtimes whole families together, yea and that for light occasions, sometime those Exceeding cruelties.
who were his best fauorits, whose seruice he had many times vsed in the execution of his cruelties: so that now no day passed wherein he did not put to death, imprison, or torture one great man or other. Whereby it hapned that the imperiall city was filled with sorrow & heauines, euery man hanging the head, & with silence couering his inward griefe, not without danger to haue bin then vttered. Among many others appointed to this slaughter, was one Isaac Angelus a man of great nobilitie, whom Hagiochristopherites (the chiefe minister of Andronicus his tirannie, & for the same by him highly promoted) suspecting, as one that bare no good will to the emperor (cause enough of death) came to his house to apprehend him; & finding him at home, D after a few hot words commanded him to follow him: whereat the nobleman making some stay, & abhorring the very sight of the wretch, as vnto him ominous & fatal, Hagiochristopori- tes himselfe began to lay hands on him, reuiling his followers, that they had not forthwith drawn him out of his house by the haire of his head, vnto the prison by him appointed. For they, touched with the honor of the man, & moued with pitty, forced him not, but stood stil as beholders. Isaac seeing himselfe thus beset, & no way now left for him to escape, resoluing rather there presently to die, than shortly after to be murdred in prison, drew his sword as the rest were laying hands vpon him, and at the first blow cleft the wicked head of Hagiochristo- phorites down to his shoulders; & so leauing him wallowing in his own bloud, & like a desperate man laying about him amongst the rest, made himselfe way through the midst of them.
E And so imbrued with bloud, with his bloudy sword yet in his hand, running thorow the midst of the city, told the people what he had done; and crying vnto them for helpe in defence of his innocencie, fled into the great temple, there to take the refuge of the Sanctuarie: where he Isaac Angelus taketh Sanctuarie.
had not long sit (in the place where the gultie flying thither for refuge vsed to sit, & confessing their offence, craue pardon of such as go in & out) but that the temple was filled with the multitude of people flocking thither out of al parts of the city, some to see the nobleman, some to behold what should become of him: for all men thought that he would before Sun-set (notwithstanding the reuerence of the place) be drawn thence by Andronicus, & put to some shame-full death. Thither came also Iohn Ducas, Isaacs vncle, and his son Isaac, to increase the tumult; not for that they were any thing guiltie of the death of Hagiochristophorites, but for that they F had before become sureties vnto the suspitious tyrant, for their kinsman Isaac, and he likewise for them; by whose trespas they wel knew themselues now brought into no lesse danger than if they had bin abettors thereunto. And beside them also, many other there were, which doubting of their owne estate, and fearing the like might happen to themselues, pricked forward with hard speeches, the common people flocking thither, instantly requesting them to stay there, and to ſtand by them now at their need, being ſo iniuriouſly wronged; whoſe pittifull complaints mooued many to take part with them. At which time alſo, no man yet comming from the Emperor (being as then out of the city) to repreſſe the ſedition, nor any of the Nobilitie oppoſing themſelues, no friend of Andronicus appearing, none of his bloudie miniſters or officers ſhewing themſelues, nor any that did ſo much as ſpeake a good word in his behalfe, or in diſlike of the tumult; the boldnes of the ſeditious people increaſed, euery man in ſo great libertie ſaying what he liſt, and after their rude manner one incouraging another. So ſpent Iſaac that long night, not thinking (God wot) of an Empire, but ſtill expecting the deadly ſtroke of Andronicus. Yet had he with great intreating ſo preuailed, that diuers of the aſſemblie ſhutting the church doores, and bringing lights into the church, ſtayed there with him all night, and by their example cauſed ſome others to ſtay alſo. The next morning by breake of day were all the citiſens flockt again vnto the temple, curſing the tirant to the deuil, as the common enemy of mankind, wiſhing vnto him a ſhamefull death, & the honor of the empire vnto Iſaac. At that time by fortune, or rather God ſo appointing it, Andronicus was out of the city at his pallace of MELYDINVM, on the Eaſt ſide of PROPONTIS, where he was by nine a clocke at night certified of the death of Hagiochriſtupheorites, and of the tumult of the people: yet that night ſtirred he not, neither did any thing more, but by ſhort letters aduiſed the people to pacifie themſelues, and not by fooliſh rebellion to caſt themſelues into further danger. In the morning Andronicus his fauorits began to ſhew themſelues, and to doe what they might to haue appeaſed the tumultuous multitude; yea and preſently after came Andronicus himſelfe, and landed with his imperiall galley at the great pallace in the city. But with the inraged people naught preuailed either the perſuaſions of the one, or report of the preſence of the other: for they all, as vpon a ſignall giuen, and as inſpired with one ſpirit, or ſtirred vp with the ſame fury, flocked together into the temple S. SOPHIA, one incouraging another, and ſcoffing at ſuch as ſtood by as idle lookers on, without weapons in their hands, reuiling them and calling them rotten lymnes that had no feeling of the common harme. After that, they broke open the priſons, and ſet at libertie the priſoners, as fitteſt inſtruments to increaſe the tumult, who were not all notable offenders of the dregs of the people, but many of them borne of good houſes, and for ſome light fault, or inconſiderate word (whereof euery man was in thoſe times bound to giue an account) or for ſome friends offence againſt Andronicus, there laid faſt. Theſe of all others moſt animated the people, in ſuch ſort, as they which before for feare of the danger did but ſoftly murmure to themſelues againſt Andronicus, did now openly ioyne with the reſt of the baſe ſeditious. Then might you haue ſeen ſome with their ſwords and targets, ſome alſo in their armor, but the greateſt part armed but with clubs and ſtaues, & other ſuch like rude weapons, armes of furie, haſtily taken vp in their ſhops as by chance they came firſt to hand, running forth in euery place. By this aſſemblie of the moſt furious and promiſcuous people was Iſaac hoyſed vp, and with a generall applauſe ſaluted Emperor. At which time one of the Sextons of the church, with a ladder tooke downe Conſtantine the great his crowne of gold, (which for a monument hung ouer the holy altar, and ſet it on Iſaacs head: which he at the firſt ſeemed vnwilling to weare, not for that hee was not deſirous enough of the Empire, but for that he feared the extream danger of the matter, and thought thoſe things that were then done to be but as it were a ſicke mans dream, like enough ſtraitway to vaniſh: beſide that, he feared in ſo doing, the more to exaſperate Andronicus. Which his vncle Iohn Ducas (as is ſayd before, ſtanding by him) perceiuing, plucking off his owne cap, and ſhewing his old bald head, requeſted the people, That if his nephew did refuſe it, they would ſet it vpon his: whereunto they with a great outcry anſwered, That they would no more yeeld their obedience to an old bald man, as hauing receiued many harmes from the hoarie haires of old Andronicus, and therefore for his ſake hated euery old man, more fit for Charons boat, and his coffin, than for an Empire, and eſpecially if he had a forken beard and bald head, as had Andronicus and this Ducas. Thus was Iſaac by the tumultuous multitude inueſted in the empire; and ſo royally mounted vpon one of the Emperors horſes, richly furniſhed with a ſaddle and trappings of gold, which they had by chance gotten, was by them brought from the temple vnto the court. Baſilius Camatorius the Patriarch, waiting vpon him, whom the headſtrong people had inforced againſt his wil to confirme with his authoritie what was by them done for the eſtabliſhing of Iſaac in the empire. Andronicus at his comming to the pallace perceiuing firſt by the confuſed crie of the tumultuous multuous multitude, and afterward by that which he ſaw with his eies, how the world went; calling vpon his old friends and flattering fauorits, thought firſt by their helpe to haue repreſſed the furie of the rebellious: who as friends of his better fortune, and not of himſelfe, were now for the moſt part ſhrunk from him; and thoſe that were left ſo feintly comming on, as if in his quarrell they had had no mind to ſpend their liues: with which heartleſſe company Andronicus fearing to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the furie of the multitude, with his bow & arrows in his hand got him vp into the higheſt tower of the pallace, called CENTENARIA, and from thence beſtowed certaine ſhot among the people. But ſeeing that to be to no purpoſe, and better perſuaded to do more with them by faire words, than ſuch vain force, hee from the top of the tower cried aloud vnto them, That if they would be quiet and depart, hee would by their conſent reſigne the empire vnto his ſon Manuel: whereat the people more inraged, ſpared not to poure forth moſt reprochfull words in contempt both of himſelfe and his ſon; and ſo furiouſly brake into the court by one of the gates called CAREA. Which Andronicus beholding, and now out of all hope, caſting from him all his habiliments of honour, and diſguiſing himſelfe fled again to his gally, accompanied only with Anna his wife, and Maraptica his minion, & ſo returned to MELYDIVM, his place from whence he came. Iſaac but yeſterday in the bottom of diſpaire, and ſhadowed as it were with the hand of death, by the ſtrange change of fortune to day mounted vnto the higheſt type of worldly honour, entering the palace, was there again with the greateſt applauſe of the people that might be, ſaluted Emperor. From whence he forthwith ſent out certain companies of his moſt aſſured friends & followers, to apprehend Andronicus; who now as a man at once forſaken both of his friends and of his better fortune, ſecretly fled with his wife and his paragon, before remembred, to CHELE, attended vpon only with a few of his truſtie ſeruants, which had of long time ſerued him before he was Emperor. There taking ſhip, with purpoſe to haue fled vnto the Tauro-ſcythes (as not thinking himſelfe ſafe in any prouince of the empire) he was twice or thrice by foule weather put backe again, the wrought ſea abhorring (as it ſeemed) to carrie him that had ſo polluted it with the dead bodies of the innocent by him ſlain, and ſtill threatning (as it were) to deuoure him. Thus ſtrangely ſtayed by foule weather, or more truly to ſay, by the reuenging hand of the higheſt, he was found by ſuch as were ſent out to ſeeke after him, & being by them apprehended, was with two great yron chains faſt locked about his proud necke, and heauie gyues vpon his legs, caſt into the caſtle of AMENA; and in that miſerable habit ſhortly after preſented to the Emperor Iſaac, yet buſied in appeaſing and reforming of the diſordred citie: where by the way as he went, he was by the people moſt ſhamefully reuiled, and iniuriouſly vſed; ſome plucking him by the beard, ſome by the haire of the head, ſome other in the meane time playing with his noſe, and bobbing him in the face, with a thouſand other deſpights done vnto him; eſpecially by ſuch women, as whoſe husbands he had before murdred or depriued of their ſight. Afterward being committed to the hatefull furie of the people, he had his right hand cut off, and was againe committed to the ſame caſtle, without meat, drinke, or other comfort: where after he had lien a few days, hauing one of his eyes put out, he was ſet vpon a foule leane cammel, with his face toward the taile therof, and ſo (as it were in triumph) led through the Market place, his bald head all bare, as if it had bin a dead mans skull taken out of a charnel houſe; in a ſhort old coat; ſo miſerable a ſpectacle, as might haue expreſſed a fountain of teares out of the eyes of a right hard hearted man. But the bedlam & moſt inſolent citiſens, eſpecially they of the baſer ſort, as cookes, coblers, curriers, and ſuch like, flocking about him like Bees (without regard that he had but the other day worne vpon his head the imperiall crowne, then honored by them as a god, & extolled vnto the heauens; that they had not long before ſolemnly ſworne vnto him obedience and loyaltie) ranne now as men out of their wits, omitting no kind of villanie they could deuiſe to do vnto him: ſome thruſt nailes into his head, ſome caſt durt in his face, ſome the dung both of men and beaſts, ſome prickt him in the ſides with ſpits, ſome caſt ſtones at him as at a mad dog, and other ſome opprobrious and deſpightfull words, no leſſe grieuous vnto him than the reſt: amongſt others, an impudent drab comming out of the kitchen, caſt a pot ful of ſcalding water in his face; and in brief, their outrage ſo exceeded, as if they had ſtriuen among themſelues, who ſhould do him the greateſt villanie. Hauing thus ſhamefully, as in a ridiculous triumph brought him into the Theatre, they there betwixt two pillars hanged him vp by the heeles: where hauing ſuffered all theſe deſpightfull indignities, with with many moe, not without offence to be named, he with an inuincible courage yet ſtill held his patience, not giuing one euill word, but ſometimes ſaying, Lord haue mercie vpon me; and otherwhiles, Why do you breake a bruiſed reed? Yet the furious people nothing mooued with the calamitie of ſo great a man, (of all others now the moſt miſerable) ſtript him of his bad cloathes as he hung, & cut off his priuities. One among the reſt, to make an end of him, thruſt his ſword in at his throat vp to the twiſt as he hung: other two with their long ſwords proued their ſtrength, who could ſtrike furtheſt into his buttocks. Thus miſerably periſhed this famous Emperour, after he had raigned two yeares. That which was left of his bodie (for many had carried away ſome pieces thereof) being taken downe from the place where he hung, was caſt into a baſe vault in the Theatre, where it for a ſpace lay, as the loathſome carkaſſe of ſome wilde beaſt, and the miſerable ſpectacle of mans fragilitie; for Iſaac the Emperour would not ſuffer it to be buried. Howbeit afterwards (the furie of the people ouerpaſſed, it was by ſome more charitable men remooued thence, and layd in a low vault neere vnto the monaſterie of the Ephori: which as Nicetas Choniates (author of this hiſtorie, ſpeaking of the time wherein he liued) ſaith, is yet there vndiſſolued to be ſeene. He was a man moſt honorably diſcended, of ſtature tall, and well proportioned; in his countenance ſate a certaine reuerend maieſtie, adorned with ſuch notable vertues, as might haue made him worthily to haue bin compared vnto the greateſt Emperors of his ſtocke and familie, had he not obſcured the ſame with too much ambition and cruelrie; whereof the one cauſed him to lead the greateſt part of his life in priſon or exile; the other brought vnto him a moſt ſhamefull end.

Iſaac Angelus his ſucceſſor, by the fauour of the people thus exalted vnto the Empire, at the firſt gouerned the ſame with great lenitie and moderation, as if hee had altogether abhorred from the effuſion of his kinſmans bloud: but afterwards not a little troubled both with forrein enemies, and domeſticall rebellion, beſieged in the Imperiall Citie by ſuch of the Nobilitie as thought themſelues no leſſe worthie of the Empire than himſelfe: for repreſſing of which inſolencies, and the aſſuring of his State, he became ſo ſeuere in chaſtiſing the offendors, and ſuch others as he had in diſtruſt, that he was counted of moſt men not inferiour in crueltie to Andronicus his predeceſſor; few dayes paſſing without the condemnation or execution of one great man or other, beſides them of the meaner ſort, of whom hee ſeemed to make no great reckoning: whereby he in few yeares loſt the loue and fauour of his Subiects, who before had him in great honour; and became vnto them no leſſe odious than was before Andronicus. Vpon which generall diſlike of the people, his ingratefull yonger brother Alexius (by him before for a great ſumme of money redeemed from the Turkes) tooke occaſion to riſe vp againſt him, and by the fauour of the ſoldiers depriued him together both of the Empire and his ſight: and hauing put out his eyes, thruſt him into a Monaſterie, there to liue as it were out of the world, as a man condemned to perpetuall darkeneſſe, after he had raigned nine yeres and eight moneths, being not yet full fortie yeares old. Whither it were the reuenging hand of God, for the hard meaſure vſed to Andronicus, or not, I leaue it to the wiſer to conſider; who in his deepe prouidence, wherewith he beſt gouerneth all things, would haue a moderation vſed in puniſhment of our moſt capitall enemies, as hauing alwayes before our eyes the ſlipperie ſtate of power and authoritie: and that as all worldly things are ſubiect to change, ſo by the iuſt iudgement of God it oftentimes falleth out, that what hurt we doe vnto others, the ſame we may receiue againe from others. In theſe ſo great and ſtrange mutations of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire (which I haue ſomewhat more at large proſecuted, not ſo much for the nouelty of the matter, although it were right ſtrange, as for that out of the loſſes & ruin thereof, the greatnes of the Turks for the moſt part grew) Clizaſthlan Sultan of Iconium, after the death of the Emperor Emanuel, found meanes to take from the Empire diuers ſtrong Townes and caſtles in the leſſer Aſia, together with a great part of the country of Phrygia: Alexius, Andronicus, and Iſaac the ſucceeding Emperours, troubled with dangers neerer home, hauing nothing to oppoſe againſt him, but faire intreatie and rich preſents; ſo redeeming for a while an vnſure peace, with no leſſe charge in ſhort time to be renewed againe. This victorious Sultan (for ſo he may of right be called) holding in his ſubiection a great part of the leſſer Aſia, now a man of great yeares, dying, left behinde him foure ſonnes, Maſut, Coppatine, Reucratine, and Caichoſroes, all men growne. Amongſt whom he diuided his Kingdome: Vnto Maſut he bequeathed Amaſia, Ancyra, Doryleum, with diuers other pleaſant Cities of Pontus: vnto

A vnto Coppatine he aſſigned Melytene, Ceſarea, and the colonie now called Taxara: vnto Reucratine hee allotted Aminſum, Docea, with ſome other Cities vpon the ſea coaſt: but vnto Caichoſroes, he left Iconium his regall ſeat, and with it Lycaonia, Pamphilia, and all the countries thereabouts as farre as Cotrianyum. Of theſe foure, Coppatine long liued not after his father; for whoſe inheritance Reucratine Prince of Docea, and Maſut Prince of Ancyra (his two brethren) fell at variance, and ſo at laſt into open warre. But Maſut finding himſelfe too weake for his warlike brother Reucratine, yeelded vnto him the territories which hee ſaw he muſt needs forgoe; and glad now to keepe his owne, ſo made peace with him. Reucratine being a man of an ambitious and haughtie ſpirit, with his forces thus doubled, denounced warre vnto his brother Caichoſroes; who doubting his owne ſtrength, fled vnto the Emperour Alexius Angelus for ayde, as had his father done before him vnto the Emperour Manuel, although not with like good fortune. For the Emperour but of late hauing obtayned the empire by the depoſing of his brother, and altogether giuen to pleaſure, reputing alſo thoſe domeſticall warres of the Turkes, ſome part of his owne ſafetie; ſent him home without comfort, as one ſtrong enough of himſelfe to defend his owne quarrell againſt his brother.

Howbeit, hee was ſcarcely come to Iconium, but he was by Reucratine expulſed thence, and driuen to flie into Armenia, where hee was by Zebune King of that countrey, a Turke alſo, honourably receiued and courteouſly vſed, but yet denied of the ayd he requeſted: the King pretending that hee was already in league with Reucratine, and therefore could not; or as ſome thought, fearing the dangerouſneſſe of the matter, would not intermeddle therein.

C Wherewith the poore Sultan vtterly diſcouraged, returned againe to Conſtantinople, and there in poore eſtate, as a man forlorne, paſſed out the reſt of his dayes.

Now hauing thus paſſed through the Turkiſh affaires in the leſſer Aſia, together with the troubled eſtate of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, no ſmall cauſe of the Turks greatneſſe; the courſe of time calleth vs backe againe before we paſſe any farther, to remember their proceedings alſo at the ſame time, and ſhortly after, in Syria, Iudæa, Ægypt, and thoſe more Southerly countries, where theſe reſtleſſe people ceaſed not by all meanes to enlarge their empire, vntill they had brought all thoſe great kingdomes vnder their obeyſance.

After the death of Baldwin King of Ieruſalem, of whom wee haue before ſpoken, Almericus his younger brother, Earle of Ioppa and Aſcalon, being then about ſeuen and twentie D yeares old, was by the better good liking of the clergie and people, than of the nobilitie, elected King: not for that there wanted in him any good parts worthy of a kingdom, but for that ſome of them enuied vnto him ſo great an honour. Neuertheleſſe he was (as wee ſaid) by the generall conſent of the people, elected, proclamed, and by Almericus the Patriarch with al ſolemnitie crowned, the 17 day of Februarie, in the yeare of Grace, 1163. To begin whoſe troubled raigne, the Ægyptians firſt of al denyed to pay vnto him their wonted tribute. In reuenge whereof, he in perſon himſelfe with a puiſſant armie entred into Ægypt; and meeting with Dargan the Sultan, ouerthrew him in plaine battell, and put him to flight: who to ſtay the further purſuit and paſſage of the Chriſtians, cut the bankes of the riuer Nilus, and ſo E drowned the countrey, that the King was glad to content himſelfe with the victorie he had already gotten, and ſo to returne to Hieruſalem.

The next yeare Almericus was againe drawne downe with his power into Ægypt, by Dargan the Sultan, to aid him againſt Saracon; whom Noradin the Turke, King of Damaſco, had ſent as Generall with an army, to reſtore Sanar the Sultan before expulſed, and to depoſe Dargan. In which expedition Dargan being ſlaine, and Saracon hauing won certaine townes, kept them to himſelfe; Sanar doubtfull of his good meaning, ioyned his forces with Almericus, and by his helpe expulſed Saracon out of Ægypt. But whileſt Almericus was thus buſied in Ægypt, Noradin the Turk making an inroad into the frontiers of the Chriſtians neere vnto Tripolis, was by Gilbert Lacy, maſter of the Templars in thoſe quarters, and the other Chriſtians, when he leaſt feared, ſo ſuddenly ſet vpon, that he had much adoe by flight to ſaue himſelfe, F halfe naked for haſte, moſt of his followers being at the ſame time ſlain. In reuenge of which diſgrace, he not long after with a great power came and beſieged Arethuſa: for reliefe wherof, Bohemund Prince of Antioch, Raymond the younger, Earle of Tripolis, Calamon gouernour of Cilicia, and Toros Prince of Armenia, came with their power. Of whoſe comming the Turk hearing, raiſed his ſiege and departed. After whom theſe Chriſtian Princes eagerly gerly following, were by the Turkes shut vp in certaine deepe and rotten fennes (whereinto G they had vnaduisedly too far entred) and there with a great slaughter ouerthrowne. In which conflict, all the chiefe commanders of the armie, were taken, except the Prince of ARMENIA, who forecasting the danger, had retired, after he had in vaine diſswaded the rest from the further pursuit of the flying enemie. The Prince of ANTIOCH there taken, was about a yeare after for a great summe of money redeemed; but the Countie of TRIPOLIS was after eight yeares straight captiuitie hardly deliuered. Noradin after this victorie returning againe to the siege of ARETHVSA, in few daies won the towne: and encouraged with such good successe, and the absence of the King, laid siege to the citie of PANEADE, which was also deliuered vnto him, vpon condition that the citizens might at their pleasure in safetie depart.

At the same time Saracon Generall of Noradin his forces, tooke from the Christians two H castles; the one in the countrey of SIDON, the other beyond IORDAN vpon the borders of ARABIA, both in the custody of the Templars: twelue of whom the King at his returne hanged vp for treason.

Rhortly after Saracon, King Noradin his great man of war, with all the power of the Turks, came downe againe into ÆGYPT, with purpose to haue fully subdued all that notable kingdome vnto his Lord and master. Of whose power, Sanar the Sultan standing in dread, praied aid of Almericus, promising vnto him beside his yearely tribute, the summe of fortie thousand ducats for his paines. The matter fully agreed vpon, and all things now in readinesse, Almericus set forward with his armie, and encountring with Saracon and his Turkes at the riuer NI-LVS, ouerthrew him in a great battel: yet not without some losse, for the Turks in their flight I lighting vpon the Kings carriages with the whole baggage of the army, and ouerrunning them that had the charge thereof, carried away with them a most rich prey, whereby it came to passe that as the Christians had the victorie, so the Turks inioyed the spoile.

Saracon after this ouerthrow, hauing againe gathered together his dispersed soldiers, tooke his way to ALEXANDRIA, where he was by the citizens receiued: after whom the King following, gaue no attempt vnto the city, for that he knew to be but vain, but incamped close by the side of the riuer NILVS, from whence the citie was chiefly to be victualled. Whose purpose Saracon perceiuing, and betime foreseeing the distresse of his whole armie for want of victuals, if he should there long stay: leauing there his son Saladin (or as some call him his nephew) with a thousand horsmen for the keeping of the citie, secretly by night departed thence K himselfe with the rest of his army: and passing through the deserts, did great harm in the vpper parts of EGYPT. Of whose departure Almericus vnderstanding, was about to haue followed Saladin left by Alexandria by Saracon, craftily layd. him, but that he was otherwise persuaded by the Egyptian captaines to continue his former purpose for the gaining of the citie: wherefore now after the departure of Saracon he began to approach the wals, and with diuers engines of war to disturb the defendants: wherewith the citizens (better acquainted with the trade of merchandize, than the feats of war) discouraged, began now to consult amongst themselues for the turning out of those troublesome guests whom they had so lately receiued: which Saladin perceiuing, certified Saracon his vncle ther-of, requesting his speedie reliefe in that his so dangerous estate, and with much intraty persuaded the citizens for a while to hold it out, vntil he might from him receiue answer: of al which L the Christians and Egyptians without, hauing intelligence, laid so much the harder vnto the citie. Gladly would Saracon haue done what he was by his nephew requested: but perceiuing it to be a matter of no lesse danger than difficultie, he by the means of Hugh, Countie of CE-SAREA, and one Arnolphus another noble Christian, both then prisoners with him, conclu-Alexandria yeelded to Almericus. ded a peace with the King: whereupon the citie was forthwith yeelded vp, and Saladin with his Turks suffred in safetie to depart. At which time also al prisoners were on both sides freely and without ransome set at libertie. Thus Saracon for this time disappointed of this his purpose for the conquest of EGIPT, returned back again to DAMASCO: and Almericus with great 1167 glory to ASCALON, where he arriued with his armie the 21 of September in the yeere 1167.

In this late expedition, K. Almericus on the one side enflamed with the wealth of EGYPT, M and on the other encoraged with the weaknes of that effeminate people: resting for the most part vpon forraine strength; had purposed himselfe to inuade the kingdom, & so if possible he might, to ioine it to his own. For color wherof, it was pretended that the Sultan contrary to his faith before giuen, had secretly sought to ioine in league & amity with Noradin the Turk, King

A King of DAMASCO. The chiefe stirrer vp of the King vnto this warre, was one Gerbert master of the Templars; who in respect of the aid by them of his order to be giuen, had obtained of the king, after the victorie gained, to haue the city of PELVSIVM with all the rich countrey about the same, giuen vnto him and his brethren the knights of the order for euer: vpon which hope, he contrarie to the mind of many of the Knights, for the furtherance of that war, gaged his whole wealth and credit, with all the treasure of his house. So all things now in readinesse for so great an enterprise, Almericus with his army set forward in October, and hauing in ten Pelusium taken by Almericus. daies passed the sandy desert, came to PELVSIVM; which city he (after three daies siege) took by force, and put to sword al them that were therein, without respect of age, sex, or condition: which citie, he according to his promise before made, gaue vnto the Templars. After that, he B began also to besiege CAIRE; at which time his fleet sacked the citie of TAPIVM. In the meane time, Sanar the Egiptian Sultan, considering the danger he was in, to satisfie Almericus his greedy desire, offred to pay him twentie hundred thousand ducats to withdraw his forces: & forthwith sent him one hundred thousand, for the ransom of his son & his nephew taken prisoners at PELVSIVM: and for the rest to be paid within fiue daies after; he gaue two of his nephewes hostages. Neuertheles the paiment he deferred from day to day, of purpose in the meane time to raise the whole power of ÆGIPT, as also to receiue aid from the Turks by Saracon, which he daily expected: of whose speedie comming, Almericus vnderstanding, left part of his armie at PELVSIVM, and with the rest went to haue met him: but missing him by the way, Saracon with his Turks came in safetie to CAIRE vnto the Sultan, as he had desired.
C Wherefore Almericus dismaid with the multitude of two so great armies now ioyned together, retired back againe to PELVSIVM, and there taking with him the garrison before left, returned home to HIERVSALEM: hauing in that expedition (begun with the breach of faith) laid the foundation of the ruine of his kingdome, as in few yeres after, it by proofe appeared, by the cuill neighbourhood of the Turks, by that meanes brought downe into EGIPT.

Saracon the Turke after the departure of Almericus, easily perceiuing a most fit time and The Sultan of Aegipt vnder the colour of friendship slain by Saracon. opportunitie to be offered for him now to obtaine that, which hee had in vaine before both fought and fought for, encamped with his army neere vnto CAIRE, and notably counterfei-ted himselfe of all others the most deuoted friend of the Sultans: so that betwixt them two D passed all the kind tokens of loue and friendship, that could possible be deuised; the Sultan oftentimes feasting the Turk, and in kindnes likewise being feasted of him: but at length going as his manner was, vnto the camp to visit him, he was by the Turkes slaine. So Saracon hauing brought to passe what he desired, and entring the citie with his armie, was by the great Ca-liph (from whom the Ægyptian Sultans, as from their superiors, the true successours of their great Prophet Mahomet, tooke their authoritie) appointed Sultan, the first of the Turks that euer enioyed the same: which royall dignitie hee had not possessed fully a yeare, but that hee was taken away by death. In whose stead Saladin his brothers son, by and by stept vp: who altogether a martiall man, not regarding the reuerent maiestie of the Caliph (as had his vncle Saracon, and al the Egiptian Sultans before him) with his horsmans mase struck out his brains; and not so contented, vtterly rooted out all his posteritie, the better to assure himselfe and his E successors the Turks in the possession of his new begotten kingdom; and after that diuided the great treasures of the Egyptians among his Turks, to encourage them the more to follow him in his warres against the Christians.

This glorious kingdome so much spoken of in holy Scripture, & renowned of the learned How the kingdome of Aegypt first fell into the hands of the Sarasins, with the notable alterations thereof.
historiographers of all ages, after the ruine of the Roman empire, was sometime part of the Constantinopolitan empire, & a notable member of the Christian cõmon weale; vntil that about the yere of our Lord 704, the Egiptians weary of the pride & couetousnes of the Gre-cians, reuolted from them vnto the Sarasins, whose superstition they also receiued: & so vnder the gouernement of the Sarasin Caliphs, the successors of the false prophet Mahomet liued about 464 years, vntil that now being inuaded by Almericus, they prayed aid of Noradin the F Turke, Sultan of DAMASCO: who to their relefe sending Saracon with an army, repulsed indeed the Christians, but oppressing their liberty, took to himselfe the kingdom; which he left vnto his nephew Saladin, in whose posterity it remained vntil it was from them again taken by the Circassian slaues the Mamalukes: vnder whose seruile gouernment it was holden of long time, til that by the great emperor of the Turks Selimus the first, it was again conquered & the Mamalukes

Mamalukes vtterly destroyed: In the gouernement of whose prosperitie, the mightie Emperours of the Turks, it hath euer since remained as part of their empire, vntill this day, as in the processe of this Historie God willing shall appeare.

1170 Saladin thus possessed of the great kingdome of EGIPT, and all things set in such order as he thought best for the Newnesse of his estate, with a great armie entred into the land of PALESTINE, in the yere 1170, and there besieged DARON; which towne he woon, and ouerthrew such as were sent by King Almericus to haue relieued the same: with which small victorie contenting himselfe, as with the good beginning of his rising fortune, he returned backe again into his kingdom: yet was his army so great and populous, as that the like armie of the Turks had neuer before bin seene in the Holy land. Wherefore Almericus considering in what great danger he stood, his kingdome now being on both sides beset by the Turks, sent out his embassadors vnto the Christian Princes of the West, to craue their aid for the defence of that kingdom which their fathers had won: and for the same purpose went himselfe in person vnto the Emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE, of whom he was royally entertained, and afterward sent backe loaded with the promises of great matters, as were also his embassadours from the Princes of the West. All which for all that sorted vnto nothing, but vanished into smoake.

1171 The yeare following, viz. 1171, Saladin besieged PETREA, the Metropoliticall Citie of ARABIA: but hearing that Almericus with a great power was comming to the relefe thereof, he raised his siege and retired: as he did also next yeare after, hauing in vaine attempted the strong castle of MONT-ROIALL, on the further side of IORDAN. In like manner also the third yeare he came againe into the Holy Land, and spoiled the countrey beyond IORDAN; but hearing of the Kings comming against him, he forthwith returned againe into EGIPT. All these light expeditions, this politique Prince made not so much for hope of victorie, or to proue his enemies strength, as to traine his souldiers, especially the effeminate Egyptians, and to make them fitter to serue him in his greater designes.

1173 Shortly after died Noradin Sultan of DAMASCO, and in his time a most notable champion of the Turks, after he had raigned nine and twentie yeares. Vpon whose death, Almericus forthwith besieged the citie of PANEADE, in hope to haue againe recouered the same: but he was by the widow of the late dead Sultan, for a great sum of money and the deliuerie of certaine noble prisoners, intreated to raise his siege and depart. So hauing sent away his armie, and traueling with his ordinarie retinue to TIBERIAS, where he had the Summer before bin sicke of the flix, feeling himselfe not well, he returned on horse backe by NAZARETH and NEAPOLIS to HIERVSALEM, where his old disease increasing vpon him, he was also taken with a Feauer: wherwith after he had bin some few dayes grieuously tormented, he requested his Physitians, with some gentle potion to loose his bellie, which was now somewhat stayed: which they refusing to doe, he commanded the potion to be giuen him vpon his owne perill, hap thereon what hap should: which being giuen him, and his bellie againe loosed, he seemed therewith to haue beene at the first well eased; but his wonted Feauer with great vehemencie returning, before his weake and spent bodie could be with conuenient meats refreshed he suddenly died the xenth of Iuly, in the yeare 1173, when he had raigned about ten yeares. His dead bodie was with the great lamentation of all his subiects, solemnly buried by his brothers. He was a most wise Prince, and withall right valiant, amongst many most fit for the gouernment and defence of that troublesome kingdome, so hardly beset with the Infidels, if it had pleased God to haue giuen him longer life.

Baldwin the fourth of that name, seuenth King of Hierusalem.

Foure daies after the death of Almericus, was Baldwin his sonne, then a youth about thirteene yeares old, by the generall consent of the Nobilitie chosen King, and by Almericus the Patriarch in the Temple with great solemnitie crowned in the yeare 1173: vnto whom as not yet by reason of his tender age, fit himselfe to mannage the weightie affaires of the kingdom, Raymond Countie of TRIPOLIS, was by the whole consent of the Nobilitie appointed Tutor to supplie what was wanting in the young King.

Noradin Sultan of DAMASCO (dead as is afore said) left behind him Melechsala his sonne, yet but a youth, to succeed him in his kingdome. Whose gouernment the Nobilitie disdaining, sent secretly for Saladin Sultan of EGIPT, vnto whom at his comming they betrayed the city of DAMASCO, the regall seat of the Turkes in SIRIA. Whereof Saladin possessed, and entring into CELESIRIA without resistance, tooke HELIOPOLIS, EMISSA, with the great citie of CESAREA;

A CESAREA; and in fine, all the whole kingdome of DAMASCO, the citie of ARETHVSA onely excepted. But thus to suffer Melechsala the young Prince to be wrouged, and the kingdome of DAMASCO to be ioyned to the kingdome of EGIPT, was of the wiser sort thought not to stand with the safetie of the kingdome of HIERVSALEM, lying in the middle betwixt them both. Wherefore the Countie of TRIPOLIS, gournour of that kingdome, made out certain force to haue hindred his proceedings. At which time also, Cotobed Prince of PARTHIA, and Melechsalas vncle, sent certaine Troupes of Parthian horsemen to haue aided his distressed Nephew, who were by Saladin ouerthrowne and almost all slaine, neere vnto ALEPPO where Melechsala lay. This for the Countie of TRIPOLIS and the other Christian Princes, with whom Saladin in the Newnesse of his kingdom had no desire to fal out; he appeased them with faire intreatie, and towards vnto the Countie hee sent freely the hostages, which yet lay for B his ransome at EMISSA: vnto the other princes he sent rich presents; and therewith so contented them all, that they returned without any thing doing against him. After which time, three or foure yeares passed in great quietnesse, to the great strengthning of him in those new gotten kingdoms. At length vpon the comming ouer of Philip Earle of FLANDERS, the Christian Princes of SYRIA encouraged, consulted of an expedition to be made in EGIPT, whereof Saladin hauing intelligence, drew down into that countrey the greatest part of his strength. But Philip disliking of that expedition, and the rather for that he saw no great cheerfulnesse in the Countie of TRIPOLIS and the rest thereunto; they with one consent changed their purpose for EGIPT, and turning their forces a quite contrarie way, miserably and without resistance wasted the country about EMISSA and CESAREA.

C Whilest the Christians was thus busied in CÆLISIRIA, Saladin on the other side tooke occasion out of EGIPT to inuade the kingdome of HIERVSALEM, of whose comming, King Baldwin hauing intelligence, with such small forces as he had gathered hastened himselfe to ASCALON. In the Meane time Saladin with a great armie was entred into the Holy Land, where burning the countrey before him, and raging in the bloud of the poore Christians, hee came and encamped not farre from ASCALON: and strucke such a feare vpon the whole countrey, that they which dwelt in HIERVSALEM, were about to haue forsaken the citie: as for the King himselfe, hee lay close within the citie of ASCALON, not daring to aduenture vpon so strong an enemie. Wherewith Saladin encouraged, and out of feare of his enemies, dispersed his armie, some one way, some another, to forrage the countrey. Which the King perceiuing, D secretly with all his power issued out of the citie, if happilie so he might ouertake the Sultan vnawares; neither was he deceiued in his expectation: for comming suddenly vpon him, and secretly charging him, he had with him for a good space an hard and doubtfull battell, vntill that the victorie by the power of God, at length inclining to the Christians, Saladin with his Turkes fled, ouerthrowne with a great slaughter, most part of his great armie beeing eyther there slaine, or lost afterward with hunger and could. This victorie fell vnto the Christians the 25. day of November, in the yere 1177, not without the almightie hand of God, the Turk hauing in his army aboue 26 thousand horsmen, and the king not past 4. hundred horse with some few footmen. After which victorie, Baldwin in great triumph returned to IERVSALEM, and there shortly after with great care & diligence repaired the decaied wals of the city. 1177

Saladin ouerthrown by king Baldwin.

E Saladin in reuenge of this ouerthrow, made diuers incursions into the frontiers of the Christians, and did great harm, specially in the country about SIDON. For the repressing wherof, the king put himselfe in armes, and going against him, ouerthrew part of his army, as they were carrying away a great bootie. Of which ouerthrow Saladin vnderstanding, came in such haste with the rest of his army, as if it had bin a sudden tempest, vpon the Christians, then in great securitie diuiding the spoile; of whom they slew a great number, and put the rest to flight: In which so sudden a confusion, Otto, grand master of the Templars, and Hugh the Earle of TRIPOLIS his son in law, were both taken prisoners. The Earle himselfe with a few fled to TIRE: the king also at the same time was glad to shift for himselfe, & by flight to saue himselfe as he might: after which victory, Saladin besieged a strong castle which the king but the yere before had built vpon the bank of the riuer IORDAN, and giuen it to the Templars, with the country F round about; which castle Saladin took by force, and put to sword al that were therein, except some few whom he carried away prisoners. By this victory Saladin became dreadful vnto the christians in SIRIA, which caused them, especially such as had any charge, with more vigilancie to looke about them. Yet shortly after, a peace was for a time concluded betwixt the Sultan and the King: whereby their troubled estates breathed themselues almost the space of two yeares.

But this so welcome a calme was by domesticall troubles againe by the Kings friends suddenly troubled: for the countie of TRIPOLIS, to whom the gouernment of the kingdome was committed, comming towards HIERVSALEM, being by the suggestion of his enemies brought into suspition with the King, as if he had affected the kingdome, was to his great disgrace by the way commanded to stay. The chiefe authors of which discontentment, were the Kings mother, a woman of a turbulent nature, and her brother the Kings Steward; who in the absence of the Earle, had wrought the Kings sicke mind according to their owne appetites. But the rest of the nobility wisely foreseeing vnto what great danger the discord might tend; in dispight of them, with much labor, caused him to be sent for againe, and so reconciled vnto the King: by which means, that dangerous fire of dissention was for that time appeased, which afterwards brake out againe, to the vtter ruine of that kingdome.

Saladin goeth out of Aegypt to Damasco:

Saladin now wearie of the league he had before made with King Baldwin, as no longer standing with his haughtie designes, renounced the same, and raising a great power in ÆGIPT, set forward toward DAMASCO. Of whose comming, King Baldwin hauing knowledge, with the whole power of his kingdome went to haue met him, not farre from the dead Sea, and there encamped at an old towne called PETRA. But Saladin turning out of the way, into the Kings territorie, came and encamped before MOVNT-ROIALL, a castle which Baldwin had giuen vnto the Templars, about three daies march fom the place where the King lay.

Galiley spoiled, and the castle of Burie taken by the Turkes,

There Saladin with the spoile of the country refreshing his armie, now weary of long trauel, set forward againe, and so without resistance arriued with his armie at DAMASCO. At the same time, the Turks Captains about DAMASCO, BOSTRVM, and EMISSA, perceiuing the frontiers of the Christians thereabout to be kept with small strength, passed ouer IORDAN, and spoiling a great part of GALILEY, besieged the castle of BVRIE, at the foot of mount TABOR, not farre from the ettie of NAIM; which castle they in few daies tooke, and hauing there made a great slaughter, carried away with them about fiue hundred prisoners. Saladin being come to DAMASCO, called together all the garrisons of that kingdome, and ioyning them vnto the forces he brought out of ÆGIPT, entred into the Holy Land: at which time the Countie of TRIPOLIS, gouernour of the kingdome, lay sicke of a burning feauer. Neuertheless the King encouraged by the Knights of the order, went out with his armie against him; and encountring with him neere vnto a village called FROBOLET, ouerthrew him in a great battell; wherein, and afterward in the flight, most part of the Sultans armie perished: Saladin himselfe being glad by speedie flight to escape the danger, and so by long marches to get him againe to DAMASCO.

Berita in vain besieged by the Turkes.

In reuenge of this ouerthrow, Saladin hauing repaired his armie, and sent for his fleet out of ÆGIPT, came and besieged BERITVS both by sea and land: at which time also his brother, whom he had left gouernour in ÆGIPT, besieged DARVM, a strong towne in the vttermost bounds of the kingdom of HIERVSALEM towards ÆGIPT: both whose forces Baldwin being not able at once to represse, by the counsell of his nobilitie, thought it best first to relieue BERITVS, as the place of greatest importance. And for that purpose set forward with his armie by land, hauing also rigged vp three and thirtie gallies at TYRE, for the reliefe thereof by sea. Of which preparation Saladin vnderstanding, as also of the Kings comming (by letters intercepted by his scouts, directed to the besieged, for the holding out of the siege, with promise of speedie reliefe) he presently rose with his armie, and departed: whereof the King being aduertised, retired to SEPHOR.

Saladin inuading Mesopotamia, is himselfe inuaded by the King of Hierusalem.

Not long after, Saladin according to his ambitious nature, desirous aboue measure to extend the bounds of his Kingdome, and seeing the successe of his attempts against the King of HIERVSALEM not answerable to his desire, conuerted his forces vnto the countries more Eastward; and passing the riuer EVPHRATES, and entring into MESOPOTAMIA, partly by force, partly by corruption, got into his hands the cities of EDESSA, CARRAS, and diuers others. In which time the king of IERVSALEM took occasion first to spoile the country about DAMASCO, and after that diuers other places of the Sultans kindome, making hauocke of whatsoeuer came in his way, & so laded with the spoile of the Turks, retired to IERVSALEM.

Saladin

Saladin with victorie returning out of MESOPOTAMIA, in reuenge of the iniuries done vnto him in his absence, marched directly to ALEPPO, the strongest citie of the Christians in that part of SYRIA, which aboue all other he longed after: where he had not long lien, but that it was by the treason of the gouernour deliuered into his hands, with all the countrey thereabouts: wherewith the Christian Princes were so discouraged, that they euen then began to feare greater matters to ensue. The Prince of ANTIOCH sold TARSVS the metropoliticall citie of CILICIA, to Rupinus Prince of ARMENIA; for that hee saw it was not without great charge and danger to be by him defended, being so farre from him, and Saladin as it were now stept in betwixt him and it.

Aleppo betrayed vnto the Turke

At the same time, King Baldwin at NAZARETH fell sicke of a feuer, the leprosie also his old disease growing dayly more and more vpon him: insomuch as despairing of his life, hee called vnto him Guy Lusignan Countie of IOPPA & ASCALON, vnto whom he had before espoused Sybil his eldest sister, and in the presence of his mother, the Patriarch, and all the chiefe commanders of the soldiers of the sacred war, appointed him gouernor of the kingdome, reseruing vnto himselfe only the title of a King, with the citie of IERVSALEM, and a yerely pension of ten thousand duckats: all which was done, to the great disgrace and discontentment of the Countie of TRIPOLIS the old gouernor.

It was not long, but that Saladin hauing breathed himselfe a little, after so great labors came againe into the Holie land, where he tooke many castles, and did infinite harm; insomuch that the country people were glad for feare to forsake their houses, & to flie into cities. The Christian armie in the meane time lying fast by at SEPHOR, not once mouing, although many a faire occasion were offered: for the chiefe Commaunders affectionated vnto the Countie of TRIPOLIS, and enuying at the preferment of Guy the new gouernor, were vnwilling to fight, but finding one excuse or other, suffered the enemie at his pleasure to spoyle the country, and so in safetie to depart, which he had neuer before done in those quarters.

Petra in vaine besieged by the Turki.

Within lesse than a moneth after, Saladin with a great armie well appointed with all the habiliments of war needfull for the besieging of a city or strong castle, came againe into the land of PALESTINE, and passing thorow the countrey beyond IORDAN, sate downe at last before PETRA, in hope by the taking thereof to haue made his passage between ÆGYPT and DAMASCO more safe. Of which his purpose King Baldwin hauing knowledge, and taught by the euill successe of late, to what smal purpose it was to commit the mannaging of his wars vnto a Generall so euill beloued, and lesse regarded, as was Guy his brother in law; sent against him with his armie, Raymund the Countie of TRIPOLIS the old gouernor, whom he had again restored vnto the gouernment, and displaced Guy. Of whose comming Saladin hearing, raised his siege after he had lien there a moneth, and so departed.

A little before this expedition, the King stil growing sicker and sicker, his foule disease stil increasing, by the common consent of the nobilitie, appointed Baldwin his nephew by his sister Sybilla, a child but of fiue yeres old, to succeed him in the kingdome; and the Countie of TRIPOLIS to haue the gouernment of the state during the time of his minoritie. This Sybilla the kings sister was first married to William the yonger, Marques of MOVNT-FERRAT, who dying within three months after, left her with child with this his posthumus sonne Baldwin, now by his vncle deputed vnto the hope of the kingdome. After whose death she was married to Guy Lusignan Countie of IOPPA and ASCALON, the late gouernour: who taking in euill part this the kings designement, especially for the gouernment of the kingdome by the Countie of TRIPOLIS, departed from the court as a man discontented, vnto his city of ASCALON: whereof the Patriarch and the Princes of the sacred war, fearing (and that not without cause) great danger to ensue, came to the King, then holding a Parliament in the citie of ACON, most humbly requesting him for auoyding of further danger, and the safetie of his kingdome, to receiue againe into his fauour the Countie Guy his brother in law, and to make an attonement betwixt him and the Countie of TRIPOLIS. But this their request sorted to no purpose, so that the Parliament was dissolued without any thing for the good of the Commonweale in that point concluded.

Dissention in the court of Ierusalem.

After that time the kingdome of IERVSALEM began stil more and more to decline. In the old King Baldwin (sicke both in bodie and mind) was almost no hope: in the young King (yet vnfit for so great a burthen) much lesse: and the dissention betwixt the two Counties Guy and

Raymund,

Raymund with their fauorits, was like enough to bring great harme vnto the State. Besides that, the Countie of Tripolis fearing the power of Guy his enemie, was thought to haue secret intelligence with Saladin the Turke, insomuch as the King was almost in purpose to haue proclaimed him traitor. Wherefore the King now rested only vpon the councel of William Archbishop of Tyre, and the masters of the Knights of the sacred warre: by whose aduice he sent Heraclius Patriarch of Ierusalem, Roger Molins master of the Knights of S. Iohns, and Arnold master of the Templars, Embassadors vnto Lucius the third, then Pope, vnto Frederick the emperor, Philip the French King, and Henry the second, King of England, to declare vnto them the dangerous state of that Christian kingdome, and to craue their aid against the Infidels. King Baldwin sendeth Embassadors vnto the Christian Princes of the west for aid.

These Embassadors comming to the Councell then holden at Verona, with great grauity and diligence, in the presence of the Pope & of the Emperor, declared the hard estate of the Christians of the East, with their humble request vnto them for aid; in such sort that they mooued them, with all the Princes there present, to compassion. From thence they were by the Pope directed vnto Philip the French King, with whom hauing dispatched their affaires, they from him passed ouer into England, and afterward into Germanie: and had at length brought their negotiation to so good passe, that in euery place great preparation was made for a great expedition to be made against the Turks, for the relefe of the Christians in the East: with which good newes the Embassadours returning to Ierusalem, filled the sicke King with the hope of great matters. But greater quarrels shortly after arising betwixt the Pope and the Emperour, and sharpe warre likewise betwixt the French King and the King of England, and the other Christian Princes also being at no better quiet, the notable expedition that had with the expectation thereof so filled the world, was againe layd aside and quite dashed. Whereof King Baldwin vnderstanding, both by messengers and letters from his friends, oppressed with griefe and heauinesse more than with the force of his disease, (a man for his prowesse and painefulnesse not inferior to any his predecessors) died without issue the 16 day of May, Anno 1185, being but fiue and twentie yeres old, whereof he had raigned twelue. His bodie was afterward with the generall mourning of his subiects, solemnly buried in the Temple neere vnto the mount Caluarie, together with his predecessors the Kings of Ierusalem.

King Baldwin thus buried, Baldwin the fift of that name, yet but a boy, was crowned King. But then began the sparkes, which had of long lien raked vp and hidden in the ashes, to breake out into a great fire: for Raymund Countie of Tripolis contended the whole gouernement of the kingdome, & tuition of the King to be due vnto him, by the appointment of the late King, and consent of the nobilitie; and did so much, that he had almost obtained it to haue bin confirmed vnto him in open Parliament. But Sybylla a woman of a most haughtie spirit (sister vnto the late King, and mother vnto the yong King yet liuing) prickt forward her husband Guy, in no case to giue place vnto his competitor Raymund; and so animated him, that by the helpe of his own fauorits, and the countenance of Boniface Marquesse of Mount-Ferrat, (who euen then was come with a great power into Syria) he extorted from the nobilitie whatsoeuer hee desired. But seuen moneths were scarce well passed, but that this yong King Baldwin was dead and buried; poysoned (as was reported) by his mother, for the desire shee had of the Kingdome her selfe: whose death she with all secrecie concealed, vntill she had obtained of the Patriarch and other Princes of the kingdom, that Guy her husband might be proclaimed king. So by her means it was so wrought, that vpon one and the selfe same day the yong King Baldwin was buried by his vncle, and Guy the Countie crowned. This yong King Baldwin, by reason of his tender yeres and short raigne, is of some not reckoned amongst the Kings of Ierusalem: howbeit, seeing he was by his vncle and the Princes of that time thought worthy of the kingdome, let him also haue his place amongst the rest as the eighth King of Ierusalem. Guy the ninth and last King of Ierusalem.

When Guy was thus possessed of the kingdome, the Countie of Tripolis seeing himselfe out of al hope of the gouernment, & highly therewith discontented, did what he might by al meanes to crosse the doings of the King: whose sicke and aspiring mind Saladin prickt dayly more and more forward, promising him his helping hand whensoeuer he should need; which curtesie the Countie desirously embraced. For now the fatall period of the kingdome of Ierusalem grew fast on, & al things tended to destruction, discord raigning in euery place: which Saladin well perceiuing (after that he had compacted with the County) by messengers sent of purpose, inuited the Turks, Sarasins, and Ægyptians, as men agreeing in one and the same religion,

A gion, generally to take vp armes in so fit an opportunitie of the discord of the Christians, assuring them of great prey and spoyle, besides the honor of the conquest. The city of Ptolomais was the place by him appointed, where all this power should meet: whither such a multitude of the barbarous Mahometans (partly for the hatred of the Christian religion, partly for the hope of the rich spoyle which Saladin had promised them) came flocking out of all places, that in short time there was met together about fiftie thousand horsemen, besides an infinite number of foot: and vnto such as could not safely passe by the borders of Ierusalem, to them the false Countie gaue safe conduct, by the countries of Tiberias, Nazareth, and Galile. Saladin the occasion the Christians taketh occasion to inuade the Holy land.

All the power of the Infidels thus assembled, Saladin laid siege vnto the city of Ptolomais: which the Templars and the Knights hospitallers had notably fortified, and strongly manned, B (as before vnto them giuen by the Kings of Ierusalem, to defend against the Infidel) and therein now were both the masters of both those honorable Orders, with the whole flower of the Knights of their profession. Vnto this citie Saladin gaue a most terrible assault vpon May day in the morning, in the yere 1187; which was by the Christians notably defended, & the enemie with great slaughter still beaten downe. In the heat of this assault, the two great masters sallied with certaine troupes of their most readie horsemen, assailed the enemies campe, and bearing downe all before them, raised there a great tumult; and by and by turning vpon the backes of them that were assaulting the citie, made there an exceeding great slaughter. Insomuch that Saladin dismayd, first with the confusion in his campe, and now with the sudden danger behind him, was glad to giue ouer the assault, and to turn his whole forces vpon them, C where was fought a most bloudie and terrible battell. Amongst others that there fought, the Countie of Tripolis, now an enemie vnto God and his Countrey, disguised in the habit of a Turke notably helped the Infidels, and meeting with the great master of the Knights Hospitalers, vnhorsed him; who surcharged with the weight of his armor, and oppressed with the multitude of his enemies, there died. Neuertheless, such was the valor of these worthy men, and new succor still comming out of the citie, that Saladin hauing in that battell, and at the assault lost fifteene thousand of his Turkes, was glad with the rest to betake himselfe to flight. Neither was this so notable a victorie gained by the Christians without bloud, most part of the worthie Knights Hospitalers being together with their grand master there slaine. Ptolome is besieged by Saladin. 1187.

Saladin by this ouerthrow perceiuing, that by open force he should not be able to do much D against the Christians, thought it good vnto his forces to ioyn also policie. Wherein the false Countie of Tripolis was the man hee thought best to make choice of, as his fittest instrument to worke by. Him he compacted withall, to seeke for grace at the King of Ierusalems hands, as of his dread Soueraigne, and after so long discord, to sue to be reconciled vnto him, as now wearie of the Turks amitie, with whom he should make shew to be vtterly fallen out. At which time also, to giue the matter the better grace, Saladin of purpose with a great armie came and besieged Tiberias, a citie of the Counties iurisdiction: for the relefe whereof, the traiterous Countie craued aid of the King and the other Princes of the sacred warre. Who with an Armie, though not great, yet very well appointed, came according to his desire, and encamped neere vnto the fountaine of Sophor: where they had not long stayed, but that they met with E the huge armie of the Turks, being in number one hundred and twentie thousand horse, and one hundred and sixtie thousand foot: with whom they ioyned a most sharp and terrible battell, which by reason of the extremitie of the heat of the weather (it then being the twelfth of Iuly) and the approch of the night, was againe giuen ouer, both armies (as if it had bin by consent) retyring. The next day the battell was againe begun, wherein the Turks, by the treason and shamefull flight of the false Countie of Tripolis, gained the victorie. In this battell Guy the King himself, with Gerard master of the Templars, Boniface Marquesse of Mont-Ferrat, and diuers others, men of great marke, were taken prisoners. And to say the truth, in this battaile was broken the whole strength of the Christians in the East. Guy King of Ierusalem taken prisoner.

The Christian commonweale by the treason of the false Countie thus betrayd vnto the Infi- F dels, Saladin without any great resistance had the cities of Ptolomais, Biblis, and Berithus deliuered vnto him: in all which places he vsed his victorie with great moderation, not enforcing any Christian (more than the Latines) to depart thence, but suffering them there still to remaine as before, yeelding vnto him their obedience, with such tribute as he had imposed vpon them. With like good fortune he within the space of one moneth tooke all the port townes betwixt Sidon and Aſcalon alongſt the ſea coaſt, excepting only the antient citie of Tyre: vnto the citie of Aſcalon alſo he laid ſiege by the ſpace of nine days; but loth to ſtay the courſe of his victorie, by the valour of the defendants reſolued there to ſpend their liues, he departed thence, and marched directly vnto Ieruſalem the chiefe citie of that kingdome: and approching the ſame, gaue ſummons thereunto, perſuading the citiſens yet whiles they had time, to yeeld themſelues, together with the citie, vnto his mercie. Which they refuſing to do, he incloſed the ſame with his armie, and by the ſpace of fourteene dayes layd hard ſiege vnto it, leauing nothing vndone or vnattempted, that might helpe for the gaining thereof. At which time the citiſens conſidering the danger they were in, and that the ſtrength of the Kingdome, with the flower of their chiualrie, were in the late battell loſt, and that they were not now to expect any forreine aid, agreed vpon certaine conditions to yeeld vp the Citie: which were, That ſuch Chriſtians as would, might remaine ſtill with their liberty and goods; & that ſuch as would not, might in ſafetie depart with ſo much of their goods as they could carrie vpon their backes. Theſe conditions being by Saladin granted, the holy citie was vnto him deliuered the ſecond of October, in the yeare 1187; after that it had been by the Chriſtians holden from the time that it was by Godfrey of Bullion and other Chriſtians woon, about 89 yeares. Saladin entring into the citie, prophaned firſt the Temple of the Lord, conuerting it vnto the vſe of his Mahometan ſuperſtition; the other churches he vſed as ſtables for his horſes, only the temple of the Sepulchre was by the Chriſtians for a great ſumme of mony redeemed, and ſo kept vndefiled. The Latine Chriſtians he thruſt out of the Citie, yet with leaue to carry with them ſuch things as they were able themſelues to beare: who trauelling with heauie burthens, but much more heauie hearts, ſome to Tripolis, ſome to Tyre, ſome to Antioch, (for only theſe three cities were now left vnto the Chriſtians in Syria) were by the falſe Countie of Tripolis by the way lightned of their burthens, to the increaſing of the heauineſſe of their hearts, moſt of them beeing by him and his followers ſpoyled of that little they had by the mercie of their enemies ſaue in the ruine of their ſtate.

Ieruſalem beſieged.

Ieruſalem taken by Saladin.

Vnto the other Chriſtians that were naturall Syrians, Greekes, Armenians, Georgians, and ſuch like, Saladin appointed certain places of the citie for them to dwel in, where ſome of their poſteritie were long time after to be found. All the monuments of the Chriſtians were by the barbarous Mahometans and Turks defaced, only the Sepulchre of our bleſſed Sauior Chriſt, with the monument of Godfrey of Bullion, and his brother Baldwin, for the reuerence of the men, were by them ſpared. In theſe ſo great troubles aboue twentie thouſand of the Chriſtians periſhed: amongſt the reſt, the Countie of Tripolis was ſhortly after found dead in his bed, and (as ſome ſay) circumciſed; a manifeſt token of his reuolt, not from the King onely, but from the Chriſtian Faith alſo.

The death of Raymund the traiterous Countie of Tripolis.

Ieruſalem thus woon, Saladin returned againe to the ſiege of Aſcalon, which after he had by the ſpace of ten dayes moſt ſtraitly beſieged, was vnto him by compoſition deliuered: wherein amongſt other things agreed vpon for the ſafe departure of the citiſens, was compriſed alſo, that he ſhould freely ſet at libertie Guy the King, and Gerard maſter of the Templars, both before taken priſoners, as is before declared; which he afterward performed.

Thus the victorious Turke ſtil vrging his good fortune, departing thence, attempted to haue taken Tripolis; but hauing made ſome proofe of his owne forces, and the valor of the defendants, he was glad to giue ouer the ſiege, and to depart as he came. Marching thence with his army, becauſe he would leaue no place vnattempted, he laid ſiege vnto the city of Tyre, where Conrade Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat was a little before arriued with Iſaac Angelus the Greeke Emperors fleet, and a ſupplie of certaine companies of good ſoldiers. Vnto which place were come great numbers of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians, fled from Ieruſalem and other places, ſo that the citie was full of men.

This citie Saladin moſt furiouſly aſſaulted, but was by the Chriſtians notably repulſed, not without the great loſſe of his beſt ſoldiers. At which time alſo the Admirall of Sicilia diſcomfited his fleet at ſea, and landing his forces, came vnlooked for vpon the backe of him: ſo that hauing his hands full before by them of the towne, and charged behind by theſe new come enemies, he was glad to retyre in ſuch haſt, as that he left his Tents, with all that therein was, vnto the ſpoyle of the Chriſtians.

Within a few dayes after, Saladin hauing againe repaired his armie, inuaded the Countrey about about Antioch; with fire and ſword deſtroying whatſoeuer was ſubiect to his furie, euen to the gates of the citie: but knowing that ſo ſtrong a citie was not without great charge & long ſiege to be woon, he thought it good to make proofe if it might by policie or corruption bee gained. Wherein he ſo cunningly dealt with the Patriarch, that he had by his means the caſtle (otherwiſe almoſt impregnable) for gold betrayd vnto him. By means whereof he in ſhort time became lord and maſter of that famous citie, (about ninetie yeres before hardly gained by the whole power of the Chriſtians, after eleuen moneths ſiege) and with it fiue and twentie cities moe, that depended of the fortune thereof, with all the prouinces belonging thereunto, alwayes deemed to haue been the third part of the kingdome of Ieruſalem.

The famous city of Antioch betrayd vnto the Turkes.

The loſſe of ſo great a citie, together with the ruine of the whole kingdome, had in a ſhort ſpace filled euery corner of Chriſtendome with the heauie report thereof. Wherewith the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt (namely Frederick the German Emperor, with Frederick his ſon Duke of Sueuia, Philip the French King, Henry the ſecond, king of England, Otto Duke of Burgondie, Leopold Duke of Auſtria, with many other great Princes and Prelats of Germanie, Italie, and other places) not a little mooued, as alſo with the pittifull complaints of the Embaſſadors at the ſame time ſent from the diſtreſſed Chriſtians, and the effectuall perſuaſions of Clement the third, then Pope; promiſed, and all, or moſt part indeed, made great preparations: which they afterwards, though not all at once (as letted by other occaſions) but at diuers times imployed, for the moſt part with the danger of their owne perſons, againſt the Turkes, for the reliefe of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, and recouerie of the Holy land: but with what ſucceſſe ſhall hereafter (God willing) be declared.

Of which ſo great preparations made againſt him, Saladin not ignorant, ſet at libertie Guy the King of Ieruſalem, who contrarie to his promiſe made at Aſcalon, he had now detained a yeare in priſon; yet before his inlargment exacting of him an oath, Neuer by force of armes afterwards to ſeeke to recouer his kingdome, or to reuenge the wrongs he had ſuſtained: hoping thereby to ſtay the comming of the other Princes in his quarrell. Which oath for all that, the Pope diſpenſed withal, as extorted by conſtraint from him, at ſuch time as Saladin had longer detained him in priſon, than of right he ſhould.

Guy now at libertie, and yet in mind a King, came to Tyre, but could not be there receiued, the citiſens hauing before ſworn their obedience vnto Conrade marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, by whom they had bin notably defended againſt the furie of Saladin. Wherfore departing thence with ſuch power as he had, and the diſperſed Chriſtians dayly repairing vnto him out of all parts of Syria, he came & beſieged Ptolemais: where he had not long lien, but firſt came vnto him the Venetian fleet, with them alſo of Piſa, and after them the Flemings with a fleet of fiftie ſaile, who all ioyned their forces together for the winning of the Citie. But whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Ptolemais, came Saladin with a great armie to the reliefe of the beſieged: where betwixt him and the Chriſtians was fought a great battell, wherein the Chriſtians at the firſt had the better; but afterward feinting, and readie to flie, had there vndoubtedly receiued a notable ouerthrow, had not Geffrey Lyſignan the Kings brother (left for the guarding of the campe) in good time come in with new ſupplies; and not only ſtayd their flight, but alſo repreſſed the further purſuit of the fierce enemie, now almoſt in poſſeſſion of the deſired victorie. Neuertheleſſe there were 2000 Chriſtians there ſlaine, and among them Gerard maſter of the Templars. Saladin by that which was now done, perceiuing how hard a matter it would be for him by land to relieue his citie, ſent for the fleet which he had ſtrongly rigged vp at Alexandria, and ſo by force put new ſupplies both of men & victuals into the beſieged citie. Wherewith the Turks encouraged, made often ſallies vpon the Chriſtians; and in deſpight of the Chriſtian religion, whipped the image of Chriſt crucified, which they had for that purpoſe in the ſight of the Chriſtians ſet vp vpon the top of the wall. With the ſame fleet alſo he ſo ſcoured the ſeas, that no victuals or new ſupplies of men could that way without great danger be brought vnto the campe: wherby ſuch ſcarcitie & want of al things began ſhortly after to ariſe among the Chriſtians, that ſome of them not able longer to indure the famin, fled vnto the Turks campe, then lying not far off, crying out for bread. Of which diſtreſſe in the campe of the Christians, Saladin knowing right well, both by ſuch fugitiues as dayly came ouer vnto him, and by his own eſpials, yet made ſhew as if he vnderſtood nothing thereof: but ſuddenly riſing with his armie (as doubtfull of his owne ſtrength) departed, leauing his his campe ful of all manner of victuals. Whereof the Christians vnderstanding, and supposing him to haue for feare been gone indeed, in great numbers hasted vnto the forsaken campe, as vnto a most desired prey: where whilest they were gorging themselues Saladin suddenly returning, and getting betwixt them and home, made of them a great slaughter. Neuertheless the Christians hauing now lien before the citie six moneths, continued the siege all the Winter, ouercomming with patience the hardest difficulties, in hope of aid from the other Christian Princes, whose comming they expected with the first of the next Spring: during which time many an hot skirmish passed betwixt them and the Turks both by sea and land.

Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of Ptolemais, Frederick the Emperor, with diuers of the great German Princes and others, before resolued vpon an expedition for the recouerie of the Holy land, and the relefe of the distressed Christians in Syria: hauing now raised a great armie, furnished with all things necessarie for so long a iourney, set forward from Ratisbone, and so comming to Vienna, and passing thorow Hungaria, Bulgaria, and Thracia, ariued at length at Constantinople; where he was by Isaac Angelus the Emperour that then raigned, honorably entertained: but indeed more for feare and fashion sake, than for any loue or good will; for that he after the supicious manner of the Greekes, hauing in disturst so great a power of the Latine Emperors, wished rather for his absence than his presence. And therefore ceased not in what he might, to hasten his passage ouer into Asia, pretending for the color thereof, the necessitie the Christians had of his present aid. So the Emperor with his Armie passing ouer the streight, and without resistance marching thorow the greatest part of the lesser Asia, entred Into Lycaonia, where meeting with a great power of the Turkes, that were come from the Sultan of Iconium to stay his further passage, hee ouerthrew them in a great battell, and so marching directly on to Iconium, tooke it by force, and gaue the spoyle thereof vnto his soldiers, in reuenge of the iniuries before done vnto his vncle the Emperour Conrade, by the Sultan of that citie. Departing thence, and marching thorow Cilicia, hee in another battell ouerthrew the Turks, that hauing taken the straits of the mountaines, had thought to haue stayd his further passage into Syria. After that, he tooke the citie Philomela, which the Sultan had strongly fortified, which he rased to the ground, and put to sword all the people therein, for that they contrarie to the law of nations, had slaine such messengers as hee had sent vnto them for the summoning of the citie. In like manner hee entred into the lesser Armenia, where he tooke the citie Melitene, and subdued all the countrie thereabouts: vnto the relefe whereof the Turks comming with a most huge armie, were by him with an exceeding great slaughter ouerthrowne and put to flight. After that, entring into Comagena, and meeting with Saphadin, Saladin his sonne, with a great armie of the Turks, he ouerthrew him in the plaine field, and discomfited his whole armie: but whilest hee too eagerly pursueth the enemie he had then in chace, his horse foundring vnder him as he passed the riuer Saleph, hee was so ouerthrowne, and his foot hanging fast in his stirrop, drawne thorow the deepe Riuer, and almost drowned; and at the farther side of the riuer was so plunged by his horse, at his landing, that he was taken vp for dead: yet breathing a little, and casting his eyes vp to heauen, with much adoe he vttered these few words, Lord receiue my Soule; and so in the hands of them that tooke him vp gaue vp the ghost, vnto the great griefe and hindrance of the Christian Commonweale: for Saladin hearing of his approch, was so affraid of him, as that hee began to doubt, not how to keepe that he had before woon in Syria, but how to defend himselfe in Ægypt. Thus miserably perished this worthie Emperor, the tenth of Iune in the yeare of Grace, 1190, being then of the age of seuentie yeares, whereof hee had with much trouble raigned eight and thirtie. His dead bodie was carried along with the armie, and afterward with all funerall pompe buried in the Cathedrall church at Tyre.

Frederick the Emperor is son chosen Generall of the Christian Armie.

Frederick the Emperor thus dead, Frederick his son Duke of Sueuia, was by the general consent of the Princes in the armie chosen Generall in his stead: vpon whom, with the rest of the armie, yet mourning for the death of the Emperor, the Turks gaue a sudden & fierce charge, in hope so to haue ouerthrowne them: but finding greater resistance than they had before supposed, and hauing lost some of their men, they with like speed that they came, retyred again. Now began famine (one of the ordinarie attendants of great armies) to increase in the campe: for why, the Turkes for that purpose had before destroyed or carried away all that was in the Countrey, leauing nothing for the Christians more than the bare ground. Wherefore

A Frederick turning a little out of the way, came to Antioch, which was easily deliuered vnto him, and his hungrie souldiers well refreshed by the citizens, beeing as yet for the most part Christians. But he had not there staied past fifteene daies for the refreshing of his armie, but that the plague (the handmaid of famin and another scourge of the greatest multitudes) began to rage among his soldiers, in such sort, that he was glad with his army to forsake the citie, and to get him abroad againe into the open field: where forthwith newes was brought vnto him, that Dodequin Generall of such forces as Saladin had sent for out of Ægypt (which were not small) was by great iourneyes comming towards him: against whom hee in good order set forward, with his fathers corse still carried in the midst of his armie. These two armies meeting together, and both willing to fight, ioyned a great and doubtfull battell, fortune now in-

B clining to the one side, and by and by to the other; the Christians exceeding their enemies in valour, and they them again in number. At length the Christians in the vanguard began to retire, and they that seconded them were also hardly charged: when Frederick mindfull of his fathers valor, with a troupe of valiant horsmen brake into the enemies battel with such force, that the Turks were glad to giue ground: after whom Leopold Duke of Austria comming presently on with his footmen, brought such a feare vpon the whole army of the Turks, that they betook themselues to speedie flight. In this battell were foure thousand of the enemies slain, with small losse of the Christians; and about one thousand moe taken prisoners, with fifteen of their ensignes. After which victorie, Frederick marching further in Cælo-Syria, pacified Laodicea then in mutinie, and like to haue beene deliuered vnto the Turks. He also with a lit-

C tle labour tooke Berythus, with diuers other cities of Syria, which before belonging vnto the Kings of Ierusalem, were now reuolted vnto the Turks. So Afterward comming to Tyre, he there solemnly buried his father, (dead, as is before said:) and from thence certified Guy the King (still lying with the other Christian Princes at the siege of Ptolemais) of his comming: who forthwith sent the Marques of Mont-Ferrat, with part of the fleet, to transport him with his people that were left, by sea: for that by land he could not so safely haue come, being now but weake, for meeting with Saladin; who with a great armie lay still houering about his besieged citie, intentiue to all opportunitie. So was Duke Frederick, with his souldiers yet left, safely by sea conducted from Tyre to the campe at Ptolemais, and there ioyfully receiued by the King and the other Princes, with the generall applause of the whole campe.

A great battell betwixt the Turks and the christians.

D In the meane time the Turks sallying out of the citie of Ptolemais, had done great harme among the Christians, by whom they were not without some losse againe repulsed. But after the comming of Duke Frederick and his Germans, it was thought good by the generall consent of all the great commanders in the army, that the citie should be assaulted round: and to that purpose was euery mans regiment appointed what place to assaile. The King himselfe with the Templars and the Italians from Pisa, vndertook that part of the citie which was toward the sea: vnto Duke Frederick & his Germans, was allotted all betwixt the bridge ouer the riuer Bele, and the Bishops palace: the Venetians, Genowaies, and Knights Hospitalers, were appointed vnto the rest of the wall as far as the court of Raymund: the Friselanders, Flemings, and Hollanders, tooke vp all the rest of the wall vnto the sea side. Thus was the citie at Ptolemais assaulted by the christians.

E once in euery side assailed by the Christians, with such furie, as if they had theron purposed to gage their whole forces; seeking by a thousand wounds, and a thousand kinds of death to haue by their scaling ladders gained the top of the wals; the Turks with no lesse courage still beating them downe again. But in the heat of this so dreadfull and desperat an assault, Saladin still houering aloofe, came now vpon the sudden and assailed the campe of the Christians, filling the same with feare and tumult: whose charge they that were left for the defence of the same, at the first notably receiued, but finding themselues too weake, began to giue ground; by which means the Turks tooke certaine tents with some ensignes, and fired some other of the pauillions of the Christians, hauing slaine somewhat moe than an hundred of the defendants.

The Christians in the mean time little preuailing in the assault, and troubled with the dan-

F ger of their campe, retired to the relefe thereof. But the Turke perceiuing himselfe too weak for the whole power of the Christians, retired also; yet not with such haste, but that he had there almost lost himselfe. This notable assault was giuen the fourteenth of October: after which, many light skirmishes passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks, but more for bootie, than for any other great purpose.

In the meane time, diuers great Princes of the Weſt that had vowed themſelues vnto this G ſacred warre, came thither, whoſe number rather increaſed the want of victuals, than furthered the ſeruice. At which time alſo the diſcord betwixt Guy the King (whoſe wife and children were now dead) and Conrade Marques of Mont-Ferrat (who had married Iſabel the late queens ſiſter, by whom hee pretended a claime vnto the title of the imaginarie kingdome) did much harme vnto the proceedings of the Chriſtians: ſo pleaſing a thing theſe haughtie ſtiles be vnto the loftie mindes of the ambitous. Shortly after the Chriſtians yet lying at the ſiege, the contagion and famine ſtill increaſing, it fortuned that Duke Frederick fell ſick of the Plague, whereof hee died; and with the great mourning of the whole armie, was afterward ſolemnly buried faſt by his father in the cathedral Church at Tire: after whoſe death the Chriſtians at-H tempted no great matter againſt the city, although they were oftentimes by the Turks prouoked, but lay ſtil ſtrongly intrenched, expecting ſome greater aid from the princes of the Weſt.
Now all the hope of the Chriſtian affaires in Syria, and in the land of Paleſtine, reſted vpon the comming of the two mightie Princes, Phllip the ſecond of that name, King of France, and Richard the firſt, King of England: who hauing agreed betwixt themſelues, with their combined forces to relieue the diſtreſſed Chriſtians of the Eaſt; and againe (if it were poſſible) to repaire the broken ſtate of the kingdome of Ieruſalem, were now met together at Matſeilles in Prouence. From whence the French King firſt departing with his fleet for Cicilia, and with a proſperous gale for certaine dayes holding on his courſe, and now come nigh vnto the Iſland, was by force of a furious tempeſt ſuddenly ariſing, ſo toſſed and tumbled in the deep, I that many of his Ships there periſhed, eaten vp of the Sea; others by force of weather driuen vpon the ſands and rocks, were there broken all to pieces; and the reſt, ſome with their maſts broken, ſome with their tacklings and ſailes rent, and all in generall ſore weather beaten, with much adoe arriued at Meſſana, the deſired Port. At which place King Richard afterwards (but with better fortune) arriued with his fleet alſo. Both the Kings now met together, reſolued there to winter: the French king enforſed by neceſſity ſo to do, for the reparing of the late loſſes he had receiued, as well in his people & prouiſion, as in his ſhipping, al which was to be relieued by new ſupplies out of France: and the king of England ſtaying to take order for the dowrie of his ſiſter Ioan (widow of William the late King of Cicilia) with Tancred the baſe ſonne of Roger, that had now aſpired vnto the kingdome of that Iſland. About which matter K great ſtirs aroſe betwixt King Richard the Queenes brother, and Tancred the new King, inſomuch that it was like to haue broken out into open warre, had it not to the good contentment of King Richard beene otherwiſe taken vp, and ſo the controuerſie ended. But whileſt theſe two great Kings thus wintred in this fruitfull Iſland, and oftentimes as good friends met together, ſometime for their diſport, and ſome time to conferre of their ſo weightie affaires; the way (as was thought) to haue appeaſed all former diſpleaſure, and to haue increaſed loue: it fell out clean contrarie, iealouſie & diſtruſt, not only reuiuing the old, but alſo ſtil raiſing new quarrels betwixt them, to the great hindrance of the common good by them intended: which may ſerue for a warning to all great Princes, willing to continue in amitie, and to hold a good opinion one of another, neuer to ſee one the other; or comming ſo to an in-L terview, not to conuerſe or ſtay long together: which as it is not often done without the danger of their perſons, ſo can it not poſſibly be long continued, but that it wil engender in themſelues as well as in their followers, iealouſie, enuie, hatred, and miſtruſt, as we haue before ſaid and hereafter in the courſe of this Hiſtorie may appeare.

An old grudge betwixt Philip the French King, and Richard king of England.

There was an old quarrell betwixt theſe two great Kings, Richard and Philip, about Adela the French kings ſiſter; whom Richard hauing before (his father yet liuing) aſſianced, had now reiected, as her whom his aged father Henry the ſecond had too familiarly vſed: and in ſtead of her, to the great diſgrace of the French, eſpouſed the Lady Berengaria, daughter to the king of Nauar: which indignitie with diuers others, then ariſing betwixt the French and the Engliſh, as then with great heart-burning ſmouldred vp in reſpect of the common cauſe then in M hand, afterwards brake out againe, to the ſhamefull ouerthrow of this moſt honorable expedition, and lamentable diſturbance of both realmes.

Winter paſt, and the Spring now come, the French King not altogether the beſt pleaſed, firſt looſed from Meſſana, and with his fleet in ſafetie arriued at Ptolemais, where he was by the Chriſtians, now the third yeare lying at the ſiege, ſo ioyfully receiued, as if he had beene

to

A to them ſent with ſuccours from heauen. After whom, ſhortly after followed alſo King Richard: of whoſe fleet (by force of weather ſore beaten and diſperſed) ſt. ſhips by the rage of the tempeſt driuen a ground vpon the coaſt of Cyprus, were by the Iſland people ſpoyled, and the men that in them had hardly eſcaped the danger of the ſea, with moſt barbarous inhu-manitie, ſome ſlaine and ſome taken priſoners: the reſt of the fleet ſtriuing there alſo, were with like inciuilitie forbidden to land; the Cipriots ready at han i all places to keepe them off. With which ſo great an indignity the king iuſtly moued, and l y force landing his people, with incredible celeritie and ſucceſſe ouerran the whole Iſland, neuer ceaſing vntill hee had made a ful conqueſt therof, and taken Iſaac Comnenus, commonly called the King of that Iſland B and of ſome (for what treaſon I know not) Emperor of the Griffons, priſoner: yet was he indeed neither King nor Emperor, but being a man of great nobilitie and power, and of the honorable ſtocke of the Comneni, had in the troubleſome raigne of Andronicus Comnenus the Emperor, his couſin, laid hold vpon that fruitfull Iſland, and there tyrannized as a reputed King; vntill that now he was by King Richard taken priſoner, and for his vnfaithfull dealing ſent faſt bound in chaines of ſiluer into Syria. The King thus poſſeſſed of the whole Iſland, there at Limozin married the Lady Berengaria the King of Nauars daughter, brought thither by Ioan late Queene of Cicilia, the Kings ſiſter. And ſo diſpoſing as he thought beſt of all things for the ſafe keeping of the Iſland, ſet forward againe with his fleet towards Siria. Where by the way he light vpon a great ſhip of the Sultans, laded with victuals and other warlike prouiſi-C ons for the reliefe of the beſieged; all which became a prey vnto him. So holding on his courſe, he at length arriued at Ptolemais, where he was by the French King, and the reſt of the Chriſtians there lying, moſt honourably receiued.

King Richard ſ. reuengeth the iniurie done to his people by the Cipriots.

King Richard arriueth at Ptolemais.

Now had the citie of Ptolemais beene three yeares beſieged by the Chriſtians, and notably defended by the Turks: during which time many an hot aſſault and bloudie skirmiſh had paſſed betwixt them. And now the eies of all men were fixed vpon the two Kings of England and France, vnto whom all the reſt offred their obedience and ſeruice. The Chriſtian campe was great, compoſed eſpecially of Engliſhmen, Frenchmen, Italians, and Almaines; not them that were left of the Emperor Frederick his armie (for they were for the moſt part dead, or els returned home againe into their countries) but of ſuch as (moued with the zeale they bare vnto this religious warre) came daily in great numbers thither: as did alſo many others of diuers D nations, deſirous in ſome meaſure to be partakers of ſo honourable a warre.

Theſe religious and venerous Chriſtians thus lying at the ſiege, had with much painful labor vndermined one of the greateſt towers of the city, called the accurſed Tower, with ſome part of the wall alſo, by means whereof they were in hope to find a way into the city. Wherefore all things being now in a readineſſe for the firing of the mine, it was thought good by generall conſent, that an aſſault ſhould alſo at the ſame time be giuen vnto the citie: and thereupon euery regiment was by lot appointed which part of the wall to aſſaile, which they all with great courage vndertooke. In the heat of which aſſault, the aforeſaid vndermined tower, with ſome part of the wall (the timber whereon it ſtaied, now burnt) fell down with a great fal, laying open a faire breach for the Chriſtians to enter: wherewith the Turks diſmaied, forthwith E craued to come to parle: which granted, they for ſafegard of their liues yeelded forthwith to giue vp the city, and to reſtore to the Chriſtians the holy Croſſe, with two thouſand captiues, and two hundred horſemen, ſuch as they ſhould require of all them that were in the power of Saladin; beſides 200000 Conſtantinopolitan ducats, to be by him giuen to the two Kings, for the coſt by them beſtowed in the ſiege. For paiment whereof the Turks in the city were to remain as hoſtages vnder the ſafe keeping of the Chriſtians, ſo that if all the couenants afore-ſaid were not within forty daies performed by Saladin, they ſhould all for their liues be at the kings mercie. So was this ſtrong city, after it had bin almoſt three yeres beſieged, deliuered vp vnto the Chriſtians the 12 of Iuly, in the yere 1191. The firſt that entred were the Germanes 1191 of Auſtria, who as if they had bin the only men by whoſe valour the city had bin won, at their F firſt entry preſumptuouſly aduanced their enſignes vpon the top of the walls, to the great offence of al the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, but eſpecially of king Richard, who (not vnworthi-ly for his princely courage was commonly called Richard Cueur de Lyon (not brooking ſo proud an indignity, cauſed the enſignes of Leopold their Duke to be puld down, and foiled vnder foot; which ſhortly after gaue him occaſion of repentance, as ſhall hereafter be ſeene.

The

The two Kings possessed of the citie, diuided the same, with all the people and spoile thereof betwixt them, without regard of the rest of the other noble Christians, that had sustained the whole trauell of that long siege: for which cause most part of them, seeing themselues so deluded, withdrew themselues from them, and with one consent sent them word, That they would forsake them, except they were made partakers of the gaines, as they had beene of the paines. Which the two Kings to content them, promised they should: howbeit they delayed so long their promises, that many worthy men, constrained by pouertie, departed discontented from them into their countries.

But long it was not, that this one citie, so lately gained, could contain these two great kings, whom two large kindomes could not retaine in peace. For albeit that they were in body together present, and in one, and that a most honorable action, combined, yet were they in hearts farre asunder, and their secret designes much different: enuie and distrust still reuiuing vnkindnesse past, and ministring new matter of greater discontentments. King Richard, according to his noble nature, was of nothing more desirous, than to haue the war continued vntill they had made a full conquest of Syria and the land of Palestine; and for that cause requested the French King to bind himselfe together with him by solemne oath, there to stay yet three yeeres, for the regaining of those countries. But he in mind long before estranged from King Richard, and in his deep conceit plotting matters neerer home better fitting his purpose, would by no meanes be persuaded so to doe; but still found one occasion or other for to colour his departure. And shortly after (as the French Chronicles report) falling extreamely sicke, hee requested King Richard and the other Christian Princes to come vnto him: vnto whom being come, he in few words declared his purpose of returne, as followeth:

I cannot my Lords longer endure the inclemencie and intemperature of the ayre in this extreame hot season. If my death might profit the Christian religion, or any one of you, or the Christian Commonweale; there should be no distemperature whatsoeuer, that could seperate me from you, or withdraw mee from hence. But more may the life of one absent, serue and profit you, than the death of him present. I must of necessitie depart, yet at my departure I will leaue you fiue hundred men at armes, and ten thousand footmen, the flower and choice of all the forces of France, vnder the conduct of my cosin Odo Duke of Burgundie, vnto whom I will giue pay and entertainment, with a continual supplie of all things for them necessarie.

The French king sweareth to king Richard in his absence not to inuade his territories in France.

This excuse of the French Kings, King Richard could not take in good part: but said, That it was apparant to all men, that hee abandoned the warres in Syria, to returne into France, for no other end or purpose, but the more easily to inuade the prouinces of Guien and Normandie, now disfurnished of their garrisons, and so subiect to his malice. Which point he so vrged, that the French King could haue no leaue with his honor to depart, vntill such time as he had by solemne oath bound himselfe vnto King Richard, not to attempt any thing either by force or fraud against him, or any thing of his, vntil fiftie daies were expired after King Richard his return home: which how well it was by the French king obserued, I leaue it to the report of the histories of that time. And so the French king, not to be intreated longer to stay, leauing behinde him the aforsaid number of men hee had promised, embarking the rest of his armie, and accompanied with three tall ships of the Genowaies his friends, and Ruffin Volta their admirall, departed from Ptolomais to Tyre, the first of August, and two daies after, loosing thence, sailed alongst the sea coast of Asia, and cutting through the Mediterranean, arriued at length in the mouth of the riuer of Tyber, and from thence went to Rome: where after he had visited Pope Celestine, and the famous places of that most renowned citie, he returned again to his fleet, and so by sea arriued in safetie in France; hauing in that great expedition, so honorably by him entertained, performed nothing answerable to that the world looked for.

After the French King, followed Leopold Duke of Austria, with his Germans: and not long after him the Venetians also, with them of Pisa and Genua. Of whose departure Saladin vnderstanding, & that the Christian forces were thereby much empaired, refused either to pay the money or to restore the prisoners, as was promised at the giuing vp of Ptolemais: threatning moreouer to chop off the heads of al such Christian captiues as he had in his power, if the king should shew any extremity vnto the pledges of the city. Neuertheles, shortly after he sent his embassa-

A embassadours with great presents vnto the King, requesting a longer time for the sparing of his pledges; which his request, together with his gifts, the King refused to grant or accept: Whereupon Saladin forthwith caused such Christian captiues as were in his power, to be beheaded: which albeit King Richard vnderstood, yet would hee not preuent the time before agreed vpon for the execution of his prisoners, being the 20 day of August: vpon which day he caused the Turks prisoners, to the number of 2500 (or as the French and Germans write, to the number of 7000) in the sight of Saladines armie to be executed.

The losse of the strong towne of Ptolemais, much empaired the reputation of Saladin, euen among his owne people; as it commonly falleth out, that the euill successe of a great commander in his affaires, altereth the good will, affection, and opinion, especially of the vulgar B sort, which iudge of all things by the euent. And albeit that his losses were great, and such as much daunted him: yet hee thought it best as the case then stood, to make them greater, and with his owne hands (as it were) to ruinate and ouerthrow such towns and cities as he saw he could not keepe, rather than to suffer them whole and vndefaced to fal into the enemies hand. So carried headlong with dispaire, he caused all the townes he had along the sea coast in Syria and Palestine, to be sacked and ruinated, and their wals ouerthrowne; especially such as were of most importance, and like to stand the Christians in stead, namely Porphiria, Cesarea, Ioppa, Ascalon, Gaza, and Elam, with diuers other castles and citadels in the countries thereabouts; most part whereof were againe by King Richard and the Templars fortified and repeopled, although Saladin in the meane time did what hee might to haue letted the same.

C Nothing more hindred the good proceeding of the Christian Princes, in this and other their most honourable expeditions against the Infidels, than the discord among themselues: one still enuying at anothers honor, and euery one iealous of his owne. Great strife and heartburning there had been betweene the two Kings of France and England, during the time they were together in this sacred expedition, to the great hindrance of the same. No lesse contention had there bin betwixt Guy the late King of Ierusalem, and Conrade Marquesse of Montferrat, about the title of that lost kingdome: whereby the whole power of the Christains in Siria was diuided into two factions. Richard King of England, Baldwin Earle of Flanders, Henry Earle of Champaine, the Knights Hospitalers of S. Iohn, the Venetians and Pisans, taking part with Guy: And Philip the French King, Odo Duke of Burgundie, Rodolph Earle of Clare-D mont, the Templars, the Genowayes, the Lantgraue of Thurin, Leopold Duke of Austria, and Robert Countie of Nassau, taking part with Conrade the Marquesse. But Conrade shortly after the taking of Ptolemais beeing slaine, by two of the desperate Assassins, or (as some others say) by two desperate ruffians, (suborned thereunto by the Prince of Torone, in reuenge of the despight done vnto him by the sayd Marquesse, by taking from him Isabel his espoused wife) as hee was walking in his citie of Tyre, and doubting no such treason: King Richard seeing now a fit occasion offered for the vtter extinguishing of that claime, and how to intitle himselfe vnto that kingdome; perswaded the aforesaid Isabel (the widow of the late Marquesse, and in whose right he had laid claime vnto the kingdome) to relinquish that so troublesome a title, and to take to her husband Henry Earle of Champain, his E nephew, vnto whom he gaue the citie of Tyre. Guy the King exclaiming to the contrary, as of a wrong done vnto himselfe. Shortly after he began also to temper with Guy, perswading him to resigne vnto him that little right and interest hee had in the kingdome of Ierusalem, and in lieu thereof to receiue at his hands the kingdome of Cyprus: which his offer the poore king was glad to accept. By which exchange, Guy became King of Cyprus; and Richard, King of Ierusalem; which honourable Title hee afterwards (as some report) vsed in his stile, as did some others his successours the Kings of England after him. So Guy with al his wealth passing ouer into Cyprus, tooke possession of the kingdome, where he long liued not. Neuertheless that pleasant kingdome continued in his family of the Lusignans, by the space of about 283 yeares afterwards: vntill that at length that familie failing in the posthumus sonne of Iames
F the bastard, last King of that Island, it fell into the hands of the Venetians: by whom it was holden as a part of their seigniorie almost an hundred yeares, vntill that it was in our fresh remembrance againe from them taken by Selymus the second, great Emperour of the Turkes, in the yeere 1571, as in the processe of this historie shall in due place (God willing) be delared.

King Richard marcheth with his armie towards Ierusalem.

Now was King Richard, for the increase of his honor, more desirous than before of the citie of

of HIERVSALEM, as the most precious and honorable prize of all that religious warre. And thereupon with all the power of the Christians then at his command, set forward from PTOLEMAIS, and was come on his way as farre as ARSVA, a towne scituated betwixt CESAREA and IOPPE. In the vauward was King Richard himselfe, with the Englishmen: after whom followed Odo, Duke of BVRGVNDIE, with his French: and in the rereward Iaques de Auenes, with the Flemings, Brabanders, and Wallons, who after the death of their Countie Philip at the siege of PTOLOMAIS, had put themselues all vnder his regiment. Saladin with a great army still at hand, and as it were tending vpon them, first with certain embuscadoes charged the rereward, and so afterward came on with his whole power: vpon whom Iaques turning himselfe, with his Flemings, receiued the charge with great assurance, and so long themselues endured the same, vntill the French came in to their succours, and after them the Englishalso. There was fought a notable battell, and great valour shewed both on the one side and on the other, but especially by them of the Turks part; who knew wel the purpose of the Christians for the besieging of HIERVSALEM, and that thereon depended their only hope, and that he that could hold the same, might almost assure himselfe to carrie away the glorie of that war. The French and English in that battell honourably stroue who might shew the greatest valour: neither would the low countrey men vnder Iaques their Generall, seeme to bee any thing behind them. This sharpe conflict began about noone, and continued vntill the going downe of the Sunne. King Richard (as some write) was there wounded with an arrow: and Iaques valiantly there fighting was slaine, hauing sold his life deere, to the great admiration of the Infidels, and dying left the victorie vnto the Christians. It is reported, that in this battell was slain more Turks and Sarasins, than in any one battell within the memorie of man before: of the Christians were not lost any great number, either any man of name, more than the aforesaid Iaques, the valiant Generall of the Flemings.

The next day the Christians remoued to BETHLEM, a towne about the mid way betwixt IOPPE and HIERVSALEM. But Winter now comming fast on, & want of victuals like enough to increase, the king changing his mind for the siege, returned with the greatest part of the armie to ASCALON, which he that winter new fortified, the wals therof being before by Saladin in his dispaire demolished: the Duke of BVRGVNDIE, with his Frenchmen, all that while quietly wintring at TIRE. In the mean time the power of the Christians was that greatly diminished, some one way departing from the campe, and some another. The Italians for the most part, with them of PISA (who in these three yeres wars had striuen with the Venetians for the honor of their seruice) were now returned home, as were the Venetians themselues also. Neuertheless, Winter now past, and the Spring time come, King Richard tooke the field again, and came to BETHLEM: where by the way he met with an exceeding great number of cammels, charged with great store of victuals and munition, sent by Saladin out of EGIPT to HIERVSALEM, all which he took: but purposing to haue gone on to the siege of IERVSALEM he was by the backwardnes of the French glad to change his purpose, and to returne to PTOLOMAIS: for the Frenchmen, persuaded by the Duke their Generall (who well knew the French Kings minde) that if any thing worth remembrance were done, it was to be done by them, and that the glory therof should wholly redound vnto the King of ENGLAND, as there in person present, and to his Englishmen; shewed themselues so vnwilling to the siege, as that therin was nothing done, to the great griefe of that worthy Prince. At which time also news was brought vnto K. Richard, how that Philip the French King (forgetful of his solemne promise made before his departure out of SIRIA) had now inuaded the country of NORMANDIE, & excited Earle Iohn (the kings brother, a man of a hauty and aspiring nature) to take vpon him the kingdome of ENGLAND in his absence: as had before in like case William the yonger brother, serued duke Robert his eldest brother, then absent at his father the Conquerors death, in the first sacred expedition vnder Godfrey of BVLLION. Wherfore K. Rich. beside the premon weale, he might lose his kingdom at home; thought it best to grow to some good end with Saladin, and so to make his return: but the politick and warie Sultan, not ignorant of the discord of the Christians, & that their forces daily decai-d in SIRIA; either of the troubled estate of the kings affaires at home in his kingdom or of his desire to return; would not hearken to any other conditions of peace, but such as might both for the present, weaken the forces of the the Christians in Syria, & discourage others that had a mind to come thither afterward, when they should see that for naught they should trauel to conquer that, which in the end they must of necessitie restore again. The conditions he offered, were, That the Christians should forthwith restore whatsoeuer they had woon in those three yeres wars, Ptolemais only excepted; and from thenceforth for the space of fiue yeres, the Turks should not in any thing molest the Christians, but to suffer them in peace to liue by them: which hard conditions (for that no better could be had) the king was glad to accept, and so concluded a peace. Wherby the labor and trauel of the two great kings, & so many nations with them, were all become frustrate and vain; hauing now to no purpose lost their men, their mony, their time, their hope, their bloud; their long trauell, to gaine that they must now in one houre forgo; nothing more left vnto the poore Christians in Syria, than the cities of Antioch, Tyre, and Ptolemais.

This done, King Richard leauing the affaires of Asia vnto the charge of Henrie Countie of Champagne his nephew, shipping the greatest part of his people, with his wife Berengaria, first for Sicilia, and from thence for England, (where they in safetie at length arriued) followed shortly after with some few himselfe; where by the way, by extremitie of weather he was in the Adriatique driuen to land vpon the coast of Histria: where trauelling with a small retinue homewards in the habit of a Templar, he was discouered & taken prisoner by Leopold duke of Austria, whom he had before disgraced at the winning of Ptolemais, as is before declared: who now glad to haue him in his power, made prise of him, and sold him to Henrie the Emperor, for fortie thousand pounds; by whom he was kept prisoner by the space of a yere & three moneths, and then ransomed for the summe of an hundred and fiftie thousand pounds.

About this time died the great Sultan Saladin, the greatest terrour of the Christians: who mindfull of mans fragilitie, and the vanitie of worldly honours, commanded at the time of his death no solemnitie to be vsed at his buriall, but onely his shirt in manner of an ensigne, made fast vnto the point of a lance, to be carried before his dead bodie as an ensigne, a plaine Priest going before, and crying aloud vnto the people in this sort: Saladin Conqueror of the East, of all the greatnesse and riches he had in his life, carrieth not with him after his death any thing more than his shirt. A sight worthie so great a King, which wanted nothing to his eternall commendation, more than the true knowledge of his saluation in Christ Iesus. Hee raigned about sixteene yeares with great honour, and dying left nine sonnes, which were all murthered by Saphradin their vncle, excepting one called also Saphradin Sultan of Aleppo; who by the fauor and support of his fathers good friends, saued himselfe from the treacherous practises of his vncle. Of this Saphradin the vncle, descended Meledin Sultan of Ægypt, and Coradin Sultan of Damasco and Ierusalem: Saladin his great kingdome being by them now againe rent in pieces.

The death of Saladin in short time bruited abroad, with the discord amongst the Turks and Sarasins about his dominions, put Celestinus (then Pope) in good hope, that the citie of Ierusalem might in that change and hurlie be easily againe recouered, and that kingdome established. But when hee had in vaine dealt to that purpose with the Kings of France and England, (then altogether busied in their wars the one against the other) hee persuaded Henrie the sixt, then Emperor, to take the matter in hand: who (for that he well could not, or else would not himselfe in person vndertake that long expedition) sent Henrie Duke of Saxonie his Lieutenant, with a great armie into Asia: vnto whom were ioyned two Legats, Conradus Archbishop of Mogunsia another of the Electors, and Conradus the Bishop of Herbipolis. At which time also many other great Princes tooke vpon them that holy war; namely Herman Lantgraue of Thurin, Henrie Palatine of Rhine, Henrie Duke of Brabant, Conrade Marquesse of Morauia, Frederick Duke of Austria, and Albertus Hapspurgensis, with some others: vnto whom also ioyned themselues the Bishops of Rheme, Halberstat, and Ratisbone, with diuers other great Prelats. Who hauing passed thorow Hungarie and Thracia, and by the Greeke Emperor Alexius Angelus relieued with all things necessarie, were by the Grecian ships transported vnto Antioch, and so by land came to Tyre, and from thence to Ptolemais, with purpose to haue gone to relieue the Germans besieged in Ioppe; who before their comming were all by treason slaine, and the citie rased: wherefore being come to the ruines thereof, they departed thence to Sidon, which they found also abandoned by the Turks. After that, they tooke Berithus, which citie they fortified, and so went to besiege Torone; which citie when they had brought to the extremitie, as that it must needs (as it was thought) either yeeld or be taken, the Turkes came on so fast to the relieſe thereof, that the Chriſtians were glad to raiſe their ſiege and to bee gone: which they in garriſon at Berithus perceiuing, and ſeeing the enemie to approch them, they abandoned the citie, and ioyning themſelues vnto the reſt of the armie, marched all together to Ioppe, a little before ruinated, which they now againe fortified. But the enemie comming to Berithus, and finding it forſaken, raſed it downe to the ground, and ſo in few moneths 1197. ſpace was Berithus both repaired and raſed, in the yeare 1197.

But whileſt the Chriſtians were repairing the citie of Ioppe, the Turks proud of that they had done at Berithus, came now to diſturbe alſo the fortifying of that place. Of whoſe comming the Chriſtians vnderſtanding, remooued by night about fiue miles from the citie, of purpoſe to draw the Turks vnto a conuenient place for battell. The Turks thinking them to haue been fled for feare, ſent part of their armie to aſſaile the citie; & with the other followed after them diſorderly, as if it had bin after men they had had in chaſe. Vpon whom the Chriſtians turning, had with them at the firſt a ſharpe encounter, but afterwards put them to flight: in which conflict certain thouſands of the Turks fel; of whom the Chriſtians taking the ſpoile, and hauing put the reſt to flight, returned againe vnto the fortifying of the citie. But the ioy of this victorie was by the ſudden death of two of the greateſt Princes in the armie greatly diminiſhed: for the Duke of Saxonie hauing in the battell taken great paines in performing the parts both of a worthie Generall and valiant ſouldier, had ouer-heated himſelfe, and thereupon without regard of his health taking cold, died of a feuer the fourth day after. The Duke of Auſtria mortally wounded in the battell, died alſo the night following.

About this time, or not long after, died Celeſtinus the Pope, author of this expedition, and Henrie alſo the German Emperor: after whoſe death great troubles began to ariſe in Germanie about the chuſing of a new Emperour. Whereof the Biſhop of Mogunſia (then chiefe Commander of the Armie of the Chriſtians in Syria) one of the Electors, and the other German Princes with him, hauing intelligence, could not by any entreatie of the poore Chriſtians (in whoſe quarrell they were come) be perſuaded longer to ſtay, but that needs home they would, and indeed home they went the ſame way that they came. After whoſe departure the Turks tooke Ioppe, hauing one of the ports betrayed vnto them by one of the Citie, at ſuch time as the Germans there in garriſon, after the manner of their countrie, vpon S. Martins day were careleſly making merrie together in their pots: vpon whom ſo ſurcharged with wine, the Turks entring by the port giuen vnto them, put them all with the reſt of the Chriſtians to the ſword, and ſo afterward raſed the citie downe to the ground. Of which victorie they became ſo proud, that they had thought without ſtop to haue driuen the Chriſtians quite out of Syria: but by the comming of Simon Countie of Mont-Fort (a moſt valiant and expert Captain, ſent thither by Philip the French King, with a Regiment of tall ſoldiers, at the inſtance of Innocentius 3, that ſucceeded Celeſtinus in the Papacie) & by ciuil diſcord then raigning amongſt the Turks themſelues for ſoueraigntie, their furie was repreſſed, and a peace betwixt them and the Chriſtians concluded for the ſpace of ten yeares; during which time the Turks promiſed not to moleſt the Chriſtians in Tyre or Ptolemais: which hapned in the yere with the ſucceſſe of their ſecond Kingdome in the leſſer Aſia, vnder the Aladin Kings.

Kingdomes after the manner of other things, haue but their time to flouriſh in, and ſo again decay.

NO Kingdome or Empire vpon earth (were it neuer ſo flouriſhing or great) was euer yet ſo aſſured, but that in the reuolution of time, after the manner of other worldly things, it hath as a ſicke bodie beene ſubiect vnto many ſtrange innouations and changes, and at length come to nothing: ſo fared it now with the Turkiſh Empire, which firſt planted by Tangrolipix in Perſia and the other farre Eaſterne Countreys, increaſed by Axan his ſonne, and ſo by the Turkiſh Sultans their Succeſſours (although their names and doings, as too farre off, bee not vnto vs all knowne) for the ſpace of one hundred and ſeuentie yeares continued, muſt now (I ſay) giue place vnto a greater power, and ſettle it ſelfe elſewhere, the ineuitable deſtinie thereof ſo requiring. It fortuned, that about this time (when in the ſpace of a few yeares ſuch mutations as had not before of long beene ſeene, chanced in diuers great Monarchies and States) that the Tartars, or rather Tattars, inhabiting the large, cold, and bare countries in the North ſide of Aſia (of all others a moſt barbarous, fierce, and needie Nation) ſtirred vp by their owne wants, and the perſuaſion of one Zingis (or as ſome call him, Cangis) holden amongſt them for a great Prophet, and now by them made their Leader, and honoured by the name of Vlu-Chan, that is to ſay, The mightie King, (commonly called the great Cham) flocking together in number like the ſand of the ſea, and conquering firſt their poore neighbours, of condition and qualitie like themſelues, and eaſie enough to be entreated with them to ſeeke their better fortune, like ſwarmes of Graſhoppers ſent out to deuoure the world, paſſed the high Mountaine Caucaſus, part of the Mountaine Taurus, of all the Mountaines in the world the greateſt; which beginning neere vnto the Archipelago, and ending vpon the Orientall Ocean, and running thorow many great and famous kingdomes, diuideth Aſia into two parts: ouer which great Mountaine, one of the moſt aſſured bounders of nature, that had ſo many worlds of yeares ſhut vp this rough and ſauage people, they now paſſing without number, and comming downe as it were into another World, full of ſuch Natures pleaſant delights as neuer were to them before ſeene, bare downe all before them as they went, nothing beeing now able to ſtand in their way. Old Zingis their fortunate Leader dead in this ſo great an expedition, Hoccata his ſonne, eldeſt of his twelue bretheren, a man of great wiſedome and courage, tooke vpon him his fathers place: who ſending part of his great Armie for the ſubduing of the Countreys Weſtward, turned himſelfe with a world of people towards the Eaſt: where hauing ſubdued the Bactrians and Sogdians, with diuers others, he entred into India, and ſubduing that rich countrey on both ſides the riuer Indus, euen to the Eaſt Ocean, there in the countrey of Cathai built the famous citie of Cambalu, in circuit eight and twentie miles about; for pleaſure and plentie of all things neceſſarie for the life of man, of all the cities of Aſia the chiefe: where the great Cham of Tartarie ſtill reſiant, as in his Imperiall Citie, commandeth ouer one of the greateſt and ſtrongeſt Empires of the world. In whoſe Kingdome alſo, in the Prouince of Mangy more towards the Eaſt, he hath another moſt famous Citie called Quinſay, of all the Cities in the world the greateſt, in circuit an hundred miles about, as M. Paulus Venetus writeth, who himſelfe dwelt therein about the yere 1260. It is ſcituate in a lake of freſh water, and hath in it twelue thouſand bridges; of which ſome are of ſuch an heigth, that tall Ships with their ſailes vp may eaſily paſſe vnder them. In this populous citie the great Cham hath for the keeping thereof alwayes thirtie thouſand men in garriſon. The Tartar Kingdome thus planted in Cambalu, Hoccata contenting ting himselfe with the rich pleasures of India, afterward managed his wars by his lieutenants, being for the most part his brethren, or other his nigh kinsemen; of whom he sent out with his armies some Northward, some Westward, and some toward the South: by whom he subdued the Arachosians, Margians, and diuers other great nations; and entring into Persia, subdued the country, with all Parthia, Assiria, Mesopotamia, and Media. At this time in the city Balch or Belch in the countrie of Chorasan in the farthest part of Persia, raigned ouer the Turks one Cursumes, of the Greekes called Corsantes; who finding himselfe farre too weake to stand before the Tartarians, fled with all his people, leauing vnto them both the citie and the countrie which hee and the Turkes his predecessours had euer since the time of Tangrolipix possessed: which citie the Tartars raised, and tooke the Countrey vnto themselues. In this generall flight of the Turks, when as euery man was glad to make what shift he might for himselfe, Cursumes their Sultan died, the last of the kings of the Selzuccian famile that raigned ouer the Turks in Persia: whose sonne Vgnan-Chan taking vpon him the leading of such multitudes of Turks as followed his father, setled vpon the great city of Babilon, now called Bagadat, neere vnto the ruines of the old Babylon: where hauing put to the sword all the inhabitants thereof, he there and in the country thereabout seated himselfe with the Turks his followers: but long he had not there rested, but that the Tartars hearing thereof, pursued him, tooke him prisoner, and expulsed thence all his people. There was at the same time also another kingdome of the Turks at Nachan a citie in Persia, giuing name vnto the countrey wherein it stood, not farre from Chorasan: wherein then raigned one Solyman, of the Oguzian familie, as had diuers other of his progenitours before him; who terrified with this dreadfull storme so suddenly risen out of the North, and warned by the sudden fal of the Selzuccian Sultan & his kingdom, of far greater fame and power than himselfe or his, fled also with such his subiects as would follow him, into the lesser Asia. But of him and his proceedings more shall bee said hereafter in the rising of the victorious Othoman familie, as descended from him. After this, the Tartars together with their good fortune still extending the bounds of their Empire, conquered Armenia the greater, with the countries of Colchis and Iberia: so that now their Empire was become of all others the greatest and most flourishing. This great Conquerour the Tartar, had in his proud conceit purposed to haue subdued all Asia, and to haue made the sea the only bounder of his Empire: but ouercome with the delicacies of India, hauing diuided amongst his people those great prouinces and fruitfull countries, with the rich cities & pleasant fields, he so rested, embracing the manners and superstition of the people hee had ouercome. Long it were, and far from our purpose, to recount al the famous victories and conquests of this bare Northerne people: sufficeth it to the Historie we haue in hand, that the Turks were by them then driuen out of Persia, with the countries thereabouts, and their Togran kingdome (as they call it) first founded by Tangrolipix, there extinguished, about the yere of our Lord 1202. The Turks thus driuen out of Persia, and their kingdome ouerthrown, retired themselues into the lesser Asia, possessed by the Turks their countrey men, long before brought thither by Cutlu-Muses and his sonnes, (as is before declared) and by them euer since in some part, though with diuers fortune holden. Where these Turks now arriued out of Persia vnder the leading of Aladin the sonne of Kei Husren, descended also of the Selzuccian familie in Persia, and taking the opportunitie offered them by the mortall discord of the Latines with the Greekes, and the Greekes among themselues, seised vpon Cilicia with the countries thereabouts, and there first at Sebastia, and afterward at Iconium, erected their new Kingdome; which of this Aladin is by the Turks called the Kingdome of the Aladin Kings, although their names were not all so.

The beginning of the Aladinian kingdome in the lesser Asia, at Sebastia and Iconium.

Now about this time, and within the course of some few yeares after, such great & strange mutations happened in the Constantinopolitane Empire, as had not therein at any time before bin seen: whereby the whole estate of that great Empire, which sometime commanded ouer a great part of the world, was almost vtterly subuerted, and a fit opportunitie giuen vnto the Turks & infidels for the sure setling of themselues, and establishing of their kingdoms both in Syria and the lesser Asia: which briefly to run thorow shall not be from our purpose; their affaires prospering by these troubles, and their proud & stately empire that now braueth all the rest of the world, being raised out of the ruines of that Christian Empire; & at this present triumphing euen in the same Imperial citie wherein these so great innouations hapned through the

A the working of ambitious heads, to the lamentable ruine and destruction of a great part of the Christian Commonweale.

Alexius the vsurper, but now Emperor, not contented (as is before declared) traiterously to haue depriued Isaac his elder brother of his empire and sight together, sought also after the life of the yong Prince Alexius his brothers son, & heire apparant of the empire; who seeing the villanie committed in the person of his father, saued himself by flight from the fury of his vncle, and so accompanied with certaine great Lords of the Greeks his fathers friends, fled to craue aid of the Christian Princes of the West, whō the Grecians commonly cal the Latines. And first he tooke his way to Philip the German Emperour, who had married Irene his sister, the Emperor Isaacks daughter, by whom he was most honorably receiued & entertained. This

B great ladie not a little moued with the miserie of her father, and the flight of her brother, ceased not most instantly to solicite the Emperor her husband, not to leaue vnreuenged so great a villanie, by the example thereof dangerous vnto himselfe and others of like maiestie & state. She declared vnto him, what an execrable indignitie it was, to see her father the Emperor vnworthily imprisoned, depriued of his empire & sight, & of the societie of men, by his brother that had by him receiued & recouered his life, his light, & his liberty: and to see the heire apparant of the Empire banished by the wickednes of his vncle, to wander vp and down here and there like a beggar: a great part of which disgrace, as shee said, redounded vnto her selfe the daughter of Isaac, and sister to the young wandring Prince, and to himselfe also, the son in law vnto the vnfortunate Emperor her father. Moreouer she said, that the murderer Alexius durst

C neuer haue been so hardie as to commit so great and detestable a villanie, if he had not lightly regarded & contemned the maiestie of the said Philip; whom if he had had in any reuerence or honor, or at all feared, he durst not haue attempted so villanous an act. This Greek lady, moued with iust griefe, with these & such like complaints so preuailed with her husband, that he promised her to be in some part thereof reuenged; which hee could not for the present perform, letted by the wars he then had with Otho his competitor of the empire. At the same time it fortuned, that great preparations were making in France and Italy, and diuers other places of Christendome, for an expedition to be made against the Turks into the Holy land. The chief men wherein were Theobald Countie of Champagne, (a man of great fame, & Generall of the Christian armie) Boniface Marquesse of Mont-Ferrat, Baldwin Earle of Flanders and Henault,

D & Henry his brother Earle of S. Paul, Henry Duke of Louain, Gualter Earle of Breame, with diuers other noble gentlemen, which to name were tedious: vnto whom resorted also many valiant and deuout Christians out of diuers parts of Christendome, readie to haue spent their liues in that so religious a war: so that now the number of them was great, and the army right populous. But beeing thus assembled together, they thought it not best to take their way to Constantinople, thorow Hungarie & Thrace, and so to passe ouer into Bythinia, for that the Greekes had stil in all former times shewed great vncourtesie vnto the Latines, in passing with their armies that way: and therefore they thought it much better now by the way of Italie to take their journey by sea into the Holy land; and for their transportation, especially to vse the helpe of the Venetians, whom they found much the easier to be intreated; for that by the

B means of so great an army, they were in hope to scoure the Adriaticke (then much infested by the Dalmatians) as also to recouer Iadera, with some other cities vpon the coast of Sclauonia, before reuolted from their state to the Hungarians, as indeed they afterward did. But by the way as this army was marching out of France, & come into Piemont, the noble Countie of Champagne General thereof, there fell sicke & died, to the exceeding griefe & sorrow of the whole army: in whose stead, the Marques of Mont-Ferrat, a man of great nobilitie, & well acquainted with the wars of the East, was chosen General. This great army, transported by the Venetians into Sclauonia, tooke Iadera, with diuers other port townes along the sea coast, and hauing there done what the Venetians most desired, was about againe to haue bin imbarkt for Syria, & so into the Holy land. But the yong prince Alexius in the mean time had by himselfe

F & the noble Grecians (fled with him for feare of the tyrant) so wrought the matter with the Latin Princes of the West, especially with Innocentius tertius the Pope, with Philip the emperor his brother in law, & Philip the French king, that they pitying his estate, & induced also with some other considerations more proper to themselues, tooke him as it were into their protection, commending by letters & messengers for that purpose sent vnto the army, (which they might might command) the defence both of himselfe and his cause: who with the commendation of three so great Princes, comming to the armie yet lying at Iadera (expecting but a faire wind to haue passed into Syria) was there of them al most honorably receiued, as the son of an Emperor, and as became one to them so highly commended. And he himself also, as one knowing his good, was not wanting vnto himselfe, but recommended his person to their protection, as a poore exiled Prince in distresse; yet was hee of a liuely spirit, gratious in speech, beautifull to behold, and very young, and withall fully instructed by the noble Grecians that were with him, in all things that might serue to further his purpose. And forasmuch as this great Armie consisted of diuers nations, especially of the French, Italians, & Venetians, not all to be by one mean moued; he fitted euery one with such motiues as hee thought might best preuaile with them: Vnto the French hee promised to pay the great sums of money they had borrowed of the Venetians for the furnishing of themselues in this war: Vnto the Venetians he promised recompence for all the iniuries they had sustained by the late Constantinopolitan Emperors, especially by the Emperor Emanuel (who for that they refused to aid him in his warres against William king of Sicilie, did in one day confiscat al the goods of the Venetian merchants within his empire, of a great value; and afterwards contrary to the law of nations, shamefully entreated their embassadors sent vnto him, amongst whom was Henry Dandulus, now by fortune generall for the Venetians in the army: who moued as wel with the wrong in particular done vnto himselfe, as with the common, desired to be reuenged both of the one & the other; which although he could not haue of Emanuel himselfe, being long before dead, yet was he still desirous to haue it of some one of the Greeke Emperors, whosoeuer he were:) Vnto the Pope and the Italians, both he & the noblemen with him, had before promised, that the Greek Church should euer acknowledge the supremacie of the Church of Rome, and from thenceforth submit it selfe thereunto, as vnto the soueraign iudge of al the Christian Churches: which caused the Pope Innocentius, by letters, by legats, by embassadors, and by all other means possible, to further the cause of the yong Prince Alexius, (so combined with his own; alledging the diuersitie of opinions in matters of religion, betwixt the Greeks and the Latines, to haue beene the chiefe cause that the Mahometans had not beene long agoe by their vnited forces subdued, or vtterly rooted out. In briefe, the young Prince spared not to promise most bountifull rewards in generall, to all that should take his part against his vncle the vsurping Emperor.

By this means, the deuout war taken in hand for the reliefe of the poore Christians in Siria, was laid aside, & the same forces that should haue bin therein imployd, now conuerted against the Greeke empire, to the great weakning of that side of the Christian commonweale, and aduantage of the common enemie; who might then easily haue beene oppressed, had hee with the vnited forces of the Christians bin on this side charged home, as he was on the farther by the Tartars. The Grecian war thus resolued vpon, it seemed best vnto the great Commanders of the armie, to march directly to Constantinople, as to the head of the Grecian state, & place where the tyrant whom they sought after was resiant. In the meane time it was by them giuen out thorow all the Greeke cities which the Emperour had strongly manned and fortified for the staying of their passage, that their purpose was not to make war against the Grecians their friends, but only to restore their lawfull Emperour vnto his former state and honor: And that forasmuch as euery city and town in antient Greece had appointed rewards, and almost diuine honours vnto such as had deliuered them from tyrants, they should now more fauourably receiue & intreat them that came to restore vnto euerie citie, and to euery man in generall, their former libertie and honor. And so vpon the resolution for Constantinople imbarking their armie, and passing thorow the Ionian sea into the Ægeum, and so without let thorow the straits of Helespontus into Propontis, and entring the straits of Bosphorus Thracius, which diuide Europe from Asia, they came to an anker euen in the face of the citie. In this fleet were two hundred and fortie saile of tall ships, sixtie gallies, seuentie ships for burthen, and one hundred and twentie saile of Victuallers: which all together made a most braue shew, couering that strait in such sort, as that it seemed rather a wood than a part of the sea. Thus for a space they lay facing the city, attending if happily vpon the comming and sight of so great a fleet, and the report of so puissant an armie as the yong Prince Alexius had brought with him, any tumult or sedition might arise in the Citie. But the warie Tyrant had so well prouided therefore before hand, that the Citizens, although they in heart fauoured the young Prince, and wished him him well, yet durst they not once moue or stirre in his quarrell. Whilest the fleet thus lay; embassadors came from the Isle of Creet, in two great gallies, with three banks of oars, yeelding vnto the yong prince that goodly island, with all the towns and cities therein: which he forthwith gaue vnto the Marquesse of Mont-Ferrat, Generall of the armie, thereby to encourage the other great commanders of the armie to doe the vttermost of their deuoire, in hope of recompence and rewards answerable to their deserts and valour.

Before the arriuall of this fleet, Alexius the Emperour had with a great chaine made fast the entrance of the hauen betwixt Constantinople and Pera, and appointed twentie great gallies wel manned for the keeping therof: but a great gale of wind arising, the General sent out the greatest and strongest ship in the fleet (of her greatnes and swiftnes called the Eagle) which with all her sailes vp, carried with a full gale of wind, by maine force brake the chaine, and made a way for the rest of the fleet to enter; which the Greekes in the gallies seeing, for feare fled, leauing the gallies for a spoile vnto the Venetians, by whom they were all taken, but not a man found in them. The hauen thus gained, Theodorus Lascaris the Emperours son in law, was presently ready vpon the shore with a select companie of the brauest gallants of the city and of the court, to haue hindered the Latines from landing; who running their ships a ground, landed with such cheerfulnes and courage, and with such hast, that in one moment you might haue seene them leape out of their ships, take land, enter into the battell, and lay about them like mad men. This hot skirmish endured a great while, for that they were only footmen that sustained this brunt, for the horses could not so soone be landed, and the Greeks were brauely mounted. All this great fight the Constantinopolitanes beheld, with doubtfull hearts, expecting what should bee the euent thereof. There were in the citie six thousand of the flower of Greece, which brauely sallying out, made the battel much more doubtfull; yet such was the valour and resolution of the Latines, that in fine the Greekes discomfited, were glad to retire themselues againe into the citie, but with what losse, was not certainly knowne: easie it were to guesse, that it was right great, for that the old tyrant Alexius discouraged therewith, and doubtful of his owne estate, with Theodorus Lascaris his son in law, and some few others of his trustie friends (hard to be found in so dangerous a case) the next night following secretly fled out of the citie, carrying away with him a wonderfull masse of treasure (which he against all such euents had caused to bee secretly hidden by his daughter Irene, in a monasterie of Nuns within the citie, whereof she was the abbesse) and so saued himselfe.

The Latines by force enter the hauen of Constantinople.

A hot skirmish betwixt the Greekes & the Latines at their landing.

The flight of the tyrant once bruted, the next morning the Constantinopolitans taking the old Emperor Isaac out of prison, saluted him againe for their Emperor, reioysing greatly for his deliuerance and the safegard of his life: and after that opened the gates of the citie to the Latines, calling and saluting them by the names of the reuengers and sauiours of the libertie of the Greekes, as also of the life and maiestie of their Emperor: they requested them that they might see and salute Alexius their young Prince, whom they had so long desired: and so was the citie of Constantinople, by the submission of the citizens, for that time saued from saccage and spoile. The old Emperor thus deliuered, and together with his son Alexius again placed in the imperiall seat, gaue the most hearty thanks that possibly he could vnto the Latine Princes, for that by their bounty, charity, and valour, the Greek empire had bin deliuered out of a long and miserable seruitude: and for his own particular, that he had receiued of them so great good, that albeit his sight could not be restored to him againe, neuertheless he acknowledged his life, his liberty, his empire, his countrey, his son, to haue bin vnto him by them restored, and he likewise to them, for which their so great deserts he could not (as he said) render them condigne thanks, or deuise rewards or honors answerable to their demerits and valour; and that therefore he did ratifie and confirme whatsoeuer his son had before promised vnto them for his deliuerance: and not only that, but further promised, That if they were not therwith contented, he would of his owne bountie giue them better contentment, not meaning they should goe discontented, that had saued his life, and otherwise so highly pleasured him. Hereupon this good old Emperor began to consult with his friends about the means whereby he might satisfie and content the Latines in such things as the yong prince his son had vnto them promised. And to the intent that the citizens of Constantinople might the more willingly doe that hee was to command them, and the more cheerefully pay such impositions as he was to lay vpon them, he intreated all the Latines to retire themselues out of the citie into their campe or about their ſhips, which they accordingly did. But the impoſition beeing ſet G downe, and what euery man was to pay, ſeemed vnto the Greeks (as men of long accuſtomed to receiue tribute of others, and not to pay tribute to others) a matter moſt heauie and intollerable. In this very inſtant that this exaction was required, died the old Emperour Iſaac, who hauing of long beene kept in a darke and ſtinking priſon in continuall feare of death, and now deliuered and reſtored to his Empire, could not indure ſo ſudden and vnexpected a change, both of the aire and of his manner of liuing, but ſo ſuddenly died.

At this exaction impoſed for the contentment of the Latines, the light Conſtantinopolitans grieuouſly murmured and exclaimed, ſaying, That it was a villanous thing to ſee the Greeke empire ingaged and bound (by a yong boy) vnto a couetous and proud nation, and ſo to be ſpoyled and bare of coyne: That the great and rich Iſland of Crete lying in the midſt of H the ſea, was by him giuen as a gift vnto the Latines: That the citie of Conſtantinople and the Greeke church, had by him beene enforced and conſtrained to yeeld vnto the See of Rome, to receiue the opinions of the Latine church, to ſubmit it ſelfe vnto the obeyſance of old Rome, from whence it had once happily departed euer ſince the time that the empire was by Conſtantine the Great tranſlated thence to them. Thus euery one ſaid for himſelfe in particular: thus all men ſaid in generall. And therof the noble men in their aſſemblies, and the vulgar people in their meetings, grieuouſly complained: whereupon a great ſedition and tumult was raiſed in the city. Some preſently tooke vp armes, and the common people all enraged ran furiouſly diſordered vnto the palace, with a purpoſe to haue committed ſome great outrage vpon the perſon of the yong emperor Alexius: who in that ſo ſudden an inſurrection, as might I well haue troubled a right conſtant man, without longer ſtay reſolued vpon a moſt wholſome and neceſſarie point for the appeaſing of the peoples furie; vnto whom (aſſembled in a wonderfull multitude) he ſhewed himſelfe from aboue in his palace, promiſing them to remain in their power, and not from thence forth to doe any thing without their aduice and liking, but wholy to depend vpon them: with which good words the people held themſelues well content, and ſo was the tumult for that time appeaſed. But forthwith the young emperor conſidering the iniury done vnto him, began with the deſire of reuenge and to change his purpoſe. He could not together ſatisfie the citizens and the Latines: for if he would keepe his promiſe with the Latines, he muſt of neceſſitie offend his owne people; neither was there any Alexis ſeeketh to bring the Latines againe into the citie. means to be found to ſatisfie both the one and the other. But thinking himſelfe more bound K to keep his promiſe with the Latines, whoſe forces he knew not how to withſtand, he ſent ſecretly to requeſt the Marques of Mont-Ferrat, General of the armie, to ſend him about midnight certaine companies of ſoldiers vnto the citie, aſſuring him to receiue them in by a gate neere vnto the palace, which ſhould bee opened vnto them by certaine of his truſtie ſeruants there left for that purpoſe. Of this plot Alexius Ducas (of his bittle browes ſurnamed Murzuſle, whom of a baſe fellow the Emperor Iſaac had promoted vnto the greateſt honors of the court) was not ignorant, who being a man of an aſpiring mind, and in thoſe troubleſome times hauing long thirſted after the Empire, tooke now this occaſion to worke vpon.

The Conſtantinopolitans again in an vprore. The night following, he by his agents, men inſtructed for the purpoſe, raiſed a tumult in the citie, not inferiour vnto that which had hapned the day before: and at the ſame inſtant, as if he L had had nothing to do in the matter, came ſuddenly to the yong Emperor in the dead time of the night (which he might at all times do, by reaſon of the great confidence the Emperor had in him) and with a ſad countenance told him, That the people were vp again in an vprore, and eſpecially they of his guard, & that they were comming toward him to do him ſome violence for the loue he bare vnto the Latines. With which vnexpected news the yong Emperor terrified, demanded of him as of his moſt faithfull counſellor, What were beſt in that caſe for him to do? Who preſently embracing him in his night gown, led him out by a ſecret doore into a tent he had of his owne in the court, as if he would there haue kept him ſafe: but far was that from his traiterous thoughts; who departing from him, as if he had gone to appeaſe the tumult, had before taken order, that he ſhould preſently after his departure, be caſt into bonds, M & ſo be clapt vp into a cloſe ſtinking priſon: which done, the falſe traitor openly ſhewing himſelfe made an oration to the people, wherin he ſhewed himſelf to haue great compaſſion of the Greek empire, & of the Greeks his countrymen themſelues, ſpecially in that they were gouerned by a youth vnfit for the gouerment, who ſuffred himſelf to be miſſ-led according to the pleaſure

A pleaſure of the Latines. And that it was high time for the citie of Conſtantinople, the ſeat of the Greeke empire, to looke about it, and to haue an eye vnto it ſelfe, ſith it was betraied and ſold by them which ought to preſerue and keepe the ſame: that they had now need of a man that loued his country and countrymen, before that which yet remained of the Græcian name were vtterly extinguiſhed by the Latines.

This his ſpeech, fitted of purpoſe vnto the humour of the ſeditious, was receiued with the great outcrie and applauſe of the windie headed people. Some cried out, that hee, and none but hee, was to bee made chiefe of the common weale that was by them to bee eſtabliſhed: otherſome cried as loud to haue him made generall of the armies and forces of the ſtate: but the greateſt crie was to haue him choſen and created Emperour; whereunto the reſt giuing B place, he was by the generall conſent of the tumultuous people, without longer ſtay, choſen and proclaimed Emperour.

Murzuſle attempteth to burne the Venetian fleet. Alexius the traitour, by no lawfull election or rightfull ſucceſſion, but only by the fury of the tumultuous people, thus created Emperour; was of nothing more carefull than how to breake the forces of the Latines, of whom only he now ſtood in dread. And therfore to begin withall, hee firſt attempted by certaine gallies filled with pitch, flax, brimſtone, and ſuch like matter apt to take fire, to haue burnt the Venetian fleet: which gallies ſo ſet on fire & carried with a faire gale of wind among the fleet, had bin like enough to haue done great harm, had it not by the warineſſe of the Venetians bin preuented: who being good ſea men, and not vnacquainted with ſuch deuiſes, eaſily & without danger auoided the ſame, by keeping themſelues C aloofe one from another in the ſea. This finenes ſorting to no purpoſe, he to color the matter ſent certaine meſſengers to the Generall, and other commanders of the army, to giue them to vnderſtand that that which was done for the firing of the fleet, had bin done without his priuity, by the malice of the tumultuous people, and that for his part he would be glad of their fauor and friendſhip, aſſuring them likewiſe of his, and promiſing them to aid them both with men and mony, and whatſoeuer els they ſhould haue need of in their wars againſt the infidels. Wherunto an anſwer was giuen by Dandulus the Venetian generall, that he would beleeue it; when Alexis the ſon of the Emperor Iſaac, whom the Latines had placed in the empire, ſhould aſſure them thereof, and intreat for the people, vpon whom the fault of that outrage was laid: which anſwer the more moued the traiterous tyrant, to rid himſelfe cleane of the feare of the D yong prince, by taking him out of the way; to the intent to hinder the people of the hope and great deſire they had to grow to ſome peace with the Latins, by taking him out of priſon, and receiuing him againe for their Emperor. For the people (by nature mutable, and not deſirous of the good of themſelues, but according to the occurrents preſent, without any great regard of that they had already done, or ought to haue done) began now to repent themſelues of that they had done againſt the yong Emperor Alexis in the fauor of the tirant, and commonly ſaid; That they muſt find ſome meanes, whatſoeuer it were, to remedie their fault together with their troubles. Wherefore Murzuſle fearing the ſudden mutation of the people, with his own hands moſt villanouſly ſtrangled the young Prince Alexis in priſon, hauing as yet not raigned much aboue ſix moneths, and immediatly after cauſed it to be bruited abroad, That the ſaid E young prince deſpairing of his eſtate, had as a man deſperat hanged himſelfe

Murzuſle encouageth his ſouldiers. The tyrant in vain hauing thus attempted the burning of the fleet, & ſtill fearing the reuenging ſword of the Latines, reſolued now by plain force to meet them in the field, and there to dare them battel. So hauing made ready and armed the whole ſtrength of the imperiall citie, he with cheereſull ſpeech encouraged his ſoldiers, requeſting them valiantly to maintain and defend their country of Greece, the monuments of their fathers, the glorie of their anceſtors, their preſent honor, and the future hope of their poſteritie: that hauing before their eyes the wals of their citie, within which they were borne, nouriſhed, and brought vp in hope of great matters, they would haue pitie and compaſſion of their temples, their wiues, their children, and in no caſe to ſuffer them to fall again into ſo miſerable & wretched a ſeruitude, but rather F to die a thouſand deaths. And the more to grace this his enterpriſe taken in hand for the defence of his country (as he would haue the world to beleeue it) with the colour of a ſuperſtitious deuotion alſo, he cauſed the Prieſts in their eccleſiaſtick attire and ornaments, to march forth in the armie, with an enſigne, hauing in it diſplayed the picture of the virgin Marie. So couragiouſly marching forward, hee firſt charged that quarter of the campe where Baldwin the the Countie of Flanders lay, where at the firſt was fought a right fierce and doubtfull battell. But afterward the alarum running throughout all the campe of the Latines, and new ſupplies comming in on euery ſide, the Greeks were put to the worſe, and inforced againe to retire into the city, hauing loſt a great number of men, together with their ſuperſtitious enſigne. It was a wonderfull thing to ſee, with what rare agreement the Latines, being of diuers nations, continued this expedition vndertaken againſt the Greekes. Seuentie two daies was this City of Conſtantinople ſtraightly beſieged by the Latines both by ſea and land, without giuing any time of reſt or repoſe day or night to the beſieged, freſh men comming ſtill on to the aſſault, as the other fell off, and in ſuch ſort troubled the Greekes in the citie, that they knew not well what to do or which way to turne themſelues. The Venetians vnto whom was committed the charge to aſſault that ſide of the citie which was toward the hauen, vpon two great gallies made faſt together, built a ſtrong tower of wood, higher than the wals and rampiars of the town, out of which they both with ſhot and fireworks much troubled the defendants, wherwith they in the time of the aſſault approaching the wal, by their fine deuices fired that ſide of the citie: by the rage whereof, a great number of houſes were burnt, with many other ſtately buildings and ancient monuments of that famous citie: and had at that preſent gained a great towerneere vnto the port, deſtitute of defenders, had not the tyrant himſelfe in good time come with new ſupplies to the reſcue thereof. In like manner, the French, with the reſt, aſſayled the other ſide of the citie by land, where they were to fight not againſt the defendants only, but againſt deep ditches, high and ſtrong wals, and bulwarks alſo: neuerrheleſſe, ſuch was the valour and furie of the Latines, with the deſire of victorie, as that they were not with any difficulties to bee diſmaied; but preſſing ſtill on, by a thouſand dangers, at length after a moſt ſharpe aſſault, they gained one of the greateſt baſtilions on that ſide of the city, called the Angels tower, and ſo by plain force opened a way both for themſelues and the reſt into the city. Whereof Alexius vnderſtanding, and ſtrucke with preſent deſpaire both of his ſtate and life, the night now comming on, fled with Euphroſina the Emperour Alexius his wife, and Eudocia her daughter, whom he had married when he had raigned about a moneth and ſixteene daies.

Conſtantinople hardly beſieged.

Conſtantinople ſet on fire.

The tyrant, author of all this miſchiefe, and of the calamities enſuing, thus fled, and the Latins furiouſly entring; the Prieſts and religious men in their ſurplices, and other eccleſiaſtick ornaments with their croſſes and banners (as in ſolemne proceſſion) met the Latins, and falling downe at the ſoldiers feet, with flouds of teares aboundantly running down their heauy countenances, beſought them, but ſpecially the captains and commanders, to remember the condition of wordly things, and contenting themſelues with the victory, the glorie, the honour, the empire, the immortality of their name, to abſtain from ſlaughter, from burning, from ſpoiling & ranſacking of ſo beautifull a city: and that ſeeing they were themſelues men, they would alſo haue pitie of men: and being themſelues captains and ſoldiers, they ſhould alſo haue compaſſion vpon captains and ſouldiers; who although they were not ſo valiant and fortunate as they were, yet neuertheles were both captains and ſouldiers: and that they would keepe and preſerue their city, whereof (if they ruinated it not) they might haue much more pleaſure and commodity, than if they ſhould deſtroy the ſame, which as it had bin the principall ſeat of the Greek empire, ſo might it now be of the Latines: That ſeeing they had thereof a carefull regard, as then belonging to another man, they ought now vpon better reaſon to haue more care therof, being their own: That the authors of all thoſe troubles and miſchiefes, Alexius the elder, and Murzuffle, had already receiued a reward anſwerable to their follies, in that they were driuen into exile: That they would haue pity and compaſſion of an innocent and vnfortunate multitude of poore people, oppreſſed and grieuouſly tormented with the often tyrannies of their murderous lords and gouernors: That in ſo doing, God the Lord of hoſts, the giuer and guider of battels, the God of mercy, would therfore reward them: To conclude, they humbly beſought them to pardon their citizens, to put on the hearts of gracious & merciful lords and fathers, not of enemies and rough maſters; of forgiuers, not of reuengers; and to vnderſtand by their tears, their miſerable eſtate and woes paſſed. With this ſo humble a ſubmiſſion and complaint of the religious, ſome of the better ſort were happily moued: but with the common ſoldiers, breathing nothing but victory, with their weapons in their hands, & the ſpoile of an empire in their power, what auailed praiers or teares? Euery man fel to the ſpoile, and in ſo great choice & liberty of al things, fitted his own diſordred appetite, without reſpect of the wrong or

A or iniurie done to others: onely from the effuſion of innocent bloud they abſtained; they whoſe liues they ſought after, being already fled, together with the tyrant. Other iniuries and outrages (ſo great, as that greater none could be) were in euery place ſo rife, that euery ſtreet, euery lane, euery corner of the citie was filled with mourning and heauineſſe. There might a man haue ſeene noble men earſt of great honor, and reuerend for their hoarie haires, with other citizens of great wealth, thruſt out of all they had, walking vp and downe the citie weeping and wringing their hands, as men forlorn, knowing not where to ſhroud their heads. Neither ſtaied the greedie rage of the inſolent ſoldiers within the wals of mens priuate houſes, but brake out into the ſtately palaces, temples, and churches of the Greekes alſo, where al was good prize, and nothing dedicated to the ſeruice of God, left vnpolluted and defaced, no B place vnſought, no corner vnrifled: right lamentable and almoſt incredible it were to report all the miſeries of that time. Some of the Greeke Hiſtoriographers, men of great marke and place, and themſelues eye-witneſſes and partakers of thoſe euils, haue by their writings complained to all poſteritie, of the inſolencie of the Latines at the winning of the citie, to their eternall diſhonor: but that diſordered ſouldiers in all ages in the libertie of their inſolent victorie, haue done ſuch outrages, as honeſt minds abhorre to think vpon. Thus Conſtantinople the moſt famous citie of the Eaſt, the ſeat and glory of the Greeke empire, by the miſerable ambition and diſſention of the Greekes for ſoueraignty, fell into the hands of the Latines, the twelfth of Aprill, in the yeare 1204, or after the account of others, 1200.

Conſtantinople thus taken, and the tyrants put to flight, the Princes and great commanders C of the armie held a counſell, to conſider what were beſt to bee done concerning the citie and the new gained empire: for after ſo great a victorie, they thought it not good to raſe ſo ancient and important a citie, ſeated as it were a watch-tower vpon the theatre of the world, ouerlooking both Aſia and Europe from the one to the other, as an eye of the vniuerſall, and ſo commodiouſly planted, as was no other city of the world, for the keeping vnder of the enemies of the Chriſtian Religion: but that it were much better to place there a Latin gouernor, to eſtabliſh there the Latine lawes and cuſtomes, and to vnite the Greeke church as a member vnto the Church of Rome. In which conſultation, ſome were of opinion, not to haue any moe Emperours in Chriſtendome but one, and therefore to make choice of Philip the Germane Emperour, authour of this warre, whoſe wife Irene was the onely daughter and heire of D the late Emperour Iſaac Angelus, vnto whom by all right the inheritance of her fathers empire belonged. But the greater part, conſidering that the troubled affairs of Greece, in ſo great a change and newneſſe of the empire, had need of the perſonall preſence of a Prince, thought it better to make choice of one among themſelues, who there ſtill reſiant in that place, might at all times giue aid vnto the Latines in their ſacred warres, taken in hand againſt the infidels: which opinion as the better, was approued of them all. The chiefe men in this election of the new Emperour, were Baldwin Countie of Flaunders and Hainault, Henrie his brother, Lewis Countie of Bloys, Symon de Montfort, Iohn de Dammartin, Gualter de Brienne, Hugh Countie of S. Paul, Iohn Countie of Brenne, Boniface Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, Stephen Countie of Perch, and fiue gentlemen of Venice: vnto whome alſo were ioyned two Bi-E ſhops of Syria, the one of Bethlem, the other of Ptolemais, who had oftentimes come to the campe of the Latines, to ſtirre them vp for the taking in hand the ſacred warre in Syria; with two Biſhops of France alſo, namely of Soiſſon and Troy in Champagne, and the Abbot of Lemely. Theſe great Lords and Prelates aſſembled into the Church of the holy Apoſtles, after they had there with great deuotion craued of God to inſpire them with his ſpirit for the choice of a good and iuſt Prince fit for ſo great a charge; with one conſent made choice of Baldwin Countie of Flaunders and Haynault, for Emperour of Greece: a braue and valiant Prince, about two and thirtie yeares old, who was afterward the ſixteenth day of May in the yeare 1204 (or after the computation of others, in the yeare 1205) in the great Temple of S. Sophia ſolemnly crowned by Thomas Mauroceus a Venetian, firſt Patriarch F of the Latines in Conſtantinople. From which time the Greeke Church in Conſtantinople began to receiue the rites and ceremonies of the Latines, and to acknowledge the ſupremacie of the Church of Rome.

The Greeke empire diuided amongſt the Latines.

It was not long after that Conſtantinople was thus taken by the Latines, but that they diuiding their forces without any reſiſtance, tooke in the moſt part of the great countries and

and prouinces on Europe side, belonging to the Greeke empire in the time of Isaac Angelus the late Emperour: the fortune of the whole empire, as it were following the fortune of the imperiall citie. Which large countries so gained from the Greeks, the Latins diuided amongst themselues, as good prize taken from their enemies. Vnto Baldwin the emperor and his successors in the empire, was assigned the imperiall Citie of Constantinople, and the countrey of Thracia, with a limited soueraigntie ouer all the rest of the prouinces by the Latines alreadie or afterwards to be gained. Vnto the Venetians in this diuision of the empire, was allotted for their share all the rich Islands of the Ægeum, and Ionian, with the famous Island of Candie also; which although it were before by the youug Emperour Alexis in the beginning of these warres, giuen vnto the Marquesse of Mont-Ferrat, yet in this diuision of the empire, it was taken from him (not without his good liking) and giuen to the Venetians, as for them more fit: in stead and lieu whereof, the Marquesse had the citie of Thessalonica with all the kingdome of Thessalie, and a great part of Peloponesus assigned vnto him, with the Royall title of a King. Of the aforesaid Islands (in number many and exceeding rich) the Venetians in the name of the state, fortified some few of the greatest with conuenient garrisons, the rest they left to bee possessed and defended by the better sort of the citizens at their priuate cost and charges; who according to their abilitie, tooke into their possession, some one Island, some another, and some two or three, one, as they were able to set out their gallies, one, two, or moe, for the keeping of the same: ouer all which, the seigniorie neuertheless had a generall care, still keeping a fleet with one of their Admirals at sea: by whom they not onely repressed the Genoa pirats then busie in those seas, but also tooke in certaine strong townes in the maine vpon the coast of Peloponesus, namely Modon and Corone; all which they of long time after held as a part of their seigniorie. Some other particular places, yet parts also of the empire, were giuen vnto particular men: as the dukedom of Athens vnto one Geffrey of Troy in Champaigne, a French man, a valiant Captaine, whom they also made Prince of Achaia: Another Dukedome was also giuen to the Countie of Bloys; as were diuers other countries and townes also vnto other more priuate men: who neuertheless were bound to hold the same of the Emperor, as of their Lord, and to pay him yerely a fourth part of the reuenue arising thereof, towards the maintenance of his state. Yea the Greekes themselues in this shipwracke of their state and empire, although they disdained nothing more than the strange gouernment of the Latines, yet could they not be perswaded to ioyne together in so common a calamitie, but after their wonted manner sought euery man how to share out something for himselfe, without regard of the common good: one seized vpon one strong towne or citie, and so likewise another; which for all that they held not long, driuen thence for the most port by a greater power, either of the Latines, or of their owne countreymen.

The man whom the discontented Greekes most looked after, was Theodorus Lascaris, the Emperour Alexius Angelus his sonne in law; who at the taking of the citie, fled to Adrianople, and afterward into Bythinia, where hee was of the people, not of that countrie onely, but of others also farther off, ioyfully receiued and honoured as their Emperour. So taking into his hands the countries of Bythinia, Phrygia, Missia, Ionia, and Lydia, euen from the windings of the famous riuer Mæander Southward, vnto the Euxine Sea Northward; hee with the generall good liking of the people, tooke vpon him the estate of an Emperour, and so in the renowned citie of Nice made the seat of his empire. At the same time also Dauid, and Alexius Comneni, the nephewes of the tyrant Andronicus (sometime Emperour of Constantinople) by his sonne Manuel, possessing the more Easterne countries of Pontus, Galatia, and Capadocia, erected vnto themselues another empire in Trapezond, where their posteritie of the honourable house of the Comneni raigned in great glorie many yeares after, vntill their empire, together with the empire of Constantinople, was by the great Emperour of the Turkes, Mahomet the second, subuerted and brought to nought, as shall afterward in due time and place be declared. Thus the Greek empire exposed (as it were) to the generall spoile, was no longer one, but many empires: Baldwin raigning in Constantinople, the Marquesse of Mont-Ferrat in Thessalie, Theodorus Lascaris at Nice, Alexius Comnenus in Trapezond, and the Venetians in the Islands, all in royall dignitie. Besides whome were many other lesser Princes, which had heere and there according to their abilitie seized vpon some one or other part of the Empire, and there erected their Toparchies, raigning therein as A pettie Kings: as did Alexius Mandinus in Attalia, Michael Angelus in Epirus, with diuers others too long to rehearse.

Baldwin (as is aforesaid) created Emperor of Constantinople, by the helpe of the Venetian Admirall Dandulus, and other great commanders of the Armie, in short time brought vnder his obeisance all the cities of Thracia, excepting the citie of Adrianople, whereunto the better sort of the discontented Greeks, together with Theodorus Lascaris (disdaining the gouernment of the Latines) were fled, as vnto a most safe sanctuarie: which Baldwin knowing, and withal desiring whilest yet he had his friends about him, to set his new Empire in some good stay, without farther delay came and laid hard siege to the same. Now the Greekes generally euill entreated by the Latines, and grieued to be gouerned by them, were some of them fled B into other their neighbour Princes countries, but especially into Bulgaria, otherwise called Misia, a large kingdome, lying betwixt the great mountaine Æmus, and Danubius: by whose persuasion, Iohn King of that country, aided by the Scythians, (a fierce Northerne people, but lately come into those quarters) and by the fugitiue Greeks themselues, tooke vpon him to relieue the besieged citie: and so with a great armie approching the same, sent before certaine troups of the Scythian Archers on horseback, to fetch in such bootie of horses or cattell as they should find neere vnto the Emperors campe; and withall commanded them, that being charged by the Imperials, they should forthwith retire, so to draw them out of their trenches, into the place where the King with the greatest part of his armie lay couertly to intrap them. Which the Scythians (well acquainted with such seruice) so well performed vnder the leading of one Cozus their Generall, that hauing once or twice drawne their enemies vnto some C light skirmishes, and so retyring, and ere long againe with a greater number returning, they at length cunningly drew the Emperor with all his armie, in hope to do some great matter vpon them, euen as they wished, into the place whereas the King with his armie lay in wait among the woods and mountaines for them; where they, wearied and out of breath with the former pursuit, & now on euery side beset with fresh enemies, were ouerthrowne with a great slaughter. In which conflict to increase the losse, Baldwin the Emperour himselfe was taken and sent prisoner in bonds to Ternoua; where afterwards by the commandment of the barbarous king he was most cruelly put to death, hauing his hands and feet cut off, & so dismembred was cast out into a deepe valley, where hee yet lay miserably breathing three dayes after, and so died; D leauing his bodie as fortunes scorne, for a prey vnto the wild beasts and birds of the aire, no man vouchsafing to burie it. Thus perished this worthie Prince, for his vertues commended euen of the Greeks themselues, being about the age of three and thirtie yeres, and not hauing raigned yet a full yeare, in the yere of our Lord 1206.

Hadrianople besieged by the Emperor Baldwin.

The victorie thus gained, and the citie relieued, the barbarous King with his sauage souldiers hauing tasted the wealth of the Latines ouerthrowne in the late battel, and the pleasures of Thracia now subiect to their lust; greedily pursued their good fortune, without respect of all humanitie: the open country they ouerran, spoiling whatsoeuer came to hand, the rich and famous cities they rifled, and afterward rased them down to the ground; namely Serræ, Philippopolis, Apri, Rhedestum, Perinthus, Daonium, Arcadiopolis, Mesena, Zurulus, & Athyra: E the citizens & country people fled into the cities for refuge, they put all to the sword, without respect of age, sex, or condition, except some few, whom they carried away with them prisoners; so that of all the prouinces of that rent and ruinated empire, the country of Thrace was most miserable, as first spoyled by the Latines, and now layd desolate by the Bulgarians and Scythians. Only some few of the strongest cities, as Didymotichum and Adrianople (valiantly defended by the Greeks and Latines) escaped this furie of the Barbarians, all the rest that fell into their hands being layd waste and desolate.

In this so troubled a state of the new erected Empire of the Latines in Constantinople, the Latines made choice of Henrie the late Emperor Baldwins brother, as of all others the fittest to succeed him in the Empire: who aided by the Marquesse, now King of Thessalie, & the other F Latine Princes, notably repulsed the Barbarians, and left them not vntill that at length he had recouered from them all such townes and cities as they had before taken, and driuen them quite out of the countrie, and so well established himselfe in his new Empire.

Henry second Emperor of the Latins in Constantinople.

But to leaue this dismembred empire, now in the hands of many, and to come neerer to our purpose: Alexius Angelus the vsurper, driuen out of the imperiall citie by the Latines, to saue

himselfe,fled into Thessalie,& from thence vnto Leo Scurus (then a man of great fame among the Greekes) who tyrannising at Nauplus,as had his father before him, was in these troublesome times growne greater, by surprising of the two famous cities of Argos and Corinth: by whose meanes he cunningly entrapped Alexius Ducas, syrnamed Murzuphle, the traitour, and for a secret grudge not commonly knowne, put out his eyes: himselfe an exiled man, being a most heauie enemie vnto the other also exiled; and himselfe thrust out of the Empire, a deadly foe vnto the other, oppressed with the like calamitie. Shortly after which losse of his sight he was by chance taken by the Latines, and so brought backe to Constantinople, where hee was for murdring the yong Emperor Alexius, worthily condemned vnto a strange and horrible kinde of death; for, cast off from an high tower, and tumbling heeles ouer head downward, hee was with the waight of himselfe, and violence of the fall, crushed all to pieces, and so miserably died, a death too good for such a traitor. Not long after it fortuned also, that Alexius himselfe wandering vp and down in Thracia, was by the Marquesse of Mont-Ferrat, going against Scurus, taken and stript of his great treasure, and whatsoeuer else hee had; and so sent away naked, long time after in beggars estate wandred about in Achaia and Peloponesus, now farre vnlike that Alexius which sometime proudly raigned in Constantinople: but such is the assurance of euill gotten honour. He hearing that Theodorus Lascaris his sonne in law raigned in Asia, and there held the state of an Emperour, reioyced not thereat as a kind father in law, but inwardly grieued thereat as an enemie, sorrie that any other but himselfe should be honoured with the title of the Greeke Emperour: in which malicious humor he sailing out of Greece into Asia ouer the Ægeum, came secretly vnto the Turks Sultan Iathatines his old acquaintance, then lying at Attalia, (which famous citie he had not long before taken from the Christians) vnto whom he declared his heauie estate, and how his empire had been rent from him, as well by the Greekes as the Latines; requesting, that by his meanes hee might be restored againe into some part thereof, especially that in the lesser Asia, which was by Theodorus Lascaris, together with the honour of the Greeke Emperor, vniustly (as he said) detayned from him. This Iathatines, now Sultan of Iconium, was the yonger sonne of Sultan Aladin; who not long surviuing his father Cai-Chosroe, left his kingdome vnto his two sonnes Azadin and Iassadin, of the Greekes called Azatines and Iathatines: where long it was not, but that these two brethren falling out for the soueraignetie, (which admitteth no equalitie) Iathatines was by Azatines his elder brother driuen into exile, and for the safegard of his life glad to flie vnto this Alexius, I then raigning at Constantinople, by whom he was honorably entertained, and as some write, conuerted and baptised. But Azatines the Sultan shortly after dying, this Iathatines returning home again, and renouncing the Christian Religion, was by the Turks receiued for their Sultan: of whom the Emperour Alexius in like extremitie now craueth aid. The Sultan not forgetfull of his owne troubles before passed, or of the kindnesse he had receiued, and mooued with the pittifull complaint of his old friend, together with his large offers; besides that hee was in hope to share out some good part of whatsoeuer he got, for himselfe; tooke him into his protection, and forthwith sent Embassadours to Lascaris, threatning vnto him all extremities, except he did forthwith giue place vnto Alexius his father in law, vnto whom, as vnto the Greeke Emperor, those countries which were by him possessed, of right (as he said) appertained. With which vnexpected message Theodorus was not a little troubled, as fearing both the Sultans power, and the inclination of the people to their old Emperor. Neuertheless, hauing propounded the matter in councel, and finding the minds of his subiects well affected towards him, & a readines in them in his quarrell to aduenture their liues; he encouraged therewith, accompanied only with two thousand choice horsemen, together with the Sultans Embassador, without farther stay set forward to Philadelphia: the Sultan at the same time with Alexius, (whom he carried with him as a bait to deceiue the people withall) and twentie thousand Turkes, besieging the citie of Antioch, scituate vpon the winding bankes of the riuer Meander. Which the Emperour Theodorus well vnderstanding, and that the Sultan by gaining that strong citie (standing vpon the passage of the great riuer, the bounder of his Empire) should open a faire way for himselfe into the heart of Romania Asiatica, to the great hazard of his whole Empire, resolued with those few he had, to doe what he might to relieue his Citie. And so setting forward vpon the spurre, carrying nothing with him more than a little victuall; and now come neere vnto the Citie, sent before the Sultans Embassador, following him at Antioch besieged by Iathatines.

A at the heeles. Who comming to the Sultan, and telling him of the Emperors approch with so small a power, could hardly persuade him that it was so, although hee bound it with many oathes: yet at length persuaded of the truth of the matter, and that indeed it was so, hee in all hast put his armie in the best order he could vpon such a sudden, but not to his best aduantage, being hindred so to do by the straitnes of the place wherein he lay. Of the two thousand select horsemen in the Emperours armie, were eight hundred Italians, all most resolute men, who giuing the first charge, brake through the middest of the Sultans army, disordering his whole battell as they went; after whom followed also the Greeks, though not with like courage: but those Italian horsemen now diuided from the rest, & in number but few, in comming backe again, were by the disordred Turks, some on horseback, some on foot, so beset on euerie side, as that there was no way left for them to passe, but there valiantly fighting, were altogether slaine, hauing both before and at the time of their death made such a slaughter of the Turkes, as is hardly to be beleeued to haue beene possible for so few men to haue made. The Greeks also hardly laid to by the Turks, and discouraged by the slaughter of the Latins, were euen vpon the point to haue fled: when as the Sultan, now almost in possession of a certaine victory, descrying the Greeke Emperor, and trusting to his own great strength, singled him out, beeing as readie as himselfe to meet him; when as at the first encounter, the Sultan with his horsemans mase gaue him such a blow vpon the head, as might haue killed a Bull, so that the Emperour therewith astonied, fell downe from his horse: who yet euen in the fall comming something againe vnto himselfe, and although dismounted, yet quickly recouering his feet, with his faulchion hoxed the hinder legs of the Mare whereon the Sultan rid, beeing a most beautiful beast, & of a wonderfull height; which now suddenly faultring vnder him, and so the Sultan tumbling down as from an high tower, before he could recouer himselfe, had his head cut off by the Emperor: which by and by put vpon a launce, and so holden vp, with the sight thereof so dismayed the Turks, that strucken with a sudden feare, they presently fled, leauing the victorie vnto the Emperour, before more than halfe ouercome: who for all that, considering his small number, durst no further pursue them, but entring the citie, gaue thankes to God for so great a victorie. Vnto whom the Turkes shortly after sent their Embassadors, and so vpon such reasonable conditions as it pleased him to set downe, concluded with him a peace. Alexius himselfe author of these troubles, taken in this battell and carried to Nice, was by the D Emperor his sonne in law, notwithstanding his euill deserts, well intreated and vsed.

Whilest the Latins thus spend those forces in subuerting of the Greek empire, which should haue bin imployed for the reliefe of the Christians in Syria, and that the Greeke Emperour Lascaris was thus troubled with the Turks, the affairs of the Christians in Syria and the Holy-land grew still worse and worse. Whereof the Knights Hospitalers and Templars (the chiefe champions of the Christian religion in those countries) greatly blamed Almericus the king of Cyprus, for that he being so neere at hand, and hauing married Isabella the heire of that kingdome, and so in her right taken vpon him the title of the King of Ierusalem; gaue himselfe wholly to pleasure, doing nothing for the defence or reliefe of the poore distressed Christians, or repressing of the Turks: who although they were yet in league with the Christians there, E and at some discord also among themselues, yet spared not as occasion serued; still more and more to encroach vpon them, & by building of new castles & fortresses to cut them short. Of al which things, the aforesaid Knights by their embassadors certified Pope Innocentius, requesting his fatherly care for the remedy thereof: certifying him withal, that there was yet liuing one Mary, the daughter of the Marquesse of Mont-Ferrat, a ladie of rare beautie, whom they as her tutors had brought vp in hope of the kingdome, & now were ready to bestow her vpon some such man as he should thinke worthie of her, together with the right she had vnto the kingdome. Hereupon Innocentius discharging Almericus of the title of the kingdome of Ierusalem, gaue it to Iohn Countie de Brenne of Daulphine in Fraunce, a man of great fame & valour, then in armes with the other Latine Princes against the Greeks. Who now returning home, F commended his earledome to his brother, and with such power as he was able to make, setting forward, came first to Venice, where he was royally entertained: and from thence sailing to Constantinople, was with like honour receiued by the Emperor Henry, and so at length the fift of September arriued at Ptolemais in Syria, where hee was with the great rejoycing and applause of the people receiued as their King. And the last of the same moneth marrying the Iohn Brenne by Innocentius the Pope appointed King of Ierusalem.

the aforesaid Ladie Mary at Tyre, was there together with her with a great solemnitie crowned King in the yere 1209. Which Almericus the old King of Cyprus hearing, shortly after 1209. died for griefe. Neither wanted this noble gentleman, thus honoured with the title of a Kingdome, some that enuied at his promotion, and therefore commonly called him in derision, a King, but still with this addition, Sans Ville, that is to say, Without a Towne.

Now was the ten yeres peace, before taken betwixt the Turks and the Christians in Syria, at the comming ouer of Simon Marquesse of Mont-Ferrat (as is before declared) almost expired: which had not so much giuen to those poore remnants of the Christians some time of rest and breathing, as had the discord of the Turks among themselues; which hauing for the space of nine yeres continued betwixt Noradin and Saphadin for the soueraigntie, was now by the death of Saphadin ended. Noradin contenting himselfe with the gouernement of Aleppo, and Corradin and Meledin the two sonnes of Saphadin, diuiding their fathers kingdome betwixt them, the one taking vnto himselfe Damasco and Syria, and the other the great kingdome of Ægypt, but all enemies vnto the Christians.

About this time also, or not long after, Innocentius tertius yet Pope, summoned a generall Councel to Lateran, whereunto, besides a multitude of great Bishops, and other reuerend Prelats, repaired also the honorable Embassadors of most of the Princes of Christendome: vnto whom so assembled, among other things was propounded the dangerous estate of the Christians in Syria, and how the same was by the helpe of the Christian Princes of the West to be relieued. Whereunto all the Fathers & Princes there assembled easily gaue their consent: and thereupon were some appointed in euery countrey and prouince, to publish this decree of the Councel, for the reliefe of the oppressed Christians, and to stir vp the deuout people for the vndertaking of so religious a war. The chiefe furtherers of this sacred expedition, to bee thus taken in hand against the Infidels, were the Bishops of Germany, especially the three great Bishops of Mets, Cullen, and Triuers, whose example moued also many others, all which to rehearse were tedious. Out of France also were sent Henry the Countie of Niuers, & one Gualter the Kings great Chamberlain, with a great number of the gallant youths of France, and so out of diuers other places also: so that at length such a number of men were met together at diuers ports of the Adriaticke, as made vp a fleet of two hundred saile; which with a prosperous wind carried ouer into Syria, arriued in safetie at Ptolemais the chiefe citie of the Christians, now that Ierusalem was lost. After whom followed also Andrew King of Hungary, long before bound both by his fathers commandement and his owne promise, for the vndertaking of that sacred expedition: with whom came also Lewis Duke of Bauaria, and Leopold Duke of Austria, with their forces all wel appoynted: vnto whom also Iohn King of Ierusalem ioyned himselfe with his power. Great hope and expectation there was for some great matter to haue been done, now that so great forces of the Christians were thus met together. Who setting forward from Ptolemais, and the first day marching into Galilee, by the way met with certain companies of the Turkes, whom they easily ouerthrew and put to flight. The next day they came to the riuer of Iordan, where they also distressed certaine of the Turks garrisons. There the King of Hungarie bathing himselfe in the riuer, forthwith (as one discharged of his vow and promise) returned with all his power vnto Ptolemais, and so from thence backe again into his country, all the rest of the armie of the Christians crying out to him to the contrarie: who after the kings departure still marching on, came to the mount Thabor. But shortly after, Winter now comming on, and many of their cattell dying for cold and want of meat, they returned some to Ptolemais, some to Tyre, and there wintred. King Iohn and the Duke of Austria in the mean time tooke a castle betwixt Cesarea and Caipha, called The castle of Pilgrims, from whence they much troubled the Barbarians thereabouts all that Winter. Vpon the appearance of the Spring, and the armie againe met together, it was thought best by all the great commanders, that for so much as the kingdome of Ægypt was the chiefe maintenance of the Mahometan superstition, against the Christians in those parts, and that so long as it stood vpright, they should not be able to do any great matter in Syria, to attempt the conquest thereof, as an exployt best beseeming their valour, and so great preparation: for that that kingdome being once subdued, the Citie of Ierusalem, with all the land of Palestine, would of themselues without more adoo streightway yeeld vnto them. And for as much as the famous Citie of Damiata, called in antient time Pelusium, not much inferiour vnto Alexandria, andria, was the first and most commodious port for their purpose, as neerest vnto Syria; and that by the taking thereof they should haue a faire entrance into the great riuer Nilus, with the command of a most rich and pleasant countrey about it. They resolued there to begin the war: and thereupon embarking themselues with all things necessary for so great an enterprise, at Ptolemais, & carried with a faire wind, they in short time arriued at the desired port. Now that rich and antient citie, the key of that side of the kingdome, stood about a mile from the sea, and somewhat distant also from the great riuer, enuironed with a nauigable ditch or Cut, drawn out of the Nile, in manner of an Island, as a man commeth from Syria by land; & compassed about with three strong stone walls, the worke of the good Emperour Ælius Pertinax, and of him (as some affirme) called also Æliopolis. At the mouth of this cut, as you should enter vnto the citie, stood a strong Watch-tower for the defence thereof, and round about it a number of faire houses, in manner of a pretty town entrenched. Beside that, for the more safetie thereof, the same cut was barred with a great strong yron chaine, in such sort, as that it was not possible for any ship, without breaking of the same to enter. The Christians with their fleet entring the mouth of the riuer, & comming to this cut, by great strength brake the chain: but thinking so to haue made their passage vnto the city, they found a greater stay at the watch tower, which strongly built of square stone, & wel stored with warlike engins of all sorts, and a good garrison of valiant souldiers, stayed their further passage, ouerwhelming them as they approched, with shot, fire, stones, timber, and such like, before prouided for that purpose.

The situation of Damiata in Ægypt.

The Christians (after the manner of the fight of that time) had vpon certaine flat vessels built certain high towers of wood for the assailing of the watch-tower: in the approching wherof, they were not only troubled with the enemie, but with the tumult and stir of their owne people also; some crying that they should yet draw neerer vnto the tower; other some crying out as fast, to haue the bridges cast out, thereby to enter; and the enemie likewise with much clamor encouraging one another for the repulsing of the Christians. So the soldiers hindred the mariners to do their busines, and the mariners the soldiers. In the midst of this hurly-burly & tumult, one of the wooden towers surmounting the rest in height, ouercharged with the presse of men, fel, and in falling made such a noise, as if heauen it selfe had fallen: where in a moment (as it were) was presently to be seen a most heauy spectacle; many ouerwhelmed with the falling of the tower, lay there crushed to death; some grieuously hurt, & yet not dead, lay oppressed with the timber, crying out for helpe; others bruised or hurt, but not ouerwhelmed, for feare of further harme, leapt some into the Nile, some aboord the other ships neere by, some crying out of his arm, some of his leg, some of his head or other part of his bodie, to the great discomfiture of the rest, in so much that the assault was for that time giuen ouer.

King Iohn (as well for his valour, as for the title of the King of Ierusalem, chosen Generall of the armie) after he had appeased this tumult, and giuen the charge of them that were maimed or hurt, vnto skilfull surgeons, and buried the bodies of such as were found drowned or ouerwhelmed; with cheerful speech encouraged the rest of his soldiers, perswading them not to be discouraged with the accident of the fal of a tower, which was neither to be imputed to their cowardise, or the valour of the enemie, but only to the chance of warre.

In the mean time Meledin the Ægyptian Sultan, had with a great armie encamped himselfe within the sight of Damiata, thereby to encourage the besieged, and to fill them with hope of reliefe; sending them oftentimes by the riuer, newes, messages, victuals, soldiers, armour, and whatsoeuer else they wanted. The chiefe cause of his staying there, was to take occasion for the surprising of the Christians, if any should bee offred, either by chance, or their owne negligence. Euery day some skirmish or other passed betwixt our men and the Barbarians, ours still carrying away the victorie: yet could these Barbarians neither be drawn forth to battell, neither could our men keep them from victuals, for as much as they had the riuer of Nile at command, whereby victualls were out of the vpper part of Ægypt in great aboundance conueighed into the Sultans campe: whereas on the contrary part, the same riuer diuiding it selfe into many armes, in some places here and there ouerflowing, in another cut into many ditches and channels, and in some other pent vp by walls and causies, gaue vnto our men a thousand displeasures. And therfore seeing that the Sultan would neither giue nor accept of battel, they resolued againe to lay siege to the tower. Wherefore hauing with great cunning, vpon two ships made fast together, framed a Tower of most strong timber, equall in height vnto the Watchtower, they brought the same neere vnto the Turks tower, & the suburbs adioining thereunto, after which followed also the rest of the fleet well appointed for the assault. At which time all the rest of the armie at land stood in battell readie ranged, as well to discourage them of the town, as that the Sultan should not be able to helpe them without the hazarding of battel. There began a fierce and cruell assault; they of the suburbes right valiantly defending themselues against their enemies. Within these suburbs, the tower, and the trenches, dwelt not only Ægyptians, (the naturall inhabitants of the countrey) but also Arabians, Persians, Syrians, Indians, Moores, and Æthyopians, who were there resiant; for that, that citie was a publique mart whereunto all kind of merchandise were brought from farre out of the remotest parts of the world, and so from thence in like manner transported also: which encouraged them the more to fight for the defence of their liues and goods, the two things which men hold most deare: and in like sort animated our men vnto the assault, as well in the quarrell of the Christian religion, as to inrich themselues with the spoile of those rich nations. The Christians with their ships drew as neere as possibly they could vnto the land, to the intent that vpon the bank of the riuer they might come to fight hand to hand, and man to man, and so come close vnto their enemies. But the Barbarians on the other side sought by shot and all other meanes they could, to keepe them further off, and so from landing.

That which most feared the Ægyptians, was, that as one of our ships by chance ran a ground vpon that side of the riuer where the enemy lay, and being boorded by the enemie, thronging in as fast as he could, and there making a cruell slaughter, one of the Christian souldiers going down vnder the hatches, made there a great hole, whereby the water abundantly comming in, I sunke the ship before the enemie was aware, and so drowned a great number of the Ægyptians together with the Christians. At which time also the high Tower built vpon the two ships, ioyning now close vnto the watch-tower, and mating the same, dismaied the defendants with the strangenesse thereof, as with a miracle, in such sort, that they strucken with a great feare, as now being to fight with a strange, hardie, and cruell kind of men, without any great resistance forsooke the tower and fled. The watch-tower thus taken, and they that should haue defended the same, some slaine, and some fled; they in the suburbs discouraged, and flying away, were many of them wounded from aboue, out of the watch-tower but now gained by the Christians. At which time also the other ships landed the souldiers, who entring the suburbs, put all they found there to the sword, euen vnto the last man. There was found great abundance of victuals, but far greater store of riches, in so much that it seemed to haue bin the spoyle of Arabia, Persia, and the rich Indies.

Damiata in vain assaulted.

Now yet remained the strong towne of Damiata, which was forthwith assaulted by the Christians, more to proue if in that heat and sudden feare it would bee yeelded, than for any hope they had by force to win it. But hauing done what they could both by scaling, and by other engins, they gained nothing but hard blowes and wounds, & so retyred. Neuertheless they lodged themselues in the suburbs, and layd a great part of the armie betwixt the Sultan and the besieged citie, to the intent that no supplie of victuals should be brought vnto it; yet both the enemie oftentimes attempted to haue entred the citie, and the besieged to haue sallied out, but both the one and the other were letted to doe what they would haue done, & that not without the great losse of their men: for why, the town was now on euery side so inclosed by the Christians, as that no man could enter in or out thereof. Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege, it fortuned that the riuer of Nile swelling with a great Easterne winde, rise aboue the banks, & so ouerflowed the places wherein the Christians lay, that they could keep nothing drie, and that most part of their victuals were therewith spoyled. With which vnseasonable rising of the riuer, the Christians not a little troubled, by commandement of Pelagius the Popes Legate, gaue themselues to fasting and prayer by the space of three dayes. But the wind falling the fourth day, and the riuer againe decreasing, they gaue themselues more earnestly to prayer than before, thanking the Almightie, that as he had put them in a great feare, so he had in mercie againe comforted them.

Now with long lying began victuals to grow scant in the Sultans campe, so that hee was glad to send away halfe of his armie vp againe into the countrey of Caire. At which time also it chanced (as if it had beene in an extreame and common danger of the Mahometan superstition) that Embassadours sent from Corradin Sultan of Damasco and Ierusalem, vnto the Princes

A Princes of the Christian armie, came to sue for peace, both for himselfe and his brother the Ægyptian Sultan; promising in regard thereof againe to restore vnto them the Holy Crosse, and whatsoeuer els himself, his father, or Sultan Saladin had before taken from them: of which their offer, most part of the army liked wel, saying, That they had therefore taken vp arms for the recouerie of that which had been before gotten, and gained by the valour of the worthie Christian captains, and had of late beene taken from them; and to blot out the ignominy of the losse thereof, to the end it should not be said, that they could not leaue whole and entire vnto their children, what their fathers had got, when they had the keeping thereof; neither hauing lost it, be able again to recouer it: that al these things being restored, there rested not any further occasion of war, or let to stay them as most victorious conquerours to returne home.

B Neuertheles Pelagius, Pope Honorius his Legat (for Innocentius in the preparation of the wars was before dead at Pelusium) with king Iohn, the Masters of the knights Hospitalers and Templars, the Duke of Austria, and the Germaines, were of opinion to the contrary: aleadging, That this sacred warre was vndertaken generally against the Infidels, and for religions sake against the Mahometan superstition, whereof the kingdome of Ægypt was the chiefe seat and stay; and that therefore they ought especially to impugne that. Which persuasion, together with the authoritie of the persuaders, so preuailed, that the Sultans large offers were reiected, and so the embassadors dispatched without any thing obtained of that they came for. Whereupon Corradin fearing that the Christians would at length come to Ierusalem, as the place they most desired; and doubting how hee should bee able to defend the same, forthwith rased the C wals thereof, and the more to deface it, ouerthrew and pluckt downe most of the goodly houses, and other stately buildings therin, sparing yet the tower of Dauid, and the holy Sepulchre; which he is said to haue done at the humble request and intercession of the Christians of diuers countries, which yet dwelt there mixt with the Turks and Sarasins.

A faire offer euill refused.

Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of Damiata, the plague began to arise in the campe, whereof so many died, that it began to repent the great commanders of the armie that they had so much hearkened to the persuasion of the Legate (a man making no profession of armes) rather than to the sound aduice of others, who by long experience taught the sudden alteration of matters of war, would willingly haue accepted of the Sultans large offers: so began Pelagius the Legat to be generally euill spoken of. There were now already six moneths past D since the beginning of the siege, and the Sultan lying in sight had not with him so great an army as before, but only the flower and choice of his people, hauing (as we haue before said) for want of victuals sent away the rest vp again into the country: now it fortuned that the Christians, as men weary of the long siege, stood not so carefully vpon their guard, with watch and ward, as before, but gaue themselues more to ease: which the Sultan perceiuing, drew nerer to the town, in hope vnder the couert of the silent night, to send new supplies vnto the besieged; which companies by him appointed for that seruice, couragiously set forward, in hope to haue deceiued the Christian sentinels, & so indeed came neer vnto the town vnseen or discouered: and now the foremost of those companies were already entred the town; when the Christians perceiuing them, & rasing an alarme, put themselues in arms, and so furiously assailed the hin- E dermost of them, and in such sort, that they which were before within, & those that were but now entred, fearing lest the enemie in that hurly burly should pell mell enter in with the rest, shut them out of the gates, exposed to the butcherie, where all were presently cut in peeces.

Succours sent vnto the besieged.

The Christians encouraged with this victory, the next day leauing a great part of the army before the town to continue the siege, presented themselues before the Sultans camp to giue him battell: who for all that well considering that the losse of a battell might endanger the whole state of his kingdome, would by no meanes be drawne out of his trenches, but lay still; wherewith the Christians, especially the French men (in the first charge naturally furious) greatly encouraged, attempted to haue forcibly entred their rampiers, but not with successe answerable to their courage. For the Ægiptians perceiuing the smal number of their enemies, F notably repulsed them, & in fine inforced them to retire, hauing lost Gualter one of their chiefe commanders, with diuers others: yea King Iohn in assailing the campe, lost many of his men, and grieuously burnt in his face, hardly escaped himselfe with life. After which discomfiture, they resolued, not to thinke of any thing else but of the siege, and aboue all things to prouide that no succours should be brought into the towne. They in the citie more straitly beset and beſieged than before,and now brought vnto extream neceſſitie and famine,and out of al hope of reliefe,aſſembled themſelues to conſult of their affaires,and what were beſt for them to do in ſo dangerous a ſtate: ſome one or other of them by night or otherwiſe ſecretly flying into the camp. And that more was,the citie had vndoubtedly bin yeelded by the greatet part,had not the chiefe commanders within mured vp the gates,and commanded that none of the inhabitants vpon paine of death ſhould come vpon the wals,or rampiers,to the intent they ſhould not get out,or caſt themſelues from aboue ouer the wals into the ditches. The chiefe commanders and captains went here and there vp and down the city,to ſearch and view al things, eſpecially the ſhops and ſtorehouſes, where finding ſmall ſtore of wheat, they diuided it in ſmall portions among themſelues: the common people enforced with want, eat whatſoeuer came to hand,were it lawfull or vnlawfull or forbidden by their ſuperſtition,wholſom or vnwholeſome,good or bad,ſalt or freſh,roaſted or raw; and ſo prolonged their liues with ſuch things as they could find. Now the beſieged, not able to indure theſe extreamities of the famine (being the paſſion that moſt grieuouſly and often troubleth mankind) they were alſo attached with the wrath of God: for the plague(the fury wherof had before attainted the camp of the Chriſtians,and afterward quite ceaſed)was now got into the city,where it made a great ſlaughter: which mortalitie day by day in ſuch ſort increaſed,that men were not only now no more to be found,to viſit,comfort,ſuccour, ſerue, and help the ſicke; but were wanting alſo to burie them,to draw them out of their beds and houſes,and to ſeperate the liuing from the dead: the ſtreets and houſes full of dead bodies,gaue forth a moſt horrible ſtinke,with a moſt grieuous and infectious aire: there was not any place cleare from the plague, or any man that could boaſt hee had not bin attainted therewith,or the feare thereof; and remedie was there none. The rage and furie of theſe two deuourers,the famine,and plague,deuoured them without number,chuſing rather ſo to dy,than to ſubmit themſelues vnto their enemies;or to humble themſelues ſo low, as to craue their fauour. That they within were thus pinched with famine,the Chriſtians knew: but that the plague ſo raged amongſt them,they knew not. Now the Chriſtians had of purpoſe caſt vp certain trenches and baricadoes, for the keeping in of ſuch as the famin ſhould enforce to come out of the town; thinking that the beſieged,to eaſe their wants,would thruſt the baſer ſort of the people & vnprofitable mouths out of the city; vnto whom the Chriſtians meant not to giue any paſſage: for they hauing long before ſo ſtraitly enuironed the citie,as that no reliefe could be brought vnto it,lay now ſtil expecting when the beſieged,enforced by neceſſity,ſhould yeeld themſelues;and ſo without loſſe of any man, to become maſters of ſo ſtrong and rich a towne. It was now more than a yeare that the Chriſtians had thus lien at the ſiege of Damiata, when as certaine of the ſouldiers vpon a brauerie aduentured with a few ſcaling ladders to mount the wal: in which doing,finding no reſiſtance, and withall hearing ſo great ſilence, as if there had bin no bodie within the citie,they ſtood ſtill a great while hearkening,but ſeeing that dumbe ſilence ſtil to continue,they returned vnto the camp,giuing the captains to vnderſtand how the matter ſtood;who at the firſt thought it to bee ſome policie and fineneſſe of the deceitfull enemie: yet afterward they thought it good to aduenture certaine men, to proue their fortune, and to cauſe certaine companies well appointed to ſcale one of the bulwarkes of the citie, in ſuch ſort, as if they ſhould haue gone againſt a puiſſant enemy,that had had the power to reſiſt them. And hereupon were ſcaling ladders brought forth, and all things made ready, as for a great aſſault. So the Chriſtians couragiouſly mounting the ladders, without reſiſtance tooke the bulwarke. But as they were entring farther into the towne,a ſmal company of the Turks and Barbarians (all the ſouldiers that the furie of the plague had left,and they alſo with the famine & infection of the aire very weake and feeble) met them,and began to make ſome ſmal reſiſtance,but to no purpoſe,being forthwith al cut in pieces. Which done,the matter wherewith the gates of the city were mured,was preſently remoued,the gates ſet open,& the Chriſtians with enſignes diſplaied let in. But euen at the very entring in at the gates,they were attainted with a moſt grieuous and horrible ſtinke,they ſaw a faire city diſpeopled,and that which was moſt feareſull to behold,the ſtreets couered with bodies of the dead,and ſuch a dreadfull deſolation, as might moue euen the enemy himſelf to compaſſion. The Chriſtians were entred,as men appointed to haue done a great execution,and to haue made the channels run with bloud,as men iuſtly prouoked with the long ſiege,and the paines they had endured; they had their ſwords and weapons in their hands, Damiata without reſiſtance taken by the Chriſtians.

Damiata vnpeopled by the plague.

A hands, but found none againſt whom to vſe them: for a man could not enter into any houſe, or goe into any ſtreet, but he muſt paſſe ouer the dead, or others which being not yet altogether dead,were miſerably drawing toward their end. Of ſeuentie thouſand perſons in the citie,were not found aboue three thouſand aliue,and thoſe for the moſt part yet yong children: for all the reſt were dead, taken away either with the ſword, famine or the plague; the greateſt part whereof lay yet ſtinking aboue the ground vnburied. Theſe three thouſand that were left,were ſo maigre and poore,that pitie it was to behold them: vnto whom their liues were granted,vpon condition that they ſhould make clean the city,and burie the dead,which they were three moneths in doing.

Thus was Damiata taken by the Chriſtians the fift day of Nouember,in the yeare 1221,af-B ter it had beene more than a yeare by them beſieged. The ſpoile there taken was great,for beſides the rich marchandiſe brought thither from farre,was found great ſtore of gold, ſiluer, and precious ſtones. The Chriſtians thus enriched,and the citie made clean,ſtaied there more than a yeare after,as in a Colonie wherein they had beene willing to dwell,forgetfull of their owne country. In the beginning of theſe wars, the Princes of the army had with one conſent agreed, That whatſoeuer citie or territorie ſhould by them be taken from the Turkes or Infidels, ſhould bee giuen vnto the King of Ieruſalem, whom after the departure of the King of Hungarie,they had made Generall of the whole armie. But now that the citie was taken, Pelagius the legat,pretending, That by the vertue of his legation,it belonged vnto him to diſpoſe of all things taken in that ſacred war, (as a man not vnmindfull of his maſter)adiudged the ci-C tie from thenceforth to belong vnto the See of Rome. With which indignitie and wrong,the King inwardly diſcontented, (and yet for the authoritie of the Legat, diſſembling the matter) withdrew himſelfe,and ſo retired to Ptolemais. 1221

The yere following, Pelagius wearie to ſee the armes of the Chriſtians to corrupt with ruſt, 1222 and nothing doing, conſidering the deſire and hope hee had vtterly to haue ruinated the Infidels,togerher with their ſuperſtition;commanded, That euery man ſhould again take vp armsfor the proſecuting of this war againſt the Sultan,and the beſieging of Caire. But for all that, when he had commanded what he would,or could,the ſoldiers little regarding his command with one voice cryed out, that they would not be commanded by any, but by the King of Ieruſalem only. So that the Legat,enforced by the ſouldiers,was glad to ſend vnto the King,to D requeſt him againe to returne vnto Damiata, and to take vpon him the charge for the managing of that war, taken in hand for the defence of the Chriſtian Religion: who for all that excuſed himſelfe from ſo doing,one while by his owne particular affaires,another while by his owne indiſpoſition: yet in fine, preſſed and ouercome with the praiers and requeſts of the other Latine Princes, he returned to Damiata,at the ſelfe ſame time, that the Duke of Bauaria arriued there with a goodly companie of braue men,brought thither out of his owne countrey, after he had beene now from thence ten moneths abſent.

Pelagius the Legat perſwadeth the Princes of the Chriſtian armie to proceed for the conqueſt of Aegypt.

The Legat deſirous of the proſecution of this war, requeſted and vrged the King, with the reſt of the Princes & great commanders, without delay to take the field,telling them,that the E enterpriſe of the holy war was growne old,and cold,by thoſe long delaies and protracting of the time: and that they which kept wars ſo far from home,ought to make haſt to force the enemie,to take all occaſions, to loſe no time, but euer to be doing,and to proue all things for the annoying of the enemy: and that that was the way, whereby the Worthies of antient times, both Kings and Emperors,had gained vnto themſelues empires,glory, greatnes,and wealth: That it was for them that were inuaded and aſſailed,vpon whoſe liues depended the ſafety of their country,their wiues,their children,& goods,to delay & prolong the time as they might to delude the enemy,to fruſtrate his deſignes,to defeat his attempts,and with delaies to dally him off,vntil that hauing therby weakned his forces,he ſhould together with his courage loſe alſo his hope: Caire(he ſaid)to be indeed a great city,but yet that the greateſt cities that euer were,had by the wars become great deſarts,forced by the power of their puiſſant and ſpeedy F enemies: & that great empires,as were thoſe of the Sultans,ought not to be inuaded or aſſailed by any forrain force,if they were not at the firſt onſet, ouerthrown,or at leaſt ſo weakned, as that they could not afterwards lift vp their heads or recouer themſelues;for otherwiſe,that they which had prepared a deſtruction for others, ſhould fall into the ſame themſelues: That it behooued either not to haue attempted or aſſailed Ægipt at al; or els now, after it had bin

once assailed, not so to giue it ouer before it were conquered. The King of Ierusalem, whether it were that he were pricked with the griefe, that being called the King of the holy land, hee could not haue the citie of Damiata (vnder the leading and conduct won by the Christians come to the sacred war) giuen vnto him by the Legate; or that he had before proued that the higher country of Ægypt was not without great and manifest danger to be attempted; sayd, that he would not in any case goe: alleaging that honorable and sacred war to haue bin taken in hand, onely for the recouerie of the holy Land, and not for the winning of Memphis, Babylon, or Thebes in Ægypt; which after they were taken, would not for any long time continue in their fidelitie or allegeance, and could not possibly be kept by force: whereas Syria, by Godfrey of Bullion and the other great princes his associats, entred into, conquered and possessed; and since his time, by diuers other Christian Kings & Princes holden, was in right their own: and that therefore he greatly commended the forwardnes, the diligence, the courage, the desire, and whatsoeuer thing else Pelagius commended: but that he ought to employ the same in Syria, and not there where no need was, or from whence no profit was to be drawne or expected. Neuertheless the Legat wedded to his owne opinion, by the power of his authoritie, commanded the King of Ierusalem, the Duke of Bauaria, with the rest of the great commanders and captains, to take vp their armes, to get them into the field vpon the expidition by him appointed against the Sultan; threatning the paine of the high sentence of excommunication against him or them, that would shew themselues backward or vnwilling to doe what he had commanded. So as it were enforced by the Legat, they began with euill wil and worse speed, to set forward in August, in the very hottest time of the yeere. At which time the Sultan beholding the great armie of the Christians, in number about seuentie thousand, retired as a man [illegible] into such places as hee thought best, farther off: which the Legat seeing (as one not acquainted with the feats of war (reioyced greatly, as if the victorie had bin already more than halfe gained; commending to the heauens them that he saw couragiously marching forward, saying, That fortune alwaies fauoured the valiant, and that vnto cowards all things fell still out to the worst. By the way the Christians seized vpon a bridge, which the enemie had made ouer the Nile, and cut in pieces such companies as were left for the keeping therof: so marching on they drew neere vnto Caire, and there in the sight of that great and rich citie encamped, where running vp and down, the more to terrifie them of the citie, prouoked them to battell, vpraiding vnto them their lazines, their cowardise and sloth, brauing them (if they were men) to come out: Yet for all that they would not so doe, but keeping themselues close and couert within the citie, let them alone to brag & boast at their owne pleasure. This siege continued long, of purpose protracted still from day to day by them of the citie: and the great opinion of the Christians had of their owne valour, with the small regard they had of their enemies, made them so proud and careles, that they remembred no more to take good care of the war, of their dutie, their watch, or their sentinels: their confidence was in their owne valour and good fortune, not considering or remembring that they were come into Ægypt, and that they had put themselues within the trenches, sallies, channels and cuts, of a deceitfull riuer, which not only brought victuals vnto their enemies, but also fortified them; who by how much they were the lesse valiant, and lesse vnderstood of the art of war, the more they vsed of craft & subtilty for the preseruing of themselues: so the crafty enemies drew the Christians out at length, abusing them with many delaies and deceits; making semblance of great feare, to make themselues the lesse to be feared; & more contemptible in their doings, to the end that they knowing the passages and straights of the country, and reseruing themselues vnto the occasions and aduantages both of the time, & of their enemies, might circumuent them and entrap them at such time as they least feared any such matter. The Christians, at all aduenture had encamped themselues in a low ground, within the banks and cusies of that fenny country, vnder the couert therof, thinking themselues safe as in their trenches, against al sudden sallies or attempts of their enemies: but these places wherin they lay, were soft & durty, for so much as the country people vsed at their pleasure to water them by channels & sluces out of the riuer of Nile: which now pluckt vp and opened, the riuer began to rise and ouerflow all. Then too late they perceiued themselues taken as in a grin, without power to defend themselues, or to make any resistance, or by any other means to shew their valor. So the riuer still arising and ouerflowing gaue vnto the Turkes and Ægiptians good hope of their wars, and of a victorie more desired than than hoped for ouer a warlike and victorious people. All the ground where the Christians lay encamped, was couered with water, so high that the victuals were corrupted, and no place left for a man to stand or lie drie in.

Now at the same time the Ægyptians had taken the high places, with the passages vpon the wals and banks in that drowned countrey, to the intent that the Christians should not be able to retire or to saue themselues out of the bogs and marishes couered ouer with water. So was their rash valour and presumptuous confidence in themselues, exposed vnto the enemies shot and furie; and when they would by force haue defended themselues, their hardinesse was ouercome by the craftie subtilitie of the weake enemie. Then began euery man to crie out against Pelagius the Legat, accusing, condemning, and railing at him: the King himselfe they blamed not, for that he had done his dutie, in dissuading of this expedition, and was contrary to his good liking himselfe drawn into this war, the charge whereof he had not without great intreatie taken vpon him: neither might he with his credit wel complaine of this misfortune, lest in so doing, hee might seeme to haue had no comfort in himselfe. But as for the Legate, what counsell could hee then giue, what counsell could he then take for himselfe? They of Venice, Pisa, and Genoa, left at Damiata, were indeed strong at sea, but how could they come to relieue him ■ Caire? And how, or by what forces could the Christians breake out of the banks & sluces of the cuts & channels; which winding in and out with a thousand inextricable turnings inclosed them, beset also on euery side with the victorious enemie? After they had bin thus coupt vp, and enuironed with the waters three dayes, you might haue seene the poore soldiers in euery place fall downe dead for want of food and sleep, and so perish in the water; the like miserable kind of death, the rest were also in short time after to expect: other helpe was there none, but to yeeld vnto necessitie, and to accept of such conditions as it should please the proud enemie to propound. Now the Sultan desired not so much their liues, as the liberty of his country; and therfore required to haue the citie of Damiata again restored vnto him, & all things els in such sort as were before the besieging thereof: and so the Christians without more adoe to depart his country. Hard conditions if a man respect the hope whereupon the Christians had vndertaken this war, & were so come into Egypt, with the toile there by them endured: but vnto him that wil but enter into consideration of mens affairs, and especially in martiall matters, it wil seem but an accident to be yeelded vnto, the like whereof hath oftentimes hapned vnto the greatest men of the world. These conditions (such as they were) were by the distressed Christians accepted of. But when they were brought to Damiata, and there propounded to the Christians there left, a great contention began to arise among them: some said they would not accept of them, or surrender the towne, which beeing kept would be a stay for al the affairs of the Christians in the East, and a most commodious place for them to haue recourse vnto; but being restored and lost, carried away with it all the hope of the Christians, and that therfore it were better to indure al extremities, than to receiue such dishonorable and hurtfull a peace. Others of the contrary opinion said, That they ought not to forsake them that were in danger before Caire, nor to expose them to the butcherie; but to haue a Christian compassion of so many thousands of soules as there lay distressed, seeing they might be saued by the surrendrie of that one town: Towns (they said) consisted of the number of men, and not men of the inclosures of wals and ditches. They that were of this opinion, for the deliuering vp of the town, seeing the other obstinatly set down to the contrary, withdrawing themselues from the counsel, presently tooke vp armes, & by force entred the houses of them that were of contrary opinion, and took from them their weapons, by that means & perforce to constrain them to yeeld to their desire. As soon as they that lay before Caire (almost drowned in the waters) vnderstood of this dissention at Damiata about the deliuery of the town, they sent them word, that if they would not yeeld the towne to the Sultan, they would forthwith send to Ptolemais, which would not faile to doe what should be commanded, to haue it in stead of Damiata surrendred to the Egiptians. So was Damiata again yeelded to the Infidels, and so great labors of the Christians taken at the siege & winning therof, all lost. That which made this indignity more tollerable, was that Sultan Meladin, hauing without bloudshed gain'd so great a victory, did neither by word or deed any thing in dispight or reproch of the Christians, but vsed them with al courtesie, relieuing them also with victuals & such other things as they wanted, and by faithfull guides conducting them in safetie out of the country.

The miserie of the Christians in the drowned land.

In like manner alſo, Corradin his brother, Sultan of Damaſco, made truce with the Latines G for eight yeares. Wherupon the King of Ieruſalem went ouer into Italie, and there by the perſuaſion of Honorius the Pope, his wife being now dead, gaue his daughter Yolande (now crowned Queene of Ieruſalem in the right of her mother) in marriage to Frederick King of Sicilia, and Emperor of the Latines, the rather thereby to ſtirre him vp for the taking in hand of the ſacred warre. Euer ſince which time, hee and the Kings of Sicilia his ſucceſſors haue beene called Kings of Ieruſalem, albeit that they haue euill proſecuted that their pretended right and title, as ſtill buſied in more prophane warres againſt other Chriſtian Princes. King Iohn afterwards departing from Rome for France, was by the way honourably entertained at Piſa: but arriuing at the French court, he found Philip the French King deſperately ſicke, who by his laſt will and teſtament gaue vnto the Knights Hoſpitalers and Templars, fixtie thouſand H crownes for the maintenance of their warres againſt the Infidels; which money was to their vſe afterward payd vnto King Iohn. Who ſhortly after to diſcharge himſelfe of a vow he had made, to viſit the pilgrimage at Compoſtella, going into Spaine, by the way married Berengaria, the King of Caſtile his daughter: and there ſtaying a great while, returned againe into France, where he lay long expecting the ſetting forward of the Emperor Fredericks ſon in law for the recouerie of his wiues right to the kingdom of Ieruſalem; which although he ſolemnly vowed at ſuch time as he with all princely magnificence married the ſaid Lady at Rome, yet otherwiſe letted with troubles neerer home, performed not the ſame, vntill almoſt ſeuen yeares after: all which time the Chriſtians in Syria enioying the fruit of the late concluded peace for eight yeares, liued in great reſt and quietneſſe; where ſo leauing them, vntill the ariſing of new troubles, let vs in the meane time returne againe vnto the troubled affaires of the Turkes, Greekes, and Latines, at Conſtantinople, and in the leſſer Aſia.

The death of Henry Empevour of Conſtantinople.

Henrie the ſecond Emperour of the Latines at Conſtantinople, after he had (as is aforeſayd) with much adoe repreſſed the furie of the Bulgarians and Scythes, his barbarous enemies, and ſo giuen peace to the miſerable countrey of Thracia, died, hauing raigned a moſt troubleſome raigne, about the ſpace of eleuen yeres. After whom ſucceeded Peter, Countie of Auſſerre, his ſonne in law, third Emperour of the Latines in Conſtantinople: who in the beginning of his empire, willing to gratifie the Venetians, and to reuenge himſelfe of Theodorus Angelus, a great Prince of Epirus, competitor of his empire, beſieged him in Dirrachium, which ſtrong citie; the ſaid Theodorus had but a little before ſurpriſed, belonging vnto the Venetian ſeigni- K orie. At which ſiege, Peter the Emperour lying, was ſo cunningly by the wilie Greeke vſed, that a peace was vpon moſt honorable conditions betwixt them concluded, & a familiar kind of friendſhip ioined. Inſomuch that the Emperour at his requeſt, not well aduiſed, came vnto him as his gueſt: who now of his enemy became his hoſt, entertaining him with al the formalities that faigned friendſhip could deuiſe. But hauing him now in his power, and fearing no harm, regarding neither the lawes of fidelitie or hoſpitalitie, he moſt traiterouſly ſlew him, as that he ſhould by the ſame Theodorus haue bin intercepted about the pleaſant woods of Tempe in Theſſalia, as he was trauelling from Rome to Conſtantinople, and ſo afterwards to haue bin by him cruelly put to death. Of whoſe misfortune, Tepulus gouernour of Conſtantinople L vnderſtanding, for the more ſafetie of the ſtate in that vacancie of the Greeke empire, made peace with Theodorus for fiue yeares, and the Turks for two. Shortly after came Robert (the ſon of the aforeſayd vnfortunate Emperour Peter) with his mother to Conſtantinople, and there in his fathers ſtead was ſolemnly ſaluted Emperor; but not with much better lucke than was his father before him: for ſhortly after his comming he tooke to wife a faire young Lady, the daughter of a great rich and noble Matron of the citie, but before betrothed vnto a gallant gentleman, a Burgundian born; with whom the old Lady broke her promiſe, and more carefull of her daughters preferment, than fidelitie, gaue her in mariage vnto the new Emperour. The ioy of which ſo great an honor was in ſhort time conuerted not into a deadly heauineſſe, but euen into death it ſelfe: for the yong Burgundian, more enraged with the wrong done him M than diſcouraged with the greatneſſe and power of the Emperour, conſorted himſelfe with a company of luſtie tall ſoldiers, acquainted with his purpoſe, and awaiting his time when the Emperour was abſent, by night entred the court with his deſperate followers, and firſt meeting with the beautifull yong Empreſſe, cut off her noſe and her eares; and afterward threw her old mother

Robert Emperour of Conſtantinople.

A mother into the ſea, and ſo fled out of the citie into the woods and mountains, with thoſe deſperate cut-throats the miniſters of his barbarous crueltie. The Emperor pierced to the heart with this ſo great a diſgrace, ſhortly after went to Rome, to what purpoſe was not certainely knowne; but in returning backe againe thorow Achaia, he there died, leauing behinde him his yong ſon Baldwin, yet but a childe, begotten by his firſt wife, to ſucceed him in the Empire; who by the name of Baldwin the ſecond, was crowned the fift and laſt Emperor of the Latines in Conſtantinople. And for becauſe he was as yet but yong and vnfit for the gouernment, hee was by conſent of the Nobilitie affianced, and afterward married vnto Martha the younger daughter of Iohn Brenne King of Ieruſalem, a worthie old captaine, (but as then Gouernour of Rauenna, which city, he being certaine yeres before ſent for out of France for that purpoſe, by B Honorius the Pope, he notably defended againſt the Emperor Frederick his ſon in law, but that affinitie was before broken off by the death of the ſaid Emperors wife) who now ſent for out of Italie vnto Conſtantinople, had committed to his charge and protection, both the perſon and Empire of the young Emperour Baldwin, now his ſonne in law. Which great and heauie charge he for certaine yeres after worthily and faithfully diſcharged, vntill ſuch time as that Baldwin was himſelfe growne able to take vpon him the gouernment. Now although the Imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, with the countries of Thracia, Theſſalia, Macedonia, Achaia, Peloponeſus, and the reſt of the prouinces of Greece, were all or for the moſt part vnder the gouernment of Baldwin the Emperor, the Venetians, or other the inferior Latine Princes; yet were the oppreſſed Greeks, the natural inhabitants thereof, in heart not theirs, as abhorring no-C thing more than that their forreine gouernment; but wholly deuoted to their owne naturall Princes, Theodorus Laſcaris and Alexius Comnenus, the one raigning at Nice in Bithynia, the other at Trapezond in Pontus, both called by the Greekes, Emperors, and ſo of them generally reputed. Laſcaris of the two the better beloued, and by farre of greateſt power, had during the time of his gouernmet fought many an hard battell, (as is in part before declared) and ſtrongly fortified his chiefe cities againſt the inuaſion of his enemies, as well the Turks as the Latines: and ſo hauing as it were erected a new Empire in Aſia, and there raigned eighteene yeares, died, leauing behind him one Iohn Ducas Batazes, that had married the faire Ladie Irene his daughter and heire, to ſucceed him in the Grecke Empire in Aſia. This Iohn was a man D of a great wit and ſpirit, and of more grauitie for his yeares, than was Theodorus his father in law, neuer vndertaking any thing before he had thereof well conſidered; and once reſolued, not omitting or neglecting any thing for the performance thereof. So that it was not vnfitly ſayd of the Greekes, The planting of this new Empire to haue required the celeritie of Laſcaris, but the ſtay thereof to haue been the grauitie of Ducas. He in the beginning of his raigne in very ſhort time hauing ſet all things in good order, greatly augmented his legions, & ſhooting at a fairer marke than the Empire he held, euen the imperiall citie it ſelfe, and the recouerie of all Thracia and Grecia out of the hands of the Latines, which could not bee done without a fleet at ſea, built a great number of gallies in the ports of the leſſer Aſia. And ſo hauing rigged vp and manned a ſtrong fleet, and ſcouring the ſeas, in one Summer took in moſt of the Iſlands of the Ægæum, namely Lesbos, Chios, Samos, Icaria, Coos, with the famous Iſland of the E Rhodes, and many others alſo. And not ſo contented, to haue increaſed his Empire, the next Spring croſſing the Helleſpont, and landing his forces, firſt inuaded Cherſoneſus; and afterward to terrifie the Latines, forraged the countrey farre and neere, euen to the gates of Conſtantinople, no man daring to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him. At which time alſo he took many cities and ſtrong townes alongſt the ſea coaſt, as Calliopolis, Seſtus, and Cardia, with diuers others thereabout, ſome by force, ſome by compoſition, the Greekes almoſt in euerie place yeelding themſelues, where they were not ſo oppreſſed by the Latines, as that they could not helpe him. Now by theſe proceedings of the Greeke Emperor in Europe, was plainely to be ſeene againe the ruine of the Latine Empire in the Eaſt, all things proſpering in his hand ac-F cording to his hearts deſire. Aſſan the Bulgarian King (no ſmall terror both vnto the Latines and the Greekes) mooued with the fame hereof, by his Embaſſadours ſent of purpoſe vnto Iohn the Greeke Emperour, offered his daughter Helena in marriage with young Theodore his ſonne: of which offer the Emperour gladly accepted. For beeing buſied in his great affaires, he was loath to haue ſo great a King as was Aſſan, his enemie, able at his pleaſure to call in the Scythes; who with their multitude, as a great floud breaking ouer the bankes, had oftentimes carried away whole countries before them. Wherefore the match agreed vpon, the two great Princes by appointment met together about Cherſoneſus, where Helena King Aſſans daughter, beeing then about ten yeres old, was with great joy and triumph ſolemnly married vnto yong Theodor the Emperors ſon, much of the ſame age. Not long after, embaſſadors were alſo ſent vnto the Emperour from the Sultan of Iconium, to confirme and prolong the league betwixt them; for the Tartars not contented to haue driuen the Turks out of Perſia and the farre Eaſterne Countries, began now alſo to cut them ſhort in their prouinces in the leſſer Aſia. Wherefore the Sultan of Iconium, fearing leſt whiles he had his hands full of thoſe his moſt dreadfull enemies, of themſelues too ſtrong for him, hee ſhould behind be ſet vpon by the Greeke Emperour, and ſo thruſt out of all; ſent theſe his embaſſadours vnto him for peace: which hee for many cauſes eaſily granted. Firſt, for that hee foreſaw what an hard matter it would be for him to maintain war at once both in Aſia againſt the Turks, and in Europ againſt the Latines: then by this warlike nation, as by a moſt ſure bulwarke, to keepe his owne countries ſafe from the inuaſion of the barbarous Tartars, vnto whoſe furie hee ſhould himſelfe lie open, if the Turks were once taken out of their way. Both ſufficient reaſons for the Emperor to yeeld vnto the Sultan, which he did: ſo was the peace concluded, and the embaſſadors diſpatched. This peace exceedingly comforted, and afterwards inriched the Emperors countries: for now the people generally deliuered of the feare and miſerie of continuall warre, began on all hands to fall to their fruitfull labours of peace. Yea the Emperour himſelfe, to the ſtirring vp of others to the like good husbandrie, cauſed ſo much land to bee ploughed vp for corne, and ſo many vineyards to be planted, as might plentifully ſuffice his owne houſe, and ſuch poore as he dayly relieued; with a great ouerplus, which he cauſed to be carefully layd vp in ſtore: he kept alſo great heards of cattell, flockes of ſheepe, and fowles of all ſorts without number. Likewiſe he cauſed his kinſmen and other of the nobilitie to do, to the intent that euery great man hauing ſufficient for his owne ſpending at home, ſhould not take any thing from the poore country men, that ſo euery man contenting himſelfe with his own, might liue in peace without the grieuance of others. By which means in a few yeres euery barne and granarie was full of corne, euery cellar full of wines, euery ſtable full of cattell, euery ſtorehouſe full of victuals; the fields were couered with corne and cattell, and in euery mans yard were to be ſeene all kinds of tame fowles, without number. About which time alſo there fortuned a great famine among the Turks, inſomuch as that they were enforced to fetch their greateſt reliefe from out of the Chriſtian countries. Then might you haue ſeen euery way full of Turks, men, women, and children, trauelling to and fro into the emperors countries for victuals; their gold, their ſiluer, their other rich commodities, they gaue vnto the Chriſtians for food; a little corn was worth a good commodity, euery bird, ſheep, & kid, was ſold at a great rate: by which meanes the country mens houſes were full of the Turks wealth, & the emperors coffers ſtored with their treaſure. The greatneſſe of the profit ariſing of this plentie of the Chriſtians, and penurie of the Turks, may hereby eaſily be gathered, for that of eggs dayly ſold, ſo much monie was in ſhort time gathred, as made the empreſſe an imperial crown of gold, richly ſet with moſt orient pearle and precious ſtones of great price; which the emperour called Ouata, for that it was bought with egge money. Thus flouriſhed the Greeke empire in the leſſer Aſia, vnder the good Emperor Iohn Ducas: the Turks at the ſame time declining as faſt, daily pilled in one corner or another by the Tartars, and conſumed with famine at home.

Plentie enſuing of peace.

Frederick the German Emperor had of long time vowed to take vpon him an expedition into the Holy land; for performance wherof he was hardly called vpon, firſt by Honorius quartus the Pope, & afterward for his long delay excommunicated by Gregorie the ninth: not ſo much for the zeale they had vnto the ſacred war, as to buſie the Emperour afar off in warres abroad, whileſt they in the mean time, to increaſe their own power, drew from him ſome one part or other of his empire: which he not without cauſe fearing, from day to day, & yere to yere, delayed the performance of his vow, ſo much vrged by the Pope; by his preſence & power ſtil diſappointing all the ſlie deſignes of the Popes, conceiued or put in practiſe againſt him. But now at length mooued, or more truly to ſay, inforced with the thundering and lightning of Pope Gregorie, he reſolued to ſet forward in the yeare 1227. About which time, Iolenta, or Yolanda his wife, the king of Ieruſalem his daughter, died in childbed, being before deliuered of a faire ſonne. Now were met together at Brunduſium an exceeding great number of courageous

A gious and deuout ſouldiers out of all parts of Chriſtendome, eſpecially out of Germanie, vnder the leading of Lodwick Lantgraue of Thuringe, and Sigefride Biſhop of Anguſta; all ſtirred vp with the fame of ſo notable an expedition. But whileſt they there ſtayed ſomewhat long, the plague aroſe among the Germans, whereof in ſhort time after, both the Lantgraue and the Biſhop died, with many of the other beſt ſouldiers. The Emperour himſelfe was vpon his way as farre as Malea, vpon the further ſide of Peloponeſus, where falling deſperatly ſicke of a burning feauer, and put backe with contrarie windes, he returned againe to Brunduſium, and there ſtayed a great while after. Then began the Pope againe to fret and fume, and to caſt out his excommunications againſt the Emperour, as if it had been thunder and lightning, accuſing him of periurie, infidelitie, and many other grieuous crimes; of all which the Emperour was B readie to haue cleered himſelfe in an open aſſemblie of the Princes of Germanie to haue bin holden at Rauenna, had it not bin by the Pope and the troubles of Lombardie diſturbed. Neuertheleſſe, he by open proteſtations and writings, fully anſwered all the Popes vniuſt accuſations, wherewith he had been ſo hardly charged: and yet deſirous to performe the expedition by him taken in hand, hauing ſet all things in good order, and put himſelfe againe in a readineſſe, he ſet forward from Brunduſium in Auguſt, in the yeare 1228, leauing the charge of his territories in Italie vnder the care of Reynold Duke of Spaleto. The Pope diſpleaſed, for that the Emperor at his departure had neither reconciled himſelfe, nor taken his leaue of him, and deeming therein his excommunications and fulminations to be contemned and ſet at naught, fell into ſuch a rage and choler, that he forbad all the Chriſtian forces that were in Syria, to C follow him, or to yeeld to him their obedience; and writ letters alſo vnto the Sultan, not to come to any agreement with the Emperour, or to yeeld vnto him any part of the Holy Land: which letters the Sultan afterwards ſent vnto the Emperor. Neither yet ſo contented immediatly after his departure, ran vpon his kingdome of Naples, and ſo filled all Italie with troubles. Neuertheleſſe the Emperor happily arriuing at Ptolemais, was there honorably receiued of the Chriſtian forces, notwithſtanding the Popes threats and curſings. Of whoſe arriuall Sultan Meledin hauing intelligence, and loth to draw ſo mightie an enemie as was the Emperor, vpon him, by his Embaſſadors offered him moſt honorable conditions of peace: which before he would accept of, he by conuenient meſſengers ſent vnto the Pope, to haue his conſent and approbation. But ſuch was his rage, as that hee would not ſuffer the meſſengers to D come into his preſence, or vouchſafe to read the Emperours Letters, being brought vnto him, but like a mad man preſently rent them in pieces. All which indignities the Emperor neuertheleſſe tooke in good part, and concluded a peace with the Turkes for ten yeares, vpon theſe conditions: Firſt, That he ſhould be annointed and accounted King of Ieruſalem: then, That the holy Citie, with all the land of Paleſtine ſhould be deliuered vnto him: thirdly, That hee might at his pleaſure fortifie the cities of Nazareth and Ioppe: fourthly, That all ſuch places as were ſometime in the power of Baldwin the fourth King of Ieruſalem, and taken from him by Sultan Saladin, ſhould be reſtored: and laſt of all, That all priſoners on both ſides ſhould be ſet at libertie without ranſome. So the peace concluded, the Emperor with his armie came to the deſolate citie of Ieruſalem, and there vpon Eaſter day with great ſolemnitie was crowned E King thereof, in the yere 1229. And ſo hauing repaired the walls of the Citie, with certaine churches, fortified Nazareth and Ioppe, & furniſhed them with ſtrong garriſons, and appointed Raynold duke of Bauaria, his lieutenant in Syria, he with two gallies only returned into Italie. Euer ſince which time the Kings of Sicilia haue been alſo called Kings of Ieruſalem, and haue oftentimes borne the armes of both kingdomes.

The next yere Pope Gregory, in deſpight of the emperor Frederick, more than for any zeale to the Chriſtian religion, did by the Dominicans & Franciſcans (two orders of Friers but then lately erected) as by his trumpeters, ſtir vp a wonderfull number of zealous and deuout Chriſtians, almoſt in euery part of Chriſtendome, to take vpon them the croſſe (as they termed it) the cogniſance of ſuch as had by vow bound themſelues to take vp arms againſt the Turks and F Saraſins, for the recouerie or defence of the Holy land. Theſe deuout men met together in great number, vnder the leading of Theobald King of Nauar, Almericus Countie of Montfort, Henrie Countie of Champaigne, and others too long to rehearſe, (of purpoſe ſtirred vp to trouble the ten yeres peace before concluded betwixt the Emperour and the Turks in Syria) ſet forward, and after long trauell paſſing the ſtraight of Boſphorus, not farre from Conſtantinople into Bithynia, came to the riuer Sangarius, & there staied a while to refresh themselues. G Afterwards passing through Galatia, and so from country to country thorow the lesser Asia, they came at length vnto the streights of the mountaine Amanus (a part of the mountain Taurus) which they found before taken by the Turks, and the Sultan of Iconium himselfe not far off incamped with a strong armie. Neuertheless the valiant Countie of Montfort, which had the leading of the vantgard, couragiously marching forward, by plain force opened the passage of the mountain, hauing slain or put to flight the Turks appointed for the keeping thereof: the King of Nauarre in the mean time (though in vaine) assailing the Sultan in his campe; who fearing the great power of the Christians, kept himselfe within his owne strength, and would not stirre. Wherefore the King seeing it to no purpose there longer to stay, diuiding his armie into three parts, left the Sultan, and followed after the Countie, placing his baggage H in the midst, and the best of his soldiers in the rereward. But whilest they thus march vp the great mountaine, the Turks better acquainted with those passages, were still at hand, assailing them sometime behind, sometime on the one side, sometime on the other, as they saw occasion: and at length taking them at an aduantage in a great plaine, set vpon them, now before almost spent with hunger and trauell, and there slew of them an exceeding great number. But by the comming on of the night the battell was broken off, and the Christians repairing vnto their ensignes, passed the straits, and so at length arriued at Antioch, hauing lost by the way the greatest part of the armie, with all their wealth, their victuals, and most part of their horses: the remnant yet left, hauing a little refreshed themselues, were by sea transported to Ptolemais; from whence they were afterward by the Templars conducted to Gaza, where they I lay, and of the spoyle of the country greatly enriched themselues. As for any other great matters they were not able of themselues to take in hand; and holpe of such forces as the Emperor had before left at Ierusalem, and other places, they could haue none; hauing expresse charge from the Emperor himselfe, not to doe any thing against the enemie, tending to the breach of the ten yeres league: which the Turks well perceiuing, and that they had to do but with these new come guests, and some few others their partakers; hauing gathered together their forces, lay in ambush for them in euery corner, to cut them off. Neither was it long, but that these of Gaza going far into the Country, and returning laded with spoile, were set vpon by the Turks; whom they (casting away the spoyle they had before taken) notably repulsed and put to flight, the day now drawing to an end. But early the next morning appeared a farre K greater number of Turkes than before; which now putting on, charged the Christians, who all that night had stood watching in their armor, and so ioyned with them a most cruell battel: wherein the Christians shewed so much valour as was possible for men to doe; but wearied with the long fight, and oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, they were ouercome and slaine almost euery mothers son. Among the rest, the two Counties, Americus and Henry fell: the King of Nauarre himselfe hardly escaped by the exceeding swiftnesse of his horse, and by vncertaine wayes wandring vp and downe the country, not knowing well which way to take, after two days came by good fortune to Ioppe: some few others escaped by flight to Ptolemais, the heauie messengers of the misfortune of their fellowes. The King afterwards visiting the holy places at Ierusalem, returned home into his countrie, with some few of his L followers, hauing performed nothing of that the world expected.

About foure yeares after, Raynold Duke of Bauaria, whom Frederick the Emperor had left his lieutenant in Ierusalem, died; hauing by the space of fiue yeres peaceably gouerned that bruised kingdome. After whose death, the Templars (who, he yet liuing, would oftentimes haue broken the League, but that they were by his wisedome restrained) now tooke occasion to stir vp the people to take vp armes against the Turks, without respect vnto the league yet in force, or of the dangers like thereof to ensue. Whereof the Ægyptian Sultan hearing, raised a great armie, sending also for the Chorasines, a warlike nation then lying neere vnto Babylon, to come vnto his aid. Thus become verie strong, he first layd siege to Gaza, but a little before repayred and fortified by the King of Nauarre and the Templars, which hee at length M tooke by force, and put to sword all that were therein, as well the citisens, as the garrison souldiers: in like manner he dealt also with them of Ascalon and other places as hee went. To represse this his furie, the Templars and Hospitallers had assembled the whole strength of that weake Kingdome, and neere vnto Tyberias came to haue giuen him battell. Who vpon their

A. their approch hastily retyred, as if he had for feare shunned battel. But whiles the Christians as victors the night following lay negligently incamped along the riuer side, he returning back again with his armie, came vpon them before they were well aware, halfe sleeping, halfe waking, but altogether vnarmed, with a most horrible outcry. The Christians now altogether awaked, and not a little troubled with the suddennes of the matter, hastily and disorderly (as must needs in so great a confusion) tooke vp their weapons, such as came first to hand, and so couragiously opposed themselues against their enemies. There was fought a most terrible and doubtfull battell, and that also for a long space, the Christians still encouraging one another to do their last deuoir: but the Turkes still keeping their order against the disordred Christians, and far moe also than they in number, preuailed, & there ouerthrew them with a great slaugh-
B ter, but not without the losse of many thousands also of their own men, which there lay dead vpon the ground. Most part of the best Commanders both of the Templars and Hospitalers were there slaine, such as escaped fled to Tyre.

The Sultan incouraged with so great a victorie, marched forthwith to Ierusalem; which he tooke without resistance, and there put to sword all that hee found therein, men, women, and children, without respect of sex or age: and afterwards hauing rifled the same, rased it downe to the ground, burning the buildings, and ouerthrowing the walls not long before repaired by the Emperor Frederick, and much beautified by his lieutenant Raynold. And carried with an infernall fury, defaced and most shamefully polluted the sepulchre of our blessed Sauiour, neuer before then violated or defiled, but of all nations vntouched & reuerenced; which for all that 1234.
Ierusalem taken and rased by the Turks.
C may seem to haue bin done not so much for the hatred vnto the Christian religion, as for that it was the place of all others most desired of the Christians; and for the gaining whereof they had vndertaken so many hard aduentures, and so much troubled the Sarasins and Turkes.

Thus by the vnfaithfull breaking of the league, the most antient and famous citie of Ierusalem, sometime the terrestriall seat of the most Highest, and glorie of the world, fell again into the power of the Turks & Infidels, in the yere 1234, in whose hands it hath euer since remained euen vntill this day: now a poore ruinous citie, gouerned by one of the Turks Sanzacks, and for nothing now more famous, than for the Sepulchre of our blessed Sauior, againe repaired and much visited by the deuout Christians, and not vnreuerenced by the Turkes themselues.

D The losse of this so famous a citie, together with the dangerous state of the Christians in Syria, much grieued the other Christian princes of the West, especially Frederick the Emperor, by whom it had bin but a few yeres before gained. Howbeit hee could not now remedie the matter according to his desire, being himselfe grieuously entangled with the endles troubles which Pope Gregorie had as it were by tradition left vnto the other Popes his successors, for the troubling of his state, vntil at length they had depriued him of his Empire, & not long after of his life also. Among other the great Princes, carefull for the poore Christians in Syria, was Lewis the ninth, the French King, a Prince of great power, but of all others of that time most famous for his zeale vnto the Christian religion, and for his deuout manner of life: who abounding in wealth and all things else of a great Prince to be desired, and withall oftentimes E considering the notable expeditions many Christian Princes had (to their immortall glorie) made, some into Syria, some into Ægypt, against the enemies of Christ, and for the relefe of the oppressed Christians, was many times about to haue taken vpon himselfe the like. But in these his deuout motions, before he could resolue vpon so great an enterprise, hee fell dangerously sicke, insomuch that for certaine days he lay speechlesse, deuoyd of sence and motion, without any signe of life, but that hee did a little faintly breathe: when comming a little vnto himselfe, (whither moued by deuotion, or troubled with his former conceits then running in his weake braine, is vncertaine) the first thing he asked for was the Crosse (the Cognisance of such as vowed themselues vnto the sacred warre) which he solemnly receiued at the hands of the Bishop of Paris. At which time also his three bretheren, Alphonsus Countie of Poitiers, Charles Countie of Aniou, and Robert Countie of Arthois, with Hugh Duke of Bourgon-F die, William Earle of Flanders, Hugh Countie of Saint Paul, and afterwards most of the nobilitie of France, to accompanie the king, tooke vpon them the same charge. Neuertheless it was not by and by taken in hand, but some few yeares let passe in the consultation and preparation 1248.
for so great an enterprise: many in the meane time discharging their vow, by dying before at home in peace in their own countries. At length the deuout King ſtill reſolute in his former determination, hauing taken order with Blanch his mother for his affaires at home, and put all things in readineſſe for his journey, came to Lyons to take his leaue of Pope Innocentius the fourth, (who for feare of the Emperor Frederick, then lay there for his more ſafetie) and from thence to Marcelles; where imbarking himſelfe with his armie the fiue and twentieth day of Auguſt, the yeare 1248, hee the twentieth day of September following arriued in ſafetie in the Iſland of Cyprus, and was there royally entertained by Guy Luſignan then King of that countrey.

King Lewis ſetteth forward toward the Holy land.

Now was the French King deſirous to haue gone directly for Ægypt, without longer ſtay in Cyprus, had he not beene otherwiſe perſuaded, both for that his whole fleet was not yet come, and the time of the yere began to grow vnſeaſonable, and the weather tempeſtuous. But whileſt he there ſtayed, paſſing the Winter, the plague (one of the readie attendants of great armies) began to ariſe in the campe, which dayly increaſing, had in ſhort time taken away a great number of men, and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort. Amongſt whom were Robert Biſhop of Beauvais, Iohn Countie Montfort, the Counties of Vendoſme and Dreux, Archambaut Lord of Burbon, with diuers other Knights & Gentlemen, to the number of 240. ſo that by force of the infectious contagion, the King was conſtrained to diuide his armie into diuers places of the Iſland, attending vntill the infection ſhould ceaſe. In the meane time the Templars hauing in ſuſpect both the French and the Turkes, (the Turkes, for feare they ſhould ouerrun all; the French, leſt hauing gotten the victory, they ſhould take all into their owne hands, and ſo diminiſh their power and authoritie wherewith they tyranniſed ouer the other poore Chriſtians) I ſent Embaſſadors ſecretly vnto Meledin Sultan of Ægypt, to perſuade him betimes to come to ſome good agreement for peace, ſo to auert the power of the French King from doing him further harme, or proceeding further in that war. Of which motion the Sultan well liking, ſent one of his noblemen to intreat with the maſter of the Templars concerning a peace, ſo that it might be by conſent of the French. The Templars glad of ſo honourable a meſſage, writ vnto the French King out of Siria, how the matter ſtood; perſuading him to accept of the peace offered, ſetting out in great words, the Sultans great preparations and power. And ſo indeed had abuſed the King, had not the King of Cyprus acquainted with his doings, perſuaded him that it was but a fineneſſe of the great maſter, and that he had firſt ſent vnto the Sultan, and procured that nobleman to bee ſent: which the King vpon conſideration perceiuing to be true, K fed the Turks Embaſſador with hope of peace, but writ vnto the Maſter of the Templars, vpon the price of his head, from thenceforth not to receiue any embaſſage from the enemie, or to haue any further intelligence with him.

Winter now paſt, and the plague well ceaſed, diuers noble gentlemen and great commaunders which following the king, and ſetting forth ſomewhat late, or for feare of the plague had ſtayed by the way, and wintred ſome in one place ſome in another, began to repaire vnto Cyprus: as Robert duke of Burgondie, who hauing wintred in Achaia, came now in the beginning of the Spring vnto the king, with a number of good horſemen; and with him, William Prince of Achaia, with a great fleet out of Peloponeſus, which country, with moſt part of Grecia, was then vnder the command of the Latines; amongſt others came alſo William ſyrnamed Longeſpie, Earle of Salisburie, with a band of luſtie tall ſouldiers. So the army being met together, L and all things againe in readineſſe, King Lewis departing from Cyprus, and toſſed at ſea with contrarie winds, about fiue days after fell with the coaſt of Ægypt, and there with all his fleet came before the ſtrong town of Damiata, being (as wee haue ſaid) the key of that kingdome. The Sultan long before vnderſtanding of the French Kings purpoſe for the inuaſion of his country, had ſtrongly fortified his frontier townes, and put into them ſtrong garriſons, beſide the great power he kept with himſelfe in readines at all aſſaies, as occaſion ſhould require. Vpon the approch of the Chriſtians, the gouernor of Damiata was readie vpon the ſhore, with a number of braue ſouldiers to keepe them from landing; who neuertheleſſe reſolutely before ſet down for the performing of that they came for, manning forth their long boats with their M archers and croſſebowes to beat the enemie from the ſhore, ran a ground with their other ſmal boats, made of purpoſe for the landing of men; and ſo without longer ſtay came to handie blowes; where for a while was fought a moſt ſharpe and cruell battell, the Chriſtians ſtriuing to land, and the Turkes to keepe them off, many falling on both ſides. But what ſhould

A ſhould an handfull doe againſt ſo many? The Turks oppreſſed with the multitude ſtill landing more and more, and hauing done what was poſſible for them to doe, fled into the towne, leauing behind them their gouernor, with fiue hundred of their beſt ſoldiers dead on the ſhore.

This citie of Damiata was exceeding rich and populous, and had in the former warres not bin taken but by more than a yeares ſiege, (as is before declared) and that not ſo much by the valour of the Chriſtians, as by the extremity of the plague and famin: ſince which time it had bin ſtrongly fortified by the Turks, with deepe ditches, high wals, and ſtrong bulwarkes, and was at that time wel ſtored with victuals alſo, and al things els for the induring of a long ſiege. Neuertheleſſe, the ſoldiers that were left, and the citizens (diſcouraged with the loſſe of their gouernor, and remembrance of the miſeries before indured in the former ſiege, and ſeeing the B Chriſtians now ready againe to beſiege the ſame) the night following, a little before the break of day, ſet fire euery man vpon his owne houſe, and ſo by a bridge which they had made of boats fled ouer the great riuer, breaking the bridge when they were ouer, for feare their enemies ſhould thereby haue followed after them. The Chriſtians perceiuing their flight, without reſiſtance entred the city, and being ſtrangers, did what they could to quench the fire, and to ſaue that which the inhabitants themſelues would faine haue with fire deſtroyed; and ſo afterwards found great aboundance of riches, with plentifull ſtore of all manner of victuals, wherewith the ſouldiers both inriched and refreſhed themſelues. This ſo happy and vnexpected a victorie happened vnto the Chriſtians about the beginning of October, in the yeare 1249. Sultan Meledin himſelfe, diſcouraged with the loſſe of ſo ſtrong a citie, offered vnto the C French King for the redeeming thereof, and to haue peace at his hands, more territorie in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, than the Chriſtians had of long time before: which large offer was by the French, eſpecially by the Earle of Arthois the Kings brother, proudly reiected, and Alexandria the moſt famous port and metropoliticall citie of Ægypt, further demanded, to the great diſcontentment of the Turks and Saraſins. In theſe troubles died Meledin the old Sultan, a man not much beloued of his people: in whoſe ſtead Melech-ſala (or Melexala, as ſome call him) a valiant and couragious Prince, wel beloued of his ſubiects, and but euen then returned out of Syria and Arabia, where he had beene to craue ayd of the other Mahometane Princes, was choſen Sultan. Which Princes, eſpecially the Sultan of Damaſco, although they had not of long beene at any good accord amongſt themſelues, or with the Ægyptian; D yet in this common danger of their ſuperſtition, which by the loſſe of Ægypt was like to bee greatly weakened, they ioined hands together, and ſo ſent him great ayd.

The citizens of Damiata ſet fire vpon the citie, and run away by the light.

The new Sultan thus ſtrengthened, drew neerer vnto the Chriſtians, which then lay encamped not far from Damiata, and had with them a hot skirmiſh, wherein he was put to the worſe, & ſo with ſome loſſe glad to retire. But the Chriſtians the next day, in hope of like ſucceſſe ſallying out again were ouerthrowne, with ten times more loſſe than was he the day before, and ſo faine to flie vnto the campe. By which victorie the Sultan encouraged, began now to conceiue better hope of the ſucceſſe of his wars; and by ſtopping the paſſages both by water and land, to prouide, that no victuals could without great perill be brought either vnto the citie or the campe, inſomuch that at length victuals began to grow ſcarce in both: whereof E the Sultan was not ignorant, as beeing thereof throughly informed by ſuch fugitiues, as for want or other cauſes, oftentimes fled out of the French campe into his.

Winter thus paſſing, and wants ſtill increaſing, it fortuned that the gouernor of the great citie of Caire (vpon the fortune whereof depended the ſtate of the whole kingdom) a man not euill affected vnto the Chriſtian religion, and in his heart highly offended with the Sultan, for the death of his brother by him wrongfully executed; by ſecret meſſengers perſuaded the French king to come on with his army to the citie, the regal ſeat of the Sultan, promiſing him to deliuer it into his power, with ful inſtructions what he had in all points to do for the gaining thereof. Whereupon the King, who had before of himſelfe purpoſed the ſame exploit, but now filled with a greater hope, aſſembled together the greateſt forces he was able to make. At F which time alſo he ſent for the Earle of Salisburie, with the reſt of the Engliſhmen, who for many proud indignities offered them by the French (eſpecially by the Earle of Artois the kings brother) whereof they could haue no redreſſe, were gone to Ptolemais, without purpoſe to haue any more ſerued in thoſe wars: but now being ſent for by the King, with promiſe of better vſage and honorable recompence for the wrongs paſt, returned againe into Ægypt,

there to doe their last endeuor. With whose comming the King strengthned, but more by the new supplies brought vnto him by his brother Alphonsus out of France, leauing the Duke of Burgundie with a conuenient garrison, with the Queene his wife, Odo the Popes Legate, and diuers other great Ladies in Damiata, he himselfe set forward with his army towards Caire. Of whose comming the Sultan hearing, and loth vpon the fortune of one battel to aduenture his whole estate, offered by his embassadors to restore vnto him all the land of Palestine, with a great summe of money for the defraying of their charges of those wars, and all the prisoners he had taken, so that he would redeliuer vnto him the citie of Damiata, and ioyne with him in league and amitie. Which faire offer for all that, the French King, by the perswasion of the Legat and others, refused. So the King marching still on, was to passe an arme of the great riuer Nilus (the Sultan on the other side still readie with his armie to stay his passage) which he had thought to haue made by a bridge of boats, prepared for the same purpose: but better conducted by a fugitiue Sarasine vnto a foord, before to him vnknowne, sent his brother Robert Earle of Arrois, with the third part of the armie before him, accompanied with the master of the Templars and the Earle of Salisburie, with their followers. Who passing the riuer at the aforesaid foord, suddenly assailed the Turks in their tents (the Sultan being then absent in solemnising one of their prophane feasts) and put them to flight. With which victory the French Earle aboue measure encouraged, would needs on forwards, as if hee would himselfe alone haue carried away the glorie of the whole conquest. Whom for all that certaine of the ancient Templars, better acquainted with the manners of that deceitfull nation than hee, and better considering also of their owne abilitie and strength, perswaded him to content himselfe with the honour hee had already got, and not to proceed any further in prosecuting of the enemie, vntill the comming of the rest of the armie; especially in that desperate estate of the enemie, wherein he was to win or lose all. Vnto whom the proud Earle in great dispight replied, that he would prosecute his victorie, and follow his good fortune; calling them dastards and cowards, opprobriously obiecting vnto them the common fame, whereby it was commonly reported, That the Holy land might long since haue beene againe vnited vnto the bodie of the Christian common-weale, but for the foule collusion of the false Templars and Hospitalers with the Turks and Infidels. With which reprochfull speech, the master of the Templars not without cause mooued, answered for himselfe and his fellowes, that he should, when he would and where he durst, display his ensignes, and he should find them as ready to follow as he was to goe before them. The Earle of Salisburie also willing to stint this strife, perswaded Earle Robert not to be so wedded to his own opinion, but to listen to the graue and wholsome counsell of the Templars, being men of great experience: and so turning vnto the master of the Templars began likewise with gentle words to pacifie him also. But whilest he was yet speaking, the Earle interrupting him with many opprobrious words, called him dastard and coward, and wished that the army were rid of him, and the fearefull cowards his countreymen. Whereunto the Earle of Salisburie answered, Well Generall, on in Gods name, and whersoeuer you dare set your foot, mine shall be as far as yours; and I beleeue we goe this day, where you shal not dare to come nigh my horses taile; as afterward indeed it proued. How be it the Earle so said, for that Earle Robert and the Frenchmen had many times in reproch and disdaine, after their manner, called him and his followers Englishtailes.

A faire offer fondly refused.

The proud earle constant in his former purpose, and not to be otherwise perswaded, set forward; and first assaulted a little towne or castle, not far off, called mansor, whereunto he inconsiderately approching, was notably repulsed; and hauing lost a number of his men, was as a man discouraged, about to haue retired. When suddenly the Sultan, neerer at hand than the Earle had thought, stirred vp with the noise of the alarum, came on with his whole power; and finding the army of the Christians now diuided (as he had long wished) with the multitude of his people enclosed them round, and had with them a great and mortall fight: wherein though the Christians right worthily behaued themselues, for the small number they were, yet oppressed with the multitude, and on euery side beset, they were slaine downe right. Then but all too late, it repented the Earle of his foolish rashnes, and that he had not hearkned vnto better counsel, and seeing the Earle of Salisburie valiantly fighting, cried out vnto him to flie, seeing God as he said fought against them. Whereunto the noble Earle answered no more, but God forbid that my fathers sonne should runne away from the face of a Sarasin. The French Earle thinkking by the swiftnes of his horse to haue saued his life, flying out of the battell, and taking the riuer of Thasnes, ouerladed with his armour, was there drowned. The Earle of Salisburie couragiously enduring the enemies charge, with his owne hand manfully slew many a Turke and Sarasin that day, vntill that at length hauing his horse slaine vnder him, and himselfe so wounded in the legs, as that he was not able longer to stand, yet vpon his knees laying about him like a desperate man, and selling his life as deere as he could, was there slaine, but not vanquished. With him perished the whole armie, so enclosed by the Sultan, that scarce any one escaped aliue, more than two Templars, one Hospitaler, and one common souldier, the messengers of this heauie newes.

About the same time also sickenesse daily increasing in the French campe, the king purposing to march forward to Caire, sent a great number of sicke and weake people downe the riuer of Nilus to Damiata: of whose going the Sultan vnderstanding, caused a great number of small boats to be carried in carts by land vnto the riuers side, which well manned, and meeting them by the way, set vpon them, and burnt or drowned them euery mothers sonne, sauing one only Englishman, called Alexander Giffard, who wounded in fiue places of his body, escaped yet into the French campe, reporting there what had happened vnto the rest.

Now had the Sultan also got intelligence of the compact betwixt the gouernour of Caire and the King, for the betraying of the city: and thereupon had caused him to be suddenly apprehended and put in safe keeping, vntil he were at better leisure to vnderstand farther of the matter: which no lesse troubled the French King, than did the former misfortune; al his hope for the yeelding vp of the city, being therby cut off. Thus his hopes together with his strength daily decreasing, he would haue gladly accepted of the conditions which he before refused which the Sultan, now growne very strong, would by no means heare of, but in stead thereof, by way of derision, sent to know of him, what was become of all his mattockes, forkes, rakes, sythes, plowes, & harrows, which he had brought ouer with him: and why he set them not to worke, but suffred them like an euil husband to rot and rust beside him? All which, with much more, the good king was glad to put vp: for now his forces greatly diminished, aswell by sicknesse, as by the former losses, finding himselfe far too weake, he would faine haue retired back again to Damiata: which the Sultan foreseeing, got so betwixt him and home, that now there was no remedy, but either to fight it out, or yeeld. The king himselfe had bin often before intreated by his nobilitie, whilst the riuer was yet vnpossessed by the enimie, to haue conueyed himselfe by water to Damiata, for that in the safetie of his person consisted (as they said) the safety of his kingdom, whatsoeuer became of them: whereunto he could neuer be perswaded, saying, that he would neuer forsake his people, because he would not be forsaken of them, but was resolued to indure with them whatsoeuer it should please God to lay vpon him: so passing the riuer by the same foord wherby his brother had not long before vnfortunatly passed, and comming to the place where the battell was fought, he might see the dead bodies of the Christians pitifully mangled, with their heads & hands cut off: for the Sultan, the more to encourage his soldiers, had before the battel proclaimed, that whosoeuer should bring him the head or hand of a Christian, should haue a great reward for his labor; in hope wherof, they had so dismembred them. But long he had not there staied, but that the Sultan began suddenly to appeare, with a most huge great army, as if he would euen with the sight thereof haue discouraged the Christians: against whom for all that, the Frenchmen in good order opposed themselues, and for the space of 3 houres made great resistance: but what could one do against ten, and he also fainting for sicknes & food? the hard plight wherin the greatest part of the French army then was. In conclusion, oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, and no way left to flie, they were all ouerthrowne and slain, except some few, saued in hope of great ransome. The king himselfe, with his two brethren, Alphonsus and Charles, and some few others, were taken prisoners, and brought vnto the Sultan: who demanding of him, what had moued him so to make war against him? was answered by the King, that it was for religion, and the defence of the name of his God. In this vnfortunat battel, fought the 5. of Aprill, in the yere 1250, besides the common soldiers, were slain most of the nobilitie of France, & all their tents taken.

The Sultan presently vpon this ouerthrow, sent of his owne soldiers the like number that the French were of, with French ensignes, and disguised in the attire of the slaine Frenchmen, to Damiata, where the Duke of Burgundie, the French Queene, and the Popes Legate lay; in

hope to haue bin so let in for Frenchmen: but they were not so wel masked, but that they were G by them of the citie discouered for enemies, and so kept out and deceiued of their purpose.

The Christians thus ouerthrowne, and the French king taken prisoner, Melech-sala the Sultan taking compassion vpon him, and yet minding of his life to make his owne gaine; cheering him vp with comfortable speeches, began to talke with him of his deliuerance, & of a good attonement to bee made betwixt them. The conditions whereof propounded by the Sultan were, That the King should forthwith deliuer again vnto him the citie of Damiata, and moreouer pay vnto him for the ransome of himselfe and his, and for the charges of the warre, eight thousand pound of gold: That all prisoners should on both sides be frankly set at libertie, and so a peace to be taken for ten yeres. For the more assurance wherof, the Sultan offred to sweare That if he failed in the performance thereof, to renounce his Mahomet: requiring also of the H king to sweare, If he failed in any thing that he had promised, to denie his Christ to be God: which prophane oath the King detesting, and wishing rather to die than to giue the same; the Sultan wondring at his constancie, took his word without any oath at all, and so published the league. But whilst they were comming together to Damiata, Melech-sala now in the pride of this victorie, fearing nothing lesse than the sudden change of fortune, or the mischiefe hanging ouer his head, was in the presence of a number of his noblemen suddenly slain by two desperat Mamalukes; and one Turquiminus a sturdie slaue of their owne order and vocation (by whose procurement it was supposed to haue been done) by the consent of the whole armie created Sultan in his stead: who reuoking the league before concluded by Melech-sala, made another in his owne name with the King, much vpon the same conditions that the other was; I which after he had receiued Damiata, he caused openly to be proclaimed. Neuertheless after [illegible] had paied his ransome, and was with the remnant of his armie by the Genowaies transported from Damiata to Ptolemais, the false miscreant performed not the halfe of that he had promised, of twelue thousand Christian captiues that should haue beene set free, scarce enlarging foure thousand; and killing all the sicke souldiers whom by his promise hee ought to haue relieued, neither suffering any Christian to carrie any of his goods with him out of Ægypt, which by the league he ought to haue done also.

The French King comming to Ptolemais, and purposing to haue returned home, was intreated by the master of the Templars and Hospitalers, and other the nobility of the Christians, to stay, which he did almost by the space of foure yeares: in which time he repaired the K cities of Cesarea & Ioppe, and fortified many strong places for the defence of the Christians againſt the Infidels: and so commending the protection thereof vnto the Knights of the sacred war, and sending his brethren away before him, followed after himselfe, greatly lamented for by all the Christians in Syria, and so arriued in France the sixt yeare from the time of his departing thence. This was the end of this long and vnfortunat expedition of Lewis the French King, wherein as some write, were eightie thousand Christians lost: Howbeit the French Chronicles extenuating their losse, report, of two and thirtie thousand French, six thousand to haue returned againe into France. The citie of Damiata in the space of a few yeares twice woon, and twice lost by the Christians, was shortly after the deliuering vp thereof, by the Sultan rased downe to the ground, becauſe it should no more serue the Christians for an en- L trance into his kingdome.

The beginning of the Mamalukes and their kingdome.

The late Ægiptian Sultans thus oftentimes inuaded by the Christian princes, and reposing no great assurance in the prowes of the effeminate Ægiptians, a people fitter for merchandize and other base occupations than for chiualrie and war, had for the strengthning of their kingdom, bought an infinit number of slaues, especially of the poore and hardie Circassians, called in antient time Getæ and Zinchi, neere vnto Cholchis and the Euxine sea, brought vnto Alexandria and other ports of Ægypt out of those bare cold countries, by merchants, and from thence transported to Caire & other cities of Ægypt: of which poore slaues, the late Ægiptian Sultans taking their choice, & culling out from the rest such as were like to be of greatest spirit and ability of body, deliuered them vnto most skilfull and expert teachers; by whome M they were carefully taught to run, to leape, to vaut, to shoot, to ride, with al other feats of actiuity, and withal cunningly to handle al manner of weapons, as well on horsebacke as on foot, and so instructed, and become cunning, were taken out of their schooles into pay, and inrolled togethe as the Sultans choice horsemen, were commonly called by the name of Mamalukes,

A lukes. In whose good seruice the late Sultans finding great vse, spared for no cost, both for their maintenance and increasing of their number; daily erecting new nurseries stored with yong frie, which growing vp and ready, was stil ioined to the other. It is wonderful to tel, vnto what a strength and glory this order of the Mamalukes was in short time grown, by the care of the Ægyptian kings: by them they managed their greatest affaires, especially in time of wars; and by their valour, not only defended their country, but gained many a faire victorie against their enemies, as they did now against the French: but as too much power in such mens hands, seldome or neuer wanteth danger, so fell it out now betwixt the late Sultan Melech-sala, and those masterfull Mamaluke slaues; who proud of their preferment, and forgetful of their duty, and seeing the greatest strength of the kingdom in their hands, traiterously slew Melech-sala The ruine of the Turks kingdom in Aegypt.
B their chiefe founder, setting vp in his place (as aforesaid) one Turquiminus, a base slaue, one of their owne order and seruile vocation, but indeed otherwise a man of a great spirit and valour. This Melech-sala murthered by the Mamalukes, was the last of the free born Kings of Ægipt; in whom the Turks kingdome in Ægypt, erected by Sarracon and the great Sultan Saladin (as is before said) and in his stocke and family euer since continued, tooke end, as did also all the power of the Turks in that great and rich kingdome. For the proud Mamalukes hauing now got the soueraignte into their hands, & exalted a Sultan out of themselues, imperiously commanded as great Lords ouer the rest of the people, not suffering them to haue the vse either of horse or armor, or to beare any sway in the common-weale: but keeping them vnder with most heauie impositions, and still preferring their owne slaues (wherewith the countrey of Ægypt C now swarmed) made the naturall countrey people, of all others most miserable, not daring to meddle with any thing more than Merchandise, their husbandrie, or other their base mechanicall occupations: whereof the greatest profit still came vnto the Mamalukes, who as Lords of all, with great insolencie, at their pleasure tooke it from them as their owne. As for the great Sultan, they still chose him from among themselues, not suffering any the Sultans children to succeed their fathers in the kingdome; for feare least they in processe of time, proud of their ancestors and parentage, should reckon of them as of his slaues (as indeed they were) and so at length bring in another more free kinde of gouernment.

Against which they prouided also, not only by this restraint of their Sultans children, but of their owne also: taking order and establishing it as an immutable law, That though the sons D of the Mamalukes might enioy their fathers lands and wealth after their death, yet that it should not be lawfull for them in any case to take vpon them the name or honor of a Mamaluke: so debarring them from all gouernement in the common wealth, to the intent it might still rest with the Mamalukes. Neither was it lawfull for any borne of Mahomatane parents (which could not be slaues) or of the race of the Iewes, to be admitted into that order; but only such as being borne Christians and become slaues, had from the time of their captiuitie bin instructed in the Mahometan superstition; or else being men growne, and comming thither, had abiured the Christian Religion (as many reprobates did in hope of preferment.) Right strange it is to consider, vnto what honour and glorie this slauish empire in short time grew: many of these poore slaues by rare fortune or secret diuine power, exalted out of the E dust vnto the highest degree of honor, prouing most excellent and renowned Princes, of such strength and power, as was dreadfull euen vnto the greatest Princes of the world. In which great glorie, this seruile empire (to the worlds wonder) flourished from this time amongst the greatest by the space of 267 yeares; vntill that hauing run the appointed race, it was with a great destruction by Selymus the victorious Emperour of the Turks, ouerthrowne in the yeare 1517, and the kingdome of Ægypt, with all Syria and the land of Palestine, brought into the forme of Prouinces, vnited vnto the Turks empire, as they are at this day, and as in the course of this historie shall in due time and place (God willing) at large appeare.

But leauing the kingdome of the Turks thus ouerthrowne in Ægypt, and the Mamalukes there triumphing, the French King returned into France, and the Christians in peace in Syria; F let vs againe returne into the lesser Asia, and vnto the imperiall Citie of Constantinople, whither the affaires both of the Turkes and of the Christians now call vs. All this while the Greeke empire (for so the Greekes will haue it called) flourished both in peace and plentie in the lesser Asia, vnder their Emperour Iohn Batazes: the power of the Latines in the mean time declining as fast at Constantinople, vnder the gouernment of the Latine Emperour

Baldwin

Baldwin the second. As for the Turks whom we left grieuously troubled both with famine and the often incursions of the Tartars, they had all this while, and yet also, enough and more than enough to doe to withstand the same enemie. At length it fortuned that Iohn Ducas the Greeke Emperour died, being at the time of his death about threescore yeares old, whereof he had happily raigned three and thirtie: by whose good and discreet gouernment, the Greek empire before brought low and almost to nought by the Latines, began againe to gather strength and to flourish both in Asia and some little part of Europe also. Of him are reported many notable matters; which as impertinent to our purpose I could willingly passe ouer, were I not by the worthy remembrance of one of them staied a while by the way.

This noble and famous Emperour hauing long lamented the death of the faire Empresse Irene his first wife, at last married another young Lady, the sister of Manfred King of Sicilie, called Anne, with whom amongst other honorable and beautifull dames, sent by the King her brother for the accompanying of her to Constantinople, was one Marcesina, a rare paragon, of such a feature as if nature had in her meant to bestow her greatest skill. From whose mouth alwayes flowed a fountaine of most sugred words, and out of her eyes issued (as it were) nets to intangle the amarous in: vpon this so faire an obiect, the Emperor not fearing further harme, tooke pleasure oftentimes to feed his eyes, vntill that at length caught with her lookes, he had lost his libertie, and was of a great Emperour become her thrall, in such sort, as that in comparison of her he seemed little or nothing to regard the yong Empresse his wife; but so far doated vpon her, that he suffered her to be attired and honoured with the same attire and honour that the Empresse was her selfe; whom she now so far exceeded both in grace and fauor with the Emperour, and honor of the people, as that she almost alone enioyed the same, without regard of her vnto whom it was of more right due. Whilst she thus alone triumpheth, at length it fortuned that she in all her glorie, attended vpon with most of the gallants of the court, and some of the Emperors guard, would needs goe (whether for her deuotion or for her recreation, I know not) to visit the monasterie and faire church, which Blemmydes (a Noble man of great renowne, both for his integritie of life, and learning) had of his owne cost and charges but lately built in the country, where he together with his monks, as men weary of the world, liued a deuout and solitarie contemplatiue life, after the manner of that time, with the great good opinion of the people in generall. This Blemmydes was afterward for his vpright life and profound learning, chosen Patriarch of Constantinople: which great honour, next vnto the Emperor himselfe, he refused, contenting himselfe with his cell. Marcesina comming thither in great pompe, and thinking to haue entred the church, had the doores shut against her by the Monks, before commanded so to do by Blemmydes their founder: and so was to her great disgrace kept out. For that deuout man deemed it a great impietie, to suffer that so wicked and shameless a woman, against whom he had most sharply both spoken and written, with her prophane and wicked feet to tread vpon the sacred pauement of his church. She enraged with this indignitie, hardly by so proud a woman to be with patience digested, and prickt forward by her flattering followers also, returning to the court, grieuously complained thereof vnto the Emperour, stirring him vp by all means she could to reuenge the same, persuading him to haue beene therein himselfe disgraced. Whereunto were ioyned also the hard speeches of her pickthanke fauourities, who to currie fauor, spared not as it were to put oyle vnto the fire, for the stirring vp of the Emperour to reuenge. Who with so great a complaint nothing moued vnto wrath, but strucke as it were to the heart with a remorse of conscience, and oppressed with heauinesse, with teares running downe his cheekes, and fetching a deepe sigh, said, Why prouoke you me to punish so deuout and iust a man? Whereas if I would my selfe haue liued without reproach and infamie, I should haue kept my imperiall maiestie vnpolluted or stained. But now sith I my selfe haue bin the cause both of mine owne disgrace, and of the empires; I may thanke mine owne deserts, if of such euill seed as I haue sowne, I now reape also an euill haruest.

The Emperor in loue with Marcesina.

Marcesina the Emperors concubine shut out of the Church.

Theodorus Lascaris chosen Emperour.

After the death of this good Emperor, Theodorus his son, borne the first yeare of his fathers raigne, being then about three and thirtie yeres old, was by the generall consent of the people saluted Emperour in his stead: who in the beginning of his empire renewed the league which his father had made with Iathatines the Turkish Sultan. And so hauing prouided for the securitie of his affaires in Asia, he with a puissant armie passed ouer the strait of Hellespontus into Europe, to appease the troubles there raised in Macedonia and Thracia, by the King of

A of Bulgaria his brother in law, and Michael Angelus the Despot of Thessalia; who vpon the death of the old Emperor began to spoile those countries, not without hope at length to haue ioyned them vnto their own: by whose comming they were for all that disappointed of their purpose, and glad to sue to him for peace. But whilest he was there busied, he was aduertised by letters from Nice, that Michael Paleologus, whom he had left there gouernor in his absence, was secretly fled vnto the Turks: with which newes he was not a little troubled. The cause of whose flight, as Paleologus himselfe gaue it out, was, for that he perceiued himselfe diuers wayes by many his enemies brought into disgrace, and the Emperors eares so filled with their odious complaints, so cunningly framed against him, as that they were not easily or in short time to be refelled: and therefore fearing in the Emperors heauie displeasure to bee suddenly B taken away, to haue willingly gone into exile, if so happily he might saue his life from the malice of them that sought after it.

At his comming to Iconium, he found Iathatines the Sultan making great preparation against the Tartars; who hauing driuen the Turks out of Persia and other the far Easterne countreys, (as is before declared) and running still on, did with their continuall incursions spoyle a great part of their territories in the lesser Asia also; and now lay at Axara, a towne not far off from Iconium: against whom the Sultan now making the greatest preparation he could, gladly welcommed Paleologus, whom he knew to be a right valiant and worthie captain, commending to his charge the leading of certaine bands of Greekes, whom hee had retained to serue him in those wars, as he had others of the Latines, vnder the conduct of Boniface Moline a Nobleman
C of Venice: and so hauing put all things in readinesse, and strengthned with these forrein supplies of the Greekes and Latines, set forward against his enemies the Tartars: who at the first sight of the strange ensignes and soldiers were much dismaied, fearing some greater force had been come to the aid of the Turks; neuertheless, ioining with them in battel had with them at the first a most terrible & bloudie conflict, wherein that part of the armie that stood against Paleologus and his Greeks, was put to the worse, to the great discomfiture of the Tartars, being euen vpon the point to haue fled, had not one of the greatest Commanders in the Turks army, and a nigh kinsman of the Sultans, for an old grudge that he bare vnto the Sultan, with all his regiment, in the heat of the battel reuolted vnto the Tartars: whereby the fortune of the battel was in a moment as it were quite altred, they which but now were about to haue fled, fighD ting like lyons; and they that were victors now glad to turn their backs & flie: in which flight a great number of the Turks fell, the fierce Tartars most eagerly pursuing them. Paleologus, with the Generall of the Turks, hardly chased by the Tartars, and glad euery houre to make a stand, and to fight for their liues, with much adoe, after many dayes flight recouered a castle of the Generals, neere vnto Castamona, and so saued themselues. The Tartars after this so great a victorie (wherein they had broken the whole strength of the Turks, and brought in hazard the whole state of their kingdome) without resistance forraged all the countries and prouinces subiect vnto the Turkish Sultan, making spoyle of whatsoeuer they light vpon: insomuch that the Sultan discouraged, & hauing now no strength left to oppose against them, fled vnto the Greeke Emperour Theodorus for aid; who most honorably entertained him, with all E his train, and comforted him with such small aid as he thought good then to spare him: which for his more safetie he sent home with him, vnder the leading of Isaacius Ducas, syrnamed Murtzufle, a man in great credit with him. In recompence of which kindnesse, the Sultan gaue vnto the Emperor the citie of Laodicea, whereinto he presently put a strong garrison: neuertheless, it was not long before it fell againe into the hands of the Turks, being a place not to be holden by the Greekes. Yet for all this, the Sultan finding himselfe stil too weake to withstand the continuall inuasions of the Tartars, and wearie of the harmes he dayly sustained, by the aduice of his chiefe councellors made a league with them, yeelding to pay them a certain yerely tribute, thereby to redeeme his peace. From which time the Tartars accounted of the Turks as of their tributaries and vassals.

F Not long after this, Michael Paleologus was by the Emperors kind and gratious Letters called home; with his faithful promise also before giuen for his security: who before his return bound himselfe also by solemne oath, to be vnto the Emperour and his sonne alwayes loyall, and from thenceforth neuer to seeke after the Empire, or giue cause of new suspect for such matters as he had beene before charged with: but for euer to yeeld vnto the Emperour, his sonne, sonne, or other his successors in the Empire, his dutifull obedience and fidelitie. Vpon which conditions he was againe made great Constable, and so receiued into the Emperors fauor, and liued the rest of his raigne in great honour and credit with him.

The death of Theodorus the Greek Emperor

Now Theodorus the Emperor hauing raigned 3 yeres, fell sicke & died, leauing behind him his sonne Iohn, then but a child of six yeres old, to succeed him in the empire: whom he vpon his death bed, together with the empire, commended to Arsenius the Patriarke, & one George Muzalo his faithful councellor, as to his trustie tutors, to see him safely brought vp, & the empire wel & peaceably gouerned. This Muzalo was a man of a meane parentage, but for his familiar acquaintance & ciuile behauiour, of a child brought vp in the court with the Emperour as his play fellow: with whom he growing vp, so framed himselfe to his manners & disposition, that he alone was vnto him in stead of all, still at hand, readie to say or do whatsoeuer might be vnto the Emperor gratious or pleasing. And the elder they grew, so increased this their mutual affection and loue also: in such sort, that with him now Emperour, he was of all others in greatest fauour and authoritie; a wary obseruer of his delights, a readie minister of his affairs, & faithful partaker of his secrets: for which he was in short time promoted vnto the greatest honors of the court, & honorably married vnto one of the Emperors nigh kinswomen; and now at his death, by his last wil, with the reuerend Patriarke appointed tutor to the yong Emperor & his two yong sisters. And for the more assurance thereof, a solemne oath of obedience to the yong Prince, as Emperor, and vnto them as his tutors, was exacted of al sorts of men, both high and low, of what vocation soeuer; and that not once, but first a little before the Emperors death, & again after he was now dead: for many of the nobilitie honourably discended, seeing the sudden change of Muzalo's fortune, among themselues murmured thereat, as grieuing at his preferment, seeing there were many among them, vnto whom both the tuition of the yong emperor, & administration of the empire, of better right appertained; insomuch as they were both neerer of kin vnto the Emperor, & fitter (as they thought) for so great a charge than was Muzalo; whom (as they said) they had many causes both to contemne & hate: For, beside that hee was not honorably borne, & had serued the late Emperor Theodore, as the minister of his wrath against some of the nobilitie, causes sufficient of the peoples hatred, if he should now also in so great authoritie affect the empire, it was by his malicious enemies vainly doubted, that hee would not spare to commit any manner of villanie for the effecting of his inordinat desire. Of all which Muzalo was not ignorant, a man at all other times of a most quicke apprehension for such matters, but as then especially, his wits being awaked with these so great motiues & dangers. Wherfore speedily calling together all the nobility into the court, he welcommed them one by one, & curteously discoursing with them, offred to discharge himselfe both of the administration of the empire, and tuition of the yong emperor, & willingly to yeeld the same to any one of them, whom the rest should thinke fittest for so great a charge: which though they all with one consent as it were refused, saying, That he was of all others to be preferred, vnto whom the emperor, lord both of the empire and the child, had committed the same: yet Muzalo earnestly requested them to the contrarie, & stifly withstood their desire, wishing indeed rather to haue led a quiet priuat life in securitie, than to haue bin so ouercharged; not so much for doubt of the enuy then arising, as for feare of some great danger therof to ensue. But would he, would he not, remedy there was none, but that as the late emperor had appointed, so must he take the charge vpon him. And now was euery one, as well of the nobilitie, as of the inferior sort, again with greater solemnitie than before, the third time sworn, to the vtmost of their power to defend the yong emperor in his empire, and Muzalo in the tuition of him, and administration of the affaires of the State, & faithfully to yeeld vnto them both all due honour and obedience: which if they should faile religiously to performe, they wished to themselues euery man, & to all theirs, a shamefull end and destruction. Yet notwithstanding all this solemne swearing, mixt most times with much forswearing, there was not fully nine days past, but that certain of the chiefe nobility, forgetful, or else careless of their oath, and ful of enuy, seldome satisfied but with bloud, conspired the vnworthie death of Muzalo the Protector both of the Emperour & the empire. The ninth day appointed for the funerall of the Emperour, was now come; at which time were met together at Sosandra (an abbey by himselfe built in the honor of the virgin Marie at Magnesia) many great ladies & graue matrons, to mourn as the manner was; all the great princes of the nobilitie, and among them the conspirators also: thither repaired

A paired also a number of souldiers prepared for the slaughter, with an infinite number of the common people, as at such solemnities is vsual. But what needs many words, while the hymns were yet in singing, and the obsequies performing, the soldiers as they were before instructed, suddenly breaking into the church with their drawn swords in their hands, slew Muzalo (then fled to the altar for refuge) with his two bretheren Andronicus & Theodorus, both men of great account, & diuers others appointed to the massacre. So the matrons and the rest of the multitude breaking off their mourning, & for feare thronging out one in anothers necke, fled as fast as they could, some one way, some another, as they thought for their best safety: but the priests & monks thinking to haue done the like, were by the imperious soldiers, whether they would or not, again inforced into the church; where tumbling one ouer another, as thronging in with Muzalo traiterously murdred in the church.

B great force & violence, and scarce able to stand by reason of the slipperines of the bloud there shed vpon the pauement, they in great feare made an end of those bloudie obsequies. This outrage appeased, Arsenius the Patriark, & only tutor of the yong emperor now left, was therwith yet much troubled, as with a thing dangerous both to the person of the yong prince, & quietnesse of the state; but what good course to take therein he could not tell: for as he was a man for his learning & integritie of life not inferior to the best, so in matters of state he was as farre to seeke: as it commonly hapneth, the contemplatiue man buried in his meditations, to be vnfit for temporal gouernment; whereas he that should performe both, must to his rare vertues and great learning ioyne a ciuil conuersation, with great experience in worldly affaires, not to be learned but by great and long practise. This reuerend father (of no great reach, yet wishing

C all well) calling together the nobilitie, consulted with them what were best to be done for the gouernment both of the yong Emperor and the empire, now that Muzalo was dead; not considering in the mean time, who they were with whom hee consulted, or, that councel grounded vpon no wise foresight, or approoued experience, was more dangerous vnto him whome hee would haue prouided for, than all the enemies murthering swords, as shortly after appeared.

Amongst others of the nobilitie called to councel, was Michael Paleologus (of whom we haue before spoken) much superior to the rest, as discended of the imperiall house of the Comneni, a man of a cheerefull countenance, gracious and curteous, and withall exceeding bountifull and liberall, whereby he easily woon the hearts of all men in generall, but especially of the Colo-

Michael Paleologus aspireth.

D nells, captains, and other martiall men, commanders in the armie: of whose aspiring to the Empire, many presages and common rumors (not always vaine) had in former time passed also, to the mouing of many: yea the Patriarke himselfe not considering his haughtie and aspiring nature, made no lesse account of him than did the rest, but vpon an especiall fauor, committed to his only trust the keyes of the common treasure, at such time as mony was to be deliuered out for payment of the armies, or other like great occasions of the state; the most effectual means for the furtherance of his secret practises, and the readiest way for the effecting of that he had so long before plotted: for hauing in his fingring such a masse of treasure, as hee might well haue wished, but neuer reasonably hoped for, hee poured it out as it were by bushels, amongst the nobilitie and martiall men, and such others as he thought were able to doe most with the people; amongst whom were many of the clergie also: of which his fauorits were made ma-

E nie meetings, and by them was the Patriarke continually solicited, but yet in generall termes, without delay (according to the necessitie of the time) to take order for the good gouernment of the state, which now as a great ship in the middest of the sea without a master, was (as they said) in danger to perish, and being once lost, was not to be againe recouered. At which time also the name of Paleologus was in euery mans mouth, as the only man for his wisdome and experience fit to take vpon him the charge and gouernment of the empire, vntil the yong emperor were come to age. Vnto which common good liking, the Patriarke also (seeing no more, or peraduenture not so much as the rest) gaue his consent: and so without longer stay, to the great contentment both of the nobilitie and people in generall, made him gouernor of the empire, and tutor to the yong Emperor, wanting now nothing of an Emperor himselfe, more than the

F title and imperiall ornaments. This was the first step whereby the aspiring man (twice before in disgrace with the two late Emperors, Iohn Ducas, and his son Theodorus) mounted at last vnto the Empire.

It was not many days after, but that his fauorits held another councel, wherein it was alledged, That it was not seemly for him that was tutor vnto the Emperour, gouernour of the state and and empire, and to giue audience vnto the Embassadours of forreine nations, to want the ho- G nour next vnto the Emperor, as well for the magnificence of the State, as for the credit of his place: whereupon he was both by the Patriarke and the yong Emperor honored with the title of the Despot, another step vnto the empire. But what contentment finde the ambitious euen in the greatest honours, so long as there is one aboue them? Little sure, or none at all, more than that it serueth them to step at next vp to the highest: as did this new made Despot, who shortly after, was by certain of the nobilitie his great fauorits, neere vnto Magnesia, with the great applause of the people, hoysed vp and saluted Emperor. Whereof Arsenius the Patriarke hearing, was therewith much troubled, as fearing what would become of the young child, the right heire of the empire. And first he was about to haue excommunicated as well him that was made Emperor, as them that had so made him: but afterward changing his pur- H pose, for feare of greater troubles, he thought it better by solemne oath to bind both him and the rest, that they should not seek after the life of the child, or by any force or colour go about to depriue him of the Empire; which was so done. Yet it was not full a moneth after, but that euen he that had so great a care of the young child, and so prouided for his safetie, (perswaded by them of the nobilitie and clergie) with his owne hands, and all the accustomed ceremonies, Michael Paleologus crowned Emperor by Arsenius the Patriarke. set the imperiall crowne vpon this vsurpers head; yet not as vpon him that should still enioy the empire, but as vpon a man according to the present necessitie of the time and state, thought fittest for so great a charge, vntill the young child came to age; vnto whom then hee was to giue place, and to resigne to him the Empire. All which being by more solemne oath than before, confirmed, good news (as the certaine signes of his fortunate gouernment) were brought I vnto him of a great victorie obtained by his captaines, against Michael Angelus Despot of Aetolia and Epirus: who hauing married the late Emperors daughter, & hearing of his death, with the troubles in Asia, aided by the King of Sicilia, and the Princes of Peloponesus and Achaia, his sonnes in law, had thought in that hurle and perturbation of the State, to haue taken to himselfe the greatest part of the Emperors territories in Macedonia and Thracia; and for the same purpose was with a great armie entred into them, burning and spoyling the countrey before him: whereof Michael Paleologus (then but newly made Despot) hauing intelligence, sent his brother Iohn, and some other his best captaines, with a great armie against him, by whom he with his complices were put to the worse, and not without great losse enforced to retyre: the ioyfull newes whereof he receiued euen as he was crowned. Which was shortly K after confirmed by the comming of the great Commaunders themselues, bringing with them the Prince of Peloponesus and Achaia, by them taken prisoner; who for his ransome was afterward glad to giue vnto the Emperor Paleologus, Monembasia, Maine, and Sparta, three of the best cities of Peloponesus: whereinto he put strong garrisons vnder the command of Constan-tinus his brother by the mothers side, a right valiant captaine. By whose good seruice, and the commodious scituation of the places, he gained diuers other townes and cities, and at length the greatest part of Peloponesus, out of the hands of the Latines: for the vtter rooting out of whome, hee shortly after with a great Armie passed ouer into Thracia, with purpose (as was thought) to haue besieged Constantinople: but finding it to bee a matter of more difficultie than was before supposed he left that, and laid siege to the castle of Pera ouer against it on the L other side of the hauen, in hope by winning of that castle, to haue become master also of the towne: which he was not able to effect, and enforced with losse to retyre. Sorting with his armie he fortified diuers castles and strong holdes in the countrey about Constantinople. And Constantinopolitans, and [illegible] as much as possible, that they should become

Now raigned at Constantinople the Latine Emperor Baldwin the second (as it before declared) a man of good courage, and lesse power, and therefore not much regarded either of the Greeks or Latines: Who for the maintenance of his state, was glad to sel away the publike ornaments of the citie, and to pawne his ion vnto the Bruges merchants for money; by whom he was

A was left at Venice to be brought vp: which gaue occasion for some writers to report, That he was pawned vnto the Venetians.

an exceeding great armie against the Turkes and Sarasins in Syria and the Land of Palestine.
This Haalon (conuerted also vnto the Christian faith by his wife) setting forward with a world Haalō the Tartar sent with a great Armie against the Turks of people following him, in the space of six moneths ouerran all Persia, with the countries ad-B ioyning, excepting one strong place in the mountains, (which some say was Samarchand, afterward the royall seat of the great terror of the world, the mightie Tamerlane) which besieged by ten thousand horsemen, by him appointed for that purpose, and so continued by the space of seuen and twentie yeres after, was then at length (as Aiton himselfe writeth) yeelded by the defendants, only for want of cloathes to couer their nakednesse. Haalon (in whose armie those ten thousand left behind were not missed, marching on, and as a violent tempest bearing all down before him, entred at length into Assiria, and there layd siege vnto the great citie of Babylon, then the seat of the great Caliph; whom all the Mahometan Princes honoured aboue all others, as the true successor of their great Prophet Mahomet, and receiued from his mouth the interpretation of their law as most diuine oracles. Which great citie Haalon woon, and putting to sword all he found therein, men, women, and children, with the spoile thereof, and the rich treasures of the Caliph, inriched his souldiers. The Caliph himselfe (reserued for that purpose) he commanded to be set in the middest of the infinite treasure which he and his C predecessors had most couetously heaped vp together, and that he should of that gold, siluer, and precious stones take what it pleased him to eat, saying (by way of derision) That so gain-full a guest should by good reason be fed with nothing but things of greatest price, whereof he willed him to make no spare: in which order the couetous wretch kept for certaine dayes, miserably died with hunger, in the middest of those things whereof he thought he should neuer haue had enough; which though they were in valew great, and with great care laid together, yet serued they him not now to suffice nature, best contented with a little. Babylon thus sacked, and almost rased, the Tartar marching on through Mesoporamia, by the way tooke the Citie Rhoais, where Aiton the Armenian King, and authour of this the Tartars expedition, came to him with twelue thousand horsmen, and fortie thousand foot, as reporteth Aiton townes sometime belonging vnto the Kingdome of Antioch. Then was one Malacnesir Sultan of Damasco, commanding ouer all Syria and the land of Palestine: who terrified with the losse of his Cities, and the feare of farther danger, with his wife and children came and humbled himselfe before the Tartar Prince, in hope so to haue saued vnto himselfe some good part of his kingdome. Wherein he was much deceiued, beeing (as some say) carried away afarre off into exile; because hee should not hinder the Tartars proceedings: or as others report, and happily with more probabilitie) being by him detained as his prisoner, and afterwards to the terrour of his foe, cut in peeces in his sight vnder the walles of Damasco, after terwards tooke by strong hand, and sacked it, and by the perswasion of his wife ouerthrew all the Mahometan temples, as hee had before in euery place where he came. But purposing to haue gone forward to Ierusalem, and to haue conquered the whole land of Palestine, news was brought him of the death of his brother Mango, the great Chan: whereupon he layd his iourney, and returned backe againe, in hope of the great empire, hauing in this expedition [illegible] of six yeares.

Thus ouer the Tartars vastie kingdome of the Turkes at Damasco ouermuch for winter time, the broken affaires of the Christians in Syria and the land of Palestine might easily haue been repaired, and those two gainfull kingdomes againe restored to the Christian Common-F wealth, had the Christian Princes of the West then in time put to their helping hand, or come [illegible] as the Tartars on the other: but they then at vaine dilcord amongst themselues and busied with their warres at home, let slip that so faire an opportunitie, the like whereof they [illegible] neuer had since. Haalon the Tartar Prince in token of his good will toward the Christians and their affaires, at his departure from Damasco left his sonne Albaga there with twentie

twentie thousand horsemen to aid them in their warres, if they should come (as was expected) for the recouerie of the Holy land: who hauing there stayd some while, and hearing of his fathers troubles at home, followed himselfe after him; but yet left behind him Guirboca a valiant Captaine, with ten thousand of his horsemen, to like purpose that his father had him: who by the insolencie of certaine Christian souldiers in garrison about Sidon, was of a friend, together with his Tartars, made a foe. These garrison souldiers hauing by chance set in some bootie out of the Tartars territorie, not onely refused to restore the same againe, but also foulely entreated such as the Tartar had sent for the demanding thereof. Whereupon further quarrels arising, it fortuned a nephew of Guirboca's, a valiant young gentleman, to be slaine: in reuenge whereof hee besieged Sidon, and hauing taken it, sacked it, and burnt it downe to the ground. After which time, hee and his Tartars became vtter enemies vnto the Christians, doing them all the harme they could deuise.

The Ægyptian Sultan inuadeth Syria.

This discord betwixt the Tartars & the Christians, gaue occasion vnto Melech the Ægyptian Sultan, now iealous of the Tartars neernesse, with a great armie of his Mamalukes & others to enter into Syria, and to spoile the countrey of Damasco; against whom Guirboca with his Tartars, although both in strength and number far inferior, went out. But ioyning battell with him at too much odds, and the victorie inclining vnto that side where most strength was, hee there valiantly fighting was slaine, with most part of his Tartars: such as escaped fled into Armenia vnto the friendly king. By this victorie, all Syria, with the land of Palestine, excepting some few places holden by the Christians, fell again into the hands of the Ægyptian Sultans; as did some of them shortly after also: for Bandocader succeeding Melech in the Mamaluke kingdome, comming into Syria with a great armie, tooke Antioch from the Christians, and with it most of the places before by them defended. The citie he burnt, and rased the Castle down to the ground, and afterward entring into Armenia, did there great harme also.

Whilest the Turks kingdome thus goeth to wracke in Syria, ruinated by the Tartars, but possessed by the Mamalukes; their affairs in the lesser Asia, now the whole hope of that Nation, went not at that time much better: for Iathatines the Turks Sultan, there also inuaded by the Tartars, and hauing lost Iconium his regall citie, fled with his brother Melech to the Greek Emperor Michael Paleologus, in hope to be of him relieued, for the kindnesse hee had not long before shewed him in like case, when as he fled from the late emperor Theodore; whereof now putting him in remembrance, hee requested him either with some conuenient force to aid him, or else to assigne him some corner in his large empire, where he might in safetie rest with his wife & children, and other followers, whom with much wealth he had brought with him in great number. The Emperor on euery side himselfe incombred with warres, thought it not good in so great newnesse of his empire, to diminish his owne forces: and to assigne vnto him any place to inhabit, seemed no lesse dangerous; for that he hauing been a great Prince, and commanding ouer many great countries, and brought vp in all princely royaltie, was not like to content himselfe with a little: beside that, his nobility, then dispersed by the Tartars, were like enough in great numbers to resort vnto him, as vnto their head, so soone as they should once heare that he were seated in any place: and vnkindly to cast him off, that had so nobly vsed him in like extremitie, the Emperor was loath. And therefore feeding him vp with faire words, & foording him on from time to time with delays, he held him a great while as a man in suspence, betwixt hope and despaire. At length in the absence of the Emperor (though happily not without his priuitie) he was commanded with all his traine, in number about twelue hundred, to get him to Ænus a citie of Thracia, standing vpon the sea coast: where hee much discontented, liued like an honorable prisoner at large; but with the watchfull eyes of so many vpon him, as that he could by no meanes (as he desired) escape. In which case we will for a while leaue him, to feed vpon his owne melancholy thoughts.

1261. Now had Michael Paleologus the Emperor raigned at Nice two yeares, when new troubles began again to arise in the West part of his Empire in Europ side, by the treachery of Michael Angelus Despot of Epirus. For the speedie repressing whereof, he sent one Alexius Strategopulus, a worthie captaine, and a man of great nobilitie (whom for his good seruice against the said Despot, he had in the beginning of his raigne made Cæsar) with little aboue 800 Bythinian Souldiers, and Commission for the taking vp of so many mo as hee should for that seruice need, in Macedonia and Thracia: commanding him when hee had passed the streight, with those those souldiers to take his wayes thorough the suburbs of Constantinople, to terrifie the Latines, whom he was loth to suffer too long to liue in rest and quiet, or to stirre too farre out of the gates, but to keepe them as prisoners coupt vp within the wals of the citie. This warlike captaine with this handfull of men, passing ouer Propontis, encamped at Regium, not farre from Constantinople; where by chance lighting vpon certain poore labouring men, Greeks borne in the citie, and there dwelling, hee diligently inquired of them the state thereof, and of what strength the Latines were, with many other things, such as he was desirous to know: who not onely told him that the strength of the Latines was but small, but also that the greatest part thereof was gone to the siege of Daphnusia, a towne not farre off vpon the side of the Euxine sea: and withall (as Greekes euill affected to the gouernment of the Latines, and desirous of the libertie of their countrey) offered of themselues to shew him a meanes how to giue him entrance into the citie. These poore men dwelt within the citie, close by one of the gates, neere whereunto by an old ruinous mine almost swarued vp, was a secret vnsuspected way into the citie, not knowne to any but to themselues: by this blind hole they promised him by night to receiue in fiftie of his best souldiers; which suddenly setting vpon the watch fast by, and dispatching them out of the way, might presently breake open the gate, and so let in the rest of the army: whereunto they promised themselues with their friends to put to their helping hands, assuring him of the good successe thereof. This plot for the betraying of the citie thus laid and agreed vpon, Alexius and Cæsar well rewarding the men, and filling them with greater promises sent them away: who as if they had bin about their countrey work, were after their wonted manner receiued into the citie, without suspition at all. And within a few daies after according to their promise, at an appointed houre receiued in by night the aforesaid fiftie souldiers; who aided by them, presently slew the watch, and brake open the gate, whereby Alexius entring a litttle before day, in conuenient place put his men in order of battell, and afterward to the greater terror of the Latines, caused the citie to be set on fire in foure places, which increasing with the winde, burnt in most terrible manner, and was in short time come almost vnto the Emperors palace. Who scarce well awaked, and seeing the citie all on a fire about his eares, and the enemie comming on, was about at the first with those few Latines that he had (for Greekes he had none) to haue made head against them. But better aduised, and perceiuing it to be now to no purpose, hee (the last of the Latine Emperors that euer raigned in Constantinople) with Iustinian the Latine Patriarch, and some other of his friends, fled by sea into Euboea, and so from thence afterwards to Venice, and afterwards to Lewis the French King, in hope to haue beene by him and the Venetians relieued. After whom fled also all the rest of the Latines. Thus the imperiall citie of Constantinople by great fortune fell againe into the hands of the Greekes, in the yeare 1261, after that it had beene in possession of the Latines about 58 yeares.

The ioyful news of the recouerie of the imperiall citie, was in short time carried vnto Michael Paleologus the Greeke Emperor at Nice; who at the first beleeued it not, as thinking it scarce possible, so strong a citie to haue bin by so weake a power surprised, wheras he himselfe not long before was not able with a right puissant army, and much other like prouision, to win the castle of Galata ouer against it. But afterwards assured of the truth thereof, with his hands and eyes cast vp towards heauen, gaue most heartie thanks to God therefore, causing hymnes and psalmes of thanksgiuing to be solemnly sung in euery church, with all the other signes of ioy and triumph that could be deuised. So setting all other things apart, hee wholly busied himselfe in making preparation for his going vnto Constantinople, now once again the seat of the Greeke empire: wherein, and in trauelling hauing spent many dayes, hee at length with the Empresse his wife and Andronicus his sonne, then but two yeares old, as if it had been in solemne procession, on foot entred into the citie, by the Gate called the Golden Gate; and so after prayers and thankes giuen, went to the palace prepared for him neere vnto the Tiltyard: for the other imperiall palaces of greater beautie (sometime the stately dwellings of the greatest Emperours of the Greekes) had now of long during the raigne of the Latines, lien ruinous, or altogether defaced. And shortly after, because vertue and true desert should not want their due honour, he caused Alexius Cæsar (by whose meanes the citie was recouered) in solemne triumph in his roabs of honour, with a crowne vpon his head, not much inferiour vnto the imperiall crowne, with great pompe to be carried thorow all the citie: and farther commanded, that his name for one yeare next following, in all solemne praiers and hymnes of thansgiuing, should be ioyned with the name of the Emperor himself. And yet not thinking to haue done him honour enough, caused his liuely image afterward to be most curiously made, and as a trophie to be set vpon a faire marble pillar, before the great church of the holy Apostles, in perpetuall remembrance of him, and that he had done for the deliuerie of his countrey; which shortly after ouerthrowne by an earthquake, was by his son againe restored. Now was this great and famous citie, sometime the beautie of the world, by these strange and fatall mutations, wonderfully defaced, and brought to great desolation: in euery place was to be seene great heapes, or rather (to say the truth) great hils of rubbidge, the eternall witnesses of the ruine thereof; the houses stood some quite fallen downe, some readie to follow after, and some other great and stately buildings now the small reliques of great fires: for the great beautie thereof was before, at such time as the Latines tooke it, most defaced by fire; who all the time that they had it, ceased not night and day to destroy some part or other of it, as if they had knowne they should not long keepe it; neither did this last fire raised by the Greeks themselues to terrifie the Latins, a little deforme it: for which cause the Emperors chiefe care now was to cleanse the citie, and in best sort he could to reform so great a confusion of things not to be all at once amended; first beginning with the churches, which ruinous or ready to fall, he repaired; and next to that filled the emptie houses with new inhabitants. And albeit that the chiefe of the Latines were together with the Emperour fled and gone, yet was the most part of the artificers and tradesmen of the citie, Venetians, and of them of Pisa, mingled together; vnto whom also to ioyne the Genowaies, and so to fill the citie with Latines, he thought it not altogether safe, although that by them he reaped great profit: wherefore he assigned vnto them the citie of Galatia now called Pera, on the other side of the hauen, for them to inhabit; granting them great priuiledges, and euery of those companies to be gouerned by a Consull or Potestate of their owne. As for the imperiall citi eit selfe, he stored it (so neere as he could) with naturall Greekes borne.

Now although all things went as Paleologus the Emperor could himselfe haue wished; yet could he not rest so contented, for feare lest those which now did eat their owne hearts, and with great griefe smouldred their anger, should at length as the rightfull heires of the empire by him vsurped, breake out into open force, and so breed him great troubles, yea and perhaps worke his confusion. For such is the tormenting state of vsurping tyrants, neuer to think themselues safe so long as any one liueth, whom they may suspect. Wherefore at once to rid himselfe of this feare, he thought it best so to dispose of the children of the late Emperor, Theodorus Lascaris, as that he should not need of them to stand in doubt: to take them out of the way, besides that it was a thing odious, he saw it like to be vnto him dangerous; Mary and Theodora (two of the eldest daughters) beeing before by their father married vnto two great Princes, (one the Despot of Epirus, and the other Prince of Bulgaria) with whom he had much before to do, and of them yet stood in some doubt; but these was safe enough out of his reach. Other two yonger sisters there were in his custodie, Theodora and Irene, with their brother Iohn, the only heire of the empire: Theodora he married vnto one Belicurt, a gentleman of Peloponesus; and Irene to one Vigintimilio of Genoa; both Latines, men of no great birth or power, such as he needed not to stand in doubt of. These two Ladies, the daughters of so great an Emperour as was Theodorus, thus basely bestowed; remained onely their brother Iohn, the onely heire of the empire, then but ten yeare old, whom Paleologus long before euen in the beginning of his raigne, had sent vnto Magnesia, there to be safely kept farre off from the court; for feare least ginne some new stirres dangerous vnto his estate. Which indignitie done vnto the young Prince, Arsenius the Patriarch (put in trust by his father for the bringing of him vp) tooke in so euill part, that he forsooke the court with all his ecclesiasticall dignitie, and as a man weary of the world, retired himselfe vnto a little monasterie of Pascasius in the countrey; there to spend the rest of his dayes. From whence for all that hee was after the taking of Constantinople from the Latines, almost against his will drawne thither by Paleologus the Emperour, and made Patriarch thereof, there together with so great an honour to finde his greater discontent. For Paleologus the vsurper, altogether vnmindfull of his faith so solemnly before giuen, for the safetie of the young Prince, and the restoring vnto him of his empire; and now

A now fully resolued to establish vnto him and his posteritie the soueraignetie of so great an empire, howsoeuer it was got, caused the yong Princes eies to be most cruelly put out: the vsual practise of the tyrants of the East, vpon such as they are loth or feare to kill, and yet would make them vnfit for gouernment. Of which barbarous crueltie, his sister Theodora (married to Constantinus Prince of Bulgaria) hearing, ceased not with teares and praiers and all other womanly persuasions, to stirre vp her husband in reuenge thereof: whereunto also Iathatines the Turkes Sultan, gaue no small furtherance; who wearie of exile, and to bee so into a corner confined as into a prison from whence he might not start, by secret messengers intreated the Bulgarian Prince to make war vpon the vsurping Emperor: promising him a great summe of mony, if by his helpe he might recouer his former libertie. Wherewith hee the rather mo-

Paleologus causeth the young Emperors eyes to be put out.

B ued, with a great power of his owne, and aboue twentie thousand Tartars which then lay by the riuer Ister, suddenly brake into the Emperours territories, and in shorter time than was to haue beene thought, ouerranne all the countrey of Thracia, euen vnto the Sea side, leauing neither man nor beast in all that countrey as hee went: in good hope also to haue by the way surprised the Emperour himselfe, euen then returning from his warres against the Despot in Thessalie: who hearing of his speedie comming, beeing got vnto the Sea side, and (hauing no way left to haue escaped by land) shipped himselfe into a Galley of the Latines, which with another, her consort bound for Constantinople, by good hap put in there for to water, and so in two dayes arriued in safetie at the imperiall citie. Thus disappointed of the Emperor, all his care was for the deliuerie of the Turks Sultan. Wherefore marching in hast

C to Ænum, he so terrified the citizens with his comming, that they without farther delay deliuered him into his hands, so to redeeme their owne peace. In his returne you might haue seene the souldiers, especially the Tartars, driuing before them infinit numbers both of men and cattell, in such sort, as that in the open countrey of Thracia for a space, was hardly to bee seene either countreyman or beast, it was so cleane swept both of inhabitants, and likewise of cattell.

Iathatines the Sultan by the Tartars carried ouer Ister, and so by them set at libertie, shortly after dyed. In whose kingdome succeeded not his sonne Melicke (as some write) but two others (as the Turkes themselues report) the one called Mesoot, the sonne of Kei-Cubades, and the other Kei-Cubades, the sonne of Feramcine, borne also of the Selzuccian family, as Iathatines dyeth in exile.

D were all the other Turkes Sultans, but how neere of blood vnto the late Sultan Iathatines they say not. Betwixt which two, as his vassals, Gazan the great Tartar Chan (by whome they were so preferred) for the payment of a yearely tribute, diuided the Turkes kingdome: apportioning vnto Mesoot the cities of Amida (in antient time called Amisus, and Aminsus in Galatia, Melatia otherwise called Meletine in the lesser Armenia, Siuaste) in antient time Sebastia, and Harbarie, before Satabrea, both in Cappadocia, with all the countrey about them. And vnto Keicubades, Iconium, the antient seat of the Turkish Sultans, with all Rumilia, Asiatica, or the countries of the lesser Asia alongst the Sea coast; which these two Princes held as the Tartars tributaries, as had the late Sultan Iathatines before them, vntill such time as hee was by the same Tartars againe expulsed. So that the Turkes kingdome,

E which had of long time flourished in the Selzuccian familie in Persia, in Syria, Palestine, and Ægypt, there quite ouerthrowne by the Mamalukes and Tartars (as is before declared) and now brought vnderfoot in the lesser Asia also, where onely rested all the hope of that Nation, was now at a low ebbe, diuided betwixt two weake Princes, raigning but at the deuotion of the Tartar. In which confusion of the Turkish empire, so rent; not onely diuers men of greater power and authoritie amongst them, shared vnto themselues, some one corner of the declining kingdome, and some another; but many of the obscure and basest people also, bearing with them nothing but their bowes and arrowes, tooke the strait passages of the mountaines, and from thence with their dayly incursions, did much harme in the countries of the Christians ioyning vpon them: which was no great matter for them to doe, the

F garrisons which were woont to defend the same, beeing for want of pay quite disbanded, and the Castles vpon the frontiers by them abandoned; which at the first, as a thing of small importance neglected, was at length vnto the Greekes a great cause of the ruine and decay of the greatest part of their estate in Asia. These mischiefes vnregarded, grew dayly more and more, the Turkes still gayning vpon the Greekes what they lost vnto the Tartars. Whose

inuasions (the glorie of their kingdome onely excepted) was not so hurtfull vnto them, as the G cause of their much greater felicitie afterwards. At length it fortuned, that a great power of these aduenturous Turks meeting together in Paphlagonia, were about to haue inuaded the territotries of the Christians: against whom Michael Paleologus the Emperour sent out a strong and puissant armie to stay their further comming on, least breaking in that way, they should without resistance at their pleasure forrage the countrey before them. Which army conducted by vnskilfull captaines, encountering with the Turks, was by them in a great battel ouer-throwne and vtterly defeated, few or none of all that great multitude escaping: for whilest the Greekes vnaduisedly pursued the Turks, retiring of purpose before them, they were by them drawne into the danger of a greater power lying in ambush for them, and so entrapped, H were slaine with an exceeding great slaughter. After which so great a victorie (the beginning of the miserie of the Christians in the lesser Asia) the Turks without let or stay ouerranne all the countrey, vnto the riuer Sangarius: vpon the bankes whereof the Greeke Emperour was glad to fortifie diuers townes and forts to keepe them out of Bithynia. Neuertheless they in short time after subdued all the countries, from Pontus and Galatia, vnto the Lycian and Carian Sea, and the riuer Eurymedon, which they diuided amongst them into diuers Toparchies: little or nothing acknowledging the soueraignty eyther of Mesoot, or Kei- Cubades.

Whilest the Turks in the lesser Asia thus win from the Christians on the one side, and lose to the Tartars on the other, many an hard conflict in the mean time passed betwixt the Ægyp-I tian Sultans with their Mamalukes, and the Tartars, for the soueraignty of Syria. The poore remainder of the Christians all that while there, in doubt both of the one and of the other: from whom and from the Armenians (then also much infested with the Mamalukes) diuers embassadors were sent vnto the Pope and the Christian Princes of the West, to craue their aid and helpe in that their hard estate: whose prayers little preuailing with the rest, yet so moo-ued Lewis the French King, and Henry the third, then raigning in England, that they both promised them aid. Whereupon Lewis a man of a great deuotion, and alwaies forward in that seruice against the Infidels, tooke vpon him the Crosse, the cognisance of the sacred war; causing his three sons, Philip that succeeded him in the kingdome, surnamed the Faire, Peter countie of K Alangon, and Iohn Countie of Neuers (surnamed Tristan, for that his mother was in her greatest heauines for the taking of her husband, deliuered of him in Ægypt) and most of the nobi-litie of France to doe the like: vnto whom also Theobald King of Nauar his son in law, Alphon- sus his brother, and Guydo Earle of Flanders, joyned themselues. And so hauing put all things in readines, tooke his way to Marseilles, and from thence embarking himselfe with his armie 1270 in the Genoway ships, hired for that purpose, set forward the first of March, in the yere 1270.
But being at sea, he was by force of weather constrained to land in Sardinia, and there to stay a Carthage besieged by K. Lewis. while: departing thence, he at length arriued at Carthage, the place by him desired; where in the entrance of the hauen he surprised certaine of the enemies ships; but landing his men, and assaulting the towne, he was there notably repulsed. This is not that antient, great, and famous L city, which sometime mightily stroue with the proud Mistresse of the world for soueraigntie, but another built long after in the ruines, or at lest not far from the ruines of the same. In the besieging whereof, the Frenchmen found such resistance, as wel put them in remembrance of the antient glory of the Carthaginians. One day it fortuned as the King thus lay at the siege, that the defendants made a great & fierce sallie out vpon the Frenchmen, who before commanded so to do, by little and little retired, to draw their enemies further on; betwixt whom & the ci-tie, the Constable with a great power comming in & charging them behind, and they which before retired now standing close vnto them, they were on both sides hardly beset; who for al that, as became valiant men, worthily defended themselues, & made there a great fight, though not without extreame perill: which they in the citie beholding, gaue out a most hideous and piteous cry, a certain signe of their hard estate within; astonying with the suddennes thereof, M both their friends & their enemies. But whilst they of the town betwixt hope & dispair stood thus beholding the fight at land, the Frenchmen by sea approching a bulwarke on that side of Carthage won. the town, took it without resistance: which so dismaid thē without, that they began forthwith to flie, of whom the greatest part casting away their weapons, were by the Kings commandement taken to mercy; and they likwise of the town vpon promise of their liues, yeelded the same

A same vnto the King. Carthage thus woon, the King laid siege vnto Tunes, the chiefe citie of that kingdome, beeing not far off: whether by the way he was encountred by the King of the countrey, who hauing there lost ten thousand of his Moores, betooke himselfe to flight with the rest. Who thus ouerthrowne, resolued no more to tempt fortune, but to keepe himselfe safe within the wals of his city, if happily so he might (as it oftentimes falleth out) more weaken his enemies by lying still and protracting the time, than by open force and valour. Which their purpose King Lewis perceiuing, resolued not to stir from thence vntill that hee were become master of the citie; which as it seemed, could not hold out for want of victuals, considering the multitude of people that were got into it. Neuertheless thus besieged both by sea and land; and so straitly hemmed in on euery side, as that no reliefe could possibly be brought B vnto it; yet held it out by the space of six moneths. After which time wants daily more and more increasing amongst the besieged, embassadours were sent out to the King, to intreat with him of peace. But whilest these embassadours goe to and fro, and reason vpon the capi-tulations of the desired peace, behold a great and furious plague arose in the French campe, which began to cut them downe by heapes: there dyed Iohn Tristan Countie of Neuers, the Kings youngest sonne, borne in the first expedition that the said King his father made into the holy Land, euen at such time as he was taken prisoner; which Tristan dyed the 25 day of August in the yeare of our Lord 1270. The good King hauing yet scarcely performed the obsequies of his sonne, fell sicke of the bloudie flix, whereof he there shortly after died also. About which time arriued there Charles King of Sicilie, the French Kings brother, with a great C number of fresh souldiers: whose comming lightned somewhat the Frenchmens hearts (heauie for the death of their King) and daunted the Moores, before bragge of the same. Shortly after whom arriued there also Prince Edward, King Henry the third his eldest sonne, who tra-uelling thorough France, and taking shipping at Aquesmort, not farre from Marseilles, was now in ten dayes with a braue companie of Englishmen come to Tunes; and there of the other Christian Princes, namely of Philip the French King (his father Lewis being now dead) of Charles King of Sicilie, and of the two Kings of Nauar and Aragon, ioyfully receiued.
But these Princes had a little before his arriual concluded a peace with the Moors King, & the Infidels, vpon condition that hee should pay a yeerely tribute of fortie thousand crownes vnto the King of Sicilia; and to suffer the Christian religion to bee freely preached in his do-D minions, by such deuout persons as should bee there left for that purpose; and that vnto such as should by their preaching be conuerted vnto the faith in Christ Iesus, it should bee lawfull for them to be baptized, and to professe the Christian religion. Of which peace, Prince Ed- ward vnderstanding, did what hee might to haue dissuaded them from the same; saying, that the warre was by them al taken in hand against the Infidels, as enemies to the crosse of Christ, with whom they were not to haue peace: and for the recouerie of the Holy Citie. But say what he would, and doe what hee could, the peace (to his great discontentment) was now concluded, which they might not (as they sayd) againe breake: and thereupon with the first faire winde hoised saile, and returned towards Sicilia, with purpose the next Spring to haue gone into Syria; which their determination was shortly after by the hand of God disappoin-E ted. For beeing come vpon the coast of the Island not farre from Drepanum, most of the great Princes and other Nobilitie, in their long boats went on land, the rest of the fleet lying at anker about a league off; for that being for the most part ships of great burthen they were not able to put into the harbour: But as they so lay, by force of a sudden and violent tempest then arising, some were eaten vp with the rough sea; some falling foule one of another, there perished together; others driuen vpon the maine, were there beaten in peeces: so that of that great fleet before the storme ceased, perished about an hundred and twentie saile, with all the people, as well marriners as souldiers left in them, and great store both of armour and munition: In such sort that most of the common souldiers and marriners which had escaped the plague at Tunes, there vpon the coast of Sicilia perished by shipwracke. Onely F Prince Edwards fleet, beeing in number but thirteene ships, escaped free without losse either of ship or man. Neither were they that were got to land at Drepanum in much better case, the plague still following them; whereof dyed Theobald King of Nauar, and Isabel his wife, King Lewis his daughter; Elizabeth the French Queene, with a wonderfull number of noble gentlemen, and other common souldiers; in such sort that that Philip the French King

The Christian princes returning from Tunes suffer shipwracke vpon the coast of Sicilia.

discouraged

discouraged with the greatnes of the mortalitie, and the miserable losse at sea, resolued there G to make an end of the intended war, and so returned into France, as did the rest that were left, 1271 euery man into his own country. Only Prince Edward hauing passed that Winter in Sicilia, Prince Edward arriueth at Ptolemais. with the first of the next Spring set forward again on his voyage, and in 15 dayes after arriued with his fleet at Ptolemais: where after he had by the space of a moneth rested himselfe and his souldiers after their long trauell, and fully inquired of the state of the country, he with six or seuen thousand souldiers marching from Ptolemais about twentie miles into the Land, tooke Nazareth, and put to sword all them hee found therein, and so againe returned. After whom the enemies following, in hope to haue taken him at some aduantage, hee vnderstanding therof, turned backe vpon them, and killing a great number of them, put the rest to flight.
And after that about Midsummer, vnderstanding that the Sarasins were againe making head H at a place called Cakhow, about fortie miles off, he set forwards towards them, and comming vpon them early in the morning before they were aware, slew aboue a thousand of them, and dispersed the rest. Ayded also by the Nobilitie of Cyprus, hee with like successe as before, made a third expedition against the Turks & Infidels: insomuch that his fame began to grow great amongst them, and they to stand of him in no little dread. But whilest hee thus preuailed, he was by foule treacherie almost taken out of the way. The Admirall of Ioppa faigning himselfe desirous to become a Christian, and willing to further the Princes proceedings, had by a secret messenger and letters sundrie times intelligence with him, as well concerning his owne good entertainment, as the effecting of that which he had promised. This messenger by the Admirall thus employed, was (though to the Prince vnknowne) one of the Assasines, a I companie of most desperate and dangerous men among the Mahometans, who strongly deluded with the blind zeale of their superstition, and accounting it meritorious, by any means to kill any great enemie of their religion; for the performance thereof, as men prodigall of their liues, desperatly aduenture themselues vnto all kinde of dangers. So now this messenger, being resolued to die, comming the fift time vnto the Prince, and being searched for hauing any weapon about him, as the manner was, had accesse vnto him, then lying in his chamber vpon his bed, in his ierkin, bare headed, because of the heat of the weather: where after due reue-rence done, he pulled out certaine letters from his Lord vnto the Prince, which he read with great delight, as penned of purpose for to please. But as he was further questioning with him of many matters, and all the companie voided, the desperate messenger making as though hee K would haue pulled out some other secret letters, suddenly pluckt out an enuenomed knife, which hee had secretly hidden about him, thinking to haue strucke him into the bellie as hee Prince Edward wounded. lay: for the auoiding of which stroke, the Prince lifting vp his arme, was therein grieuously wounded. But as the villaine was about to haue doubled the stroke, the Prince with his foot gaue him such a blow, that he felled him to the ground, and with that starting vp, caught him by the hand, where in strugling with him for the knife, in wresting it out of his hand, he hurt himselfe therewith in the forehead; but getting it from him, presently thrust it into the mur-therers bellie, and so slew him. The Princes seruants being not farre off, and hearing the buste-ling, came running in; where finding the messenger dead on the floore, one of them with a stoole beat out his braines: whereat the Prince tooke some displeasure, for so striking a dead L man. This danger of the Princes much troubled and grieued all the Christians in Syria; and the more, for that the wound in his arme, after it had beene certaine dayes well dressed by the skilfull Surgeons and Physitians, began to mortifie and grow blacke, insomuch, that they and others about him began to mutter among themselues, and to looke heauily vpon the matter, as not without danger. Which hee perceiuing, sayd vnto them, Why whisper you thus amongst your selues? What see you in mee? Can I not be healed? Tell mee the truth and feare not. Whereunto one of them answered; And like your Highnesse, wee doubt not of your healing, but that it will be painfull for you to suffer. If suffering (sayd he) may againe restore my health, I commit my selfe vnto you, worke on mee your skill, and spare not. So the next day they cut out all the dead and poysoned flesh out of his arme, and in fifteene M dayes after perfectly cured his wound, to the great reioycing of all his people. The great Sultan to cleere himselfe of this so dishonourable a treacherie, sent three of his noblemen vnto the Prince, calling to witnesse his false Prophet, That the same was done neyther by him nor his consent. Which Embassadours the Prince honourably vsed, but suffered them

A them not to come nigh him. So hauing tarried eighteene moneths at Ptolemais, and no ayd comming from the other Christian princes, as was expected, he tooke shipping, and returning homeward, landed first in Sicilia, and from thence crossing ouer into Apulia, and so trauelling to Rome, was there honorably entertained by Gregorie the tenth, then Pope; and from thence by the way of France arriued in England, where he was shortly after crowned king, in the yere 1272. his father the old King, Henrie the third, being a little before his returne dead.

The yeare following, Gregorie the tenth, not ignorant of the hard estate of the Christians in Syria, (as hauing there bin of late himselfe with Prince Edward, at which time he was in his 1273. absence elected Pope) and now desirous to procure them some reliefe, ratified the election of Rodulph the Emperour taketh vpō him the Crosse. Rodulphus of Hapspurge vnto the Empire; vpon condition, That hee should promise to take B vpon himselfe the Crosse, and to giue them reliefe: for the performance whereof he offered vnto the Emperour two hundred thousand crownes, with the tenths both of the Clergie and Temporaltie for six yeres: and many goodly blessings were in his name also, by the preachers of that time, promised vnto all such as should with him take vpon them that sacred warre.
Whereupon the Emperour with all his familie tooke vpon them the Crosse, the signe of the sacred expedition intended: as did also the Duke of Lorraine shortly after, with some others.
Neuertheless the Emperour, otherwise busied in warres against the Bohemians and Bauarians, and delaying still the time, as not greatly willing to take vpon him so long and dangerous a journey, and the Pope still threatning his high sentence of excommunication, the time passed, the Pope died, and nothing was as yet done. Vntill that at length the Emperour hauing C happily finished his warres in Bohemia, and finding himselfe at some good leisure in some part to discharge his vow, and to satisfie the expectation the world had of long conceiued of him, sent Henrie Prince of Megapolis, or as the Germanes call it, Meckelbourg, with a strong power into Syria, to performe what himselfe had promised. Who comming to Ptolemais, made many notable incursions into the countrie about Damasco, with fire and sword destroying all before him as he went, and carrying thence many great and rich booties; vntill that at length hee was by the Mamalukes circumuented and taken prisoner, and so carried vnto the Henr. the prince taken prisoner, & sent to Caire Sultan at Caire, where he remained in strait prison six and twentie yeares after; vntill that by chance one of the Mamalukes (a renegate Germane) beeing chosen Sultan, caused him to be brought before him, and at his comming demanded of him, If it would not doe him good to D celebrate the remembrance of the natiuitie of his Christ with his friends in Germanie? (for now that time of the yere was at hand) And I know (said the Sultan) that thou art so addicted vnto thy superstition, that thou respectest the same more than thy libertie. Truth (said Henry) mightie Prince; for libertie would auaile me nothing, if Christ by his most mild incarnation had not taken away our captiuitie: and therefore how much all men owe vnto the reuerend remembrance thereof, I would to God thou, ô King, didst also vnderstand; which as I most heartily wish, so I would I could thereof perswade thee. God forbid (said the Sultan) for I remember that when as I was chiefe enginer vnto thy father at Knese-Fenicke in Liuonia, and there did him good seruice, I was altogether of the Christian perswasion; but now hauing left that common error, haue therewith also changed my priuat fortune. But as for thy Reli-E gion I haue nothing to say, my talke is onely concerning thy libertie: Wouldest thou therefore gladly be free, and so returne home to thy friends? That, Nature craueth (sayd Henry) although my fortune gainsayeth, which yet dependeth of your pleasure: I desire indeed to returne home, which if you should denie me, I must as I haue done, take it in good part; assuring my self, that my wife Anastasia, with my beloued sons, Henry, Leo, and Iohn, haue long since celebrated my funerals, and ended their mourning. Thou art deceiued, (said the Sultan) for I am sure that they know thou yet liuest, and pray most heartily for thy returne. Truly I owe much vnto the remembrance of thy father, and therefore this day giue thee thy liberty. And hauing so said, furnished him with all things necessary, and gaue him leaue to depart with one Martin his seruant, who taken with him, had borne him companie all the long time of his captiuitie.
F So taking his leaue of the Sultan, hee came to Ptolemais: but shipping himselfe for Cyprus, hee was by the way by certaine Pyrats taken at sea, and as a fugitiue captiue brought backe againe vnto the Sultan: who pitying his hard fortune, set him againe at libertie, and by a ship set out for that purpose, transported him into Cyprus: where he was by the Queene of that Iſland his aunt (as ſome ſay) honourably entertained, and ſo furniſhed of all things fit for his G eſtate. Departing thence he came to Marſeilles, where after he had ſome few dayes refreſhed himſelfe, he from thence trauelled by land home into his owne Countrey: where at the firſt he was not knowne of his owne children and friends, as being grown old in priſon, & by them long before accounted among the dead; but now at laſt found againe, and by them known, he was of his children ioyfully receiued as their father, and of his ſubiects as their Prince. Howbeit he ſhortly after died, and was honorably buried in the monaſterie of Dobran.

Thus in the whole courſe of this hiſtorie it appears, by that which is already written, what notable expeditions euen the greateſt Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to their immortal glory, from time to time vndertooke againſt the enemies of Chriſt, and his moſt ſacred word, & for the reliefe of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria and in the land of Paleſtine: whereof as H diuers of them had right glorious ſucceſſe, vnto the great profit of the Chriſtian Common-weale; ſo ſome of them anſwered not with like euent, as vndertaken with too ſmal ſtrength, or otherwiſe ouerthrown by the diſcord or malice of the Chriſtians themſelues, rather than by the enemies force. Which neuertheleſſe how vnfortunatly ſoeuer they fel out in the hands of ſuch worthie men as vndertooke them, yet haue they this glory, commendation, and comfort, That they were taken in hand for the honor of the Son of God, Chriſt Ieſus, and the defence of his veritie, againſt the falſe Prophet Mahomet, & his moſt blaſphemous doctrine; ſo honorable and iuſt a quarrel as might well beſeeme the greatnes of the greateſt Prince, yea of all the Princes of Chriſtendome. Yet could not the worthines therof, euen in thoſe more zealous times, or the dangerous eſtate of that part of the Chriſtian commonweale, euen then like I to periſh, (as ſome others be now) or the lamentable complaints of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, crying out vnto their Chriſtian brethren for aid, any whit moue the Chriſtian princes of that time, with their combined forces to reach vnto them their helping hands, or to yeeld vnto them any ſuccor or reliefe: for they little feeling thoſe harmes ſo far off, & more regarding their owne hereditarie quarrels, employed thoſe forces one againſt another, vnto the effuſion of ſo much Chriſtians bloud, as might haue ſufficed not for relief of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria onely, but alſo to haue regained whatſoeuer had been before from them taken by the Turkes or Saraſins. The German Princes were ſtil at a iarre about the choice of their Emperors: the French agreed not with the Engliſh, or them of the Low-countries: neither the Engliſh with the Scots: the Arragonians were at odds with the French: and in Italy were al- K moſt as many deadly factions as prouinces. Of which diſcord of the Chriſtians (the greateſt occaſion of their ruin and decay) Melechſares the Ægyptian Sultan vnderſtanding by his eſpi-als, raiſed a great armie of the Mamalukes and others, with a full purpoſe to haue vtterly rooentirely ioyned thoſe two great countries vnto his owne kingdome. But what he had ſo miſchieuouſly deuiſed, hee liued not to bring to paſſe, beeing in the midſt of thoſe his great de-ſignes taken away by ſudden death. After whom Alphix (or as ſome cal him, Elpis) ſucceeding him in the Kingdome, & with a puiſſant armie entring into Syria, laid ſiege to Tripolis, which Tripolis woon and raſed by Elpis the Ægyptian Sultan. he at length tooke by vndermining of it, and put to ſword all the Chriſtians therein (except ſuch as by ſpeedie flight had in time got themſelues out of the danger) & raſed the city down L to the ground: which calamitie betided vnto the Chriſtians the ninth of Aprill in the yeare 1289. Preſently after, he had the ſtrong caſtle of Neleſine yeelded vnto him, whereinto he put a ſtrong garriſon, to hinder the Chriſtians from building againe the late deſtroyed city. In like manner alſo he tooke the cities of Sidon and Berythus, which he ſacked, and laid them flat Sidon and Berythus raſed. Tyre yeelded. with the ground. And after that, hee remooued to Tyre, which after three moneths ſtraight ſiege, was by the Citizens (now out of all hope of reliefe) yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That they might with bagge and baggage in ſafetie depart. With like good fortune hee in good time, and as it were without reſiſtance, tooke all the reſt of the ſtrong Townes and Caſtles which the Chriſtians yet held in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, excepting onely the Citie of Ptolemais; whereunto all the poore Chriſtians fled as vnto a Sanctuarie, to be there M defended by the honourable Knights Templars and Hoſpitallers. Nothing now left vnto them more than that ſtrong Citie, the Sultan of his owne accord made a peace with them for the ſpace of fiue yeares, fearing (as was ſuppoſed) to haue drawne vpon him all the Chriſtian Princes

A Princes of the Weſt, if hee ſhould at once haue then vtterly rooted out all the Chriſtians in thoſe countries together.

The Chriſtians affaires thus brought to the laſt caſt in Syria, and yet faintly as it were breathing, by the benefit of the late obtained peace; Peter Beluiſe maſter of the Templars, with the grand maſter of the Knights Hoſpitallers, ſuddenly paſſed ouer (as Embaſſadors from the reſt) into Europe, vnto Nicholaus quartus then Pope, craning his fatherly ayd. Who mooued with ſo great miſeries of the poore afflicted Chriſtians, ſolicited the other Chriſtian princes to haue ſent them reliefe; eſpecially Rodolph the Germane Emperour, who then buſied with the affaires of the empire, and his troubles neerer home, (as were the other Chriſtian Princes alſo) gaue good words, but no helpe at all. Yet ſome of them vnder the colour thereof, got B from their ſubiects great ſummes of money, which they imployed to their other worſe vſes: onely the Pope ſent fifteene hundred men at armes, whom with deuout perſuaſion, and much earneſt preaching, he had induced to take vpon them that ſacred expedition, and entertained them of his owne charge: vnto whom alſo many others out of diuers countries, vpon a religious zeale, ioyned themſelues as voluntarie men: who meeting together at Brunduſium, and there imbarked with the two graund maſters of the Templars and Hoſpitallers, in ſafetie at length arriued at Ptolemais. There was then in the citie a great number of people of all ſorts; The miſerable eſtate of a citie about to periſh.
of able men there was about fiftie thouſand, and about fortie thouſand of the weaker ſort: amongſt whom, diuers murders, felonies, rapes, and ſuch other ſhameful outrages, (all haſting the dreadfull iudgments of God) were dayly committed, and let paſſe vnregarded, more than C of them that were iniured. For all the chief commanders were then at variance among themſelues, euery one of them laying claim (not worth a ruſh) vnto the vaine title of the kingdome of Ieruſalem. Henrie King of Cyprus comming thither with a great fleet, charged the Templars to deliuer him the Crowne of that kingdome, which they had (as he ſaid) wrongfully taken from Almericus and Guy his Auncеſtors. And Charles King of Sicilia by his Embaſſadors layd claime vnto the title of that Kingdome, as due vnto the Kings of that Iſland: and vnder-ſtanding it to be giuen vnto Henrie King of Cyprus, cauſed all the reuenues of the Templars within his dominion, to be brought into his Treaſuries, and their lands & houſes to be ſpoyled. Hugh alſo, Prince of Antioch, laboured with tooth and naile, to defend the ouerworne D right that his father and grandfather had vnto that loſt Kingdome. And the Countie of Tripolis layd in for himſelfe, That hee was diſcended from Raymund of Tholous; and that beſide himſelfe, remained no Prince of the antient Nobilitie, which had woon that kingdome out of the hands of the Saraſins, and that therefore that regall dignitie did not of better right appertaine vnto any other than vnto himſelfe. Neither did theſe foure Princes more ſtriue for the title of the loſt Kingdome, than for the preſent gouernment of the Citie, ſtraightway about to periſh. The Popes Legate pretending thereunto a right alſo; for that King Iohn Brenne had before ſubiected it vnto the See of Rome. As for the claime vnto the Citie of Ptolemais; the Patriarke of Ieruſalem challenged vnto himſelfe the preheminence, for that the Metropoliticall Citie of Tyre (vnder which the Citie of Ptolemais was the third Epiſco-pall Seat) was vnder his iuriſdiction, euen by the Decree of the Weſt Church. The Tem-E plars alſo, and the Knights Hoſpitallers, whoſe power in the Citie was at that time farre the greateſt, pretended the gouernment thereof of beſt right to belong vnto them, as the iuſt reward of their bloud, alreadie and afterward to bee ſpent in the defence thereof: promiſing great matters if it might be wholly referred vnto them. Neither ſpared the French King, or the King of England, by their meſſengers to claime the ſoueraigntie of the citie, by their predeceſſors ſometimes woon. And they of Piſa hauing ſtill a Conſul therein, and by often marriages with the naturall inhabitants, grown into great affinitie with them, did what they might to get the gouernment into their hands. The Venetians alſo by their authoritie and great wealth, laboured to gaine the good will of the people, ſparing therein no coſt. And they of Genoa, no leſſe cunning than the reſt, ſupplanted the ſtrongeſt factions, by giuing aid both ap-F pertly and couertly vnto the weaker; that ſo hauing weakned the faction they moſt doubted and hated, they might by the ioynt fauour of the weaker, aſpire vnto the gouernment of the ſtronger, and ſo conſequently of the citie it ſelfe. The Florentines alſo by their continual traffique thither, were not out of hope, by one fineneſſe or other, amongſt ſo many competitors, to find a meane to ſtep vp aboue the reſt. But the greateſt part of the people for all that were moſt inclined vnto the Armenians and Tartars, as both for their neerneſſe & power moſt like of all other to ſtand them in ſtead. All theſe aimed at one marke, which was, the gouernment and commaund of the Citie; and moſt of them had in the ſame their owne proper lawes and courts, to decide their cauſes and controuerſies in. Whereby it came to paſſe, that euerie man might without checke or controlement almoſt doe what he liſt, the offendors from one court to another, remooving their ſuits as beſt ſerued their turnes. Thus were murders (as is before ſayd) dayly committed in the ſtreets, men abuſed, houſes robbed, ſhops broken vp, and many other outrages done, to the haſtning of the wrath of God, and griefe of all good men.

1291. Diuiſion and diſſention (the ruine of all Common-weales) thus raigning in the Citie, the ſouldiers of late ſent thither, or in zeale come of themſelues, for the defence thereof, gaue occaſion for the more ſpeedie deſtruction of the ſame: Such is the power of the Almightie, in his wrath and iudgements for ſinne, euen by thoſe things wherein we moſt truſt and ioy, to worke our vtter ruine and deſtruction. Theſe Souldiers, for want of ſuch pay as was promiſed them, were enforced to ſeeke abroad; and therefore contrarie to the league before made with the Ægyptian Sultan, oftentimes went out in great parties into the frontiers of his territories, taking the ſpoyle of ſuch things as they light vpon. Whereof the Sultan vnderſtanding, demaunded by his Embaſſadors, That reſtitution might be made, and the offendors deliuered vnto him to be puniſhed, according vnto the League. But in that ſo ſicke a ſtate of a dying Commonweale, neither was reſtitution made, as reaſon would, or yet the Embaſſadours courteouſly heard. With which inſolencie the Sultan prouoked, ſent Emilech Araphus a notable Captaine, (and as ſome ſay, his ſonne) with an hundred and fiftie thouſand men, to beſiege the Citie: who comming thither, and hauing made his approches, had by a mine in ſhort time ouerthrowne a piece of the wall; but in ſeeking to haue entred by the breach, hee found ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, that hee was glad with loſſe to retyre. Whileſt Araphus thus lay at the ſiege of Ptolemais, Alphir the Sultan died at Damaſco: in whoſe ſtead the Mamalukes made choice of this Araphus for their Sultan; who more deſirous of nothing, than of the glorie of the vtter rooting vp of the Chriſtians in Syria, was ſo farre from raiſing of his ſiege, (either for the death of the Sultan, or the newes of his Kingdome) that he more ſtraitly beſet the citie than he had in the three moneths ſpace that he had there lien before. Now had they in the citie choſen Peter the maſter of the Templars, their gouernor; a man of great experience and valour: vnto whom, and the reſt of the nobilitie, the Sultan offered great rewards, and vnto the ſoldiers their pay, with free libertie to depart, ſo that they would without more adoo yeeld vnto him the city, which they could not long hold. Which his offer the maſter reiected, and flatly told him, That he had not learned of his anceſtors, to ſel for money vnto the Infidels a Citie bought with ſo much Chriſtian bloud; either did ſo much regard his vaine threats, as therefore to forget his ſeruice due vnto his Sauior Chriſt and the Chriſtian Commonweale. With which anſwer the tyrant inraged, the next day with all his forces aſſaulted the citie, and that in ſuch deſperat and furious manner, as if hee would euen then haue cartied it; hauing before filled the ditches, and promiſed the ſpoyle vnto his ſouldiers, the more to encourage them. Yet hauing done what he could, and loſt a number of his men, ſlaine both in the aſſault, and in a ſallie which the Chriſtians made out at the ſame time, he was enforced to retyre backe againe into his trenches. In this ſo terrible an aſſault, not repulſed without ſome loſſe alſo of the Chriſtians, the grand maſter and gouernour of the citie was wounded with a poyſoned dart, whereof he in three dayes after died: with whom the courage of the Defendants fainted alſo, no man beeing left like vnto him to vndertake ſo great a charge, although many there were, that ouerweening of themſelues deſired the ſame. In the beginning of this ſiege the Chriſtians had ſent away all their aged and weake people, vnfit for ſeruice, into Cyprus, where they in ſafetie arriued. But now many of the better ſort, both Captaines and others, diſcouraged, one after another conueighed themſelues away out of the citie: of whom a great number in paſſing thence to Cyprus, were vpon the Coaſt of the Iſland, together with the Patriarke drowned. In the citie remained only twelue thouſand, which were thought ſufficient for the defence thereof; who afterwards (as ſome report) fled alſo by ſea after their fellowes, and ſo left the citie emptie vnto the barbarous enemie: ſome others reporting of

of them more honourably, as that they ſhould right valiantly defend the citie againſt the aſſault of their enemies, vntill ſuch time as that moſt of them being ſlaine or wounded, and the reſt by force driuen from the walls into the market place, and there for a while notably defending themſelues, in flying thence vnto the ſhips, were by the way al cut in ſunder, or els drowned. But howſoeuer it was, the Sultan entring the citie (by the Chriſtians abandoned, or by force taken) gaue the ſpoile thereof vnto his ſouldiers; who after they had rifled euery corner thereof, by his commandement ſet it on fire and burnt it downe to the ground: and digging vp the very foundations of the wals, Churches, and other publicke or priuat buildings, which the fire had not burnt, left there no ſigne of any citie at all; but purging the place euen of the very heapes of the ſtones and rubbidge left of the raſed citie, made it a fit place for husbandmen to plow and ſow corne in; which he did both there, at Sydon, Beritus, and other townes alongſt the ſea coaſt, becauſe they ſhould neuer more ſerue for a refuge vnto the Chriſtians, orgiue them footing againe into thoſe countries. Thus together with Ptolemais was the name of the Chriſtians vtterly rooted out of Syria and the Land of Paleſtine, in the yeare 1291, about 192 yeares after the winning of Ieruſalem by Godfrey of Buillon and the other Chriſtian Princes his confederates.

This loſſe, as tending to the great diſgrace of the Chriſtians in generall, mooued not a little euen the greateſt of the Chriſtian Princes; wronged all or moſt part of them in the perſons of the Templars or Knights Hoſpitalers, their ſubiects, ſo ſhamefully now quite caſt out of Syria and the land of Promiſe; howbeit, troubled with their owne turbulent affaires at home or with their neighbour Princes not farre off, none of them once ſtirred for the redreſſe or reuenge thereof. Onely Caſſanes the great Tartar Prince, hauing of late ſubdued the Perſians, and married the daughter of the Armenian King (a Lady of great perfection, and of a Mahometane become a Chriſtian) at the requeſt of his wife and his father in law, tooke the matter in hand. And for that purpoſe hauing raiſed a moſt puiſſant armie of two hundred thouſand fighting men, and ayded by the Armenians and Georgians, paſſing ouer the mountaine Amanus into Syria, not farre from the citie Hama met with Melcenaſer, the Ægyptian Sultans Lieutenant, with a mightie armie, whome hee ouerthrew in a great and mortall battell, wherein fortie thouſand of the Ægyptians are reported to haue beene ſlaine, and ſo draue him quite out of Syria: ſending Molais, one of his captaines, with part of his armie to purſue him, who neuer left him vntill hee had chaſed him ouer the deſart ſands into Ægypt. The victorious Tartar after this battell tooke the citie of Hama, where lighting vpon the great treaſures of the Sultan, hee bountifully diuided it, together with the ſpoile, amongſt his ſouldiers; reſeruing nothing thereof vnto himſelfe, more than a ſword and a casket full of ſecret letters. The Ægyptian thus put to flight, hee without reſiſtance tooke in moſt of the cities of Syria, with the citie of Ieruſalem alſo; which in many places by the Turks and Ægyptians defaced, he againe repaired: and together with the Temple of our Sauiour gaue it to the Armenians, Georgians, and other Chriſtians, repairing thither out of Cyprus, Crete, and other places, to inhabit. And hauing himſelfe honoured the holy places with great gifts, returned with his armie to Damaſco, which was forthwith deliuered vnto him. But lying there, with purpoſe in Autumne following to haue gone into Ægypt, and to haue vtterly deſtroyed that kingdome, he was certified of new troubles ariſing in Perſia, and ſome other parts of his empire: for repreſſing whereof, he with the greateſt part of his army returned himſelfe into Perſia, leauing one Capcapus gouernour of Damaſco; who after the ouerthrow of the Sultans armie had reuolted vnto him; and Molais (of whom wee haue before ſpoken) gouernour of Ieruſalem: commanding them at his departure to re-edifie the citie of Tyre, and to ſend embaſſadours vnto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to ioyne in league with them, for the more ſure holding of thoſe new gained countries. And ſo Tyre was indeed repaired as he had commanded, and deliuered to the Chriſtians, with a conuenient garriſon for the keeping thereof: but the embaſſadors comming to the proud Biſhop Boniface the eight, then Pope, whom of all others it beſeemed to haue furthered their buſineſſe, they could of him obtaine nothing, but returned as they came. For hee at the ſame time fallen out with Philip the French King, thundering out his excommunications, diſcharging his ſubiects of their loyaltie, and ſo much as in him was, depriuing him of his kingdome, had giuen the ſame vnto Albertus Duke of Auſtria, whom he had declared Emperour: whereof arise great troubles. Besides that, he being of the Guelphes faction, was not in any thing more carefull, than of the vtter extinguishing of the contrarie faction of the Gibellines, especially of the most honorable familie of the Columnij, of whom some he had slaine, some hee had depriued of their honours, some he had imprisoned, and driuen other some into exile; so that thus wickedly busied for the maintenance of his owne proud estate, hee had no leisure to further the good of the Christian commonweale: which his intollerable pride, and forgetfulnesse of dutie long escaped not the reuenging hand of God; being when hee thought least, suddenly taken prisoner at his fathers house in the city of Anagnia (where he was borne) by Sara Columnius his mortall enemie; whom but lately before redeemed out of a pirats gally, the French King had sent for that purpose, with one Longaret (or as some call him, Nogaret) a French Knight: by whom the proud Prelat brought to Rome, in the castle of S. Angelo within fiue and thirtie days after most miserably died, in his madnes (as some report) renting himselfe with his teeth, and deuouring his owne fingers. This worthie Tartar Prince Cassanes (by whom the Christian commonweale might haue againe risen in Syria and the land of Palestine, had not the pride of the great Bishop, & the dissention of the Christian Princes hindred the same) was (as Aitonus writeth, who was present in this warre, following his vncle the Armenian King) a man of a verie short stature, and exceeding hard fauor; but with valor, bountie, and other vertues of the minde, plentifully recompencing what wanted in the feature of his bodie. After whose departure into Persia, Capcapus gouernour of Damasco, considering that the power of the Tartars there left was not great, and that no aid was to be expected from the other Christian Princes of the West; to recompense his former treason of reuolting from the Sultan, with a new reuolt from the Tartar, rose vp into open rebellion, drawing after him not onely the citie of Damasco, but the greatest part of Syria also. Whereof Molais gouernor of Ierusalem vnderstanding, was about to haue gone against him with his Tartars; but aduertised by his espials, that Capcapus in this his conspiracie had compacted with the Ægyptian Sultan also: perceiuing himselfe too weake to withstand so great a power, retyred with his Tartars into Mesopotamia, there expecting new supplies both from Cassanes and the King of Armenia. Of whose departure out of Syria the Ægyptian Sultan vnderstanding, came directly with his armie to Ierusalem, which he tooke, (being forsaken of the inhabitants) and prophaned the temple; sparing only the Sepulchre of our Sauiour, at the humble suit of the religious, making there a greater shew of deuotion, than of crueltie. After that, hee woon all the other lesser townes, which the Tartars had either kept for themselues, or giuen to the other Christians, and vtterly rased all the forts of the Hospitallers and Templars, which valiant men, without other helpe, for the space of almost a yeare held out against the tyrant; in which time most of them were honorably slain: the rest that were left aliue being taken by the enemie, had neuertheless leaue giuen with bag & baggage in safetie to depart, hauing before by solemne oath for euer abiured the country of Syria: and so these worthie men, the great ornaments of the Christian commonweale, the Hospitalers and Templars, which to the vtmost of their power had by the space of 300 yeres right worthily defended both the Christians and the Christian religion, against the Infidels in Syria and the Holy land, were now for euer driuen out thence about the yeare of our Lord 1300, to the great dishonour of all Christendome.

The description of Cassanes.

The city of Ierusalem, with all Syria again recouered by the Ægyptian Sultan.

Wherefore with them now taking our leaue of Syria and the Holy land, leauing the same in the possession of the Ægyptian Sultan and the Mamalukes, although it were shortly after like enough to haue bin againe recouered from them by the Tartars, had not the death of the great Tartar Prince Cassanes, and their domesticall troubles letted: we will againe returne return to the troubled affaires of the Turks in the lesser Asia, whither the course of the time had somewhat before called vs, with the occurrents thereof, more proper to our purpose and the argument we haue in hand, but that al cannot be at once told: and for the better vnderstanding of the desirous Reader, I thought it not good abruptly to breake off the course of the aforesaid historie, drawing so neere to an end, but to make him partaker of the heauinesse thereof.

The death of Mesoot and Beiubades.

Now had the Turks no kindome left in the lesser Asia, and that also at the pleasure of Gazan the great Tartar Chan diuided betwixt Mesoot and Cei-Cubades, as his vassals, bound vnto him by a yerely tribute, as is aforesaid: who both kept in awe by the greatnes of the Tartar, did nothing worth the remembrance, but as they liued, so also died, almost buried in obscuritie. Of these two, Mesoot died without issue; but Cei-Cubades departing, left behind him his sonne Aladin,

A Aladin, who by the name of Aladin the second succeeding in the kingdome, vnited againe the same before diuided, yet paying still tribute vnto the Tartar his Soueraigne, as had his father with the other first Sultans of the Turkes before him. Much it was not that this Aladin did, albeit that the power of the Tartars in his time beganne to decline, and not to lie so heauie vpon the Turkes as before. Hee was a man of a quiet spirit, and therefore much delighted in peace: a great friend vnto Othoman the first founder of the glorious and mightie Othoman empire, as in his life shall appeare. But this Aladin, the last of the Turkes Sultans of the Selzuccian familie, dying without issue; one Sabib his Vesir-Azemes or chiefe Counseller, and then a man of greatest authoritie, aspired vnto the kingdome, which he had for most part himselfe swaied all the raigne of the late Sultan his master: which vsurped soueraigntie, no

B way vnto him due, hee could neither himselfe long hold, or deliuer vnto his posteritie; for that many others of the nobilitie, men of great power; and borne of greater families than hee; enuying at his honour, and disdayning to bee gouerned by him, or any other no greater than themselues, layed hold some vpon one countrey or prouince, some vpon another, where they were able to doe most, erecting vnto themselues greater or lesser Satrapies, according to the measure of their own strength and power, without respect of any superioritie one should haue ouer another, but euery one of them absolutely commanding ouer so much as he was able by strong hand to hold. So that as it had oftentimes before chanced, that the great Monarchies destitute of their lawfull heires, had in part, or all, become rich preyes vnto such as could first lay strong hand vpon them; euen so fell it now out in the great kingdom of the Turks, euery

C one of their great Princes, measuring the greatnesse of his territorie, not by the measure of his right, but by the strength of his owne power. Wherein they shared so well for themselues, that Sabib at first in possession of all, was in short time thrust quite out of all: and so the great kingdome of the Turkes in the lesser Asia, brought vnto a meere Anarchie; no King now left among them, the whole kingdom being now diuided into diuers Satrapies, or other lesser Toparchies. The greatest of those Princes that thus shared the Turks kingdome amongst them, was one Caraman Alufirius; who as strongest, tooke vnto him the citie of Iconium, the regall seat of the Turkish Sultans, with all the great countrey of Cilicia, and some part of the frontiers of the countries of Lycaonia, Pamphilia, Caria, and the greater Phrigia, as farre as Philadelphia, and the citie of Antioch vpon the riuer Meander: All which large territorie, was

D of him afterward called Caramania, and by the same name is commonly at this day knowne, and by our late Geographers described. Of this Caraman also descended the Caramanian Kings, who of long time after vnfortunately stroue with the Othoman Sultans for the Soueraigntie of their empires; vntill that at length they with their kingdome, and all the rest of these Turkish Satrapies, were in the fatall greatnesse of the Othoman empire, swallowed vp and deuoured, as in the processe of this Historie shall (if God so will) in due time and place be declared. Next neighbour vnto him was Saruchan, of the Greekes called Sarchan, of whome the countrey of Ionia-Maritima was and yet is called Saru-Chan-Ili, and Sarnchania, that is to say, Saruchans countrey. The greatest part of Lydia, with some part also of the greater Misia, Troas, and Phrygia, fell to Calamus and his sonne Carasius, of whome it is

E called Carasia, or Carasi-Ili, (or as wee might say) Carasius his countrey. The greatest part of the antient Misia, with some part of Lydia, was possessed by Aidin, and was of him called Aidinia, or Aidin-Ili, as his countrey. Some part of the great countrey of Pontus, with the cities of Heraclea-Pontica, Castamona, Synope, and others neere vnto the Euxine, and the countrey of Paphlagonia, fell into the handes of the sonnes of Omer, or as the Greekes call him, Amur; of whome that countrey tooke not name, as did the others, of such Princes as possessed them, but is commonly called Bolli, of a Citie in that Countrey by the Turkes so named. As was also Mendesia, or as some call it Menteşia, a Countrey in the lesser Asia, so by the Turkes called of Mendos or Myndus, a Citie in Caria. There were beside these, diuers other places and Toparchies in the lesser Asia, which in the rending of this great kingdome, from the Turkes receiued names, before vnto the world vnknowne; all which to prosecute, were tedious. Sufficeth it vs, for the manifesting of the Turkes Anarchie, and the ruine of their kingdome in the lesser Asia, as in part also for the more euidence of the heauie Historie following, to haue remembred these as the chiefest; especially such as tooke their names of such great Princes or Captaines as in that so great a confusion confuſion of the Turks kingdome, by ſtrong hand firſt ceazed vpon them, and ſo left them to their poſteritie, of whom much is to be ſaid hereafter. Theſe Princes one and all that thus ſhared the late Aladinian kingdome, were deſcended of the better ſort of the Turkes, which with the Selzuccian & Aladinian Sultans driuen out of Perſia by the Tarrars, had vnder them ſeated themſelues in the leſſer Aſia, as is before at large declared. Now amongſt theſe great men that thus diuided the Turks kingdome, moſt of them that write of the Turks affaires, both Greekes and Latines, reckon vp Othoman (the raiſer of his houſe and familie) for one, who indeed in the latter time of the late Sultan Aladin began to flouriſh, and was of him for his valour extraordinarily fauoured (as in this Hiſtorie ſhall appeare) but of his kingdome held no more than one poore lordſhip, called Suguta in Bythinia, not farre from the mountaine Olympus, (long before giuen vnto his father Ertbogrull, for his good ſeruice) with ſuch other ſmall holds thereabout, as he had himſelfe gained from the weake Chriſtians his neighbours. For although he were a Turke borne, yet was hee not of the Selzuccian family, as were the reſt, but of another houſe and tribe, and therefore not of them fauoured or thought to haue ſo good right to any of the late Sultans prouinces or territories, as had they who beeing of his houſe, and holpen with the preſcription of time, enuied at the ſudden riſing of this Oguzian Turk, being to them as it were a meere ſtranger: whoſe fortune for all that (I know not by what ſecret foreknowledge) they ſeemed to feare, as in time to grow dangerous vnto them and their poſteritie; wherin they were no whit deceiued. But of him and his proceedings much more is to be ſaid hereafter: leaue wee him now therefore with the reſt vnto their fortunes in this the Turkes Anarchie, and ſo conclude this part of our Generall Hiſtorie: Glad when I looke backe to haue waded thus far, yet fearing to be drowned before I get ouer; ſuch a ſea of matter and world of troubles yet remaining, not without much labour and toile, and that in long time to be paſſed through.

Othoman none of the Selzuccian familie.

THE RISING OF THE GREAT AND MIGHTIE EMPIRE OF THE TVRKES VNDER OTHOMAN FIRST FOVNDER THEREOF: WITH HIS LIFE AND DOINGS.

WHAT small assurance there is in mens affaires, and how subiect vnto change euen those things are wherein wee for the most part repose our greatest felicitie and blisse, (beside that the whole course of mans fraile life, by many notable examples well declareth) nothing doth more plainely manifest the same, than the heauie euents and woe full destructions of the greatest kingdomes and empires: which founded vpon great fortunes, increased with perpetuall successe, exalted by exceeding power, established with most puissant armies, wholesome lawes, and deepe counsels; haue yet growne old, and in time come to naught: So that euen as men, all things else belonging vnto man, are subiect vnto the ineuitable course of destinie, or more truly to say, vnto the fatal doome of the most Highest, prefining vnto euery thing that in time begun, a time also wherin to take end, being himselfe without time the great commander thereof, and of all things else done therein. The fame of the first Assyrian Monarchie, is very antient, and was no doubt both great and long, yet hath it neuertheless found an end; and the more to put vs in remembrance of our infirmitie, was neuer with so much glorie and valour by Ninus erected, as it was with shame and cowardise by Sardanapalus subuerted. With like necessitie fel the great empire of the Medes & Persians, the time thereof being come. And after them, the Macedonians also. Neither hath the great Roman empire, or the proud citie of Rome it selfe (sometime the mistresse of the world) herein found any exemption, but runne the same course with the rest: which grown great with continuall triumphs, and so strong as that it was not with forrain power to be shaken; conuerted the forces of it selfe vpon it selfe, to the ouerthrow of the antient liberty thereof, together with the vtter subuersion of the state. After which time that mightie monarchie (of all that euer yet were, the greatest) vnder the Romane Emperors felt many an hard and perillous storme, and by little and little still declining (though sometime like a sick aged bodie, by the valour or vertue of some one or other her worthie Emperors, a little relieued, and by and by againe cast downe by the follie or negligence of some others succeeding) it became at length a prey vnto a foolish rude & barbarous nation, whielf it had before oftentimes ouercome, and ouer which many the Roman captains had triumphed, and therof taken their glorious surnames: which now againe without compassion, burning and sacking it, caused it to stoope, and to yeld vnto the seruile yoake which it had in former time proudly imposed vpon the necks of others: wherein if any thing be to be blamed, it is not the fortune or folly of this or that man, then sitting at the helm (although that may also much help the

the matter as a meane) but the instabilitie of worldly things neuer permanent, but alwayes changeable, and the sooner for their height; and that so forcibly, as that no man knoweth how to remedie the same, either if he did, were he able to performe it; the greatest means that men could possibly deuise for the stay thereof, being oftentimes by a greater power from aboue, conuerted vnto the more speedie effecting of that, against the which they were by mans wisedome prouided. The like might be said of the Athenians, the Lacedæmonians, the Thebanes, and of whom not? What maruell then, if the antient kingdomes of the Turks likewise in Persia, and the lesser Asia, in Syria, Palestina, and Ægypt, hauing run their appointed times, mightily impugned by the Christians, oppressed on the one side by the Tartars, and on the other by the Mamalukes, and at length by themselues rent in sunder (their destinie so requiring) lost at last their wonted maiestie, and so fel into a meere Anarchie, as in the former part of this Historie at large declared? Yet in this far more than any other people fortunate, That after the ruine of their former kingdomes, straight way out of themselues arise another, namely this Othoman monarchie, the chiefe obiect of this Historie: which at the first scarce of the world perceiued, or of themselues regarded, in short time so prospered, as that the power and glorie thereof obscured not their former kingdomes only (nothing, in comparison of this) but euen the greatest monarchies of the world; ouer a great part of which, it now so proudly triumpheth, as if it should neuer haue end: at the beauty wherof the world wondereth, and at the power thereof quaketh: within the greatnesse whereof are contained no small portions of Asia, Europe, and Africke, but euen the most famous and fruitfull kingdomes thereof: no part of the world left vntouched but America onely; not more fortunate with her rich mines, than in that she is so farre from so great and dangerous an enemie. The foundation of this so great a kingdome (and now so mightie an empire, as holdeth the world in awe) was first laid by the valiant Othoman, or as the Turks call him, Osman; not descended of the Selzuccian family, as were al the former Turks Sultans, but of the Oguzian tribe and kindred: in whose line this glorious empire hath euer since, by the space of three hundred yeeres and three, to the astonishment of the world, wonderfully flourished; and so yet doth at this day; vnder the gouernment of Mahomet the third, which now raigneth thirteenth in descent from him, knowing none in this world greater than himselfe. But forasmuch as both his greatnesse, and the greatnesse of the rest of the Othoman Kings and Emperors his progenitors, tooke their begrnning from this worthy and warlike Othoman, with whose life and doings we purpose to begin this part of our Historie, it shall not be amisse both for the continuation of that we haue in hand, with that we haue already written, and for the more manifesting of that which hereafter followeth, a little farther to fetch his race and descent also: not meaning with a long and faigned pedegree to set him out of Noah his arke, (which continuall succession of Princes, no Nation of the world, be it neuer so antient, the Iews onely excepted, and they also by writings and Histories as much as was possible eternized, could truly and iustly challenge) but onely so farre as shall be pertinent vnto our purpose, and by the authoritie of good Histories to be auerred.

At such time as the Turks kingdome founded by Tangrolipix in Persia, flourished in the Selzuccian Princes his successors, there was also another kingdome of theirs at the citie of Machan, as is before declared, but nothing comparable to the other either in glorie or power. In this citie, and ouer this small kingdom, raigned one Solyman, by his subiects honored also with the name of a Sultan or King; at the same time that the Tartars vnder the leading of old Zingis their great captaine, leauing their owne countrey, and bearing downe the world before them, hauing conquered the farthest parts of the East, and there seated their kingdome, turned their forces into Persia, and there ouerthrew the Turkes kingdome at Balch in Corasan, and draue the Turks with Cursumes their last King, out of the countrey: after that they had there from the time of Tangrolipix raigned about an hundred and seuentie two yeares.

Solymon, Sultã of Machan forsaketh his kingdome for feare of the Tartars.

This Solyman of whom we speake, then raigning at Machan, was not of the Selzuccian familie (as were all the other Turks Sultans, the successors of Tangrolipix) but of the Oguzian tribe, a familie famous also amongst the Turkes; who seeing the Selzuccian Sultan Cursumes (or as some call him, Cussumes) his countryman, beaten out of his kingdome by the Tartar, and his country ouerrun, and the great Caliph of Babylon also ouerthrown; thought it not good longer to stay in that country which he could not hold, but by speedie flight betimes to prouide for the safetie of himselfe & of such his subiects as would follow him: and hearing that Aladin the

A the son of Kei-Husreu, or as the Greeks call him, Cai-Cosroe (a great man of the Selzuccian familie, & neere of kin vnto the late Sultan Cursumes) who for feare of the Tartars but lately come into Romania-Asiatica, had there by force of armes most honourably seated himselfe and the Turks his followers, amongst the Christians: in hope of like good fortune, and for the zeale towards his superstition (accounting all wel gotten that was gained from the Christians) tooke his way after him, with such of his kinsmen and subiects as would accompany him in his new aduentures. And comming to Artezerum, a citie in the borders of Armenia and Cappadocia, thereabout in the country according to the season of the yere seated himselfe with his followers, being in number many; who with their wiues and children, after the manner of the Tartar Nomades their ancestors, in poore tents and carts couered with a course kind of cloth, had B followed him; being indeed nothing else but a verie rude and rough kind of sturdie heardsmen, not wedded to any place, but still remouing with their tents and carts vp and down, as best serued for their purpose and the feeding of their cattell, as do the Turcoman nation, the true discent of the Turks, in many places of Asia at this day: and were thereof not only called Nomades, that is to say, Heardsmen, (by which name the proud Ianizaries will oftentimes in contempt call euen the greatest of the naturall Turks) but Hamaxophoreti, and Hamaxobij, that is to say, people carried or liuing in carts. Solyman hauing stayd a while about Erzerum, remouing thence came to Amasia; and there spoyling the country, then inhabited by the Christians, did them much harme, oftentimes encountring them in the plain field, and sometimes seising vpon their townes and cities, vntil he had subdued vnto himselfe a right large territory:
C yea at length hauing in so many battels by him fought, and cities by him besieged, lost a great number of his people, and so wearied the rest as that they were not willing farther to follow him; and fearing also with such small power as he had left, to be able to defend and keepe the country by him alreadie gotten, in the midst of so many enemies, thought it best to depart thence, and to seeke his better fortune elsewhere. At the same time it was rifely reported, that the affaires of Persia, after so long trouble (for all this was not a while in doing) began to grow againe to some good quiet, the furie of the Tartars beeing now well abated, and that storme ouerblowne: wherefore Solyman resolued now to returne home againe, and to visit his native country, of him and his people aboue all others desired. So passing thorow Syria, (for D that was now his way) neere Aleppo he seised vpon a castle called Ziaber-Cala, & there staid a space for the refreshing of his people. Afterward setting forward againe, he came at length to the great and famous riuer Euphrates, ouer which hee must needs passe: but finding there neither bridge nor foord, or other means to get ouer, he stood still as a man dismaid, not knowing what to do. Stay there he would not, and go further he could not: his desire bid him go, but the great riuer said not so. In this perplexitie Solyman himselfe with his horse oftentimes taking the riuer, in hope to haue found some passage; but finding none, aduenturing too farre, was with the force of the streame carried away, and so together with his horse drowned. His bodie after long seeking being at length found, was with the great lamentation of his people buried neere vnto the castle Ziaber, not long before by him taken: whereof they say the place is now in their tongue called Mesari-Zuruc, (viz.) the Turks Graue. Some of these Oguzian E Turks, after the death of their Sultan, wearie of their long trauell, seated themselues in the countrey thereabouts, vnto whom the Turks that now hold that castle do refer their beginning. The rest of that great tribe and familie diuersly diuided, went vnto diuers places as their fortunes led them; some of them into the wast ground and desarts of Arabia and Syria, and are at this day called the Damascene Turcomans: other some returned backe againe into Romania, the same way that they came; of whom are discended the Turcomans of Iconium, & Anatolia: who yet with their wiues and children, as heardsmen in great companies wander vp and downe the countrey, after the manner of their ancestors.

Romania Asiatica.

Solyman thus lost, left foure sons, Sencur-Teken, Iundogdis, Ertogrul, of some called Orthobules (the father of this Othoman founder of the Turks empire that now is) and Dunder. With these foure brethren, most part of these Oguzian Turkes that were left, returning into Romania (as F is aforesaid) after they had there rested themselues a while, marching vp along the riuer Euphrates, came to a place called Pasin-Ouasi, about ten miles aboue Arterum, where Ertogrul and his brother Dunder, with foure hundered families, not willing to goe any further, stayed with their tents and carts, their best dwellings. Sencur and Iundogdis their other two brethren in the meane time passing the riuer, returned with the rest into Persia: whom wee there leaue vnto their vnknowne fortunes. In this place Ertogrul with his brether and his three sons staid a while, and had diuers conflicts with the country people thereabout, vntill that at length he thought it best to returne againe into Romania. So setting forward, he came to Ancyra, and from thence vnto the black mountains, and so to a plain called of the Turks Sultan Vngi, about 75 miles Eastward from the city of Nice in Bithynia, where he had many skirmishes with the Christians.

Now a great while before this, Aladin the elder (of whom wee haue before spoken in the former part of this historie) fled out of Persia, had subdued diuers great prouinces & countries in Romania Asiatica, or the lesser Asia, for so it is more truly called: so that he was of all the people thereabouts accounted for a great Prince, and of the Turks themselues honored with the name of their Vlu Padischach, that is to say, their great King or Emperor. Hauing placed his regal seat first at Sebastia, and afterward at Iconium; which two cities before ruinous, he repaired, and therein raigned, as did some few of his posterity after him, as is before declared. Neither was Ertogrul ignorant of the honour, glorie, and power of this great Sultan: but hauing three sons, namely Iundus, Serugatin, and Othoman, sent Serugatin his second son (a bold wel spoken man) vnto him, to request him in that his so large a kingdome, as yet not well peopled by the Turks, to grant vnto them his poore exiled countrymen, of long time oppressed with diuers fortunes, some small corner for them with their families and cattell to rest in. Which his request, the Sultan not forgetfull of his own distresse sometime in like case, graciously heard, and with great curtesie vsed the messenger. Now for the furtherance of his suit it fortuned, that this Sultan before driuen out of Persia by the Tartars, and by them also much troubled in these his new gotten countries in the lesser Asia, had with them diuers hot skirmishes & sharp conflicts: in one of which it fortuned the Sultan himselfe, with all the power he then had, to be hardly beset by his enemies, and in danger to haue lost the day: when as Ertogrul, but newly come into the country, & willing to do the Sultan seruice, & awaiting al opportunities for the commending of himselfe and his followers; vpon the sudden vnlooked for, with foure hundred men came vpon the backs of the Tartars, then almost in possession of a great victory, and so forcibly charged them, that vnable to endure the charge, & to maintain the fight against the Sultan, (whose men encouraged by this vnexpected aid, as by succour sent from heauen, began now to fight with greater courage) being both before and behind hardly beset, they as men in despaire of the victory they had before assured themselues of, turned their backs and fled. After which good seruice, the Sultan honorably welcommed this new come Turke, giuing him his hand to kisse, as the manner of the nation is; and highly commending his valor, commanded a rich cloake to be cast vpon him (amongst those Easterne nations a great honor) and all his souldiers to be bountifully rewarded; and presently after gaue vnto Ertogrul and his Turks a country village called Suguta, betwixt the castle Belezuga & the mountain Tmolus in the greater Phrygia: in which village they might liue in in Winter, and vpon the aforesaid mountain, and the mountain Ormenius, betwixt the riuers Sangarius and Licus, feed their cattell in Sommer. And yet not so contented thus to haue honored him, in whom he saw such approoued valor, committed to his protection that side of the countrie wherein he dwelt, being in the verie frontiers of his kingdome: which his charge he so well looked vnto, that all the country thereabout, before much infested with the often incursions of the enemie, was by his vigilant care and prowesse well secured.

Thus is Ertogrul the Oguzian Turke, with his homely heardsmen, become a petty Lord of a country village, & in good fauour with the Sultan: whose followers, as sturdie heardsmen with their families, liued in Winter with him in Seguta; but in Sommer in Tents, with their cattel vpon the mountains. Hauing thus liued certain yeres, and brought great peace vnto his neighbors, as well the Christians as the Turks, before much troubled with the inuasion of the Tartars; it fortuned that the Christians of Cara-Chisar (a castle thereby, called by the antient Greeks, Melanopyrgon, and of later time, Mauracastron, that is to say, the blacke tower or castle) wearie of their owne ease, and of the peace they had by his cares enioyed, fell out with him, and euil intreated both him & his people. Which their ingratitude he taking in euil part, thereof, and of the wrongs by them done vnto the Turkes, so grieuously complained vnto the Sultan, that hee therewith moued, raised a great armie, and so himselfe in person came and besieged besieged the castle. But lying there at the siege, news was brought him, that the Tartars with a great armie vnder the leading of one Baintzar, were entred into Caria, and there spoiling the country, had taken Heraclea. For the repressing of whom, the Sultan was glad to rise with his armie; yet leauing a sufficient strength behind him for the continuing of the siege, vnder the charge of Ertogrul Beg, for so the Turks now called him. The Sultan afterwards encountring with the Tartars at Baga, ouerthrew them in a great battel. Whilest Ertogrul in the mean space hardly besieged Cara-Chisar, wherein fortune so much fauoured him, that at length he tooke the Castle, the spoyle whereof he gaue vnto the souldiers, reseruing only the fift part thereof, as due vnto the Sultan; which he sent him for a Present, together with the Captain of the castle, who he had taken aliue: which captaine the Sultan afterward inlarged, and restored again to him his castle, for the payment of a yerely tribute, which he truly payed during the life of the Sultan; but he dying about two yeres after, he refused any more to pay it, and so reuolted from the Turks.

Sultan Aladin, founder of the Aladinian kingdome (for so the Turkes call it) being dead at Iconium, after him succeeded Azatines his eldest son; and after him Iathatines his yonger brother: who slaine by Theodorus Lascaris the Greeke Emperour, (as is before declared) after him succeeded in that kingdome another Iathatines, the son of Azatines, who was by the Tartars expulsed, and his kingdome subdued, as in the former part of this historie it appeareth. After which time the Selzuccian familie there also by the Tartars in the lesser Asia depressed, retained scarce the name and shadow of their former maiestie and glorie. In which troublesome times, and confusion of the state, Ertogrul well beaten and wearied in the world, kept himselfe close in his house at Suguta, as well contented therewith as with a kingdome; seeking by all meanes to keepe peace on euerie side with his neighbours, as well Christians as others. In which quiet kind of life he sweetly passed ouer the troublesome times of Mesoot the sonne of Kei-Cubades, and of Kei-Cubades the son of Feramuzin, both Sultans, but the great Tartars tributaries, and raigning but at their pleasure, vntill the time of the second Aladin, the sole and last heire of the Iconian kingdome, before by the Tartars diuided, which was no few yeres. At which time Ertogrul liued quiet at Suguta, as one amongst many other of the Iconian Sultans subiects, wisely considering the fall of the Selzuccian Sultans, both in Persia and at Iconium; as also the ruine of his owne house and familie, both from royall state brought almost vnto nothing: and therefore with patience taking the world as it came, and making a vertue of necessitie, contenting himselfe with a little, bare himselfe kindly towards all men. In which contented kind of life he grew to great yeres, with his three sons, great beloued and honored of their neighbours, as well Christians as Turks; and no lesse fauored by the second Aladin then Sultan, than he had been of all the Sultans before him: whom the yong men his sons, after the manner of their nation (forbidding them with empty hands to salute their Princes) oftentimes visited with one Present or other. In all which his sons were many good parts to be seene, yet so, as that in Othoman was easily to be seene a greater courage and spirit than in the other two his brethren: which was the cause that he was the more of them of his tribe regarded, but especially of the youthful and warlike sort, which commonly resorted vnto him when he went to hawke or hunt, or to other delights of the field (the counterfeits of war) and was of them commonly called Osman Gazi, that is to say, Osman the Warlike.

In this frontier countrey neere vnto Suguta, the dwelling place of old Ertogrul, had Sultan Aladin diuers lieutenants and captains, gouernors of his castles and strong holds vpon those frontiers, with whom Othoman was wel acquainted, and vnto whom he for friendship sake oftentimes resorted: but especially vnto the captaine of In-Vngi, for that he knew himself to be of him well beloued, & therefore vnto him verie welcome. So it fortuned vpon a time, that as Othoman, being yet but yong, was going to make merrie with the gouernor of Eski-Chisar (a castle about foure and twentie miles off, called of the Greeks, Palaeocastron) by the way as hee went, at a place called Itburne (a town in Phrygia) chanced there to see, and afterwards to fall in liking of a faire maiden called Malhatun: vnto whom his affection daily increasing, he without his fathers knowledge sent a secret friend of his to intreat with her of marriage. Which after long discourse to her made concerning Othomans affection & request, gaue him answer, that betwixt Othoman & her was great inequality; a thing especially to be regarded and eschued of such as wished to liue a happie life in wedlock bands: she was (as she said) but meanly borne, and Othoman amorous of Malhatun a Country Maid.

and therefore was not to expect so great a match: whereas he could not want choice of other G maids of more worth, & in all respects more answerable vnto himselfe. But among other causes why she gaue him this answer, one was, for that some that wished her well, had put into her head, that Othoman meant not indeed to marrie her, but vnder that color to obtain of her some few days pleasure, and so hauing dishonored her, afterward againe to cast her off: which was indeed far from his thought; for he the more inflamed with her modest denial, the more desired her for his wife. In the mean time Othoman going again vnto the gouernor of Eski-Chisar, and curteously by him entertained, chanced (as it oftentimes doth among familiar friends in their merriments) to fall in speech of his Loue, with greater affection than discretion, commending her beautie, her feature, and gracious perfections, not dissembling also, to her greater praise, the repulse by him receiued at her hands. Which the gouernor hearing, seemed greatly H to like of his choice, saying, that she was by the diuine prouidence (for so the Turks religiously vse to speak) appointed only for him to haue. But in the mean time secretly inflamed with the immoderat commendation of Othoman, without respect of friendship, he began to grow amorous of her himselfe, whom he had neuer seen; so light is that foolish affection: & that so far, as that being otherwise a man of good discretion, hee was not able to conceale or couer these new conceiued flames, but that Othoman by certain coniectures & tokens perceiued the same. And yet dissembling the matter as if he had suspected nothing, being risen from the banquet, calling vnto him one of his trustie seruants, secretly sent him away vnto certaine of the maids friends, willing them in his name, as they tendred her honour, presently to send her away vnto some safe place further off, for feare shee were not ere long taken from them by a great man I more amorous of her person, than respectiue of her honour. And by and by after taking leaue of his vnfaithfull friend, & bidding him farwel, took his way to the captain of In-Vngi, whom he knew to be his deere friend. But whilest he there stayed certaine dayes, passing the time in hawking, hunting, and other youthfull disports, with the captain his friend; the gouernor of Eski-Chisar, who commanded all the country thereabout called Sultan-Vngi, sent one of his trustie seruants to Iburne, to see faire Malhatun, and how all things went there. Who comming thither, and vnderstanding of her secret departure, and that by the aduertisement from Othoman she was conueyed to certain of her friends afar off, at his returne, from point to point certified his master thereof. Who exceedingly grieued with the report, and fretting aboue measure to see himselfe so deluded by Othoman, presently sent vnto the Captaine of In-Vngi, K
euen at first shewed it selfe; & thinking it not for his safety, to commit himselfe vnto the trust of such wauering men, entred into a deep conceit of a matter of great aduenture, which was, by a sudden sally to make himselfe way thorow the midst of his enemies. Wherewith hauing made his brother Iundus and those few his followers there present acquainted, and thereupon resolued; he fiercely sallied our, and by plaine force brake thorow the midst of them, and so tooke his way towards Suguta, still notably repulsing them that were sent to pursue him. But being come into the frontiers of his fathers territorie, & the report of his dangers known, & that being but weakely accompanied, he was by a great number of his enemies pursued; presently all the lustie youths and such as loued him well, took horse to come to his rescue: who meeting with the gouernors soldiers, that had Othoman in chace, in a sharp conflict slew diuers M of them, and put the rest to flight. Of whom some were also taken prisoners, & among the rest one Michael Cigla a Christian, Captaine of a little castle in that countrey, called Hirmen-Caia, of the people of Ormeni; Of whom Othoman taking compassion, freely pardoned him that offence. With which vnexpected curtesie he was so moued, that euer after he tooke part with

A him, and did him great seruice in his wars: whose posterity hath euer since euen vntil this our age continued, next vnto the Othoman family, most honorable and famous amongst the Turks, by the name of Michael Oglies, that is to say, the sonnes or posteritie of Michael.

Ertogrul now spent with age, shortly after died, in the yere of our Lord 1289. hauing liued 93 yeres, and thereof gouerned the Oguzian familie after the death of his father Solyman, 52. His death was of all his tribe and kindred generally lamented, and his body after the Turkish manner honorably buried at Suguta, where he had of long time liued.

After whose death, these plaine Oguzian Turks, in a generall assemblie consulting whome they might chuse for their lord and gouernor in stead of old Ertogrul; casting their eyes especially vpon two, stood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although most men The Oguzian Turks in doubt of whome to make choice for their gouernor.
B were of opinion, that Othoman for the rare gifts and vertues as wel of bodie as of mind, was to be preferred before the rest of his brethren the sons of Ertogrul; yet were there some, & they also men of great grauitie and experience, who had in suspect the yong mans age, as of it selfe slipperie, & for the most part prone to vice, especially in the liberty of great power: & therefore thought it better to make choice of Dunder (Ertoguls brother and Othomans vncle) a man of far greater grauitie, iudgement, and experience. But Dunder himselfe being indeed a wise man, & far from all ambition, persuaded them in that choice not to haue any regard at all vnto his honor or preferment, but to consider what were best for their state & welfare in general. For he prouidently foresaw in what danger the Oguzian state stood, exposed on the one side to the mortall hatred and treacheries of the Greeks, grieued to see themselues spoiled by the C Turks, & naturally hating them for the Mahometan religion: and on the other side not surely backt by the Sultans of Iconium, brought in thraldome to the Tartars, and dayly grown weaker and weaker. Vnto which inconueniences & dangers (he said) an old, weake, & ouergrown bodie (as his was) could giue no helpe or remedie at all, but required the helpe of a wise, politicke, vigilant, stirring, and valiant man, such as they all well knew was Othoman his brothers son. Thus before he came vnto the election, he in priuat declared his mind vnto the chiefe of the Oguzian familie: & afterward in their request comming to the generall assemblie, all mens minds & eies now fixed vpon Othoman, he first of al (by his example to encourage the rest) for the good of the Oguzian tribe, his antient house and family, saluted him their great lord & gouernor, promising vnto him all loyaltie, with the vtmost of his seruice: whereunto by and by D ensued the great applause of the rest of the people, as vnto a gouernor sent vnto them by God; vnto whom they ioyfully wished all happie successe, with long long life, and a prosperous gouernment. Thus with all mens good liking was Othoman made the great gouernor of the Oguzian Turks, and so become among them a great commander, and honored with the title of Osman-Beg, or the lord Osman. Yet was this his honor included in a small circuit, plain & homely, without any great pompe or shew, as commanding amongst rough and rude heardsmen and shepheards, not acquainted with the curtesie of other more ciuil nations: for as yet they were the same homely Scythian Nomades that they were before, & could not as yet be persuaded to forsake their woonted rude and vnciuil manners, by long tradition receiued from their ancestors, and so best agreeing with their nature and calling. Amongst which rude heardsmen, E this new gouernor himselfe, not too far exceeding the rest in ciuilitie, commanded much like vnto another Romulus; of whom also the Turks report many such things as do the Romans of their founder, which for breuitie I thought good to passe ouer.

Now it fortuned that Othoman euen in the beginning of his gouernment fel first at ods with one Hagionicholaus, or S. Nicholas (captaine of Einegiol, a castle there by) for that he had oftentimes of purpose troubled and molested these Oguzian heardsmen, in passing to and fro with their cattell by his castle. For which cause Othoman was inforced to request the captain of Bilezuga (another castle there by, also his neighbour & friend) that is people in passing that way to the mountains, might with their goods & cattell, as occasion should require, take the refuge of his castle; which the curteous captain (wel acquainted with old Ertogrul, Othomans father)
F easily granted: yet with this prouiso, that none should with such goods or cattell haue accesse into his castle, but the Turks women only: which his curtesie Othoman refused not. So was the castle of Bilezuga from that time forward a refuge vnto the Turkes women, who passing that way, and there shrouded with their goods and cattell, vsually presented the Captaine with some one homely countrey Present or other, which afterwards was the losse of the Castle.

Yet was not Othoman vnmindful of the wrong done vnto his people, by his euill neighbor the captain of Einegiol: but purposing to be thereof reuenged, made choice of seuentie of his best and most able men, whom he appointed secretly to passe the mountain Ormenius, and so if it were possible, to surprise or set on fire his enemies castle. Of which his designement the warie captaine hauing intelligence by one of his espials, in place conuenient vpon the mountain laid a strong ambush for the cutting off of such as were by Othoman sent to haue surprised his castle: wherof Othoman (no lesse wary than he) before warned by his scouts, & augmenting the number of his men, marched directly to the place where the enemie lay. Where betwixt them (for so small a number) was fought a right bloudie and cruell battell, and many slaine on both sides; amongst whom Hozza, Othomans nephew was one. The victorie neuertheless fel vnto Othoman: after which time his people in much more safetie fed their cattel in the Summer time on the mountains, as the manner was, and so in quiet passed to and fro.

The castle of Chalce surprised by Othoman

Shortly after, Othoman by night surprised the little castle of Chalce, not far from Einegiol; and there without mercie he put to the sword all the Christians he found therein, and so afterwards burnt the Castle. Which outrage was the beginning, and occasion of great troubles thereof ensuing: for the Christians of the countries adioyning, much grieued therewith, and assembling themselues together, complained vnto the captaine of Cara-Chisar the greatest commander thereabout, That these Turks, which not many yeres before were of meere pitty receiued as poore heardsmen into that countrey, began now in warlike manner to lay violent hands vpon the antient lands and possessions of the Christians; which insolencie (as they said) if it were longer winked at and suffered by him, and other such men of account and authoritie as were to reforme the same, they would no doubt in short time driue both them and all the rest of the Christians out of their natiue countries: wherefore it were now high time, & more than necessarie for him, and all the rest, to awake (as it were) out of the dead sleep wherein they had long time drowsily slept; and ioyning their forces together, to expulse those vnthankful, incroching, and mercilesse strangers out of their countries: the mischief (they said) being now spred far, therefore needed speedie remedie; and that repentance would come too late when it was past cure. The Captaine mooued with the indignitie of the late fact, and iust complaint of the poore country people, sent with all speed a strong companie of souldiers, vnder the leadinh of Calanus his brother; with commandement that they should march vnto the Castle of Einegiol, and there to ioyne with the rest of the Christian forces.

Othoman vnderstanding of this preparation made against him, gathering his soldiers together, marched to a place called Opsicium, neere vnto mount Tmolus in Phrygia; where betweene him and the Christians was fought a sharpe battell, wherein he lost his brother Sarugatin (whom the Turks account for a Saint or Martyr at this day) with many other of his souldiers. In this battell was also Calanus slain, whose bellie Othoman caused to be ripped, and his intrals to be pulled out, naming the place where he was buried, Mesari-Repee, that is to say, The Dog-Graue, by which name the place is at this day known. The bodie of his brother Sarugatin he carried to Suguta, and there honorably buried it neere to the bodie of his father Ertogrul. Aladin Sultan of Iconium vnderstanding of this conflict, was very sorry for the losse happened vnto Othoman, being a Mahometan of his owne religion: wherefore in token of his good will and fauour, he gaue vnto him the citie of Paleapolis, with all the territorie thereunto belonging, giuing vnto him also leaue to besiege, take or spoyle, the seigniorie and castle of Cara-Chisar: for accomplishment whereof he sent vnto him both souldiers and munition. Othoman incouraged with this great bountie of the Sultans, straightly besieged the castle of Cara-Chisar, which at last he woon, and slew all the Christians therein: the captain he tooke aliue, whom he cruelly executed: the spoile of the castle he gaue vnto his souldiers, reseruing only the fift part therof, which he sent for a present to the Sultan. All this hapned in the yere of our Lord 1290. This castle of Cara-Chisar, with the rest of Einegiol, Bilezuga, Chalce, & others before and hereafter in the life of Othoman to be mentioned, were all scituate in the borders of the greater Phrygia, or else neere thereunto in the confines of Bithynia and Mysia: In which pleasant countries (but lately part of the Constantinopolitan empire) the Christians the antient inhabitants thereof, as yet dwelt, intermingled with the Turks at the rising of the Othoman empire; with whom they liued at continual jars, vntill that at length they were by them altogether vtterly oppressed and extinguished.

Othoman

Othoman encouraged with this good successe, and supported by the great Sultan of Iconium, began now after his ambitious nature to conceit greater matters, for the further increase of his honor and territorie: yet not trusting altogether to his own deuice, he entred into consultation with his brother Iundus, which way was best to take to distresse and bring in subiection his neighbours the Christians. In which case, Iundus a man of greater courage than discretion, aduised him with all celeritie to vrge his good fortune, and presently to inuade the Christians alreadie discouraged with the losse of Cara-Chisar. But this counsell altogether pleased not Othoman; for (said he) the castles and forts by vs gained, must bee kept with strong garrisons, otherwise they will again be recouered by the enemie; which garrisons cannot be maintained and kept, if we spoile or dispeople the countries adioyning vpon vs; for in so doing we shal (as it were) with our owne hands cut our owne throats: wherfore I thinke it better, that we enter into a league of amitie and friendship with the Christians round about vs; which league wee will keep with some, & breake with others, as shall serue best for our purpose. And according to this resolution, he made peace indeed with al the Christians, but specially with Michael Cossi, captain of Hirmen-Caia castle, of whom we haue before spoken, who afterward serued him to great vse in the managing of his wars, & became also a renegat of the Mahometan religion. All this Othoman did the rather, because he was then at great variance with one Germean-Ogli (a great man among the Turks, but one of the Selzuccian familie) who enuying at the rising of Othoman, sought by all means possible to hinder his greatnes, as did also the others, his quietnesse: which discord the Christians liked well, as a meane for them to liue in more rest by.

Othoman consulteth with his brother Iundus what course to take for the oppressing of the christians his neighbours.

In the meane time, Othoman deuised with all carefulnes to beautifie and strengthen his new commonweale: and for the greater concourse of people, built a faire temple in Cara-Chisar for the exercise of the Mahometan religion; appointed markets to be kept in al peaceable maner, in his great townes, granting great priuiledges to such as resorted thither, as wel Christians as Turks: vsing therin such justice, that all sorts of people without feare, in hope of gaine resorting thither, furnished his country and townes with all things necessarie: yet this care of ciuil policie and gouernment, could not so withdraw him, but that according to his aspiring mind, he had alwaies a greater desire and care to inlarge his possessions and territorie. Wherefore intending to make a rode into Bythinia, he requested Michael Cossi, the Christian captaine before mentioned, to deliuer his opinion what was best to be done: who so politickely directed him in that exploit, that he returned victorious, enriched with great spoile and more honor. This road so terrified most of the Christians thereabouts, that they were loth to giue Othoman any cause of offence, for feare lest they should by him be spoiled.

Othoman setteth in order his little commonweale.

It fortuned about this time, that the captains of Bilezuga and Cupri-Chisar falling at ods, he of Cupri-Chisar first taking vp armes fiercely inuaded the captaine of Bilezuga: who thereupon sent vnto Othoman, to pray his ayd, which hee easily granted, and so without further delay presently came vnto him with certaine companies of lustie tall souldiers. By whose comming, the captaine of Bilezuga not a little encouraged and strengthened, set vpon his enemie: where betwixt them was made a sharpe conflict, and diuers on both sides slaine: but the victorie by the helpe of Othoman the Turke, at length inclining to the Bilezugian, the other vanquished captaine in all hast fled vnto his owne castle. After whome Othoman following, laid siege vnto the Castle, which at length he tooke together with th captaine, whom he caused to be presently slaine. It is strange to tell, how proud the Lord of Bilezuga was, to haue sed to be presently slaine. It is strange to tell, how proud the Lord of Bilezuga was, to haue so reuenged himselfe of his enemie, and to haue gained the victorie: although it were indeed gotten, not so much by his owne valour as by the prowesse of the Turke: for whome and his followers in token of his thankfulnesse, he caused a great feast to be prouided in the countrey there, whereby he honorably entertained them: and in the end of the feast, caused garments of great price (according to the manner of the Easterne nations) to be giuen to Othoman, in token of his fauour; and his souldiers to be also bountifully rewarded: but this was done with such a presumptious state & grace, as if he had bin some great Prince, offring vnto the common soldiers of the Turks, in passing by them, his hand to kisse, as a great fauour. With which exceeding insolencie, Othoman was so much offended, that hee had much adoe to hold his hands from him: yet repressing his anger, hee in secret imparted his discontentment vnto his cosin Dunder, his vncle Dunders sonne, grieuously complayning of the intollerable pride of the Christian captain, and of the disgrace by him done vnto the Turks, in offring them his hand to kisse; kisse; requiring his opinion how he were for the same to be corrected: who but a little before, G beeing by the said captaine made his lieutenant, franckly told his kinsman, That as then nothing was to be attempted against him: first, for that on the one side they had Germean Ogli (a great man amongst the Selzuccian Turkes) their enemie, and round about them besides they were enuironed with the Christians, whom he should haue all in his neck at once if he should offer the Bilezugian captain any wrong. By which answer, Othoman perceiuing his cosins great affection towards the Christian captaine, and doubting to haue the mischiefe he had imagined against him, by him reuealed, or at least wise hindered; without more adoe suddenly taking vp his bow in his hand, with an arrow shot him quite thorow, and so slew him.

Michael Cossi inuiteth Othoman to the mariage of his daughter.

Not long after, Michael Cossi the captaine of Hirmen-Caia, Othomans great friend, hauing concluded a marriage betweene a gentleman of that countrey and his daughter, inuited all the H Christian captains of the castles thereabouts, requesting them to come to the marriage; and the rather, that so they might grow into acquaintance with Othoman, whose power began now to grow dreadfull vnto them: hoping that such means might be found at that merry meeting, that all being made friends, euery man might in more security possesse his own without feare of being spoiled by him. Vnto this marriage came al these bidden guests, bringing with them such presents as they thought good to bestow vpon the new married folks, according to the maner of the country: but Othomans gifts far exceeded al the rest, who besides many other rich things, gaue vnto them whole flocks and droues of sheep and cattel: which thing drew all the Christian captains into no little admiration of his bountie; insomuch that they began to say I among themselues, that Othomans wealth and good fortune did portend some greater matter, to their vtter ruin and fall: which to preuent, they thought it best by secret meanes to compasse his death. The execution of which deuice they referred to the captaine of Bilezuga, as vnto one with him best accqainted. This captaine was of great wealth, credit, and authoritie amongst the Christian rulers thereabouts, but very full of craft and dissimulation: which his euill disposition, Othoman of longtime well perceiued; yet hauing occasion to vse him, in subtill manner gaue him (in outward shew) al the honour he could, magnifying him in words, and debasing himselfe as plaine and poore in comparison of him. But to giue a beginning to this trecherous deuise; the captaine meeting with Othoman, in friendly manner told him, how that he intended shortly to marrie the daughter of the captain of Iar-Chiser, earnestly requesting him to honor that his marriage with his presence, of the time whereof, he said he would K giue him farther knowledge afterwards: and al was but a color, to bring Othoman whithin his danger, not fearing any such treason. Othoman vnderstanding that the time of the marriage drew nigh, sent thither a present of certain fat oxen and sheep, in the name of his brother Iun-dus, for the captains prouision against the mariage; certifying him, that Othoman himselfe, with his simple rétinue, would be present at the mariage, & then present him, not with such presents as were agreeable wito his honor, yet such as his poore abilitie could affoord. This message with the presents, were wonderful welcome to the captain, hoping assuredly that his deuised trecherie would take such effect as he wished: and therefore calling vnto him Michael Cossi, in whom he had reposed an especiall trust, declared to him his whole deuise (wherof he was not L before altogether ignorant) requesting him to take the pains to go vnto Othoman to bring him to the marriage, the time beeing now certainly appointed and at hand; which hee knew Cossi might easily do, being of his familiar acquaintance: and in token of great friendship, he sent vnto Othoman by the same messenger, a present of gilt plate. Cossi tooke vpon him this message, which when he had deliuer'd to Othoman, he found him very willing to go, as a man not doubting any harme. But Cossi inwardly grieuing to see so braue a man, and his kind friend, by such trecherous maner to be brought to his end, moued with compassion, discouered vnto him the whole conspiracy of the captain against him, & of the plot laid for his destruction, willing him to take heed vnto himselfe: for which verture, Othoman gaue Cossi great thanks, as to his friend for sauing his life; & withall richly rewarded him, promising him greater matters if he would M continue that his faithfull friendship. Now concerning the captaine of Bilezuga (sayth he) at your returne recommend me vnto him, and tell him, That I thinke my selfe much bound vnto him for many courtesies, but especially for that he hath heretofore diuers times in most friendly manner protected my goods and cattell, within the safegard of his castle: which his friendship I most humbly request him to continue for one yeare more, enforced thereunto by

A reason of the dangerous wars betwixt me and the Prince Germean-Ogli; as he well knoweth: wherefore if it might so stand with his good pleasure, I would presently send vnto his castle such things as I make most reckoning of, requesting him once more to be the faithfull keeper thereof, as he hath bin before: and tell him further, that my mother in law, with her daughter my wife, desire nothing more than to find opportunitie to be acquainted with the honorable Lady his mother; for which cause (if it please him) I wil bring them both with me to the marriage. This Othomans request, when the captaine of Bilezuga vnderstood by Michael Cossi, he sent the same Cossi backe againe to hasten his comming, willing him to bring with him what guesse he pleased; appointing certain time and place when and where the marriage should be solemnised. And because the castle of Bilezuga was thought to be too little conueniently to B receiue the multitude of people which were expected at the mariage, there was another open place of greater receipt appointed in the country for that purpose, about three miles distant from the castle. The marriage day drew nigh, whereunto Othoman must repaire for his promise sake: and therefore prepared with all diligence to set forward, and to put in execution what he had deuised for the safetie of himself, & destruction of his enemy. Othoman had of long accustomed in dangerous times, to send by carriage the best of his things, made vp in packs, to be kept in safetie in the castle of Bilezuga: vnder the colour whereof, he now made great packes in forme as he was wont; but in stead of his rich houshold stuffe, & such other things of price, he thrust in armed men, couering those packs with homely couerings, sending them by carriages to the castle of Bilezuga, giuing charge that they should not come thither before twilight.
C After that, he apparelled certaine of his best soldiers in womens apparell, as if it had been his wife and mother in law, with their women: so casting his iourney, that he with these disguised soldiers, and the other sent in packs, might at one instant meet at the castle aforesaid. The captain being now in the countrey, and vnderstanding that Othoman was comming in the euening with a great traine of gentlewomen; thought the cause of his late comming to be, for that the Turkish women vse to shun the sight of Christian men by all means they can. Othoman beeing now come to the place in the country where the marriage was next day to be solemnized, hauing done his humble reuerence to the captaine; requested him to do him the honor, that his gentlewomen which were nigh at hand, might by his appointment be sent to his castle, there to haue some conuenient lodging where they might alight and bestow themselues apart from D others, according to the homely fashion of their nation; lest peraduenture the presence of so honorable a companie of noble men and gallants, might put them out of countenance: which the captaine granted, and hauing saluted them a farre off after the Turkish manner, commanded them to be conueyed to his castle, making reckoning of them all as of a rich prey. At the same time that these disguised souldiers arriued at the castle, came thither also the other soul-diers couered in packs in the carriages: which so soone as they came into the castle, suddenly leapt out of the packs, and drawing their short swords, with the helpe of their disguised fellowes, slew the warders of the castle, and without more adoe possessed the same: the greatest part of the captaines people beeing before gone out of the castle to the place of the marriage.
Othoman hauing tarried so long with the captaine, as he supposed the castle at that time by his E men surprised; so soone as the captaine had taken his chamber, suddenly tooke horse, with all his followers, accompanied also with Cossi, taking his way directly to the castle of Bilezuga, of whose sudden departure the captaine vnderstanding, presently tooke horse and pursued him with all his traine, which were for the most part drunk; and ouertaking him before he came to the castle set vpon him: in which conflict, he was by Othoman slain, and the rest put to flight.
F The same night Othoman with great celeritie, early in the morning surprised the castle of Bursia, also where he tooke prisoners the captain therof, with his faire daughter Lulufer, (who should haue bin married to the captaine of Bilezuga the next day) with all her friends, as they were readie to haue gone vnto the marriage, which faire Lady he shortly after married vnto his eldest sonne Orchanes; who had by her Amurath, third King of the Turkes, and Solyman Bassa. Othoman omitting no opportunitie, presently sent one of his captains called Dargut-Alpes, a man of great estocme and valour, to besiege the castle of Einegiol, wherein hee vsed such celeritie, that preuenting the fame of that was done at Bilezuga, hee suddenly enuironed the castle in such sort that none could passe in or out; vntill such time as that Othoman hauing brought

brought his prisoners and prey to the castle of Belizuga, and there hauing set all things in good order, came with the rest of his men of warre to Einegiol; which he presently by force tooke, promising the spoile thereof vnto his souldiers. The captaine called Hagio Nicholaus his antient enemie, he caused to be cut in smal peeces, and all the men to be slaine: which cruelties he vsed, because they a little before had vsed the like tyrannie against his Turks.

Othoman by administration of Iustice strengtheneth his gouernment.

When Othoman had thus got into his subiection a great part of the strong castles and forces of the greater Phrygia, with the territorie to them belonging, he began with all carefulnesse to make good laws, and to execute Iustice to all his subiects, as well Christians as turks: with great indifferencie studying by all means to keepe his country in peace and quietnesse, and to protect his subiects from the spoile of others, as well Christians as Turks: whereby it came to passe, that the old inhabitants which had for the most part forsaken the countrey, by reason of the great troubles therein, repaired now againe to their antient dwellings; and not only they, but many other strangers also, supplying the places of them whom the late warres had consumed. So that by his good gouernment, that wasted countrey in short time grew to bee againe very populous.

The ciuill gouernment of his countrey well established, he besieged the citie of Isnica, in antient time called Nice, a citie of Bythinia, famous for the generall Councell there holden against Arius in the time of Constantine the Great. This citie he brought into great distresse, by placing his men of war in forts new built vpon euery passage and way leading vnto the same, so that nothing could bee brought out of the countrey for the releefe of the poore citizens. They in this extremitie, by a secret messenger certified the Emperor of Constantinople (vnder whose obedience they were) in what distresse the citie stood; and that except he sent them present releefe, they must of necessitie either perish with famine, or yeeld themselues into the hands of their enemies the Turks. The Emperour moued with the pitifull complaint of this messenger, with all expedition embarked certaine companies of souldiers from Constantinople to relieue his besieged citie. But Othoman vnderstanding by his espials, where these souldiers were appointed to land, in secret manner withdrawing most of his forces from the siege, lay in ambush neere to the same place where the Emperors soldiers (casting no peril) landed; who before they could put themselues in order of battel were by Othoman & his turks in such sort charged, that most part of them were there slaine, and the rest driuen into the sea, where they miserably perished. Othoman hauing thus politickely ouerthrown the Constantinopolitan souldiers, returning to the siege, continued the same in straiter manner than before. The besieged citizens driuen into great penurie, and now dispairing of all helpe, yeelded themselues with the great and rich citie of Nice into the hands of Othoman, with the spoile whereof he greatly enriched his men of warre.

Aladin the great Sultan of Iconium, glad to heare of this good succes of Othoman against the Christians, in token of his fauour and loue, sent vnto him a faire enfigne, with certaine drums, and trumpets, a sword and princely robe, with large charters, That whatsoeuer he tooke from the Christians should be all his owne; and also that publicke prayers should be said in all the Turkes temples, in the name of Othoman, for his health and prosperous estate: which two things properly belonged to the dignitie of the Sultan. These extraordinarie fauours gaue occasion for many to thinke, that Sultan Aladin (hauing no children) intended to make Othoman his adoptiue sonne and successour in his kingdome.

The presents and charters sent him, Othoman humbly accepted, sending vnto Aladin the fift part of the spoile of Nice, taken from the Christians, but the princely honours due to the Sultan only, he vsed not during the life of Aladin: intending not long after to haue gone himselfe in person to visit the Sultan, and so to haue growne into his further fauor. But hauing prepared all things for so honorable a iourney, at what time as he was about to set forward, he was certainly informed of the death of Aladin, and that Subli (one of his great counsellors) had taken vpon him the dignitie of the Sultan (as is before declared): which newes much discontented the aspiring mind of this Oguzian Turk, in good hope to haue succeeded him in the kingdom, or at leastwise to haue shared the greatest part thereof vnto himselfe, whereof he was now altogether disappointed. Yet immediatly after the death of Aladin, he thought it now fit time to take vpon him the princely honours before granted vnto him by the Sultan in his life time, which he for modestie sake had forborn, Aladin yet liuing, wherefore he made one Dursa surnamed named Fakitche (that is to say, a man learned in the Turkish law) Bishop and Iudge of Cara-Chisar, commanding the publick praiers which were wont to be made for the health & prosperous raigne of the great Sultan, to be now made in his owne name; which was first openly done by the said Bishop in the pulpit of Cara-Chisar. At the same time also he began to coin money in his owne name, and to take vpon him all other honours belonging vnto a Sultan or King: which was about ten yeares after the death of his father Ertogrul, and in the yeare of our Lord 1300, vnto which time the beginning of the great empire of the Turks is vnder the fortune of this Othoman, to be of right referred, as then by him thus begun. 1300

When Othoman had thus taken vpon him the maiesty of a King, he made his sonne Orchanes Prince and gouernour of Cara-Chisar; promoting his principall followers, to be gouernours of other strong castles and forts, diuers of which places retaine the name of those captaines at this day. He himselfe made choice of the citie Neapolis, about twentie miles from Nice, to seat his regall Palace in; where also diuers of his Nobilitie built them houses, and changed the name of the city, calling it Despotopolis, as who should say, the city of the Lord or Prince. For all this, Othoman ceased not to deuise by all meanes he could, to augment his kingdome: and for that cause beeing accompanied with his sonne Orchanes, made many rodes into the countries adioyning vpon him, surprzing such places as might best serue his purpose, for the enlargement of his kingdome, all which in particular to rehearse were tedious.

Neapolis the first regall citie of the Othoman Kings.

Prusa besieged by Othoman.

The Christian Princes, rulers of the countries bordering vpon this new kingdome, fearing lest the greatnes of Othoman might in short time be their vtter confusion, agreed to ioyne all their forces together, and so to commit to the fortune of one great battell their owne estates with his: according to which resolution, the Christian confederate Princes, which were for the most part of Mysia, and Bythinia, leuying the greatest forces they were able to make, with fire and sword inuaded Othomans kingdome. Who hauing knowledge beforehand of this great preparation made against him, had in a readinesse all his captaines and men of warre: and hearing that his enemies had entred his dominion, in warlike manner marched directly towards them; and meeting with them in the confines of Phrygia and Bythinia, fought with them a great and mortall battell, wherein many were slaine on both sides, as well Turks as Christians: and after a long fight, obtained of them a right bloudy victorie. In this battell Casteleanus, one of the greatest Christian captains was slaine: another called Tekensis of the country which he gouerned in Phrygia, chased by Othoman vnto the castle of Vlubad, not far distant from the place where the battell was fought, was for feare deliuered vnto him by the captaine of the same castle, and was afterward by Othomans commandement most cruelly cut in pieces, within the view of his chiefe castle: which Othoman afterward subdued, with all the countrey thereabouts. The other Christian Princes and captains saued themselues by flying into stronger holds farther off. The Prince of Bythinia the chiefe author of this war, fled into the strong citie Prusa, which the Turks now call Burusa, whither Othoman not long after led his army, in hope to haue won the same: but finding it not possible to be taken by force began presently at one time to build two great and strong castles vpon the chiefe passages leading to the citie, which castles he with great industrie finished in one yeare: and in the one, placed as captaine Altemeur his nephew; in the other one Balaban Zuck, both men of great courage, and skilfull in feats of warre: and in this sort hauing blocked vp the citie of Prusa, so that little or nothing could without great danger be brought into it, he subdued the most part of Bythinia, and so returned home, leauing the two castles well manned with strong garrisons, vnder the charge of the captaines before named.

Othoman returning home to Neapolis, honorably rewarded his soldiers, according to their deserts, establishing such a quiet and pleasing gouernment in his kingdom, that people in great number resorted from far into his dominions, there to seat themselues: wherby his kingdom became in few years exceeding populous, and he for his politicke gouernment most famous. And so liuing in great quietnesse certaine yeares, being now become aged and much troubled with the gout, his old soldiers accustomed to liue by the wars, abhorring peace, came to him, requesting him as it were with one voice, to take some honorable warre in hand for the inlarging of his kingdome, with great cheerfulnes offring to spend their liues in his seruice rather than to grow old in idlenes: which forwardnes of his men of war greatly pleased him, and so giuing them thanks, for that time dismist them, promising that he would not be long vnmindfull full of their requeſt. But yet thinking it good to make all things ſafe at home before he tooke any great wars in hand abroad, thought it expedient to call vnto him Michael Coſte, the onely Chriſtian Captaine whom for his great deſerts he had at al times ſuffered to liue in quiet with his poſſeſſions, as it were in the heart of his kingdome; and by faire meanes (if it might be) to perſuade him to forſake the Chriſtian religion, & become a follower of Mahomets, ſo to take away all occaſion of miſtruſt: which if he ſhould refuſe to do, then forgetting al former friendſhip, to make war vpon him as his vtter enemie. Whereupon Coſti was ſent for, being perſuaded by the meſſenger, that Othoman had ſent for him, becauſe he had occaſion to vſe his wonted faithfull counſell and ſeruice in a great exploit which hee had intended, as he had oftentimes before. Coſti thinking of nothing leſſe than of that which enſued, came accompanied with ſuch ſoldiers as he thought to vſe in that ſeruice: But comming vnto Othoman, and vnderſtanding the very cauſe why hee was ſent for, and ſeeing danger emminent on euery ſide, kiſſing Othomans hand, after the manner of the Turks, requeſted him in curteous manner to enter him in the principles of the Mahometan religion, which he promiſed euer after to embrace: And ſo ſaying certain words after Othoman, he turned Turke, to the great diſpleaſure of God, and the contentment of Othoman and his nobilitie. For which his reuolting, Othoman preſently gaue him an enſigne and a rich robe, tokens whereby the Mahometan Sultans aſſure their vaſſals of their fauour and the vndoubted poſſeſſion of ſuch land and liuing as they then hold.

Michael Coſti turneth Turk.

Oftentimes after this, Othoman for the contenting of his ſoldiers, inuaded the countries bordering vpon him, tooke many ſtrong caſtles and forts, ſubdued the moſt part of Phrygia, Miſia, and Bythinia, and other great regions, vnto the Euxine ſea: and being now very aged and diſeaſed as is aforeſaid with the gout, and thereby vnable to goe into the field in perſon himſelfe, oftentimes ſent his ſonne Orchanes againſt his enemies; who to the imitation of his father atchieued many great enterpriſes, Othoman his father yet liuing.

Now happily might the conſiderate reader (and not without iuſt cauſe) maruell, what dead ſleep had ouerwhelmed the Greeke Emperors of thoſe times; firſt Michael Paleologus, and afterwards his ſonne Andronicus, both men of great valour, and ſtill reſiant at Conſtantinople, thus to ſuffer the Turks (not Othoman for he as yet bare no ſway; but others the ſharers of Sultan Aladins kingdom) to take their cities, ſpoile their countries, kil their ſubiects, and dayly to incroch vpon them in the leſſer Aſia, and eſpecially in Bythinia, ſo neere vnto them, and as it were euen vnder their noſes: But let him with me, heere as in a moſt conuenient place but breath a little, and conſider the troubled ſtate of that declining empire, now haſting to an end; and he ſhall plainly ſee the cauſes of the decay thereof, and how like an old diſeaſed bodie quite ouerthrowne and ſicke to death, it became at length a prey vnto the aſpiring Turks. Michael Paleologus hauing by great trecherie obtained the Greeke empire, and by rare fortune recouered alſo the citie of Conſtantinople from Baldwin the Emperor (as is in the former part of this Hiſtorie declared) fearing the power of the Princes of the Weſt, but eſpecially of Charles King of Sicilia, then a Prince of great fame and power, whom he knew Baldwin (the late Emperor) ceaſed not to ſolicite for the reſtitution of him againe into his empire, and to haue alſo ioyned with him a neere bond of affinitie, by marrying his daughter vnto Charles his ſon: to auert this danger, and to intangle Charles with troubles neere home, by his embaſſadors offred vnto Gregorie the tenth, then Biſhop of Rome, to vnite and conforme the Greeke Church vnto the Latine, and to acknowledge the Biſhops ſupremacie, in ſuch ſort as that it ſhould bee lawfull for any man to appeale vnto the court of Rome, as vnto the higher and moſt excellent court; of which his offer the Pope gladly accepted, promiſing to performe what he had before requeſted, for the keeping of Charles otherwiſe buſied. But when it came to the point, that this reformation and alteration of religion in the Greek church ſhould be made, Ioſeph the Patriarch, to begin withall, gaue vp his place, & ſhortly after forſaking the city, retired himſelfe into a monaſterie neere vnto the ſtrait of Boſphorus, where he at quiet deuoutly ſpent the reſt of his life. The reſt of the clergie alſo diſcontented with this innouation, in their ſermons openly inuaighed againſt it, perſuading the people not to receiue it; crying out, That now was come the time of their trial, the time of their martyrdome, and the time wherein they were to receiue the glorious crown of their painfull ſuffrings; inſomuch, that great tumults were therupon raiſed, and all the citie and the country in an vprore: for it was not the clergie only, and the vulgar people by them moued, which diſliked and abhorred theſe the Emperors proceedings, & made theſe ſtirs, but many of the better ſort, yea, of the chiefe magiſtrats themſelues alſo. So that Michael Paleologus the Emperor leauing all other forrein buſines, was enforced to conuert all his power and ſtudy vnto the appeaſing of theſe domeſticke troubles, as deeming them of greater danger than thoſe abroad. And firſt to perſuade his diſcontented ſubiects, hee told them, That this alteration was made not for any good liking he had thereunto, but in reſpect of the dangerouſnes of the time: and that it was a point of wiſedome, to foreſee dangers hanging ouer our heads, & not to delay, if any thing were to be altred, for the auerting therof: for if the enemies (as he ſaid) ſhould come, the city yet in many places rent, or but lately repaired, & as it were but newly raiſed from death to life, the preſent miſchiefs would be far greater than thoſe forepaſſed, & that then their enemies would become lords not of their religion and ceremonies only, but of al at once, their wiues, their children, & whatſoeuer elſe they had: where their libertie changed into bondage, they ſhould be conſtrained to conforme themſelues not with their bodily ſeruice only, but euen with their minds alſo, vnto the wills of the Latines their enemies. And that ſo it would come to paſſe, that no man ſhould be able to keepe the old cuſtoms & manners of their anceſtors, but ſhould ſee euen their moſt ſacred rites and ceremonies changed & quite ouerthrown. Which he carefully foreſeeing, had not (as he ſayd) refuſed to yeeld vnto neceſſity, and as wiſdome would, neglected a little harme in reſpect of a greater benefit; & in the leſſe to haue yeelded vnto his enemies, to enioy the benefit of the greater. With which the emperors perſuaſion ſome were mooued, & ſo held themſelues contented: and ſome others not; againſt whom hee was inforced to vſe other more ſeuere remedies, as againſt his rebellious ſubiects: of whom ſome he impriſoned, ſome he baniſhed, ſome he tormented, ſome he diſmembred, ſome he bereft of their ſight, or confiſcated their goods, vſing (in briefe) all the means wherby the minds of the reſolute or the weake were to be mooued. All which things, they whoſe zeale was grounded vpon knowledge (in number feweſt) with patience indured: but the greater part void of iudgement, & the refuſe of the people in ſimple attire, ranne rogueing abroad, ſome into Peloponeſus, ſome into Thracia, ſome into Achaia, & ſome as far as Colchos, as men perſecuted for their conſcience, not regarding greatly whether, ſo it were out of the emperors iuriſdiction, & ſomthing fitting their owne humors; neither conforming themſelues vnto the religion then commonly by the emperor eſtabliſht, neither yet agreeing among themſelues, but taking vnto them diuers names, ſome as the diſciples of Arſenius, ſome of Ioſeph, & ſome of others; ſome of them, themſelues deceiued, and deceiuing others alſo. Thus for the auoiding of forrein danger out of the Weſt, was the Empire at home no little indangered, & the ſtate thereof ſhaken. Wherewith the Emperor was ſo encombred, as that he had no leiſure to prouide for the tempeſt ariſing by the Turks out of the Eaſt, but was inforced wholly to imploy himſelf & al his indeauors to the keeping of his people & ſubiects in their due obedience at home. All whoſe deep deuices, firſt in aſpiring to the empire, no way vnto him due, & great trauells afterwards for the aſſuring of the ſame to himſelfe and his poſteritie, againſt all right, euen with the alteration of the religion of his fathers, yeelded him in the winding vp of all, not ſo much as credit of an honorable ſepulture: but dying in theſe troubles not far from Liſymachia, as he was making preparation againſt the prince of Theſſalie, was there by his ſon Andronicus his commandement (for whoſe aduancement he had ſtrained both his faith & honor) obſcurely buried in the field, a good way from his camp, as vnworthie of a better ſepulture, for reuolting from the antient religion of his anceſtors, although his obſequies were for faſhion ſake afterward with ſome ſolemnitie celebrated. This was the end of the great emperor Michael Paleologus, in whoſe time the Turks, the ſucceſſors of Aladin, greatly incroched vpon him in the leſſer Aſia, as is in part before declared: a man greatly adorned with the good gifts both of the bodie and the mind, had hee not for the aduancement of himſelfe and his poſteritie, ſtained the ſame with foule treacherie and apoſtacie: for which (as ſome ſay) he euer after liued in conſcience troubled, and dying was euen by his own ſon not thought worthie of an honorable funerall. A notable example vnto all ſuch as with greedineſſe ſeeke after vaine glorie, and fooliſhly expoſe themſelues vnto ſuch aduentures, as oftentimes ouerwhelme their deepeſt deuices, hauing in themſelues no certaintie, preferring their inordinate deſires (either for themſelues or their poſteritie) before that which is good and vertuous. Twice wretched in ſo doing; firſt in their follie, and then in their indeauors: who beſide that they finde God himſelfe againſt their deſignes and purpoſes, they by & by alſo euidently meet with other things than what they had foreaſted, Alteration of religion in the Greeke church.

Perſecution in the Greeke church for matters of religion.

casted, contrarie vnto them; and so themselues oftentimes, contrarie to their expectation, cast headlong into extreame miserie: for loe, euen he of whom we now speake, otherwise a man of great wisedome, and happie in his doings, ouercome with his affection towards his children, in desiring to leaue vnto them the empire, when as he ought to haue cast all the care both of himselfe and of them especially vpon the prouidence of God; hee like a blind man following his owne deepe conceits, not grounded vpon the feare of God, but vpon mans wisdome only, cast himselfe before he was aware into miserable troubles, and became odious euen vnto his subiects, and them also for whom he had so forgot himselfe. For whereas God had euen from his childhood allotted vnto him the empire (as was by many euident signes and tokens to haue bin gathered) if he could haue moderated his vntimely desires, kept his tongue from periury, & his hands from bloud, and not turned out of the way after strange doctrine; hee had by many degrees excelled euen the best Emperors his predecessors: wheras now he lieth obscurely buried, shrouded in the sheet of defame, the repors of his foule and faithlesse dealings far exceeding all his other worthie vertues.

Andronicus Paleologus succeeding his father in the Empire, and thinking by restoring again the gouernment of the church, together with the rites and customes of the Greeks, to haue appeased all such troubles as were before by his father raised, by bringing in those of the Latines; found himselfe therein much deceiued, and his troubles no lesse than his fathers: they which had before receiued the Latine customes, and well liking of them, with great obstinacie defending the same; and the other of the contrarie faction now countenanced by the Emperor, without modestie or measure insulting vpon them: whereof arose exceeding great stirs and troubles, especially in the beginning of his raigne: to the great benefit of the incroching Turks, who in the mean time ceased not by all means to increase their territories in Asia; and not only there, but in the islands of the Mediterranean sea also. For Andronicus by the death of Charles King of Sicilie, deliuered of the greatest feare for which both he and his father before him had to their great cost and charge both built and maintained a strong fleet of gallies; now persuaded by some, whose actions and speeches were after the manner of the court, all framed vnto the princes appetite, (as the readiest way to thriue, without respect of the common good) to spare that needlesse charge (as they termed it) which yerely cost him more than any thing else; had discharged all his mariners and sea men, and commanded all the gallies to be laid vp, some in one creeke, some in another; where neglected and not looked vnto, they in time for the most part rotted and perished. As for the Marriners, they went some one way, some another, as their fortunes led them, to seeke for their liuings in forreine countries, euen with the Emperors enemies; and some gaue themselues to husbandrie, thinking it better by doing something to liue, than by sitting still to perish. Which good husbandrie at the first seemed to be verie profitable vnto the Emperour, but especially vnto such as beeing neere vnto him, and couetously giuen, made small reckoning of all other the most necessarie defences of the empire, in comparison of hoording vp of mony, vntil that it was afterward too late by experience found hereof to haue sprung many great mischiefes, vnto the great weakning of the Greeke Empire. For besides that the Turks without let did great harme on the sea; the Pyrats now out of feare of the Emperours gallies, at their pleasure tooke the spoyle of the rich Islands in the Mediterranean, and robbed the towns all along the sea coast, to the vnspeakable griefe of the poore country people: and yet not so contented, came with their gallies, sometime two, sometime three, and sometime moe, as it were in contempt, euen close vnto the imperiall citie. Yea the Venetians were so bold, as vpon a right small displeasure to rifle and afterward to set fire vpon the suburbs thereof, which they would hardly haue aduentured, had the Emperors fleet bin preserued and maintained in the woonted strength.

At the same time also Andronicus the Emperor (to the great hindrance of the affaires of the empire, and aduantage of the forrein enemie) was not a little troubled with a jealous suspition of his brother Constantine (commonly called Porphyrogenitus) as if he had sought to haue aspired vnto the empire; seeking by all means to win vnto himselfe the loue and fauor of all men, but especially of the nobility both at home and abroad, & so by that means to mount vnto the height of his desires: All which (as most men thought) were but meere slanders, maliciously deuised by such as enuying at his honor, and taking occasion by the emperors suspition, ceased not to increase the same, vntill they had wrought his vnworthie destruction. The first ground of this false suspition in the Emperours head, was, for that that this Constantine euen from his childehood, was for many causes, better beloued of the old Emperour his father, than Andronicus, dronicus, as better furnished with those gifts of nature which beautifie a prince; and of a more curteous behauior than was his brother: insomuch that had he not bin the yonger brother, his father could willingly haue left him his successor in the empire. This was one and the chiefest cause of the emperors grudge, and the ground of his suspition. Yet was there another also, and that not much lesse than this: for that his father in his life time had of long thought to haue separated from the empire a great part of Thessalia & Macedonia, and to haue made him absolute Prince thereof; & had haply so done, had he not bin by death preuented: which thing also much grieued Andronicus, and the more incensed him against his brother. Which his secret hatred he for all that according to his wisedome, cunningly dissembled, not onely during the time that his father liued, but three yeres after his death also, making shew of the greatest loue and kindnesse towards him that was possible. Constantine in the meane time, of such great reuenues as were by his father assigned vnto him, eaping great profit, most bountifully bestowed the same vpon his followers and fauorits, and others that made sute vnto him, as well the meaner sort as the greater, and with his sweet behauiour woon vnto him the hearts of all men: for affabilitie and curtesie in high degree easily allureth mens minds, as do faire flowers in the spring the passengers eyes. This was that precept of the wise Indians, That the higher a Prince was in dignitie, and the more curteous he shewed himselfe vnto his inferiors, the better he should be of them beloued. He therefore that should for the two first causes blame Constantine, should doe him wrong; as both proceeding not of himselfe, but of his fathers too much loue: but in the third he was not altogether blameless; for if for want of experience he prodigally gaue such gifts, as for the most part might haue beseemed the Emperor himselfe, he ignorantly erred, yet did he no little offend: but if hee knew, that for his too profuse bounty he could not be vnsuspected of his brother, & yet without regard held on that course, he was greatly to be blamed therin. For if nothing else might haue moued him, yet he should haue considered, to what end the like doings of others in former times had sorted, and how many it had brought to vntimely end. So although perhaps that Constantine meant no harme vnto his brother, or any way to supplant him, yet did these things not a little increase and aggrauate the former suspitions, and open the eares of the Emperour his brother vnto such calumniation as commonly attendeth vpon immoderat bountie. But to returne to our purpose, this honorable Constantine then liued in Lydia, but lately married, and in good hope long to liue, being not past thirty yeres old: but pleasantly spending the time with his wife at Nymphea in Lydia, at such time as he was thus secretly accused vnto his brother, the Emperour thought it good, as vpon other occasions of businesse, to passe ouer into Asia himselfe, but indeed with a secret resolution, vpon the sudden to oppresse his brother vnawares, as by proofe it fel out. For at his comming ouer, Constantine fearing nothing lesse, was forthwith apprehended, with all his greatest fauorits, of whom one Michael Strategopulus (sometime a man in great authoritie with the emperor his father, and of all other, for wealth, honor, & noble acts most famous) was chiefe: who together with Constantine were fast clapt in prison, where wee will leaue them euery houre looking to die, their lands and goods being before confiscated. But these worthie men, especially Constantine and Strategopulus, thus laid fast; who many times in great battels discomfited the Turks, & notably defended the frontiers of the empire along the East side of the riuer Meander; they now finding none to withstand them, forraged not only all the rich countrie beyond the riuer, but with an infinit multitude passing the same, did there great harme also: so that there was no remedie, but that the Emperor must of necessitie make choice of some other worthie captaine for the defence of those his cities and countries, by the incursion of the Turks then in danger in that part of Asia.

There was then in the Emperors court one Alexius Philanthropenus, a right valiant and renowned captain, and then in the flower of his youth; of him the Emperour thought good to make choice for defence of those frontiers of his empire in the lesser Asia (against the Turks) which were before, the charge of his brother Constantine & Strategopulus; ioyning to him one Libadarius, an old famous captain, & a man of great experience also: appointing vnto him the gouernment of the cities of Ionia; and vnto the other the frontiers along the winding bankes of Meander. Where Alexius hauing now gotten a charge worthie his valour, & in many great conflicts with the Turks still carrying away the victory, became in short time of great fame: besides that, he was exceeding bountifull & curteous vnto all men; a costly, but a readie way vnto dangerous credit and renown. Thus at the first al things prospered in his hand according G to his hearts desire: yea the Turks themselues, bordring vpon him, hardly beset on the one side by the Tartars, & on the other by himselfe; & yet not so much feared with their enemies behind them, as moued with his curtesie, came ouer to him with their wiues and children & ser-ued themselues (many of them) in his campe. But as they say, That in Iupiters court no man might drinke of the tun of blisse, but that he must taste also of the tun of woe: so fell it out with this great captain, who hauing but tasted of the better tun, had the worse all poured full vpon his head. For Libadarius seeing all to prosper with him, and somewhat enuying thereat, began to feare & suspect, lest he proud of his good fortune, & now grown very strong, casting off his allegeance, should aspire vnto the empire, and so first begin with him, as the neerest vnto him: which thing many of the nobilitie secretly surmised also, but how truly many doubt. But this H enuious plot was not yet ripe, but lay as fire raked vp in the ashes. Now there was with Alexius Philanthropenus, certaine companies of Cretensians, whom for their good seruice and fidelitie he both honored & trusted aboue others, vsing them all for the gard of his own person. These men proud of their credit, hearing of the surmised aspiring of their General, & in hope by his aduancement to raise their own fortunes also, ceased not continually to suggest vnto him high conceits of himselfe, & to persuade, with al speed to take the matter vpon him; the very conceit whereof (as they said) would be vnto him no lesse danger, than if he should enter into the action it selfe, as he might well see by the wofull examples of the noble Constantine and Stra- tigopulus, both in extreame perill but for the iealous conceit surmised against them. Which I quicke suggestions wrought in his great mind diuers, & those most contrarie motions, so that he scarce knew himselfe what he would or would not. For they which are vnto themselues in con- science guiltie of any grieuous crime, if any mischiefe hang ouer their heads therefore, it happeneth vnto them as foreknowing and expecting the same euen from the time that they offended: vnto whom, if nothing else, yet that same verie foreknowledge easeth not a little the griefe and miserie: whereas contrariwise, they which are with sudden mischiefes, and vnlooked for, ouerwhelmed, not knowing any iust cause why, must needs stand as men dismaid, and almost besiae themselues. But at length after diuers great conflicts with himselfe, the euill persuaders of rebellion preuailed with him. Yet did hee at Alexius Philanthropenus aspireth. the first forbid any mention to be made of him in the army as emperor: which caused the Cre-tensians, the chiefe authours of his rebellion, almost to force him forthwith to take vpon him K the imperiall ornaments, thereby to confirme the minds of his followers and fauorits: for that such resolutions were (as they said) forthwith to be put into execution; neither that any thing required so ioynt celeritie and dexteritie both of the minde and the hand; and for that longer delay would but fill his soldiers heads with doubts, and discourage them with the feare of the vncertaintie of the euent: all which for all that moued him not so to do; but whether for feare of the greatnes of the danger, or for that he secretly thought how first to circumuent Libada- rius, of whom he stood most in doubt, is vncertaine. The report of all which his doings and designes were in short time carried first vnto Libadarius, as the neerest, & so in post vnto the Emperor: who were therewith not a little both disquieted. And had Alexius (as some persuaded him) at the first set vpon Libadarius, then vnprouided, no doubt but hee had done much: but L God, by whom all princes raign, and whose power confoundeth the deuices of the proud, turned him from Libadarius, by whom he was to be oppressed, to follow after Theodorus the Em-perors brother, of whom he was to haue feared no harm. This Theodorus, the first man that A- lexius shot at, warned by his brother Constantines harmes, liued a pleasant priuat life in Lydia, far from the ambition of the court, and therefore so much the more beloued of the emperor: but Alexius fearing lest in that hurle many should resort vnto him, as vnto the Emperours brother, and so hinder his proceedings, thought best first to make him sure, and afterward to op-Libadarius opposeth himselfe against the proceedings of Philanthropenus. presse Libadarius not aware, that in stead of the bodie, hee followed but after the shadow. But Libadarius, as a man of great experience, taking the benefit of this his ouerfight, and knowing money to be the sinewes of warre, gathered together all the coyne he possibly could, both of M his owne and his friends, sending also for the Emperours Treasures to Philadelphia, and with all speed raised the greatest power he possibly he could out of Ionia, which hee furnished with all things necessarie, promising vnto his soldiers great matters, and filling them with greater hopes, and that within ten dayes hee would with a great armie meet the Rebell in the heart of Lydia, and there dare him battell. But withall considering that the Cretensians, men but

A but of a mercenarie faith, had always the gard of Alexius his person, he thought good to make proofe if they might with gold be woon to betray him: and so well wrought the matter by great summes of mony presently giuen, & promises of greater preferments with the emperor, that they (somwhat before discontented with Alexius his slacknes, and now doubting also his successe) yeelded vnto his desire, promising in the beginning of the battell to deliuer him into his hands; which they shortly after in the very ioyning of the battel accordingly performed, deliuering him fast bound vnto Libadarius his enemie. Who not a little proud thereof, vsed him with great insolencie, and within three dayes after put out his eyes, for feare the emperor according to his curteous nature should haue giuen his pardon; and so kept him in prison vn-B till the Emperors pleasure were further known. Thus through false suspect and ambition were the greatest champions of the Greeke empire brought to confusion.

Now after this rebellion of Philanthropenus, Andronicus became so iealous of his owne people, as that he wist not whom to trust, reposing greater confidence in strangers, than in his own subiects, to the great hurt of his estate. At the same time it fortuned, that the Messagets (commonly called Alani) which then dwelt beyond Ister, being Christians, but oppressed by the European Tartars, wearie of their slauerie, sent secretly vnto the Greeke Emperor Andronicus, offring that if he would assigne vnto them a conuenient place for them to dwell in, they would come ouer vnto him with ten thousand of their families, and faithfully serue him in his wars against the Turks (who then grieuously wasted his countries in Asia, destitute of good captains and commanders:) which their offer he gladly accepted, as standing then in need of aid, & not C greatly trusting his own people. But when these Massagets, in number aboue 10000, comming ouer with their wiues & children, were to be furnished with all things, and especially the men with horses, armor, and pay, (all which the emperor could not of himselfe doe) the subiects were therewith hardly charged, and Commission sent out into euery countrey and prouince, for the taking vp of horses and armor; euery citie, euery countrey towne and village, euerie gentlemans house and poore mans cottage, was searched and ransacked, and all things taken from them, that was there found fit for seruice, to their great discontentment, euery man murmuring and grudging to haue his armes taken from him, and giuen to strangers: but when they were also to be contributers vnto their pay, they then openly cursed and banned them euen vnto their faces. Yet at length (though with much adoo) these strangers well furnished with D all things necessarie, were with some other forces also, shipped ouer into Asia, vnder the leading of Michael Paleologus the Emperours eldest sonne, and then his companion in the Empire.
Who marching alongst the country, came and incamped about Magnesia. Where the Turkes at the first, after their woonted manner retyred themselues into the high mountains and thick woods, that from thence they might more safely learn what strength their new come enemies were of, and what discipline of war they kept: for they knew, that vpon the comming of great armies many false reports did run, & that things were made far greater than indeed they were, as did of these also, as of a people inuincible: and therefore they thought it best so to protract the time, vntill they might see in what sort best to deale with them. But so houering ouer their heads, and perceiuing them oftentimes without order to roame abroad into the country E seeking after prey, (for why, they after the manner of mercenarie men spoiled their friends no lesse than if they had been their enemies) they came downe in good order from the moun-taines, from whence at the first they aduentured but a little; but afterwards they came on further, and with greater confidence, in such sort, as that it seemed they would ere long assault the yong Emperor in his campe. Wherewith he with the rest discouraged, without any stroke giuen retyred; the Turks still following him at the heeles. For neither he, neither the rest, any thing considered the small number of their enemies: but as drunken men, whose heads filled with grosse vapors, are deceiued in the greatnesse of the obiect that they see, and oftentimes thinke one thing to be two; so were they also in like manner with their owne feare blinded.
Beside that, most commonly it falleth out, that the army which insolencie and iniury forerun-F neth, is appointed to destruction, and by the fearefulnesse of it selfe ouerthrowne before the enemie set vpon it, they themselues becomming enemies to themselues and Gods iust vengeance appointing vnto them such an end as their deeds haue deserued: neither was it like that they should doe any great good, that at their first setting forth, in stead of prouision, carried out with them the bitter curses and execrations of their friends. Michael the Emperor seeing the Massagets flie, and not daring with those few hee had left, to oppose himselfe against his enemies, retyred himselfe into the strong castle of Magnesia, there to expect what would become of these mischiefes. But the Massagets spoyling the countrey of the poore Christians as they went, marched directly vnto the strait of Helespontus, and there againe passed ouer into Europe, as if they had been therefore onely sent for ouer the riuer Ister, to shew the Turks the sooner the way vnto the sea in Asia. For it was not many dayes after, but that Michael the Emperor being returned to Constantinople, the Turkes comming down, with a great power, subdued all the Countries, euen vnto the coast of Lesbos, to the great ruine and weakening of the Greeke Empire.

It was not long after these great stirs made by the Massagets, but that one Ronzerius (sometime a notable pirat, but as then a most famous Captaine) hearing of the great entertainment that the Greeke Emperor gaue vnto strangers, by messengers sent for that purpose offred vnto him his seruice in his wars against the Turks, as had before the Massagets. This Ronzerius of whom we speake, had out of Catalonia a prouince of Spaine, and out of that part of France which is called Narbonensis, and some other places also, gathred together a great number of base needie naked men, yet lustie able bodies, and fit for seruice either by sea or land; with whom hee manned foure tall gallies, and so as a notable pirat long time robbed, not onely the merchants trading to and fro in the Mediterranean, but landing his men oftentimes in the rich Islands, carried away thence much rich spoyle also; vntill at length by the mischiefe hee did being become famous, and great wars then arising betwixt Charles King of Naples, and Theodorus King of Sicilia, he was by Theodorus sent for and requested of aid: which hee (liuing of the spoyle) easily granted, and so came vnto him with a thousand horse and as many foot, all old expert souldiers, whose good seruice stood the King in those wars in great stead. But as the end of war is peace, so at length vpon the euil successe of Charles, a peace being concluded betwixt the two Kings, and confirmed by a marriage betwixt their children; Ronzerius liuing altogether by his fortunes, was to seeke for new entertainment, both for himselfe and his men, as hauing neither house nor certain dwelling place to repaire to; but being as needy men met together, some out of one place, some out of another, in hope of bootie as their fortune led them. In which case Ronzerius their Generall thought it best to offer his seruice to the Greeke Emperor in his wars against the Turks; whereof he gladly accepted, and so sent for him: vnto whom he shortly after came with two thousand good soldiers, called (after the proud Spanish manner) by the name of Catalonians, for that they were for the most part Spaniards of the country of Catalonia. Of whose comming the Emperor reioycing more than he had cause (as afterward by proofe it fell out) in token of his great fauor, honored him with the name of the Great Captaine, and afterwards gaue him his neece Marie in marriage. But within a while after, when as one Tensa another Catalonian captain sent for by Ronzerius, was come thither also with more aid, the Emperor to gratifie them both, gaue vnto Ronzerius the name of Cæsar, and vnto the other the name of the Great Captaine. But when these new captains with their followers were to be transported into Asia, it is not to be spoken what harm they did by the way vnto the countrey people, and in the villages alongst the sea coast; abusing the men and women as their slaues, and spending their substance at their pleasure, for which they had many a bitter curse: and this was their first yeares entertainment. The next Spring they set forward to relieue the great Citie of Philadelphia, being as then long besieged by the Turks, and hardly bestead without with the enemie; and within, with extreame penurie and famine: which good seruice they most valiantly performed, and raised the siege. For the Turkes beholding the good order of these Latine souldiers, their bright armour, and couragious comming on, rose presently and departed, not only from the citie, but quite out of the Emperours territorie. Besides that, in this armie were ioyned vnto these Catalonians great numbers of the best souldiers of the Greeks, and all the power of the Massagets: so that had not the Emperor expressely before commaunded, not to pursue them too farre, it was by many thought, all those cities and countries might then againe haue beene in short time recouered from the Turkes, which they had before taken from him. But in Kingdomes appoynted vnto ruine, faire occasions helpe not for the stay thereof; yea the greatest helpes prouided by the worldly wise, by a secret commaunding power aboue, beeing oftentimes conuerted to the destruction of that they were prouided for the safegard of; as it now fell out with the

A Emperour and these Spanish souldiers: for this seruice done, the Greekes returned home, as did the Massagets also. But these Catalonians with Ronzerius their Generall, roaming vp and downe the Emperours territories in Asia, did there great harme, turning their forces (as enemies) vpon them whom they were sent for to relieue: alleadging that they had not their pay according to the Emperors promise; and that therfore they must liue vpon them that had sent for them and deceiued them. So were the poore people in euery place spoiled, their wiues and daughters rauished, their Priests and aged fathers tortured to confesse such secret store as they had: all was subiect vnto these dissolute soldiers rage and lust; yea many of them that had nothing to redeeme themselues, vpon the greedie souldiers imagination; hauing their hands or feet, or some other part of their bodies cut off, lay by the high waies side begging an

B halfepenie or a peece of bread, hauing nothing left to comfort themselues with, more than their miserable voice and fountaines of teares: with which their wrongs and miseries, worse than those they had sustained by the Turks, the Emperour much grieued, and well the more, for that they were done by him whom he had entertained to relieue them: but what remedy, his coffers were so bare as that he was not able to doe any thing for the redresse thereof. Ronzerius hauing thus spoiled the Emperours countrey in Asia, and left nothing that pleased either him or his, with all his power passed ouer into Europe: and leauing all the rest of his armie at Calipolis, with two hundred of his men went vnto the yong Emperor Michael (then lying with a small power at Orestias in Thracia) to demand of him his pay, or if neede were to extort it from him with threats: with whose insolency at his comming, the Emperor more offended than before, his souldiers there present perceiuing the same, with their drawne swords

C compassing him in, fast by the court, slew him, with certaine of his followers, the rest fled in al haste to Calipolis to certifie their fellowes what had happened.

Ronzerius slain.

Thus by the death of Ronzerius, the young Emperor had thought to haue discouraged the Catalonians and abated their pride, as like enough it was to haue done: yet in proofe it fell not out so, but was the cause of far greater euils. So when God prospers not mens actions, the best falleth out vnto the worst, & their wisest deuices turn to meere follies: for the Catalonians at Calipolis hearing of the death of Ronzerius their Generall, first slew al the citizens in the city, and notably fortifying the same, tooke that as their refuge. Then diuiding their soldiers into two parts, with the one part of them manned out eight gallies, which vnder the leading of the

D great captaine Tenza, robbed and spoiled all the merchants ships, passing the straits of Hellespontus, to or from Constantinople: the other part left in the citie, in the meantime forraging the countrey all about them. But Tenza shortly after encountering with a fleet of the Genowaies, wel prouided for him, was by them ouerthrowne, & most of his Gallies sunk, and himselfe taken; but yet afterwards redeemed by his fellows, and so again inlarged. Now the Catalonians at Calipolis somwhat discouraged with the losse of their fleet and so many of their men, for certain dais kept themselues quiet in within their wals, not knowing wel what course to take, for they feared both the Massagets and Thracians: them for that they had vpon light causes abused them, & slain diuers of them in the late Asian war; and these, for that they had but euen the other day burnt their houses & spoiled their labors in the country there by: for

E which and other their outrages, they vtterly despaired of the Emperors fauor, whom they had so highly offended. But that which most of al terrified them, was, for that they looked for euery day, when Michael the yong Emperor, who as then lay not far off, should with a great power come to assault them: for feare of whom they cast a deepe ditch about the city, with a strong counterscarfe, so preparing themselues, as if they should haue beene euen presently besieged. But the time so passing, and the Emperor delaying his comming, they began to think of other matters: for being brought to that strait, that they could not wel tel which way to turn them, but that they were on euery side beset with danger, they vpon a malicious resolution, and vnto the Greekes most fatall, by messengers sent of purpose, craued aid of the Turks that dwelt on the other side of the strait ouer against them, in Asia; who presently sent them fiue hundred

F good soldiers, after whom followed also many other fugitues and loose companions, in hope of spoile; with whom the Catalonians for the present strengthned, & being themselues three thousand strong, issued out of the city, and forraged the country therabouts, bringing in with them great heards & flocks of sheep and other cattel, together with their keepers: wherewith both the Emperors & their subiects incensed, prepared themselues for reuenge. This was the first calling in of the Turkes into Europe (that I read of) and the beginning of those endlesse miseries wherewith the Christian commonweale hath beene euer since most grieuously afflicted, and a great part thereof ouerwhelmed; few or none greeuing therat, but such as themselues feele the heauinesse thereof, whom God in his mercie comfort.

The Turcopuli.

The Catalonians and Turkes now lying about Cypsella and Apri in Thrace, Michael the Emperour with his Macedonian and Thracian souldiers, the Massagets and the Turcopuli, encamped at Apri. These Turcopuli were Turks, also in number about a thousand (who as is in the former part of this Historie declared) beeing fled with their Sultan Iathatines vnto the Greeke Emperour, and left behind him at such time as he was by the Europian Tartars deliuered, had forsaken their Mahometane superstition, and so being become Christians, were inrolled amongst the Greeke souldiers. Shortly after the Emperour (aduertised by his scouts of the approch of his enemies) commanded euery man to be in a readinesse, and his captaines to put his armie in order of battell: who seeing the enemies battell diuided into three parts, put theirs also in like order, placing the Turcopuli and Massagets in the left wing, the Macedonian and Thracian choice horsemen in the right wing, and the rest with the footmen in the maine battell. At which time the Emperour himselfe riding from place to place, with comfortable speeches encouraged his men to fight valiantly against their enemies. The Sun rising, the enemies battell began to come on, in number much inferiour vnto the Emperours, yet in like order, the Turks being placed in both wings, and the Catalonians wel armed in the midst. But the signall of battell being giuen on both sides, the Massagets, whether it were by agreement so before made with the enemie, or vpon a sudden conceiued treason, presently withdrew themselues aloofe off, and so stood as idle beholders, giuing aid neither to the one nor to the other, as did also the Turcopuli their companions; which greatly dismaied the Grecians, and encouraged their enemies: for the Greekes dismaied with that sudden defection of their fellowes, were euen in the ioyning of the battell discouraged. Which the Emperour perceiuing, with great instancie intreated the captaines and commanders of his armie, calling them oftentimes by name, not to bee so suddenly discouraged: but they in so great a danger little regarding his words, and stil shrinking from him, when as the greatest part of his footmen were troden vnder foot and slaine, turning himselfe vnto them that were left, which were but few, hee said, Now worthy men is the time wherein death is better than life, and life more beter than death. And hauing so said, valiantly charged the enemie: in which charge his horse was slain vnder him, and he in dauger to haue bin taken, had not one of his faithful followers remounted him vpon his owne horse, and so saued his life with the losse of his own. The Emperor flying to Dydimotichum, where Andronichus his father then lay, was of him ioyfully receiued, but sharply reproued for aduenturing his person so far. The enemies pursuing the chace, slew some, tooke others, vntill that by the comming on of the night, & weary with the long fight, they retired: and the next day diuiding the spoile, afterwards at their pleasures forraged the country. The renegat Turks, called Turcopuli, within a few daies after reuolting to the Catalonians, were of them ioyfully entertained, and inrolled into the regiment of Chalel, the Turks Generall.

The vnfortunat battel of Michael the Emperour against the Catalonians and Turks.

Shortly after this victorie, the Catalonians began to mutinie among themselues, the great captaine Tenza, and Pharenza his companion, disdained to be commanded by Recafort their General: in which tumult, the matter comming to blowes Tenza was slaine, and Pharenza for safegard of his life glad to flie vnto the Emperor Andronichus; of whom he was, contrary to his expectation, right honorably entertained. About this time also the Massagets hauing done the Greekes more harme, than the Turkes against whom they were entertained, and enriched themselues with the spoile of their friends both in Asia and Europe, were about with their wiues and children, and wealth, to returne againe vnto their old dwellings beyond Ister. Which the Turcopuli, with the Catalonians vnderstanding, and bearing vnto them a secret grudge, for that they (as the weaker) had by them oftentimes bin wronged in the diuision of the spoile of the Greekes, lay now secretly in wait for them, as they should passe the straits of the great mountain Hemus, which bounded the Greek empire frō the Bulgarians: where setting vpon them, fearing no such danger, they slew them almost al; and with the spoile of them, recompenced themselues for all the wrongs they had from them before receiued.

The Catalonians proud of their victorie at Apri, and well strengthened by the reuolt of the Turcopuli with continuall rodes spoiled not onely all alongst the Sea coast of Thracia, but

A but al the inland country also, as farre as Maronea, Rhodope, and Bizia, laying al waste before them. And hauing forraged most part of Thracia, brake into Macedonia, and there wintred about Cassandria, sometime a famous citie, but as then all desolate and ruinous. But the Spring being come, they remoued thence, with purpose to haue spoiled the cities of Macedonia, and especially the rich citie of Thessalonica, where the empresse Irene then lay: wherein they were by the Emperors good care and foresight preuented; who doubting such a matter, had fortified his cities in that countrey, and furnished them with strong garrisons, and all other things needull for their defence: which they quickly perceiuing, and findiug the country al desolate and forsaken by the inhabitants, were about to haue againe returned into Thracia: but as they were therupon resoluing, they were informed by one that was with them captiue, how that the

The Catalonians shut out of Macedonia.

B Emperor by a mightie strong wall built at a place called Christopolis, from the sea side euen vnto the top of the mountaines, had so shut vp the passage, as that it was not possible for them that way to enter. With which vnexpected news they were at the first exceedingly troubled, as foreseeing, That if they should there long stay in that spoiled country, they should in short time be driuen to exceeding wants (for they were now in number aboue eight 1000 fighting men) and afraid also by a general conspiracie of the people about them, to be oppressed. Thus beset, and not well knowing what to doe, or which way to turne themselues, they desperately resolued, no longer there to stay, but forthwith to set forward, and to breake into Thessalie, with the plentifulnesse thereof to relieue their wants, or into some other country further off, towards Peloponesus, and there to seat themselues, and to end their long trauels: or at leastwise, if they could not so do, to enter into league with some that dwelt vpon the sea coast, and

C so returne againe into their owne countrey. Wherefore leauing Thessalonica, and deliuering the Emperour of a great feare, they in three dayes came to the Thessalian mountaines, Olympus, Ossa, and Pelius; where they at the foot of them found such plentie of all things necessarie for their reliefe, that they there wintred. But Winter past, and the Spring being come, they passed ouer those high mountaines and the pleasant vallies called Tempe, and so at last came downe into the fruitfull plaines of Thessalie, where they spent that yeare at their pleasure without resistance, deuouring the labours of the poore country people, and making hauocke of whatsoeuer thing came in their way: for as then the state of that countrey was but weake, the Prince thereof being but yong, and withall very sicke and like to die, and the suc-

D cession so ending in him, as that it was feared, who after his death should lay hand thereon; and euery man therefore more carefull of his own priuat than of the common good. Yet to auert these forraine enemies, who like a consuming fire deuoured the country before them; the nobilitie thought it good, with great gifts to ouercome their captains and commanders, and then to offer them guides to conduct them into Achaia and Bœtia, countries more pleasant and fruitfull than was theirs, and more commodious for them to dwell in: promising also to giue them aid for the seating of them there, if they should so need. Of which their offers the Catalonians accepted, as thinking it better with their hands ful of gold so easily gotten, to go seeke their better fortunes, with their power yet whole and strong, and helpe also if need were, than to hazard al vpon the successe of a doubtfull victorie, and so foolishly to preferre an vncertain

E hope before a most certain benefit. So making peace with the Thessalians, and the Spring being come, receiuing of them their promised rewards, and guids to conduct them, passing ouer the Mountaines beyond Thessalie, and the straits of Thermopile, they encamped neere vnto Locris and the riuer Cephisus: which rising out of the mountain Pernassus, and running towards the East, hath on the North side of them Locris and Opus; and on the South the inland countrey of Achaia and Bœtia: and beeing a great riuer vntill it come to Lebadia and Haliartes, is there diuided into two riuers; the one called Æsopus, and the other Ismenus; whereof the former runneth thorow the countrey of Attica, vntill it come into the Sea; and the other neere vnto Aulis (where the noble Grecians, as they say, beeing about to goe vnto Troy, met, and there stayed) falleth into the Euboean Sea. But the Duke of Thebes and

F Athens, and of all that countrey, hearing of their comming, and (as hee thought well) prouided also for them (as hauing all the Winter and Spring time before put his forces in readinesse) with great pride and contempt denied them passage thorow his countrey, at such time as they asked the same; making no more reckoning of them, than as of a sort of loose wandering rogues that could find no place to rest or thriue in: wherewith they intraged, resolued among

among themselues, either there to seat themselues in his country, or to die therefore. And so G passing the riuer into Beotia, not far from the same encamped themselues, being in number about 3500 horse, and 4000 foot. But so lying and expecting the comming of their enemies, A notable stratagem of the Catalonians. they caused all the plaine ground about where they lay and meant to fight, to be plowed vp, which they with certaine small cuts out of the riuer so watered, as that it differed but a little from a deepe marish or bog. Hither about the middle of the Spring commeth the Prince of the countrey, with a gallant armie raised out of Athens, Thebes, Plate, Locris, Phocis, and Megara, in number about 6400 horse, and 4000 foot, an armie too strong he thought for so contemptible an enemie. But the weakest enemie not feared, doth oftentimes the greatest harme, as here by proofe was to be seene: for the Prince comming vnto the aforesaid plaine, now growne greene with grasse, and casting no perill, encouraging his men, came brauely on H with all his horsemen to haue charged his enemies: who stood fast vpon the firme ground, a little without their trenches, as readie to encounter him. But before he was come to the middle of the plaine, his horses sinking deepe into the rotten and new ploughed ground, and there intangled as in a marish, lay for the most part tumbling in the mire, together with their riders; or else plunging in the deepe, and hauing cast them, ran vp and downe the plaine, as fortune led them; othersome sticking fast, stood with their riders vpon their backs, as if they had bin very images, not able for to moue. Which the Catalonians beholding, and therewith encouraged, ouerwhelmed them with all manner of shot, and slew them at their pleasure, vntill they had almost made an end of them: and with their horsemen so speedily pursued the rest in chace, euen vnto the cities of Thebes and Athens, that they without more adoe euen at that I instant surprised them both, with all that was in them. So the Catalonians hauing as it were at a cast at dice won a most goodly countrey, garnished with faire townes and cities, which they neuer built; and stored with all manner of wealth, which they neuer sweat for, there ended their long trauels, and seated themselues: not ceasing (as saith Nicephorus Gregoras, the reporter of this historie, speaking of the time wherein these things were done, and wherin he himselfe liued in Constantinople) vnto this present day, by little and little to extend the boundes of their territorie. Where leauing them, with whom we happily haue too long strayed from our purpose, let vs againe returne vnto the Turks and Turcopuli their companions.

In the armie of the Catalonians, at such time as they were about to haue besieged Thessalonica, were three thousand Turks, of whom eleuen hundred were of them (as we said) which K remained with Melech at Ænum, after the flight of Iathatines their Sultan vnto the Tartars, and renouncing their superstition, became Christians; and so being baptized, and hauing wiues and children, were enrolled among the Emperors souldiers; but at the battell of Apri reuolted vnto the Catalonians, and were commonly knowne by the name of Turcopuli: the other being the greater part, were such Turks, as with Chalel their captaine came out of Asia, being sent for by the Catalonians. Now all these Turks, as well the one as the other, at such time as the Catalonians were about to inuade Thessalia, and to seeke their new fortunes in the countries more westward, and so farther off from Asia: partly distrusting the societie of them, as dangerous vnto them; and loath also further to follow their vncertaine fortunes into countries further off, amongst people to them vnknowne, began to rise in mutinie, and to refuse to L goe. Whereupon their captaines Melech and Chalel requested of the Generall of the Catalo-nians to giue them leaue with quietnesse to returne: which their request he easily granted, (as now not greatly needing their helpe, after that he was departing out of the Emperors dominion) and so they gladly departed; proportionally diuiding all the captiues and spoiles they had taken in that long warre, according to the number of both parts.

The Turks diuided into two factions. These Turks after their departure from the Catalonians, diuided themselues into two parts, the Turcopuli or renegat Turks following Melech, & the rest Chalel their General. But Melech being before becom a Christian, as were his followers also; & after that hauing receiued most honorable entertainment at the Emperors hands, and yet againmost shamefully breaking his faith before giuen, and violating his religion, had reuolted to his enemies, despairing of the M Emperors further friendship, which he had so euill deserued, made choice rather to goe vnto Crales Prince of Seruia, by whom he was sent for, than to come againe into the sight of Andro-nicus the Greeke Emperour. And so going vnto him with a thousand horse, and fiue hundred foot, was there of him well entertained himselfe: but his souldiers all commanded to deliuer

A vnto the Prince both their horses and armour, and to fall to other trades, and not to beare armes but at such time, and so many of them as should seeme good vnto the Prince, that had receiued them into his countrey.

But Chalel with the Turkes his followers, in number about 1300 horse and eight hundred foot, staying at Macedonia, offered vnto the Greeke Emperour quietly to depart his country, so that he would giue him passage by the straits of Christopolis by him fortified; and in safe-tie transport him and his souldiers with all their substance, ouer the strait of Helespontus into Asia: vnto which his request, the Emperour considering the great harme done in his prouin-ces, and desirous also to be discharged of so great a burthen, easily granted; and so sent Sennacherib, one of his most valiant captaines, to conduct them out of Macedonia into Thracia, vn-B to the straits of Helespontus. Where the Greeke captaines and souldiers seeing the great multitude of horses, and aboundance of money and other spoiles, which they hauing taken from the Greekes, were now about to carrie away with them into Asia; they thought it a great indignitie to suffer them so to doe: and allured also with the hope of so rich a prey, as had bin of long in gathering, they entred into a deuice far different from that which was vnto the Turks before promised, neither prouiding them of shipping, neither careful of their safety but purposing vpon the sudden by night destroy them. Whereof the Turks hauing got vnderstanding, suddenly rising, surprised a castle in the country there by, which they notably fortified for the defence of themselues, to the great astonishment of them that had purposed their destruction; who now not able to force them, were glad to get them farther off, and to C certifie the Emperor what had happened: who (after I wot not what receiued custome of the Greek Emperors his predecessors) slowly dispatching things requiring greatest hast, carelesly delaid the time, to the great trouble of his state, and aduantage of his enemies. For they wisely considering the danger and distresse they were in, by speedy messengers sent ouer the strait, craued aid of the Turks their countrymen in Asia, which they presently sent them; wherwith they not a little both encouraged and strengthned, with their often & sudden incursions grieuously wasted the country round about them, to the great discontentment of the Greeke captains, not able without greater help to remedy the same. Who thereof certified the yong Em-perour Michael Paleologus, requesting him with all the power hee could make, to come and besiege the castle, and to suppresse these so dangerous enemies. For the performance whereof D not only the captains with their soldiers, but the country people in generall with their spades and mattocks came flocking vnto the Emperor; not as if they would haue besieged the castle, but haue digged it downe and ouerthrowne it together with the Turks their enemies.

The vnfortunate battel of the Emperour Michael Paleologus with the Turks in Chersonesus. Now the Emperor with his captains and souldiers, and a multitude of those countrey people, being come thither, who all gladly followed him, most part of them foolish, thinking of nothing, but of the spoile of their enemies, not considering with what danger the same was to be gained: so that the more the enemies prouided for the necessary defence of themselues, as in number but few, & shut vp in their enemies country, the more carelesly & neglegently, and without al order, the Greeks proceeded in their siege, for that they were in number far more, and better prouided of al things than their enemies: not reputing with themselues, nothing in E this world to be firm and sure; and al wordly things (as saith the diuine Philosopher) to be but the mockerie of God, and to be hastily turned vp side downe, and with most vncertain course this and that way to wander. But their enemies, who before feared euen the very fame of their comming, accounting themselues rather among the dead than the liuing, seeing their confused and disordered rashnesse; therewith much more than before encouraged, bestowed all their wealth, their women, and other things vnnecessarie for battel, in good safetie within their trenches: but themselues, with eight hundred chosen horsemen only, and they very well armed, fallied out, euen to the place where the imperial ensigne stood; being neither of any great safety, neither guarded with any such strength or carefulnes as beseemed: with which sudden and desperat eruption of the enemies, the Grecians terrified, especially that rustical and vplandish F company, began to flie: after whom by little and little others followed, vntil at length all the rest without further resistance fled also: which the Emperor seeing, did what he might to haue staid their flight: but in so generall a confusion and feare, when euery man was to shift for one, who regarded him: wherefore wearied and seeing no other remedie, he was glad to take the same course & to flie with the rest: yet many of the more expert captains, ashamed of so foule a flight,

a flight, made diuers stands: and so staied the barbarous enemie from further pursuit of the Emperor and the other flying Greeks. In which doing, many of them inclosed by the Turks, were of them taken prisoners: vnto whom all the Emperours treasure became a prey also, and whatsoeuer honorable ensignes of the empire else that were found in the Emperors tent; yea the imperiall Crowne it selfe, richly set with pearle and precious stones, was there taken also, which (they say) Chalel putting vpon his head, pleasantly scoffed at the Greeke Emperor that but late before wore it.

Thracia spoiled by the Turks.

After this victorie, the Turks with great pride spoiled almost all Thracia, in such sort as that the people for two yeres together durst scarcely go out of their strong walled townes to plough and sow their land; which exceedingly grieued both the emperors, the father and the son: for in their own power they had no great confidence, God hauing (as it were) taken from their people, both their hearts and courage, so that all their hope was to entertaine forraine aid (the miserable shift of the great distressed ones) wherin also they found many difficulties and lets, whilst they considered the greatnes of their charge, their coffers being then, if euer, empty by reason their territories were so long and grieuously by their enemies wasted: yet need admitting no law, Andronicus the old Emperour was glad to send to Crales Prince of Seruia, his son in law, to pray his aid. But in the meane time he making no hast (as men in relieuing others commonly doe) and the miserie more and more increasing, it pleased God to stir vp the heart of one Philes Paleologus the Emperours neere kinsman, to vndertake the protection and deliuerance of his Prince and countrey; and was afterward for his great valour by the Emperour worthily made Lord great martial of the empire. This Philes of whom we now speake, had all his life time bin brought vp in the court, and was for his vpright dealing and integritie of life beloued of al men, but specially of the old Emperor his kinsman, whom he with like affection honored; but was a man altogether vnskilful of the wars, as being by nature of a weake constitution of body, and so very sickly; and withal more giuen to deuotion and the seruice of God than the affaires of the world, oftentimes spending most part of the day at his prayers in the church. He now grieued to see the perplexed Emperor, and the miserie of his country, requested of him that he might with some small power, and some few captains of his owne choice, goe out against these proud Turks: hoping (as he said) by Gods grace to reuenge the wronge by them done, and to returne to him againe with victory. Vnto which his reqnest, the Emperor easily yeelded; saying, that God was iust, which delighted not in many legs, neither in the greatnes of any mans strength, but in a contrite heart and humble mind: not so giuing his help vnto Michael the Emperour, his son, for the offences of his parents: as happily he might vnto this so vpright and deuout a man, regarding more his integritie of life, than his skill in armes: for turning me about, I haue seen in this world (said he) I haue seene, the swift not to gaine the prize, neither the valiant the victorie; wise men to want bread, and men of vnderstanding, wealth; the simple to gain fauor, and the subtill to fall into disgrace: such alteration worldly things in time find. So the Emperor (as is aforesaid) yeelding to his request, furnished him with mony, horses, and armor, and such a conuenient power, as he himselfe desired. Which he hauing receiued, first of al incouraged his captains and soldiers with all manner of courtesie and kindnes, giuing vnto them mony, horses, armour, iewels; yea sometime hee gaue vnto one his purse, vnto another his cloke, his rapier, or some other such thing, as he had about him, to encourage them in their forwardnes: after that, he perswaded them to an honest temperate course of life, & valiantly to play the men, promising according to their deserts to reward euery one of them, the war once happily ended: & before his setting forth, vnderstanding by his espials, that Chalel with a thousand foot & two hundred horse was forraging the country about Bizia, he hasted his departure, that so he might by the way encounter them, laded with the spoil of the country: and so setting forward, came the third day to a little riuer, which the inhabitants call Xerogipsum, & there in a great plain neere vnto the same, encamped. Where after he had set al things in order fit for battel, he with cheereful speeches as a great commander, encouraged his captains and souldiers; leauing nothing vnsaid or vndone, that might serue for the animating of them to fight. But he had not so lien two daies, but that his scouts about midnight comming in, brought him tidings, that the enemy laden with spoile, was euen fast by at hand: who by the rising of the Sun were come within sight, and had themselues a far off also discouered the Christian army, al glistering in bright armor. Wherefore staying a while to prepare themthemselues for battell; and first of all, compassing themselues round with their waggons and other carriages, they bestowed in them all their captiues fast bound together, with the bootie they had taken; and afterwards as the manner was, casting dust vpon their heads, & their hands vp towards heauen, they came on. And now the Christian armie came on forward also, Philes still encouraging both the horsemen and footmen, and right wel conducting them, as the time and place required. So he fortuned, that he that had the leading of the right wing of the army, gaue the first charge vpon a squadron of the enemies, and at the first onset vnhorsed one of the enemies, and by and by after him another: But hauing his horse sore wounded vnder him, hee hastily retyred out of the battell; which somewhat troubled the Christians, and encouraged the Turks, who now with a barbarous outcrie began most fiercely to presse vpon the retyring Christians. Philes in the mean time with many cheerefull words and comfortable persuasions still encouraging them to play the men; and with his eyes oftentimes cast vp to heauen, with teares running down his face, most heartily besought God, the giuer of all victorie, no longer to suffer those his enemies, and the ministers of his wrath, to triumph ouer his people: as did also the poore captiues that lay bound, doubtfully betwixt feare & hope expecting the euent of the battell. The Christian footmen at the same time encountering hand to hand with the Barbarians, assailed them, and were assailed, slew of them, and were themselues of them slaine; so that there was a cruell fight made on both sides. But Philes with the multitude of his men hauing almost incompassed the Barbarian horsemen, with a companie of his most valiant soldiers broke in vpon the side of the enemies battell, and so made way thorow the midst of it; and so troubled the Turks, as that they well knew not how to stay, or what to do. So being on euery side circumuented and hardly charged, most of them there fell, excepting some few horsemen, whom the Greeke horsemen pursued vnto the entrance of Chersonesus, with purpose there to shut them vp. Philes comming thither also, there vpon those straits encamped: at which time the Emperor presently sent out fiue gallies to keepe the straits of Hellespont, so that no aid might be brought vnto those Turks out of Asia. Whilest these things thus went, two thousand choice horsemen came to the aid of Philes out of Seruia, and the Potestate of Pera came by sea also with eight gallies moe into Helespontus, to the aid of the Christians: wherefore when the Grecians and the Seruians had thus on the one side shut them vp by land, and they that were in the gallies on the other by sea, Philes with all his power came and incamped about the towne and the trenches wherein the Turks lay, planting his batterie against the castle, wherewith he greatly shooke the same, and made great slaughter of the Turkes and of their horses, and that not only by day, but by night also. But the Turks seeing death now present before their eyes, and no way left for them to escape, for that they were so on euery side both by sea and land inclosed, thought good thus to aduenture their liues, resoluing by night to set vpon the Grecians rather than vpon the Seruians, whom they had hitherto accustomed to ouercome, and whom they had with often slaughters terrified; that so the rest by them also happily discouraged, they might so delay the assault: but in attempting the same they perceiued themselues much deceiued, finding them euen at their first sallying out readie in armes to receiue them: wherefore hauing in vaine giuen the attempt (as against a strong fortresse) they were shamefully enforced to retyre. Yet were they not therewith so discouraged, but that the strait siege still continuing, they gaue the like attempt vpon the Seruians; but beeing also by them in a like manner with losse repulsed, they began now vtterly to despaire. Wherefore the next day about midnight casting away their armes, they with their bosomes and pockets ful of coyne ran downe vnto the sea side, towards the gallies, with purpose to yeeld themselues vnto the Genowaies that were therein; as fearing of them lesse harme, as of men whom they had neuer hurt. But the night being darke and mistie, and the Moone giuing no light, many of them vnawares came vnto the Greeke gallies, and there flying the smoke, fell into the fire: for being lightned of their mony, they were by them forthwith without any pittie slain also. But the Genowaies slew not all their prisoners, but only such as had brought with them the most coyne; lest afterwards bewraying the same, it should haue been sought after by the Greekes: the rest they cast into bonds, of whom some they sent vnto the emperor, other some they kept to themselues as their owne prisoners. Thus by the valour and good conduct of this worthie deuout captaine, the Turks were for that time againe chased out of Europe, and the country of Thracia deliuered of a great feare.

Now

The causes of the decay of the Greeke Empire.

Now by that we haue alreadie written, is easily to be seene the chiefe causes of the decay and ruin of the Greek empire, to haue bin, First, the innouation & change of their antient Religion and ceremonies, by Michael Paleologus, whereof ensued a world of woe; then, by Couetousnes, couered with the name of good husbandry, the vtter destruction of the chief strength of the empire; next vnto that, by Enuy, the ruin of the Great; false Suspect, the loser of friends; Ambition, honors ouerthrow; Distrust, the great minds torment; & Forrein aid, the empires faithlesse porter, opening the gate euen vnto the enemy himselfe: whereunto foule Discord joyned (as shall be forthwith declared) what wanted that the barbarous enemy could desire, for the helping of them in the supplanting of so great an empire? But againe to our purpose, Michael companion with his father Andronicus in the empire, had by his wife Mary two sons, Andronicus who was afterward Emperor, and Manuel syrnamed the Despot; and two daughters, Anne married vnto Thomas Prince of Epirus, and Theodora married to the Prince of Bulgaria: of all these, the old Emperour Andronicus their grandfather so entirely loued Andronicus his nephew, as that in comparison of him hee seemed little to regard either his owne children, or the rest of his nephews, wishing them all rather to perish than him: which many supposed him to do, as purposing by him the better to establish the succession of the empire in his house; as also for his excellencie of wit, and comlinesse of person; the likenesse of name also happily furthering his kind affection. For which reasons, he caused him to be honorably brought vp in his court, as not willing to spare him out of his sight either day or night. But when hee was out of his childehood, and growne to be a lustie youth (at which time mens hot desires are commonly most vehement) he began to contemne all chastisement and gouernment; especially in so high a calling, and in the prime of his youth. Besides that, his companions became vnto him the ministers and persuaders of all those vaine delights which vnstayed youth most desireth: and at the first began to lead him forth to walke the streets, to hawke, to hunt, and to haunt plays, and afterwards to night walkes also, not well beseeming his state: which riotous course of life, when as it required great expence, and his aged grandfather gaue him but a certaine spare allowance for his conuenient maintenance; he acquainted himselfe with the rich merchants of Genoway which dwelt at Pera. Heereof arose hard taking vp of money, great debt, fine deuices how to come by coyne, with secret consultations and purposes of flight. For when he saw his grandfather old Andronicus long to liue, & his father Michael like to succeed him, he had no hope of aspiring vnto the empire; wherupon his ambitious thoughts and impotent desires long time tormenting his haughty heart, suggested vnto him such purposes. For when as he would not obey his grandfather as his tutor, nor follow other mens councels, as a child, he sought after the Imperiall libertie, and abundance of wealth, that he might haue that was sufficient for himselfe, and wherwith to reward others, as the followers of an Emperour. Which seeing he could not do, his grandfather yet liuing, and his father raigning; hee sought after the soueraignty of other principalities and countries: one while after Armenia, as belonging vnto him in the right of his mother the King of Armenia's daughter; another while after Peloponesus; and sometime hee dreamed of Lesbos and Lemnus, and other the fruitfull Islands of the Ægean sea: which when it was secretly told, somtime to his father, and somtime to his grandfather, he was now crossed and reproued of the one, and afterwards of the other. And to passe ouer many other his youthfull prancks, he vsed in his night walks secretly to repaire vnto a certaine gentlewomans house, more honourably borne, than honestly qualified: which woman, a certain gallant (and another Adonis) no lesse affected than himselfe: wherwith hee highly offended, as with his Riuall, appointed certaine ruffians and fencers to watch her house. But vpon a certaine time about midnight, Manuel the Despot (his younger brother) seeking after him, chanced to passe that way where these watchmen lay: who seeing him hasten by, and not knowing him in the darke, and supposing him to haue beene the man they looked for, (the gentlewomans best beloued) set vpon him, and so wounded him, that he fell downe for dead from his horse: but being by and by after knowne by others comming in, he was taken vp, and halfe dead carried vnto the Court. Which outrage in the morning boeing knowne vnto the Emperour, cast him into a great heauinesse, as beholding not the time present onely, but wisely considering what was like to ensue in the time to come also. But Manuel the Despot being dead of the wounds there receiued, and the report thereof brought vnto Michael the young Emperour his father, then lying at Thessalonica, strooke him to

A to the heart with so great a griefe, that falling sicke with the conceit thereof, he shortly after died.

Andronicus the vnstayed Youth neuertheless holding on his woonted course, with a secret purpose to haue fled, became thereby still more and more suspicious to his aged grandfather; not a little carefull vnto what end those his violent passions would at length tend. And therefore appointed one Syrgiannes (a man of great credit and authoritie in the court, in whom, as in a reconciled enemie, he had most vnaduisedly reposed too much trust) to insinuate himselfe into the youthful princes acquaintance and fauor; that so sounding him & his secret designes, he should not possibly be able without his knowledge to step aside; which of all things the old Emperor feared most, as the beginning of greater troubles. This Syrgiannes being a man
B of great place, and of a subtill wit, was somtime himselfe suspected of aspiring, and therefore as vpon the misprision of treason, was by the old Emperor imprisoned: but afterwards by him againe inlarged and receiued into fauor, was now put in trust warily to obserue the doings of the yong prince. But he not vnmindfull of the wrong before done vnto him, and in hope by troubling the state either to aspire vnto the empire himself, or at leastwise to some good part thereof; thought now a fit occasion to be ministred vnto him for him to worke vpon, both for the one and the other, by setting the old Emperor and his ambitious nephew together by the eares: which opportunity he not minding to let slip, taking the yong prince one day aside, discouered vnto him all his grandfathers deuice, in briefe, as followeth:

C Your grandfather, noble Prince (said he) hath set me as a watch ouer your actions, or more truly to say, as a blood-hound, to seeke after not your doings onely, but if it were possible, euen after your most secret thoughts also: and so whilest hee maliciously prepareth for you snares and fetters, you not aware thereof, foolishly follow your shallow and childish conceits. For what shall it auaile you secretly to flie away? whereas, if the best chance, yet must you (as the common saying is) put your feet vnder another mans table, and liue of his charge; if it fall not out worse, that you be slaine or made away by them you flie vnto for reliefe, or else fall into the snares by your grandfather layd for you. But if so be that casting behind you these your fond deuices, you will hearken vnto my councell, I will shew you a readie way, how you shall in short time, and without any danger, aspire vnto the Imperiall Seat and dignitie; the onely way whereunto is this, if you leauing the Citie of Constantinople, shall flie out into the Cities and Pro-
D uinces of Thracia. For seeing men are most commonly by nature desirous of change, and the miserable Thracians are with often exactions grieuously vexed; if you shall but once proclaime a redresse of their grieuances, with immunitie for euer, they will all with one accord follow you whethersoeuer you will, your grandfathers long and heauie yoke beeing cast off, as if it were Sisiphus his heauie stone, which they had long rolled, and neuer the neere. If you like of this aduice, I will be vnto you both the author and the leader of this exployt, and will easily bring to good effect the whole matter: so that you
E againe on the other side promise vnto me vpon your faith, to reward this my trauell according to my desert therein. But what rewards shall these be? Honorable preferments, large possessions, great reuenues, the first place in your fauor, and that no great matter be done or concluded without my consent & knowledge. For you see how willingly I make my selfe partaker of your calamitie, and companion of your dangers, no necessitie enforcing me thereunto; forgetting euen my very faith, in comparison of the loue and Zeale I beare towards you; wherein if any mishap shall by the mutabilitie of fortune betide me, I haue set downe my selfe with patience to endure it. All which considered, you need not to grudge to yeeld vnto my requests, if you tender your owne safetie. And forasmuch as the shortnesse of the time will suffer no long consultations, and that delay bringeth extream danger, let vs without longer stay impart the matter vnto such others, as for the hatred of the Emperor are like to keepe our councell, and may yet much further our designes.

The yong Prince mooued with this speech as if it had bin with a charme, easily granted to his desire, confirming the same by his oath conceiued in writing: at which time were present F such as were especially to be acquainted with the plot of the conspiracie, namely Iohn Catacuzene, and Theodorus Synadenus (both men of great honour, and the old Emperors antient supposed friends, and of him beloued, much of like age vnto himselfe) and Alexius Apocaucus the third (not of like honor with the other, yet a man of great place, and of a most subtill and deepe wit:) who all vnderstanding the matter, shewed themselues not as ministers, but as ring-

leaders and captains of the intended rebellion. This conſpiracie with moſt ſolemne oath and promiſes on euery part confirmed, they began right cunningly to attempt the matter: and to begin withall, Syrgiannes & Catacuzenus, by corrupting diuers of the great and moſt gracious courtiers, procured to themſelues the gouernment of ſuch cities and prouinces in Thracia, as they thought fitteſt for them to begin their rebellion in. Syrgiannes hauing the gouernment of the ſea coaſt, & the inland country euen from the ſea ſide to the top of mount Rhodope; and Catacuzenus the gouernment of the country about Oreſtias. In all which places they muſtred ſoldiers, prouided armor, entertaining alſo ſtrangers, and other vagrant and maſterleſſe men; as for ſome great war: beſides that, in the cities for the gouernment therof, they placed their truſtieſt friends, remouing ſuch others as they had in ſuſpect. All which they colored by rumors falſly raiſed, one while of the comming of the European Tartars from Danubius, and another while by the comming of the Turks out of Aſia: againſt whoſe inuaſions theſe preparations were giuen out to be made, for auoiding of ſuſpition; and the traitors for their prouident care highly commended euen by the Emperor himſelfe, againſt whom they were intended. All which things Syrgiannes notably diſſembled, oftentimes withall certifying the young Prince what he had done, and what was likewiſe of him to be performed.

But the old Emperor ſeeing his youthfull nephew not to hearken to his graue aduice, but ſtill to proceed in his diſſolute kind of life, was about ſolemnly to haue reproued him before the Patriarch & ſome others of the chiefe nobilitie: if happily ſuch open reproof might haue wrought in him ſome change of manners; if not, then to haue committed him to priſon, & like enough he was to haue ſo done, had he not bin otherwiſe perſuaded by Theodorus Mitochita, (who of all others was able to do moſt with him) by reaſon of the liberty of the time; for then it was almoſt Shrouetide, when as the people diſtempred with exceſſe of meat & drinke, were of all other times moſt fit, vpon any light occaſion to be drawne into a tumult or vprore: for feare whereof, he was contented for that time to let him alone. But Shrouetide paſt, & a good part of Lent alſo, the old Emperor ſeeing no amendment in his nephew, calling vnto him Geraſimus the Patriarch, and the reſt of the reuerend Biſhops then preſent in the citie, ſent for his nephew, openly before them all to chide him, and to ſchoole him for his diſordred life; but eſpecially for his purpoſed flight; that aſhamed of ſuch open reproofe before ſuch reuerend fathers, he might either amend his life, or at leaſtwiſe of all men be thought iuſtly puniſht for the ſame, if he ſhould ſtil proceed therein. So the yong prince being ſent for, came, accompanied with many of his fauorits & followers, moſt of them being ſecretly armed, and hee himſelfe not altogether vnprouided: for it was agreed amongſt them, that if the Emperour ſhould vſe gentle and fatherly admonition towards him, that then they ſhould be quiet, without any ſhew of inſolencie or diſcontentment; but if he ſhould in anger reprooue him, or threaten to puniſh him, then vpon a ſigne giuen, forcibly with their ſwords drawn to breake in vpon him, and to kill him in the imperial ſeat, & without more ado to place yong Andronicus his nephew in his ſtead. But comming in, and (as his manner was) taking his place next vnto his aged grandfather, his diſperat followers attending without, he was indeed of him grieuouſly blamed and reproued for his former follies and euil courſe of life; yet with ſuch moderation & grauity, as that all ſeemed (as it did) to come of a moſt fatherly care and regard: ſo that at that time no ſuch outrage was committed, as was by diuers his followers wiſhed, but the aſſembly quietly diſmiſſed, & a ſolemne oath taken on both ſides: of the grandfather, That hee ſhould not appoint any but his nephew to ſucceed him in the empire: & of the yong prince, That he ſhould neuer go about to attempt any thing to the ſhortning or hurt of his grandfathers life or Empire. But the conſpirators thronging about him at his comming out, fretted & fumed at him, as if he had broken his faith & oath before giuen them; ſaying, What greater wrong couldſt thou do vs, than being by vs made ſtrong, and become dreadfull vnto thine enemies, to diſpoſe of thine affairs at thy pleaſure to thine owne ſafetie, and to leaue vs thy moſt faithfull friends and ſeruants in the diuels mouth to be deuoured? For now they both doubted and feared, leſt their conſpiracie was diſcouered. With which ſpeeches he both diſcouraged and aſhamed, ſent for Theodorus Metochita his grandfathers chiefe Councellour, requeſting him to deale with his grandfather, for the pardoning of all his followers, as hee had done for himſelfe: of which motion hee diſliking, told him, That he was to giue God thanks, that he had himſelfe eſcaped ſo great a danger; and to him alſo, as a meane for the ſafegard of his life, although he treated not for ſuch traiterous perſons, with whom, if he were well aduiſed, he would haue nothing to doe, either thinke that they would euer be faithful vnto him, that reſpecting neither God nor man, had ſo fouly broken their faith before giuen vnto the Emperor his grandfather. With which vnexpected anſwer of ſo great and graue a Councellor, the prince not a little troubled, and withall diſcontented, ſtood a while as in a muſe all ſilent, reaſoning as it were with his owne paſſions: but afterwards commanding him without further replie to depart, and the old companions of his follies reſorting vnto him, hee by their perſuaſion entertained againe his former diſloyall thoughts & deſignements: which his grandfather vehemently ſuſpecting, and therewith not a little grieued, would (as if it had been by inſpiration) oftentimes in his heauines ſay vnto them that were about him, In our time is loſt the maieſty of our Empire, and the deuotion of the Church. Yet to preuent the worſt, he thought it good betime to lay hands vpon his ſuſpected nephew, and ſo to detain him in ſafe keeping: acquainting none therewith but Geraſimus the Patriark & his ghoſtly father; who preſently acquainted the Prince therwith, & was the cauſe that he haſtned his flight, flying himſelfe before. For he now certainly vnderſtanding the danger he was in, the night before he ſhould haue been apprehended, with all the reſt of the conſpirators his complices, in the dead time of the night fled out of the City, by the gate called Gyrolimnia; which gate (all the reſt being ſhut) was ſtil at his command, for that he vſed commonly therby at his pleaſure very early to go out on hunting, as he now pretended to doe; but the next day after came to Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus campe, who then both lay with a great power at Hadrianople, expecting his comming. The old Emperor, before the riſing of the Sun aduertiſed of the flight of his nephew, the ſame day commanded him to be proclaimed traitor, and proſcribed, with all his conſpirators, and whoſoeuer elſe ſhould take his part. And for the more ſuretie, euery man in the city was ſworne to be loyall and faithfull vnto the old Emperour, and enemies vnto his nephew and his adherents. But he on the other ſide, proclaiming liberty and immunitie abroad in all the cities and villages in Thracia, to woon the hearts of the countrey people in generall, that they reſorted vnto him from all places in great numbers, readie armed to do whatſoeuer he ſhould command them. And to begin withall, they firſt laid hands vpon the collectors of the Emperors mony (then abroad in the countrey) whom they ill intreated, taking from them their mony. After that, and yet ſeuen days not expired, almoſt an incredible number of horſemen, footmen, archers, and others, departed from Hadrianople toward Conſtantinople, vnder the leading of Syrgiannes, in good hope at their firſt comming to take the citie, being at diſcord in it ſelfe, and moſt part of the meaner ſort, in hope of gaine, fauouring their rebellious proceedings, ſuch as the ſeditious find in ſuch rebellious tumults. So hauing marched foure days, they came and incamped at Selyrbia: but as they were about to haue gon on farther, the old Emperor doubting leſt the citiſens, ſeeing ſo great an army before the city, ſhould therein raiſe ſome tumult or ſtirre, to the indangering thereof; thought good before to ſend Embaſſadors vnto his nephew, to proue if happily theſe ſo dangerous troubles, might by their means in ſome good ſort be appeaſed. The chiefe of theſe Embaſſadors was one Theoleptus Biſhop of Philadelphia, a man no leſſe famous for his vertue than his wiſedome, and yet for both of all men honored; and with him alſo was ſent Syrgiannes his mother, as of all others moſt fit to appeaſe her ſon, and to perſuade him not to approch the city, for that thereof might enſue much bloudſhed, and the deſtruction of the city, or at leaſtwiſe the vtter vndoing of many; whereof if he ſhould be the author, how could he euer after liue in conſcience quiet, but that the torment thereof would follow him euen into his graue; and therefore to requeſt him to retyre a little, and ſo to come to talke, and to demand what he pleaſed. Syrgiannes moued as well with the preſence of the reuerend Biſhop, as the prayers of his mother, retyred to the young Prince, which lay then about Oreſtias; whither the Emperors Embaſſadors came alſo: with whom (after long debating) it was agreed, That the young prince ſhould in all royall manner hold all Thracia, from Criſtopolis vnto Rhegium, and the Suburbes of Conſtantinople: and withall, That ſuch lands as the young Prince had already giuen vnto his followers, in Macedonia, ſhould ſtill remaine vnto them (which were ſuch as yeerely yeelded vnto them a right great reuenue:) And that the old Emperour ſhould hold vnto himſelfe the imperiall Citie, with all the Cities and Prouinces of Macedonia beyond Criſtopolis: and that hee alone ſhould haue the honour to heare the Embaſſadors ſent from forreine Princes, and to giue them their diſpatch; for that the young Prince tooke no pleaſure sure in those waighty affaires, as by nature more delighted in hawking, hunting, & his other G youthfull pleasures. Vpon which conditions a peace was concluded, better liked of the young Prince than of the old Emperor; who although he was desirous otherwise to haue redrest so great wrongs, yet wanting power, was glad to yeeld to what his nephew would request. Thus was the Greeke empire in Europe (as then all or the most part inclosed within the bounds of Macedonia and Thracia) now diuided betwixt the grandfather and his nephew: Asia in the meane time (wherein the Greeke Emperors their predecessors somtime held great kingdoms) being left for a prey to the greedie Turks. Othoman on the one side euen in the heat of these troubles laying the foundation of his empire in Phrygia & Bythinia; and the other the Turks Princes the successors of Sultan Aladin, encroching as fast vpon the emperours territories and countries on this side the riuer Meander. And not so contented, at the same time also built H great store of gallies, wherewith they robbed the Christian Merchants trading to Constantinople, and spoiled the coasts of Macedonia and Thracia, and the Islands of the Ægeum, and among others tooke the famous Island of the Rhodes; which they held not long before they were againe driuen out of the same by the Knights Hospitallers, vnder the conduct of William Villaret, aided by the Genowaies and the King of Sicilia, which they from that time held (to the great honor and benefit of the Christian commonweale) by the space of 214 yeres, known by the name of the Knights of the Rhodes: vntill that in the memorie of our fathers it was (I say no more, but grieue therefore) shamefully lost vnto the Turke, for want of reliefe; neuer place being more honourably defended, as in the processe of this Historie shall appeare: euer since which time those honorable men (the flower of Chiualrie) haue seated themselues I in the Isle of Malta, which they to their immortall glorie, and the comfort of all good Christians, haue most notably defended against the mightie Sultan Solyman, and all the furie of the Turks, as shall be also in due place declared.

The Greeke empire in Europe diuided.

Whilest the Grecians are at discord amongst themselues, Othoman layeth the foundation of the Turkes Empire, & the other Turks encroch vpō them also.

The Island of the Rhodes was by the knights hospitalers recouered from the Turkes in the yeare 1308.

But to returne again vnto the troubled estate of the Greeke empire. Syrgiannes the Greeke captain, & author of all the aforesaid stirs betwixt the old Emperor and his nephew, had euen from the beginning thought, as a companion to the yong Prince, to haue ruled all with him at his pleasure, and that nothing either great or little should haue bin done without him: but seeing it now to fall out far otherwise than he had before expected, and the Prince to be wholly ruled by Catacuzenus, and himselfe of all others least regarded, & not so much as called to any counsel; inwardly tormented with griefe and enuie, he began secretly with himselfe to deuise K how he might be reuenged of the vngratefull Prince, which vnmindful of his former promises, had so vnthankfully cast him off. Wherefore he resolued again to reuolt to the old Emperor, not doubting but so in short time to ouerthrow all the councels and deuices of the young Prince, together with his state also, by himselfe before raised. For he, as worldly wise, excluding God from his councels, had such an opinion of himselfe, that which way soeuer he went, thither must all things follow also. Wherefore by one of his trustiest friends he secretly made the old emperor acquainted with his purposed reuolt, and how all things stood: for the greater credit thereof alledging, That he could not abide the sight of him that sought to corrupt his wife, meaning the yong Prince. This news from Syrgiannes was vnto the old emperor most welcome: for it grieued him (as an old man of a great spirit) to see himselfe so contemned and L deluded by his nephew, his empire rent, and his old seruitors of all sorts, by him spoyled of their lands and possessions in Macedonia and Thracia. So a solemne oath in secret passed from the one to the other, Syrgiannes without longer stay secretly fled to Constantinople: which there bruted abaoad, reioyced many, now well hoping the whole gouernment would againe come vnto the old emperour, and that so they should againe recouer their possessions wrongfully taken from them by his nephew. But God not seeing it so good, all this hope was but in vaine, as ere long it appeared: for the yong prince, who of long knew how much he was beloued of the Constantinopolitans, and by them secretly sent for; taking occasion vpon the flight of Syrgiannes, with all the power he could make, marched towards the city: and being come within sight thereof, encamped, laying ambushes vpon euery way and passage thereabout, for M to haue intercepted Syrgiannes; who was then at Perinthus, and the third night after, with three hundred select souldiers, deceiuing them that lay in waight for him as if they had bin all asleepe, before the rising of the Sun came to Constantinople: and if the old Emperour would haue giuen him leaue, he had suddenly charged them that did lie in wait for him, before they were

A were aware of his comming. But as soone as it was day, the Prince hearing of the escape of Syrgiannes, and no such tumult in the citie as he had expected, presently without more adoe retired with his armie the same way he came, backe againe into Thracia.

By and by after, Constantine the Despot was by the old Emperor his brother sent by sea to Thessalonica, to take vpon him the gouernment of Macedonia, and by the way to apprehend Xene the Empresse, the young Princes mother; and after with all the power he could make to inuade the yong Prince in Thracia: that so setting on him on the one side out of Macedonia, and Syrgiannes with the Turkes (for the Emperour in this ciuill discord was glad to vse their helpe also) and the Bythinian soldiers on the other, they might so shut him vp betwixt them and take him. According to which resolution, the Despot comming to Thessalonica, there B tooke the Empresse, whom with all her familie he thrust into a gallie, and so sent her to Constantinople, where shee was in the palace kept close, as too much fauouring the proceedings of the Prince. And afterward raising all the power hee could in Macedonia, inuaded the Prince in Thracia, breaking by force thorow the wall of Cristopolis.

The yong Prince seeing himselfe by this means, now like to be driuen to a great strait, sent Synadenus with his Thracian armie, to defend the frontiers of his empire towards Constantinople, against Syrgiannes with his Turks and Bythinians: in hope himselfe by many subtle deuices & slights, to be able to encounter his vncle the Despot. And first he caused diuers edicts and proscriptions to be written in hast, wherin great rewards and preferments were with great solemnity of words promised to whomsoeuer could bring vnto him the Despot either quick C or dead: which were of purpose giuen to the country people passing to & fro, to be dispersed abroad in the high waies, and about in the country neere vnto the Despots campe. And after that, he caused the death of the Emperor his grandfather to be euery where proclaimed, and how that he was by the Constantinopolitans in a tumult slaine: which the deuisers thereof, in euery place reported. Yea some there were, that swore they were themselues present at his wofull death, and saw it with their eies: others ome, more certainly to persuade the matter, shewed long white goats haire, or such like gathered out of white wooll, as if they had bin by the furious people pluckt from the old Emperors head or beard, at such time as he was slaine. Which things being commonly reported in euery town and village, but especially in the Despots campe, wonderfully filled mens heads with diuers strange and doubtfull thoughts; then D diuers also of the dispersed edicts being found, and brought to the Despot, struck him (and not without cause) into a great feare; insomuch, that by the perswasion of his best friends, he without longer stay retired in hast to Thessalonica. Whither shortly after came a gallie from Constantinople, with secret letters from the Emperor to the Despot, for the apprehension of fiue and twentie of the chiefe citizens, vehemently suspected for the stirring vp of the people to rebellion, and so to haue deliuered the citie to the Prince: al whom the Despot should haue sent bound in that gallie to Constantinople: but they in good time perceiuing the danger they were in, secretly stirring vp the people, and by and by after ringing out the bels (the signal appointed for the beginning of the rebellion) had in a very short time raised a wonderful tumult in the citie; insomuch, that all the citizens were vp in armes, who running headlong vnto the E house of the Despot, found not him (for hee forewarned of their comming, was fled into the castle) but slew al they met of his, or else robbing them, cast them in prison. As for the Despots house, they took what they found therin, and afterwards pulled it down to the ground. Then comming to the castle, they fired the gates: which the Despot seeing, & not able to defend the place, tooke horse and fled to a monasterie not far off, where being taken by them that pursued him, he ful sore against his wil, for the safegard of his life, took vpon him the habit of a Monk: neuertheles, he was from thence caried prisoner to the yong Prince his nephew, who shewed himselfe much more courteous to him, than al the rest of his nobilitie & waiters: for they, as if they would haue eaten him vp, were euen forthwith ready to haue torn him in pieces, had not the Prince embracing him in his armes, saued his life. Yet the next day after, by the perswasion F of his counsell, he sent him to Didimotichum, where he was cast into a most lothsome prison, being very deepe and strait, in manner of a well, no bodie to attend vpon him but one boy, where he lay in miserable darknes and stinke; they which drew vp his ordure from him and the boy, whether by chance or of purpose, pouring it oftentimes vpon his head. Where after he had lyen a great while in most extreame miserie, wishing to die and could not; he was at length length by the Princes commandement (entreated thereunto by certaine religious men) remoued into a more easie prison, where we will for euer leaue him. G Andronicus the old Emperour seeketh for counsell of the Psalter, as of an heauenly Oracle, and so seeketh to make peace with his nephew. Psal. 68. vers. 14.

Things falling out crosse with the old Emperor, and although they were neuer so well deuised, still sorting out vnto the worst, he became very pensiue and doubtfull what to do. So it fortuned, that one day in his Melancholie mood, hauing a Psalter in his hand, to resolue his doubtfull minde, he opened the same, as if it were of that heauenly Oracle to aske counsell: wherein the first verse that he light vpon was, Dum cœlestis dissociat Reges, nive conspergentur in Salmon. When the Almightie scatered Kings (for their sakes) then were they as white as snow in Salmon. Which he applying to himselfe, as if all those troubles, and whatsoeuer else had happened in them, proceeded from the will of God, although for causes to him vnknowne: hee by and by sought to reconcile himselfe vnto his nephew; contrary to the mind of Syrgiannes, desiring nothing but trouble. For (as we haue before said) the young Prince although he was desirous of the power and libertie of an Emperor, yet he left the ornaments and care thereof vnto his grandfather: and had he not oftentimes and earnestly beene egged forward by his companions to affect the whole empire, happily could and would haue contented himselfe with the former pacification: for being now sent for, hee came first to Rhegium, and there visited his mother (now set at liberty, and sent thither for the furtherance of the desired pacification) where hee with her and by her counsel did whatsoeuer was there done. So within a few dayes the matter was brought into so good tearmes, that an attonement was made, and he himselfe went and met the Emperour his grandfather before the gates of the citie: the old Emperour sitting then vpon his horse, and the Prince lighting from his, a good furlong before he came at him: and although his grandfather was very vnwilling, and forbad him so to doe, yet hee came to him on foot, and kissed his hand and foot as he sate on horsebacke; and afterward taking horse, embraced him, and there kissed one another, to the great contentment of the beholders: and so hauing talked some few words, departed; the old man into the citie, and the young man into his campe, which then lay neere vnto Pega: where staying certaine dayes, he came diuers times into Constantinople, and so went out againe; for as then his mother, partly for her health, partly for the loue of her sonne, lay at Pega. H I

But Syrgiannes nothing glad of the agreement made betwixt the Emperor and his nephew, walked vp and downe sicke in mind, with a heauie countenance, especially for that in time of peace his busie head stood the common weale in no stead. Wherefore in al meetings & assemblies, he wilingly conuersed with them which most disliked of the present state, & spake hardly as wel of the Emperor as of his nephew, wronged as he thought by them both; whereas in the time of their greatest distresse he had (as he said) stood them in good stead. But seeing one Asanes Andronicus walking melancholie vp and downe, as a man with heauinesse oppressed; who hauing done good seruice for the young Prince, & not of him regarded, had fled to the old Emperor, and there found no such thing as he expected for the ease of his griefe, although he were a man honorably born, and otherwaies endued with many good parts: with him Syrgiannes acquainted himselfe, as grieued with the like griefe that he himselfe was; with whom as with his friend, without any dissimulation hee plainly discoursed of all such things as his griefe desired. But Asanes handling him with great wisedome, did himselfe with like words speak hardly both of the Emperor & his nephew; but yet curiously noted whatsoeuer Syrgiannes said, for he had before hated him for his ambition, & as then, took it in displeasure, that he was enemy vnto Cataeuzanus, his son in law, who was all in all with the yong Prince, and did oftentimes comfort him. But the song being throughly set, Asanes came secretly vnto the old Emperor, and told him the whole matter; and in fine, that except he betime laid hold on Syrgiannes, affecting the empire, he should in short time be by him brought to his end. Wherupon Syrgiannes was forthwith clapt fast in prison: whose house with all his wealth, the common people took the spoile of; and not contented to haue rased it down to the ground, conuerted the site thereof, together with the pleasant vineyards adioining vnto the same, into a place to feed goats and sheep in: a worthy reward for his manifold trecheries. The yong Prince shortly after going to Constantinople, was there crowned Emperour, as fellow in the empire with his grandfather: vnto which solemnity in the great temple of Sophia, both the Emperours riding, it fortuned the old Emperor by the stumbling of his horse to be ouerthrown, & fouley beraied in the mire, the streets being then very foule by reason of much rain but a little before K L M

A fallen: which many tooke as ominous, and portending the euill fortune which shortly after befell him. During the time of this peace, it fortuned that as the yong Prince was a hunting in Chersonesus, seuentie Turks aduenturers, were by force of weather driuen on shore: who before they would yeeld themselues prisoners, made a great fight with the Emperors men, and slew diuers of them; in which conflict the young Emperour himselfe was wounded in the foot, wherewith he was a great while after exceedingly tormented.

Andronicus the late Prince, and now fellow in the empire with his aged grandfather, held not himself elong so contented, but after the manner of ambitious men (and continually prickt forward by his aspiring fauourites) longed to haue the whole gouernment to himselfe, which hardly brooketh any partner: and therefore wearie to see his grandfather liue so long, B resolued no longer to expect his naturall death, (although it could not by course of nature be far off) but by one deuice or other to thrust him from the gouernment; or if that might not be wrought, at once to dispatch him both of life and state together. And the suter to lay the plot whereon so foule and horrible a treason was to be built, he by the councell of his mother and others, by whom he was most directed, sent for Michael the Prince of Bulgaria, his brother in law (though before to him vnknown, as was his wife his sister also) to make with him a firme league, to the intent by him to prouide, that if the Prince of Seruia (who had but lately married the old Emperors nigh kinswoman, and so to him much deuoted) should take part with him, he should by the Bulgarian his neighbour be intangled. Who so sent for, with his wife, the old Emperors daughter, came to Dydymotichum, where they were many dayes most ho-C nourably entertained both by the yong Emperor and his mother: for why, this meeting plotted vpon great treason, was finely coloured, with the desire the yong Emperor had to see his sister and her husband, as before vnto him vnknowne; and the Empresse her daughter, whom she had not seene in three and twentie yeares before. But the secret conclusion betwixt them was, that the Bulgarian Prince should to the vttermost of his power aid the young Emperour against his grandfather, and he likewise him against the Seruian, as he should haue need: and further, that if his grandfather beeing deposed, he should recouer the whole empire, then to giue him a great sum of mony, with certaine special cities and prouinces confining vpon him, as in dowrie to his kind brother in law, and companion in his labours. So Michael the Bulgarian Prince honorably entertained by the yong Emperor and the old Empresse his mother in D law, loaded with rewards, and promises of greater, returned home into his countrey.

A treacherous meeting.

This matter thus dispatched, the yong Emperor therewith encouraged, & knowing also the Constantinopolitans, besides the other cities of Thracia, exceedingly to fauour him and his proceedings, by whom also he was secretly inuited to hasten his comming thither (as wearie of the long life and lazines, as he termed it, of his grandfather) thought it best cunningly to go about the matter; that so his grandfather beeing with as little stirre as might be deposed, he himselfe might alone inioy the empire. But needing mony for the effecting of so great matters he by force tooke all the money from the collectors, whom the old Emperour had sent into Thracia for the taking vp of mony there, telling them that he was an Emperor also, and in need of money, and that the common charge was likewise by the common purse to be discharged.
E After that he tooke his way towards Constantinople, pretending that vpon speciall causes he had occasion to send embassadours vnto the Sultan of Ægypt: for the transporting of whom he was there to take order for the setting forth of a great ship, and other things necessarie for the iourney. Neither went he slenderly appointed, but with a great power; and the cities of Thracia before well assured vnto him, such as he suspected being thrust out of office, & others more assured vnto him placed in their steads. But whilest he thus bestirreth himselfe, one of those that were most inward with him, detesting so foule a treason, secretly fled from him vnto his grand father, from point to point discouering vnto him all the intended trecheries; and withall, how that his nephew had determined to depose him from his empire, or otherwise to F bereaue him of his life if he should stand vpon his guard: but if in the attempt he should find ease succesfe, then to spare his life; and depriuing him of the imperiall dignitie, to thrust him as a Monke into a monasterie: and therefore aduised him to beware how he suffred him after his wonted manner to come into the citie, for feare of a generall reuolt, but rather by force to keepe him out. Which the Emperour hearing, and comparing with other things which hee had heard of others, yet sounding in his eares, deeming it to be true, stood vp, and in the anguish guish of his soule thus complained vnto God : Reuenge my quarrell ô God, vpon them that doe me wrong, and let them be ashamed that rise vp against me : and preserue thou vnto me the imperiall power, which by thee giuen vnto me, he commeth to take from me whom I my selfe begot and aduanced. After, he began to consider what course to take for the assurance of himselfe and his state in so great a danger. And first he sent vnto his nephew (come halfe way) to forbid him from entring the citie, and to tell him, that it was a great follie for him, being so manifest a traitor, both vnto his grandfather and the state, to thinke his traiterous purposes to be vnknown vnto the world. And beside in way of reproofe to rehearse vnto him, how many occasions he had giuen for the breaking of the league with his grandfather : first in taking away the mony from the collectors, whereof the state neuer stood in more need, by reason of the diuision of the empire, which required double charge ; then in that he had in the citie euery where displaced such gouernors and magistrats as his grandfather had sent thither, and placed others at his pleasure, with many other like facts, declaring his trecherous aspiring mind, for which he was not without cause by his grandfather forbidden to enter the citie. After that, the old Emperor by secret letters craued aid of Crales Prince of Seruia, and Demetrius the Despot his son, who was then gouernor of Thessalonica and the countries adioining ; commanding him with Andronicus and Michael his nephews (gouernors of Macedonia) with all the forces they were able to raise, and such aid as should be sent vnto them out of Syria, with all speed to ioyne together and to go against the yong Emperor. But these letters thus written vnto the Prince of Seruia, the Despot, and others, (as is before said) were for the most part intercepted, by such as the young Emperour had for that purpose placed vpon the straits of Cristopolis, and the other passages ; especially such as were written in paper, yet some others in fine white linnin cloth, and secretly sowed in the garments of such as carried them, escaped for all their strait search, and so were deliuered. And in truth nothing was done, or about to be done in Constantinople, but that the yong Emperor was by one or other aduertised thereof : whereas the old Emperor on the other side, vnderstood nothing what his nephew did abroad, or intended. For all men of their own accord inclined to him, some openly both bodie and soule (as they say) and such as could not bee with him in person, yet in minde and good will were euen present with him ; and that not onely the common sort of the citizens of Constantinople, but the chiefe Senatours, the great courtiers, yea and many other of the Emperors neerest kinsmen also : who curiously obseruing whatsoeuer was done in the citie, forthwith certified him thereof. Amongst whom was also Theodorus the Marquesse, one of the old Emperours owne sons : who many yeres before by the Empresse his mother sent into Italy, and there honourably married, was by his prodigall course of life there, growne far in debt ; so that leauing his wife and children behind him, he was glad after the decease of his mother, to flie vnto his father at Constantinople, and there now liued ; who beside that he most honourably maintained him in the court, and bestowed many great things vpon him, paid also al his debts, which were very great. Al which fatherly kindnes he forgetting, went about most Iudas like to haue betrayed his aged father. For he also dreaming after the empire, & for many causes (but especially for that he was in mind, religion, maners, and habit, become a Latin) by him reiected, thought he could not do him a greater dispight than by reuolting vnto the yong Emperor : so that the neerer he was in bloud, the more he was his fathers vnnatural enemy. Shortly after, Demetrius the Despot, hauing receiued the Emperours letters at Thessalonica, called vnto him Andronicus and Michael his nephewes, the gouernors of Macedonia ; with whom ioyning all his forces, & daily expecting more aid out of Seruia, he first spoiled the young Emperours friends and fauourits in Macedonia, giuing the spoile of them in all the cities and townes of Macedonia, vnto their soldiers, who made hauock of whatsoeuer they light vpon : and whosoeuer seemed any way to withstand them or dislike of their proceedings, their goods and lands they confiscated, and draue the men themselues into exile. Neither was the yong Emperor Andronicus in the meane time idle, but secretly sent out his edicts, into all parts of the empire, yea into the very cities of Constantinople and Thessalonica, and ouer al Macedonia : whereby hee proclaimed vnto the people in generall, a releasement of them from all tributes, impositions, and paiments ; and frankly promised vnto the soldiers and men of war, the augmenting of their pensions and pay : which were no sooner bruited, but that most men were therewith moued, both in word and deed to fauour his proceedings, doing what they they

A they could to further the same, and by secret letters inuiting him to hasten his comming into the citie ; who thereupon comming to Rhegium, by his embassadours sent from thence, requested the old Emperor, either to giue him leaue according to the league betwixt them, to come into the citie, or else to send him certaine of the chiefe of the nobilitie and clergie, with some of the better and more vnderstanding sort of the Burgers and citizens also, vnto whome he might frankly speake his mind, for them faithfully to deliuer the same againe vnto the Emperor his grandfather, and the people. Which requests the old Emperor perceiuing to be full of deceit and trecherie, for a good space answered thereunto nothing at al, but stood al silent, as doubting which to grant : for, to suffer his nephew to come into the city, he saw was dangerous, the citizens (as he well knew) being for the most part inclined to reuolt to him so soone B as they should once see him within the gates ; and to send any forth vnto him, as hee desired, might be (as he feared) an occasion of some tumult to be after raised in the citie : for he knew that his nephewes drift therein was, openly by faire words, and secretly with great gifts and large promises, first to gaine them, and by them the rest of the citizens. Both which things being dangerous, hee made choice of the easier, and sent forth vnto him two of the most Noble Senators, two of the most reuerend Bishops, two other graue Prelates, and foure of the chiefe Burgesses of the citie : vnto whom at their comming vnto him, hee in the open hearing of all men deliuered this premeditated and craftie speech :

The young Emperour sendeth Embassadours vnto his grandfather.

The speech of the young Emperour vnto his grandfathers embassadours.

C It is not vnknowne vnto the world, you my subiects, to haue alwaies beene vnto mee more deare than I haue beene vnto my selfe : and how that I haue not vpon any ambitious conceit, or desire of the sole gouernment, against my grandfathers good will, gone out. For you see how that I neither spare mine owne life, or attend my pleasure, for the care I haue of you : I come not vnto you compassed about with a guard of armed men, as is the manner not of Kings onely, for the enuie of their high place, but of others also of farre meaner calling, whom disaster fortune, banished from their parents and kinred, hath enforced to wander heere and there, with death also before their eyes. Let any man tell mee how I came by these wounds which I yet beare in my bodie, but in fight with the enemies of my countrey which passe ouer out of Asia into Thracia ; or else dwelling neere vnto Ister, doe with their incursions from thence miserably waste that side of Thracia which is next vnto them ? For I (to tell you the very truth) seeing the old Emperour by reason of his great yeares to become slothfull and
D blockish, and not possible to bee awaked out of his drowsie sleepe, neither any whit to grieue when as the poore Christians his subiects were both by day and night, some as sacrifices slaine by the barbarous enemies, some carried away into most miserable captiuitie, and the rest poore and naked to bee driuen out of their houses and cities ; not to speake in the meane time of the greater mischieses in Asia, and how many cities haue beene there lost through the old Emperours sloth and negligence : when I saw these things (I say) strucken with a piercing griefe, which my heart could not indure, I went out for two causes, either by some kinde of honourable death to end my griefe together with my life, or else to the vttermost of my power to stand my countrey in some stead. For by no meanes it can come to passe, but that a man, and he that hath of long time raigned, must at length become loathsome vnto his subiects, and incurre their deadly hatred. For why, God hath made nothing in this life immutable and
E firme : whereby it commeth to passe, as we see, that all worlaly things ioy and delight in change. But if a man will as it were force fortune to his desire, and striue to bind things vnto a certaine firme and constant course, hee shall but lose his labour, and in vaine striue against nature. But whatsoeuer is contrary vnto nature, or exceedeth the iust bounds thereof, hath in it neither comfort nor delight. This was it that caused the wise men to say, and to leaue to vs as rules, Not to dwel too long vpon any thing ; and a measure to be the faireſt vertue. For you see how that my grandfather being growne to great yeares, and hauing raigned so long (I may almost say) as neuer did any but hee, is become hatefull vnto all his people ; and yet regardeth not either how to discharge himselfe of so great a burthen, or how to releeue the declining state of the empire, or so much as grieueth to see the successours of the empire to die before him : For my father is dead without any fruit of the empire, except the bare title onely ; and F others also neereſt to him of bloud, and farre younger than he, are dead likewise : and happily I my selfe may die also before I shall receiue any profit thereof : for what can more easily happen, especially vnto a man that shunneth no danger, and regardeth not his life ? But some perhaps will suspect me of ambition, for departing from the Emperour my grandfather, and for refusing to be ruled by him. Which thing I neither flatly denie, or altogether confesse : For might I see the Empire increase, and the

bounds thereof inlarged, I could willingly content my selfe, and as my ease take my rest; cheering my selfe vp with such hope as doe they that beare with their cookes, making them to stay long for their dinner, in hope thereby to fare the better. But seeing the state of the empire daily to decline from euill to worse, and the miserable people carried away captiues, or slaine by their enemies euen at the gates and vnder the wals of the imperiall Citie: what deeme you mee then to thinke? For most men ease their present griefe, with the hope of future good, although the same be but vaine: But vnto mee is not left euen such vaine hope vnto my false comfort. And can you marueil at the impotent affection of the Great Alexander of Macedon, grieued and displeased to see his father to heape victorie vpon victorie, and to cut off all the hope of his sonnes glorie, by leauing him so few occasions of warre; and not thinke mee (to whom you see the quite contrarie is chanced, and from whom not onely the hope of the empire is cut off, for the wasting thereof, but euen the course of a quiet life) to fret and grieue thereat? Mooued herewith, and not able longer to indure it, at length I rise vp, and requested of the Emperour my Grandfather, but a thousand men at armes, promising him by the power of God with them preserue the Cities in Bythinia, and to driue his enemies further off, (before that hauing them), they should passe ouer the strait, and besiege the imperiall Citie of Constantinople: which so small a request hee not onely denyed mee, but hath euer since taken mee for his mortall enemie. But this and many other things else let passe: I haue now another request vnto him by you, which is, That hee would giue mee eight thousand duckats to content my souldiers withall, who of long haue from plac to place roamed vp and downe with mee, following mine vncertaine fortune: Which granted, I will no more bee vnto my Grandfather troublesome, but dismissing my forces, hold my selfe right well contented.

Hauing thus said, hee rose out of his seat, and taking them a part one after another, courteously discoursed with them, and so filling them with great hopes, sent them away: who departing from him and comming into the citie, became as it were the open proclaimers of his praises, enflaming the people with a greater desire of him than before. Which the old Emperour hearing, and perceiuing almost all his friends in the citie to bee in heart reuolted from him; and withall fearing to bee of them in some sudden concourse slaine, was therewith exceedingly vexed. Yet hee thought it best before any such thing should happen, to proue their mindes, and to heare the counsell of the Patriarch, and Asanes, and the other Bishops also: vnto whome; being by one of the Senators called together, he declared his mind, as followeth:

The speech of the old Emperour vnto the Patriarch and the rest of the Bishops and Nobilitie, concerning the young Empeour his nephew.

Were I assured, that hauing deposed my selfe of the imperiall dignitie, I should my selfe liue in safetie, and see my people wel gouerned, I would I should neuer be of the companie of the faithful, if I did not by much prefer a pleasant quiet contented life before an Empire. For if a man would seeke for the pleasure of the mind, what can be mor pleasant, than to be disburdened of all cares, & free from such dangers as attend high estates? But if for my sinne and the sinnes of my people, as also for the sinne of mine ancestors, the vengeance of God in manner of a violent tempest raging against vs, subuerteth our empire: and I yet but a youth, by the helpe of God reformed and quieted the state of the Empire, grieuously troubled with discord in the Church, and the often inuasion of the enemie; and taught by long experience know not how in so great hurle and tempest which way to turne my selfe: How can I with safetie commit vnto my nephew so great a charge, who as yet is both an vnstayed youth, and so careless of his owne good, as that hee knoweth not how well to gouerne his owne priuate affaires? For giuing ouer his power to young vnskilfull men, and hauing flung away his imperiall possessions amongst them, hee himselfe liueth in penurie and want; neither regardeth any thing more than his dogges and kites, of whome hee keepeth few lesse than a thousand curres, and as many hawkes, and not much fewer men to looke vnto them. Wherefore vnto such a man, how may I safely commit eyther my life, or the administration of mine Empire, by God committed vnto mee? But I will neuer witting and willingly cast away either my subiects or my selfe. For my nephew I haue loued, not onely more than my wife and children, but (to say the truth) more than my selfe also; as you well know how tenderly I haue brought him vp, how carefully I haue instructed and aduised him, as purposing to haue left him the heire and successour both of my wisedome and mine Empire, that so hee might the better please both God and man. But hee, contemning my good counsell, hath spent whole nights in banqueting, and riot, and brothelhouses; wherein hee hath also slaine his owne brother: and to bee breefe, hee hath risen and lifted vp his hand against mee his grandfather, and a grandfather that had had of him so well deserued, attempting such a villanie as the Sunne neuer saw. Wherefore you ought also to hate and detest his wickednesse, and to rise vp to restraine his impudent disloyaltie, and by your Ecclesiasticall censure to denounce him vnworthie of the Empire and the communion of the faithful, as one seperated from God; that so ashamed and corrected, he may louingly thither returne from whence he is shamefully departed, and againe be made heire both of myne empire and staidnesse: for there is no man aliue whom I had rather haue promoted vnto the Empire, so that he would heare my precepts, and obey my councell. As for the conclusion he vsed in his former speech, it was altogether feigned, craftie, and malicious: for you haue heard how many reproches he hath giuen me in all that Speech wherewith his conclusion agreeth not; but the more to stirre vp the hearers thereof against mee, did of purpose so conclude his Speech.

Vpon this, most of the foresaid graue and learned Bishops agreed, that the young Emperor should no more be named in the prayers of the Church, vntill he had better conformed himselfe. Howbeit the Patriarch and some others secretly fauoring both him & his proceedings, liked not thereof, and therefore saying nothing therunto, returned home vnto their own houses. But meeting once or twice afterwards in the Patriarchs house, they there conspired together against the old Emperor; with whom also diuers of the nobilitie consented: and thereupon an oath was conceiued in writing, whereby they bound themselues to continue constant in that their wicked resolution. Whereupon, about three days after, the Patriarch causing the bels to be rung, and a great number of the common people flocking together, pronounced the sentence of excommunication against al such as should in their publike prayers omit the name of the yong Emperor, or refuse to do him all honour due vnto an Emperor. Which thing not a little grieued the old Emperor, as appeared by his speech, in saying, If the Doctor of peace be so mad against vs, in hope of reward promised by my nephew, that casting off all shame and grauitie, hee doubts not to be the author of sedition; who shall represse the rash attempts of the vulgar people against vs, if we respect but mans helpe? for the Patriarch so much as in him lieth is, I see, the murderer of vs.

So the Bishops of the contrary faction, moued with the notable impudencie of the Patriarch, excommunicated him likewise, as he had done them, with his mad followers, as the authors of sedition and faction, and incited with bribes to the troubling of the state: for which cause also he was by the Emperors commandment committed vnto safe keeping in the Monasterie called Manganium. But about two dayes after, the young Emperour came to the walls of Constantinople, to know how his grandfather had accepted the messengers sent vnto him; earnestly requesting, that it might be lawfull for him alone to enter into the city, to do his duty to his granbdfather. But neither hee, neither his words were any whit at all regarded, but was by such as stood vpon the wals himselfe with stones driuen away; who could not abide to heare him speake, but shamefully railed at him, saying all his talke to be nothing else but deceit and fraud: and so for that time he retyred a little from the wals. But night being come, certain busie heads among the common people (and they not a few) secretly meeting together gaue him knowledge, that about midnight, when as all the citizens were asleepe, and the watchmen in securitie, he should come vnto the walls, where they would be readie with ropes to draw him vp vnto the top of the bulwarks; which done, the matter (as they said) were as good as dispatched: for that they were persuaded, that the citizens so soone as they should once see him in the midst of the city amongst them, would forthwith all reuolt vnto him. So he according to this appointment, about midnight approching the wals, found there no such matter as he had well hoped, for the receiuing of him into the city; But contrariwise the watchmen carefully watching all alongst the wall, and calling one vnto another. Wherefore finding there no hope, he with Catacuzenus and Synadenus, his chiefe councellors, leauing the South side of the city, in a little boat rowed softly all along the wal that is toward the sea, if happily they might there finde their friends, and so be receiued in: but there the watchmen also descrying them from the walls, and calling vnto them, but receiuing no answere, began to cast stones at them, and to make a noyse: so that deceiued of their purpose, and out of hope, they were glad to get them further off, and to depart as they came.

Thessalonica yeelded vnto the yong Emperour.

But the euil successe of this exploit was shortly after with his better fortune recompenced: for by and by after, secret letters were sent vnto him from Thessalonica, requesting him with all speed to come thither, assuring him in the name of the Bishop, with diuers of the Nobilitie tie, and the good liking of the people in general, at his comming to open the gates of the city vnto him: wherupon he leauing a great part of his army with Synadenus, to keep short the Constantinopolitans, hee himselfe with the rest of his power set forward towards Thessalonica, where he in the habit of a plain country man entred the city vnsuspected: but being got within the gate, and there casting off that simple attire wherewith he had couered his rich & royal garments, and presently known to be the yong emperor, the people came flocking about him, and with many ioyfull acclamations receiued him as their Lord and Soueraigne: yet some few, more fauoring the old Emperour, fled into the castle, and there stood vpon their guard: which after they had for a space notably defended, was at length taken from them.

Thessalonica thus yeelded, Demetrius, Andronicus, and Asan Michael, the old Emperors chiefe captains, then lying with his armie not far off, and not well trusting one another, fled; most of whose soldiers presently went ouer vnto the yong Emperor: who departing from Thessalonica, came to Serre, which by composition was deliuered vnto him also, but not the castle: for that was by Basilicus Nicephorus (the captain thereof) still holden for the old Emperor. This Basilicus was a man honorably discended, but of no great capacity or wit, as the finer sort supposed, and therefore not of them much regarded, or thought fit for the taking in hand of any great matter: whom yet the old Emperor for his plain sinceritie, more than for any thing else, had made captain of that castle, and gouernor of the country thereabouts; which he yet still held, and in these most troublesome times shewed himselfe wiser than them all that had so thought of him: of whom some died in dispaire, some fled, some were taken prisoners, and so suffred a thousand euils; the rest with the losse of their honor, traiterously reuolting from the old Emperor to the yong: whereas he alone, looking but euen forward vpon his allegeance, with his trust in God, so long as the old Emperour liued opposed himselfe against these troubles, and stood fast for him, and was not to be moued with any faire promises or cruell threats of the yong aspiring Emperor, whereof he lacked none. But hauing strongly fortified the Castle committed to his charge, there kept himselfe, vntill that hearing of the death of the old emperor, he then reconciling himselfe to the young, as vnto his right Soueraigne, deliuered vp vnto him the castle: who in reward of his fidelitie, gaue it him again to hold for him, in as ample manner as he had before held it for his grandfather. For wise men honour vertue euen in their enemies, as did king Philip in Demosthenes, when as he said, If any Athenian liuing in Athens, doth say that he preferreth me before his countrey, him verily would I buy with much money, but not thinke him worthy my friendship: but if any for his countries sake shall hate mee, him will I impugne as a castle, a strong wall, or a bulwarke; and yet admire his vertue, and reckon the city happy in hauing such a man. And so in few words to conclude a long discourse, the yong Emperor in short time hauing romed thorow all Macedonia, and without resistance taken all the strong towns & cities therein, he there tooke also Demetrius the Despots wife and children, with all his treasure, as also the wiues of Andronicus & Asanes, and of al the Senators that followed them: after whom the great commanders their husbands were also for the most part taken & cast in prison, some at Thessalonica, some at Didimotichum, some of the rest afterward most miserably perishing in exile. Wherewith the old Emperor discouraged, was about to haue sent his Embassadors vnto his nephew for peace, whilest hee was yet thus busied in Macedonia: and had indeed so done, had not another hope arising in the meane time, quite altered that his better purpose. It fortuned at the same time, whilest the old Emperour was thus thinking of peace, that Michael the Bulgarian Prince, in hope of great profit thereof to arise, secretly offered his ayd vnto him against the yong emperor his nephew: of which his offer the old Emperour gladly accepted, and Embassadors were sent to and fro, about the full conclusion of the matter, no man beeing acquainted therewith, more than two or three of the Emperour his most secret friends and trustie Councellours. Yet in the meane time disdaining to be so coupt vp as he was, by Synadenus one of his Nephewes Captaines, euen in the Imperiall Citie; sent out one Constantinus Asan, with the greatest part of his strength against him: who encountering him at the Riuer Maurus, was there by him in plaine battell ouerthrowne and taken prisoner, the rest of his discomfited Armie flying headlong backe againe to Constantinople. All things thus prosperously proceeding with the young Emperour, and the Countreys of Macedonia and Thracia now almost all at his command, he returned in haste with all his Power vnto Constantinople, to preuent the comming of the Bulgarians thither: as fearing lest lest that they finding the city weakely manned, should treacherously kill the old Emperour, with such as were about him, and so seise vpon the citie themselues: or at least wise giue him such aid as might keep him out, and so cut off all his hope for obtaining of the same. At which time also there was great want of victuall in the city; he with his armie hauing shut it vpon the one side by land, and the Venetians with their galleys on the other side by sea: who then at odds with the Genowais dwelling at Pera, kept all that strait sea betwixt Europe and Asia, in such sort, as that neither victuals nor merchandise could be brought that way, either to Constantinople or Pera. The yong Emperor comming to Constantinople, attempted at his first coming to haue entred the city, in hope without any great resistance to haue been receiued; but repulsed by the defendants, was glad to get him further off. About this time came also vnto the citie three thousand horsemen, the appointed aid of the Bulgarian Prince, vnto the old Emperor: who although he wanted men, and was right glad of their comming, yet remembring the harms he had before receiued by forrein aid, and not now daring to trust them too far, suffered not them to come into the city, more than their General and some few others of their commanders with him. Now the yong Emperor vpon the comming of this aid, lest some great harme might betide either the old Emperor or himselfe, to the vtter subuersion of their state; secretly sent vnto his grandfather, requesting him to be well aduised how hee trusted those forrein people too far; offering himselfe to do whatsoeuer he should command, rather than so great a harme should happen vnto either of them, as was from them to be feared. But the trust the old Emperour had conceiued of this Bulgarian aid, had so confirmed his mind, as that he little listned vnto his nephews request: besides that, how could hee well trust him that had so oftentimes deceiued him? Wherewith the young Emperor much grieued, and now againe almost dispairing of his further successe, dislodged, and drew neere vnto the place where these Bulgarian horsemen lay encamped: from whence he sent certaine Embassadors with great gifts and Presents vnto the Generall, and the rest of the chiefe commanders: promising them far greater, if they would without further troubling themselues return home againe: whereunto they willingly granted, and so were of him honourably feasted, and the next day after conducted vpon their way homewards.

It fortuned, that the yong Emperor returning backe again from the Bulgarians, and incamped in the same place where he before lay; two of the watchmen of the city, the one called Camaris, & the other Castellanus, both smiths, fled secretly vnto him: who admitted to his presence, and all others commanded to depart, excepting Catacuzenus, offered to betray the Citie vnto him, so that he would vnder his hand writing assure them of such a summe of mony, and such possessions as they required: which he easily granting, and the houre & manner of performing of the same, being by them declared and agreed vpon, they by & by without longer stay, for feare of suspition, returned again into the city. But the Emperor staying foure days in the same place, caused certain ladders to made of great ropes, such as they vse in great ships: But the appointed night being come, the two traitors hauing before prouided great store of good wine, liberally gaue the same by way of curtesie vnto the watchmen their companions neere vnto them: who dranke so plentifully thereof, that not able any longer to hold vp their heads, they fel into so found a sleep, as that but for breathing they differed not much from dead men. About midnight came certain soldiers of the yong Emperors, with the foresaid ladders; which the traitors by and by drawing vnto them by a rope cast downe, and making them fast vnto the top of the wall, receiued by the same eighteene armed men: who being got into the city, without more ado brake open the Roman gate, whereby the yong Emperor with his Armie presently entred, no man letting him. But it is worth marking, how things appointed to befal vs, are by no means to be auoided, although we be thereof before neuer so plainly forewarned: For the same night the city was surprised, immediatly after the setting of the Sunne; the gates being shut, a certain country man came running in all hast from out of a village there by, and knocking hard at the gate called Girolimna, required to speake with some of the souldiers, who being come, he told them, how that a little before he had seen, a great number of the young Emperours men marching towards the citie, by the way that leadeth vnto the Roman gate: which being told vnto the old Emperor, did not a little trouble him. And therefore thought it good to send out certain scouts, to see if al were cleere along the wals toward the land, from sea to sea: which his purpose Metochita his chiefe Councellor letted, saying, it it not to beseeme a courtagious mind to be vpon so light an occasion so much moued; for that either the rumor was false, or the endeuors of so few vnne, the walls and gates of the citie being so filled with armed men: which happily he said not so much vpon ignorance of martiall affaires, as blinded by a certaine commanding power, that the supernall decree giuen by God himselfe against the old Emperor, might at length take place. And againe, the third part of that night yet scant past, diuers other countrymen came running vnto the said gate Gyrolimna, and told the watchmen vpon the walls, that a great number of men were met together at the Roman gate: whereof the Emperor hearing, was there with much more troubled than before; insomuch that sharply rebuking Metochita, he said vnto him, Thou seemst to be strangely metamorphosed into a man of yron, which are become so secure, as not to haue any feeling of the danger wherwith we are inclosed: Seest thou not that the matter requireth, not that we should thus sit still and take our rest. For the noise of my nephew sounderh in mine eares as the sound of a great drum, and disquieteth my minde. I feele a sea of calamitie broken out against mee, which ouerwhelmeth and drowneth my heart and courage. Neuertheles he, firme in his former opinion, made no reckoning of those reports: and therefore rose to go to bed, to shew indeed that he accounted nothing of them, but as false alarmes. But the Emperor left alone, and no bodie with him vnto whom he might breake his griefe, laid him downe vpon a pallet, not putting off his clothes; but as if he had together with them put on extreame desperation, lay tumbling too and fro as a man in mind troubled with diuers many and heauy thoughts. In the mean time he heard a great noise at the court gate, and the report of the entring of the young Emperor his nephew, with a great clattering of armour; for there were aboue eight hundred soldiers entred with him, and withal they of the city on euery side saluted him with most ioifull acclamations. But the old Emperour hearing the great tumult and outcrie, rose from his pallet, exceedingly troubled; and destitute of all the helpe of his captaines and souldiers, (for why, his palace was altogether desolate, except of such as were his ordinarie waiters) betooke himselfe vnto his praiers, beseeching God not to forsake him in so great a danger, but in his mercie to defend him from the fury of those wicked men. Who presently heard him, & sent him present reliefe: for whilst he was thus praying in the palace, the yong Emperor without, calling together all his captaines and lieutenants, straitly charged them vpon paine of death, neither by word nor deed to violate the maiestie of the old Emperor his grandfather, nor any other about him: for this victorie (said he) God hath giuen vs, and not we our selues; his will ordereth all things, whereunto all things obey; the stars, the aire, the sea, the earth, men, flouds, tempests, plagues, earthquakes, shoures, dearth, and such like, sometimes to our blisse, & sometime to our correction and destruction: wherefore vsing vs as the instruments of his chastisement, he hath giuen vnto vs this present victorie, which peraduenture tomorrow he will giue to others to vse against vs, and then as we haue been vnto them we haue ouercome, such will they also shew themselues vnto vs again: wherefore if neither nighnes of bloud, neither that we be all of one country, may moue vs, yet in respect of our selues let vs vse mercie, that wee feele not the hand of God vpon vs in like case. In the meane time a courtier opened a wicket vnto the young Emperour, with this message from his grandfather.

Forasmuch as God this day (my sonne) hath giuen vnto thee the imperiall scepter, taken from mee, I request of thee this one good turne; for many which I haue euen from my birth bestowed vpon thee, (for in this my hard estate I let passe, that I next vnto God haue beene the author of thy nativitie and increase) giue mee my life, spare thy fathers head, and with violent weapon spill not that bloud from which thou thy selfe hast taken the fountaine of life. Man truly beholdeth heauen and earth, and heauen and earth behold mens actions: wherefore make not the heauens and the earth beholders of so wicked an outrage as neuer man euer committed. If brothers bloud long agoe cryed out vnto the Lord against Cain, how much louder shall the fathers bloud crie vnto the Lord, and declare so great a wickednesse vnto the earth, the sunne, and starres, and make it abhorred of all the Princes of the world? Regard my miserable old age, which of it selfe promiseth vnto mee shortly death, but vnto thee a rest after long cares. Reuerence the hands which haue oftentimes most louingly embraced thee, yet crying in thy swathing clouts. Reuerence those lips which haue oftentimes most louingly kissed thee, and called thee my other soule: Haue pittie vpon a bruised reed, cast down by fortune, and doe not thou againe tread vpon it. And seeing thou art thy selfe a man, be not too proud of thy present fortune, but consider the vi-

A certaintie and varietie of worldly things, taking by me example: see in me the end of long life, and meditate, how one night hauing receiued me an Emperor of many yeares, leaueth me now subiect vnto another mans power for euer.

The yong Emperor Andronicus moued with this speech, and taking great care of his grandfathers safetie, scarce abstaining from teares, entred the palace, and comming to his grandfather, humbly saluted him, embraced him, and with chereefull words comforted him. Straitway after he went vnto the Monastery Manganium, where (as is aforesaid) the Patriarke Esaias was by the old emperors commandment kept in safe keeping; whom the yong emperor now tooke from thence, and carrying him away in one of the emperours richest chariots, restored him again vnto his Patriarchal dignitie; wherein he afterwards spared not to reuenge himself to the full, and most cruelly to persecute the old emperors friends. That day from morning vnto night, a man might haue seene all the riches and wealth of such noblemen as had taken part with the old emperor, carried away, and their goodly houses ouerthrown and made the scorn of the base common people: but especially the house & wealth of Theodorus Metochita, a man but the day before in greatest fauor with his Prince, and of all others next vnto the Emperour himself, of greatest authoritie and credit, whose whole wealth (not that only which was found in his house, but that also which he had laid vp in trust with his friends, discouered by Notes found in his studie) became most part a prey vnto the common people, & the rest confiscated vnto the Prince. Thus he which earst of all others next vnto the Emperor was accounted most fortunate, was now vpon the sudden, with his wife and children brought vnto extream beggerie; and after many yeares felicity, in one day cast into the bottome of despaire and miserie: where a man might haue heard many complaining, say, All that wealth and treasure to haue bin the bloud and teares of the poore oppressed subiects, brought vnto him by them whome he had made rulers and gouernors of the prouinces & cities of the empire; to the intent that when they had dealt cruelly with the people, as with their slaues, he might stop them for comming to complaine of their griefes vnto the emperour: and that the eye of the Reuenger had not always slept, but was now at length awaked, & had of him yet scarcely taken sufficient punishment: which euery where to heare, increased not a little his griefe. As for himselfe, he was confined vnto Didymotichum, as the place of his exile and banishment; where after he had a certain time poorely liued, he was sent for backe again to Constantinople: where hauing nothing left to relieue himselfe (for his house at the comming of the yong emperour, was in the furie of the people pluckt down to the ground, and the very pauement thereof digged vp) he went vnto the monasterie of Chora there by, which long before built by the Emperor Iustinian, and become ruinous, he in the time of his prosperitie had with great charge repaired, and therein now (hauing made shipwracke of all that he had) quietly shrouded himselfe, to the great comfort both of his bodie and afflicted mind, where he not long after died.

But to return again vnto the old Emperor, as yet in doubt what should become of himself: it fortuned that the same day that the city was taken, the yong emperor at night returning to the palace, by the way met with Niphon sometime Patriarch, who asked him how they meant to deale with his grandfather. Wherunto the yong emperour answering, That he would deale with him honorably and emperor like; he was by him therefore blamed and reproued. For this Niphon being of a craftie subtill wit and malicious nature, besides that hee secretly hated all them vpon whom fortune greatly either fauned or frowned, bare an especial grudge against the old Emperor: First, for that at such time as he was right worthily for his shamefull couetousnesse & extortion, by the rest of the Bishops and clergy thrust out of the Patriarkship, hee was not by him (as he looked for) defended: & secondly, for that dreaming again after the Patriarchal dignity, he thought it one good step thereunto, to haue him (as his greatest enemy) taken out of the way. Wherefore he said now vnto the young Emperour, If thou desire to raigne without feare, giue not thyne honor vnto another; but taking all the ornaments of the Empire from the old man, cast haire-cloath vpon him, and so clap him fast in prison, or thrust him out into exile. This mischieuous councel this wicked man gaue against the poore old distressed Emperour, not remembring how vnworthily he had by him been before preferred vnto the highest degrees both of honour and wealth, if he could there haue kept himselfe: vnto which vngracious councell, diuers others of the nobilitie also consenting, so wrought the matter amongst them, that although they could not quite draw the yong Emperors mind from his grandfather, yet they much changed the same, so that he could no longer indure to take him for his companion in the empire. Whereupon after many meetings and consultations had, it was decreed, That the old man should still retaine the name and ornaments of an Emperour, as before, but not to meddle in any matters, nor to come abroad, but to sit still quietly in his Chamber, with the yerely maintenance of 10000 duckats, for the maintenance of himself e and such as tended vpon him; to be raised of the fishing before the city of Constantinople: a poore pension for the maintenance of so great an Emperor. Of which so shameful a decree, Esaias the Patriarke was also a furtherer: who seeing an Emperor that had raigned so long, cast downe, and shut vp as it were in prison, was so far from grieuing thereat, that foolishly reioycing, hee in token thereof absurdly wrested this Text of Scripture, saying in his merriment, Lætabitur justus, cum viderit vltionem; The just shall reioyce when he seeth the reuenge: calling himself, Iust, and the emperor, Reuenge. But the old Emperor thus shut vp in his chamber (differing in nothing but in name, from a prison) not long after, the state of his bodie ouerthrown with griefe and corrupt humors distilling out of his head, first lost one of his eyes, and shortly after the other also: and so oppressed with eternall darknes, mingled (as saith the Scripture) his drinke with teares, and ate the the bread of sorrow, being oftentimes (to his great griefe) most bitterly mocked and derided, not of them only which were by his enemies set to gard him, but of his own seruants also. Not long after, the young Emperour falling sicke, in such sort as that it was thought hee would not recouer, Catacuzenus, and the rest of his greatest fauorits and followers carefull of their own estate, and yet doubtful of the old blind Emperor, deuised many things against him, but all tending to one purpose, for the shortning of his days. But in the end all other deuices set apart, they put him to his choice, either to put on the habit of a religious, and so for euer to bid the world farewell, or else to take what should otherwise ensue; the best whereof was either death, exile, or perpetuall imprisonment in the loathsome castle of forgetfulnesse: For the putting whereof in execution, Synadenus (of all others to him most hatefull) was appointed. At which hard choice, the old Emperour as with a world of woes suddenly oppressed, lay a great while vpon his bed as a man speechlesse: for what could he do else, except he had an heart of steele or adamant? beeing then compassed about with many barbarous and mercilesse soldiers, and his domesticall seruants kept from him, and no man left that would vouchsafe to direct him (being blind) whither to go, or where to stand. But to make the matter short, would he, would he not, they made choice for him themselues, polling and shauing him, and casting a Monks habit vpon him, changed his name, after the name of the religious, and called him by the name of Anthonie the Monke. Glad was Esaias the false Patriarch, of this the hard estate of the old Emperor: for that now that he was professed a religious, there was left no hope for him to recouer againe the empire, either cause for himselfe to feare. Yet he thought it good to be aduised, in what sort remembrance should be made of him in the church prayers, if any were at all from thenceforth to be made. Whereof to be by the old Emperor himselfe resolued, hee (seeming to be very sorie for that which was done, but purposing indeed therein to deride him) sent vnto him two Bishops, to know what his pleasure was to haue done therein. Vnto which their demand, he oppressed with heauinesse, and fetching a deepe sigh euen from the bottome of his heart, answered:

The old Emperor becommeth blinde.

Andronicus the old Emperor against his will made a Monke, and called Anthonie.

The notable answer of the old Emperor, to the catching question of the proud Patriarch.

As in poore Lazarus appeared a double miracle, that being dead, he rose; and being bound, walked: euen so was it to be done in me, though in quite contrary manner: for lo, being aliue, I am dead, as ouerwhelmed with the waues of calamity and woe; and being loose, I am bound, not my hands and feet only, but my tongue also; wherewith vnable to doe any thing else, I might yet at least bewaile my woes and wrongs vnto the aire, and such as by chance should heare me, and vnto this most wofull darknes wherein I must for euer sit. But shame hath closed my mouth, my brethren abhor me, and my mothers sons account me for a stranger vnto them, and the very light of myne eys is not with him, my friends & neighbors stood vp against me, and all that saw me, laughed me to scorne: my feet had almost slipped, and my footsteps were almost ouerthrown: for I fretted against the wicked, when I saw the peace of the vngodly. The Emperors long ago gaue great priuiledges vnto the Church, euen those which it at this day inioyeth: and the Church gaue to them again power, to chuse whom they would to be Patriarks. Now concerning him that sent you, I not only nominated him vnto the Patriarkeship, but I my selfe made choice of him, and

and preferred him before many other right worthy and most famous men, being himselfe a man growne old in a more priuat life, neuer before preferred, or for any other thing famous: I will not say how often I haue holpen him and done him good. But now when he should againe haue relieued me in my calamity, he ioyneth hands with mine enemies against me, more cruel vpon me than any other bloudie handed executioner; not ashamed to aske me how I would be remembred in the Church: faigning himselfe to be ignorant and sorrie for mine estate, much like vnto the Ægyptian crocodile of Nile, which hauing killed some liuing beast, lieth vpon the dead bodie and washeth the head thereof with her warme teares, which she afterwards deuoureth together with the bodie. But what I answere him vnto this his catching question, I know not: for if I shall say, As an Emperour, I shall forthwith be slaine by them which for that purpose haue me in hold: but if I say, As Anthonie the Monke, it shall be taken as the franke confession of mine estate, by them which haue craftily contriued mine ouerthrow; as if I had not by compulsion, but euen of mine owne free will put on this monasticall habit, which God knoweth was neuer in my thought.

Hauing thus said, he sent them away without any other answer vnto their demand: but sitting downe vpon his bed side, said, My soule return againe into thy rest, for the Lord hath dealt wel with thee: neither spoke any one word more in declaration of his griefe, his tongue there staid by his singular wisedome, or else with the greatnes of his griefe; & so against his wil in silence passing ouer his sorrow, his mind with the greatnes of his woes ouercome, and as it were astonished, before the humors gathered into the brain could be dissolued into tears: for as the Sun sending forth his moderat beames, draweth vnto it many exhalations and vapours, but casting the same forth more plentifully, doth with his immoderat heat consume the same before they can be drawne vp, so the moderat affections of the mind may haue their griefes by words and teares expressed; but such as exceed all measure, & with their vehemency as it were ouerthrow the mind, commonly make men to stand still mute and silent, or if they speake at all to speake idly, & nothing to the purpose, as men beside themselues, or in an extasie: but for the resolution of the question by the Bishops demaunded, the deuout Patriarch decreed, That in the church-praiers he should be remembred before the Emperor his nephew, by the name of the most religious & zealous Monke Anthonie: which was done (God wot) for no good zeale to the poore blind man, but the better to colour the matter with the common people, as if hee weary of the world, had voluntarily taken vpon him that silly profession. Neuertheles, within foure daies after, Synadenus, vnderstanding them in euery place to whisper among themselues, & secretly to mutter against the hard dealing with the old Emperour, who had long raigned ouer them, & so by right was again to do, if his nephew should chance to die, and that the Ecclesiasticall laws enforced no man against his wil to enter into religious orders; he therewith enraged, sent to him certain of his own confederacy, to exact of him an oath in writing, That he should neuer more after that time, seek after the empire, or yet accept of the same if it were offred him, neither to substitute any other: which if he refused to do, to put him in feare of his life: and the more to terrifie him, set a guard of insolent barbarous soldiers ouer him; for feare of whom, he yeelded to do whatsoeuer they required; and so his oath being solemnly conceiued into writing) another man leading his hand, because he was blind) he signed the same with a red crosse aboue, & a blacke crosse beneath, after the maner of the religious. Hauing thus liued in darknes disgraced, shut vp in his chamber as a man forsaken of the world, with an vnsure guard euer to attend him, by the space of two yeares, it fortuned that the 12. of February towards night (a day in the Greek church dedicated to the vigill of S. Anthony, whose name they had geuin him certain of his friends that were suffred to haue accesse vnto him, going as their manner was, once in three or foure days to visit him (among whom was his daughter, somtime the Prince of Seruia his wife, but as then a widow, & Nicephorus Gregoras, author of this History) he entred with them, as with his friends, into a familiar discourse of many matters, wherin he so deceiued the time, that it was past midnight before they perceiud how the time past. But the cocks crowing, he brake of the talke, & bidding them farewel, gaue them leaue to depart, pleasantly saying, that tomorrow they would make an end of their discourse; who all thereupon took their leaue and departed, no signe of any sicknes as then appearing vpon him: and after they were gon, called for meat & did eat: the meat he eat, was certain shel-fish, for it was with them a fasting day, & he had not eat any thing after which, when as he should haue drunk a cup o fwine, for the comforting of his old stomack, & digesting of that so hard meat, hee he drunke could water, as his manner was, when he felt any inward heat, to drink the same im- G moderatly: which hurtfull manner of diet he then vsing also, began by and by to feele a great paine in his stomack, and so presently after became very sicke, falling withall into a great loos-nesse of bodie, so that in the space of one quarter of an houre he was glad oftentimes to arise, and to goe vnto an homely house of office in an inner chamber thereby to discharge natures burden; where after many euacations, sitting downe vpon an homely bed fast by, and not able to recouer his owne bed, hauing as then none to helpe him, there before it was day, died, after he had raigned 43 yeares. His death was by many strange signes and accidents as it were foretold: first a great eclipse of the Sunne appeared, iust so many daies before his death as he had liued yeares: and after that, another eclipse of the Moone; and with it an earthquake, the day before he died at night, being S. Anthonie his euen, whose name his enemies had thrust vpon H him: at which time also, the sea with a great tempest rising aboue the wonted bounds, made diuers breaches in the wals of the citie towards the sea, as if it had been some violent enemie, and ouerflowed also diuers houses in the citie. Many crosses and pinacles were then also from the tops of churches and other high buildings ouerthrown; and with them a great pillar, som-time one of the ornaments of the city, standing before the church, commonly called the church of the fortie martyrs; which being very high, and below burnt and worne away with time, had put many in feare as they passed by it, least it should haue fallen vpon them; insomuch that the Emperor vpon a time passing that way, was requested by some of the nobilitie there present, to ride farther off from it, for feare of falling vpon him: who smiling at their vaine feare, by chance answered, ô would to God I might liue so long as this pillar will stand: which now falling I out according to his speech gaue many of them that had heard him so say, occasion to maruel.

His dead bodie was honorably buried in the monasterie of Libe, which his mother Theodora the Empresse had not long before new built, and his obsequies there (after the manner of that time) yearely solemnly kept by the space of nine dayes.

The Turks king-dome founded by Othoman in Asia, at such time as the Greeke Empe-rors were at variance be-twixt them-selues in Eu-rope.

Thus at length hauing passed through the troubled state of the Greeke empire, during the long raigne of the old Emperor Andronicus, the considerat Reader may easily see the causes of the declining and ruine also of this famous empire; and how that the Greeke Emperors, troubled with their tempestuous affaires neerer home in Europe, yea in the very imperiall citie it selfe, and in their owne palaces, were not at leasure to looke ouer the strait into Asia, but glad to leaue their territories there vnto the weak defence of themselues. At which time, and euen K in the middest of the aforesaid trouble, Othoman on the one side, with great industrie laid the foundation of his Empire in Phrygia and Bythinia, now the greatest terror of the world: and then did those things which we now haue of him written. The other Princes of the Turks also, the successours of Sultan Aladin, at the same time on the other side, alongst the Riuer Meander encroaching on as fast: vntill that at last amongst them they had thrust the Greeke Emperours quite out of Asia, and in fine became themselues, together with the Greeke empire, a prey vnto the Othoman Kings, as in the processe of this Historie shall more at large appeare.

Prusa yeelded vnto the Turkes.

But againe to returne vnto Othoman himselfe, who all this while (that old Andronicus the Greeke Emperor was thus troubled) had with his sonne Orchanes sought by all means on euc- L ry side to inlarge his kingdome: the garrisons by him left in the two late built castles neere vnto the great citie of Prusa, vnder the charge of the two valiant captains Acthemur and Balabanzuck (as is before declared) hauing now continued there certaine yeres, had by shutting vp the passages, and spoiling of the countrie, brought the city into such distresse and penurie, that many of the citizens and other the poore Christians fled into the citie, there died of famine. The rest now out of all hope to be relieued by the Greeke Emperour, not then able to relieue himselfe, came to composition with Orchanes (for Othoman was then sicke of his old disease the gout) couenanting with him, that they might in safetie with life and libertie depart, and so much of their goods as they themselues could carrie: and so yeelded to him the citie. Which conditions (as most write) were on the Turks behalfe well and faithfully performed: yet some M there be that report them to haue bin in most part by Orchanes broken. Thus was Prusa, one of the greatest cities of that part of Asia, yeelded vnto the Turks, in the yere of our Lord 1327: and was afterwards by Orchanes made the royall seat of the Othoman Kings.

About this time, or very shortly after, Othoman in the eight & twentieth yere of his raigne dyed,

A died, at the age of 69, in the yeare of our Lord 1328, and lyeth buried at Prusa, where his The death of Othoman.
tombe is yet at this day to bee seene, in a certaine chappell of an old monasterie in the castle, Othoman buri-ed at Prusa.
standing in the midst of the citie; couered with a mantle of greene chamlet, and a little Tuli-pant or Turkish hat (such as he vsed to wear) lying ouer his head, differing from those which he Turkes now weare, especially the better sort of them, so great that they can therewith scarcely come in at a door. There is also another monument of him to be seene at Suguta, fast by the Sepulchre of his father Ertogrul; there made by his sonnes in remembrance of him; whereof some haue reported him to haue bin there buried. Howbeit the Turks themselues generally suppose the true monument wherein he is interred, to be at Prusa, as is aforesaid. He was wise, politicke, valiant, and fortunat, but full of dissimulation, and ambitious aboue measure; not rash in his attempts, and yet very resolute; what hee tooke in hand, he commonly brought to good effect: to all men he was bountifull and liberall, but especially to his men of war, and the poore, whom he would many times feed and cloth with his owne hands. Of a poore lordship he left a great kingdome, hauing subdued a great part of the lesser Asia: and is worthily accounted the first founder of the Turks great kingdome and empire. Of him, the Turkish Kings and Emperors euer since haue beene called the Othoman Kings and Emperors, as lineally of him descended: and the Turks themselues Osmanidæ, as the people or subiects of Othoman, or Osman, for so he is of the Turks commonly called.

NOte, that in the reckoning vp of certaine of the great Christian Princes and Prelates of the same time, at the end of euery the Turkish Kings and Emperours liues, the first and greatest number following their names, sheweth the yeare of our Lord, wherein such an Emperour, King, or Bishop began to raigne, or sit: and the number following, how long hee raigned or sate: as for example, Andronicus the elder began to raigne in the East, in the yeare of grace 1282, and raigned 43 yeares: and so of the rest. Wherein wee seeke not the exact computation vnto a moneth or day (as not much materiall to our Historie, or any part of our purpose) but onely the reasonable view of the great Princes of the forepassed times, as they liued in ages together.

His father dead, Orchanes takes his scepter vp in hand;
As one of deeper wit and reach his foes for to withstand.
The Phrygians and Bythinians he by force of armes brought low; Proud Prusa, with faire Nicomede, and many cities moe.
And glad in Asia to haue made such hauocke and such spoyle;
His forces into Europe sends, the Grecians there to foyle.
Who meane while laughing at their losse, did make thereof a game;
Not thinking what a world of woe was to ensue the same.

THE LIFE OF ORCHANES, OR VRCHAN, SECOND KING OF THE TVRKES.

AFTER the death of Othoman, his two sonnes, Orchanes (whom the Turks call Vrchan) and Aladin his brother, hauing with great solemnitie enterred their father at Prusa, immediatly summoned a Parliament, whereunto both the brethren came accompanied with the chiefe of their nobilitie. This Parliament was called especially, for the establishing of the succession in this new Kingdome, and for the diuision of Othomans treasure and goods, betwixt them two, his sonnes. But vpon view taken, there was no money, plate, or iewels found in the Kings coffers, for that he had in his life time most bountifully bestowed it vpon his men of warre: so that all the wealth he left vnto them his sonnes, was, the honourable remembrance of his life for them to imitate, large dominions for their possessions, store of ready horses and armour fit for seruice; with great heards of beasts and cattel for houshold prouision. Whereupon Orchanes demanded of his brother Aladin, what order he thought was best to be taken with those things by their father so left? To whom Aladin answered, That it was most requisit, first to establish a King in their fathers kingdome; which like a good sheepheard might gouerne and defend his subiects, rule and maintaine his men of warre, prouiding all things meet for defence of his kingdome: And that vnto him of right belonged all these other things by their father left, as the patrimonie of his successour, for the common good and maintenance of his estate. As for mine owne part (said Aladin) I claime no interest therein, you being my elder brother, and so vnto me in stead of a father: by whom also you haue bin these two yeares, as it were alreadie put in possession of the kingdome, all things being committed to your gouernment, during the time of his late sickenesse. This modesty of Aladin was greatly commended of all the antient counsellors; by meanes whereof, the kingdome in all peaceable manner descended to Orchanes. In regard of which courtesie, Orchanes would gladly haue made Aladin his brother President of his counsell: which honor he would in no wise accept, but requested rather that hee would giue him the lordship of Fodore in Tekences countrey; which Orchanes frankly granted. In which lordship of Fodore, Aladin most part liued a priuate and quiet life, and afterwards built two Mahometan churches, and an Abbey at Prusa, there yet at this day to be seene.

The two eldest sonnes that Othoman left vnto his two sons, Orchanes and Aladine

Some Latine Historiographers otherwise report this beginning of Orchanes his raigne; as that Othoman should haue three sonnes, and that Orchanes the yongest obtained the kingdome by murthering of his other brethren. A practise of late much vsed amongst the Turkish Princes, but not before the time of Baiazet the first of that name, who first of the Turkish Monarchs embrued his hands with his brothers bloud: where before, they vsed all brotherly loue one to another, as the most probable histories collected out of the Turks owne Chronicles affirme.

When that barbarous manner of murthering their brethren first began among the Turkish Sultans.

The

The citie of Nice with diuers other castles recouered from the Turks after the death of Othoman.

The Christian Princes and captains, presently vpon the death of Othoman recouered the citie of Nice, with diuers other castles and forts, out of the hands of the Turks: as it commonly chanceth, that dominions lately woon with great perill, are soone againe lost, the conqueror dying before there be a firme gouernment established. Amongst other forts by the Christians repossessed, the castle of Tzuprichiser, scituate vpon the passages of the riuer Sangarius, most grieued the Turks, for thereby their passage into that part of Bythinia was much impeached. Wherefore Orchanes desirous to recouer this castle, disguised himselfe with a few other of his best souldiers, in the apparell of Christian marchants, and came to the castle, craūing leaue to passe as marchants: the warders of the castle verily supposing them by their attire to be marchants, opened the gates, and let them into the castle: who presently drew their swords, slew the warders, and so by force possessed the castle, to the great benefit of the Turks, and the hurt of the poore Christians yet left in the countrey of Bythinia. For they now hauing opened a way ouer the riuer Sangarius, and as it were broken down the strongest defence of that side of the Greek empire, at their pleasure forraged the countrey in such sort, as that the great city of Nice (for want of victuals to relieue so great a multitude as for feare of the Turks was fled out of the country into it) was brought to great extremitie and want. For the relieue whereof, and for the repulsing againe of the Turks, Andronicus the young Emperor, who then all commanded, with such an armb as he was then able to raise, passed himselfe in person ouer the strait of Constantinople, into Asia: the greatest strength of his army consisting in two thousand choice horsemen; the rest as well horse as foot, being for the most part artificers taken vp in the city, men altogether vnacquainted with armes (who in token of their cowardise, and that they were more mindful of flight than of fight, carried ouer with them almost as many long boats and such other small vessels, as they were men, to be readie to receiue them at such time as they should flie) or else abiect rascals, taken vp here and there, men of whom no great thing was to be expected, & of all others most vnfit for so great a prince (as was the Emperour) to commit the defence of his person and honor vnto. But Orchanes hearing of his comming, sent certain of his most expert captaines, to forelay the strait passages of the country whereby the Emperor was to passe; following also himselfe after with his army, of purpose to encounter the Emperor. Who in thre daies march after his landing in Asia, being come to Philochrene, a little towne in Bythinia, and vnderstanding that Orchanes hauing before taken the straits, lay not far off encamped with his army; he there at Philochrene pitched his tents, and staied that night also. But the next morning, the Sun as yet scarcely risen, he seeing diuers companies of the Turks comming down from the mountains fast by, put his armie into order of battell, and so set forward to meet them: where to begin the fight, the Turks archers freely bestowd their piercing shot amongst the Christians, still keeping themselues aloofe off, so to doe the more harm. Which the Emperor mistaking, and supposing that their keeping off to haue proceeded of feare, encouraged therwith, commanded certain loose companies disorderly to march forward, & to skirmish with them: which his more expert captains not liking, would haue otherwise persuaded him, as to haue kept his strength together against the danger of the battel. Neuertheles, such was his youthfull heat, as that he could by no means be otherwise intreated, but that forward needs they must. But al the forenoon spent in this light and tumultuarie kind of skirmishing, and the Sun at the highest now shining very hot, Orchanes from the top of the mountains perceiuing the Christians wel wearied with the heat of the day and long skirmishing, came down from the hils with a world of men following him; who with a most hideous cry, charged the Christians on euery side, some a far off with their arrowes, and some hand to hand with their swords & other weapons: whose assault the Christians at the first most valiantly receiued, and a great while right worthily defended themselues, hauing wounded and slain a number of their enemies. Which hard fight was on both sides couragiously maintained, vntil the approching of the night, with great slaughter on both sides: at which time, the Christians weary of the long fight, & oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, disorderly retiring toward their trenches, & hardly pursued by the Turks, receiued there a great losse, as wel of their horsmen, as of their foot: but by the comming on of the night, the battel was at length ended with vncertain victory. Among others there hurt, the Emperor himselfe was wounded in the foot with an arrow. That night hapned a wofull mishap, and a manifest token of God his wrath: for Orchanes hauing to his cost made proofe of the strength and valor of the Christians,

The Emperour wounded.

A stians, & doubting they would the next day come on further into the country, left three hundred horsemen as scouts, to attend the enemies remouing: and himselfe with his army retired before hand to take aduantage of such places as the Christians were to passe by. But the Emperor in the euening leauing his campe, and going to Philocrene, a little town fast by, the better to haue his wound dressed; the rest of the armie vnderstanding of his departure, and supposing him to haue fled for feare (as if Orchanes with a great armie would that night haue slain them all) fled themselues also out of the campe, euery mothers son; some to their long boats and other little vessels they had for that purpose brought ouer the strait; some hasting toward the town gates, were by the multitude of others running headlong after them, ouerborne and trodden to death; other some hanging one at anothers taile, like a chain, got some part of them
B vp to the top of the rampiers of the towne; other some drawne backe by them that hung vpon them, falling down together by heaps, and trod vpon by others, there perished; some (as is reported) died there for verie feare, no man either chasing or hurting them, so weake is mans courage, when God withdraweth from him his strength. But in the morning the Sun arising, the three hundred Turks left for scouts, perceiuing the flight of the Christians, entred the forsaken campe, where they found horses, armor, and emptie tents, yea the Emperours owne furniture, and his horses ready sadled: of all which, two hundred of these Turks tooke the spoile at their pleasure, and the other hundred pursuing the dispersed Christians, like heartlesse men wandring here and there, slew a great number of them. The Emperor himself seeing his armie thus (as it were by the hand of God) ouerthrown and dispersed, tooke shipping also, and so re-C turned to Constantinople. After whose departure, the Turkes seising vpon many sea townes alongst the coast of Bythinia, & there seating themselues, layd heauy tributes vpon the other country townes and villages; for the benefit whereof they spared to destroy them, together with the inhabitants, which they might at their pleasure full easily haue done.

Now lay the great city of Nice in the suds, the enemie commanding all the country about it, liuing as sicke men doe by hope, and holding out onely vpon hope of a thousand horsemen which the Emperour (notwithstanding his late discomfiture) had promised forthwith to send, there to lie in garrison for the suppressing of the Turks. Of which aid so promised Orchanes vnderstanding, furnished eight hundred of his horsemen after the manner of the Christians; & fetching a great compasse about, came at length into the high way that leadeth from Con-D stantinople to Nice, and so trouped directly towards the city, as if they had come from Constantinople. At the same time he sent 300 of his other horsemen in the habit of Turks, to forrage and spoyle the country as much as they could within the view of the city, now for want of victuals brought into great extremitie; which whilest they were a doing, the other eight hundred horsemen in the attire of Christians, following vpon them, as if it had bin by chance, charged them, and in the sight of the citisens put them to flight: which done, these counterfeit horsemen returned directly again towards Nice. The citisens, which with great pleasure had in the mean time from the wals seen the most part of the skirmish, and how they had put the Turks to flight, supposing them to be the Constantinopolitan horsemen, whom they dayly expected, with great ioy opened the gates of the city to receiue them as their friends. But The citie of Nice surprised by the Turks.
E they being entred the gates, presently set vpon the Christians, fearing no such matter: & being seconded with the other three hundred, which in dissembling manner had fled before, & were now speedily returned, bringing also with them other companies of Turkes, before laid in secret ambush not far off, they woon the great and famous city of Nice, which they haue euer since vntill this day possessed: the spoyle whereof was giuen vnto the souldiers for a prey, and the citisens all lead away into miserable captiuitie & thraldome. Whilest Orchanes was thus busied, his other captains did with great courage & successe inlarge his dominions on al sides, dayly incroching vpon their weake neighbors the Christians. Cunger-Alpes one of his valiant captains, subdued the country of Mudurn, or Modrin, in Phrygia; and Bolli in Paphlagonia: appointing one Abdurachman a man of great valour, to gouerne the country. And at the same F time another of his old captaines called Accecozza, brought Candara in Paphlagonia, and Ermeni, a country neere vnto the mountain Horminius, into the Turkish subiection; placing garrisons in all the Castles and forts which he had woon, of whom some part of those Countries was after his name called Cozza Ilini, that is to say, The old mans country. So that Orchanes his kingdom grew dayly greater & greater, as wel by the industry of his chieftains, as of himself.

About this time it fortuned, the captains ſonne of Scamandria (a town not far from the ruines of the antient city of Troy, & about a days journy from the renowned caſtle of Abydus) to depart out of this world: vnto whoſe funerals, being kept in the country, whileſt his woful father the captaine with his friends out of Scamandria reſorted, the old craftie Turke Accecozza lying always in wait, as a fox for his prey, ſuddenly ſet vpon thoſe heauie Chriſtians, whereof he ſlew the moſt part, and tooke the reſt priſoners. Amongſt whom he alſo tooke the Captain of Scamandria, with his caſtle and countrey: whom he afterwards led priſoner vnto the caſtle of Abydus, which is one of the moſt famous caſtles ſcituate vpon the ſea coaſt of Aſia, ouer againſt Seſtus in Europe; where the ſea of Helleſpontus by the narrow ſtrait falleth into the ſea of Ægeum: two caſtles much renowned by reaſon of their nigh ſcituation, and yet placed in diuers parts of the world; eterniſed alſo by the euer liuing wits of Poets, for the aduenturous paſſage of Leander ouer that fret of the ſea, to his loue Hero: which caſtles are now called Dardanelly. Accecozza hauing brought the captiue captaine of Scamandria (lately a man of great account in that country) ſo neere as he could vnto the caſtle of Abydus, offred to ſet him at libertie if they would ſurrender their Caſtle, otherwiſe they ſhould ſee him cruelly ſlain before their faces. Theſe Turkiſh threats nothing moued them of Abydus, more than to ſay, That they might if they would cut off his head, ſeeth him and eat him, but the caſtle they intended not to deliuer. The ſame captaine was afterward by the commandment of Orchanes profered to the Emperor of Conſtantinople to be redeemed, which he refuſed: yet at the laſt he was ranſomed by the gouernor of Nicomedia, and againe ſet at liberty. Accecozza of long time held the caſtle of Scamandria; yet ſo continually moleſted with the gariſon of Abydus, and men of war ſent from Conſtantinople, that he with his followers were glad for the moſt part to liue on horſebacke, to be always in more readines againſt the attempt of their enemies. The captain of the caſtle of Abydus had at that time a faire yong gentlewoman to his daughter, who (as ſhe ſaid) chanced to dream (what ſhe had happily waking for the moſt part wiſhed) That being fallen into a deep myrie ditch, out of which ſhe could by no means help her ſelfe, a luſtie yong gallant comming by, did not only help her out, but alſo in friendly manner made her cleane, and afterwards apparelled her in rich and coſtly attyre. The danger of this dreame much troubled the tender gentlewoman, but the image of the young gentleman was ſo well phantaſied in her brain, that waking, ſhe thought ſhe ſtill ſaw him, and ſleeping longed ſore for what ſhe ſaw not. Thus whileſt this yong gentlewoman with great deuotion entertained this imaginarie man, the old gray headed Turke Accecozza came, and with a ſtrong companie beſieged her fathers caſtle of Abydus. During which ſiege, this gentlewoman oftentimes went vp into the high turret of the caſtle, from whence ſhe might at pleaſure ſee the martiall deeds on both ſides, and take full view of all the enemies campe. But ſee the chance, as Abdurachman with great courage & no leſſe brauerie, approched neere to the ſiege of the caſtle, ſhe thought (vpon the firſt ſight of him) that he was the verie man whom ſhe had before dreamed of, and whoſe Idea was in her heart ſo deepely imprinted: wherefore ſhe fully reſolued to performe what ſhe had without witneſſe with her ſelfe determined. And waiting another time when Abdurachman approched the caſtle, ſhe caſt downe to his feet a letter written in Greeke, and made faſt vnto a ſtone: which letter he taking vp, deliuered the ſame to the general Accecozza. Wherein after ſhe had diſcouered her paſſionate affection, ſhee promiſed to deliuer the caſtle into Abdurachmans power, if the Turkes would raiſe their ſiege, and Abdurachman himſelfe with ſome few would ſecretly returne to the caſtle in the dead time of the night, and then follow her direction. Accecozza like an old foxe, which is ſeldome taken in the trap, gaue ſmall credit to theſe louing lines, for feare of treaſon; yet for ſo much as you are the man (ſaid hee to Abdurachman) whom ſhe vpon ſpeciall liking hath made choice of for the purpoſe, wil you aduenture your perſon? And he armed with a manly courage, a ſurer defence than any armor of proofe, incited alſo with hope of honour, riches, and beautie, all worthie prizes for martiall minds; ſaid he would vndertake the atchieuement of that exployt, if it were his pleaſure ſo. Whereupon Accecozza, becauſe nothing ſhould be ſuſpected by his ſudden departure, gaue a ſharpe aſſault to the caſtle, as if hee would haue taken it by fine force, yet in the end retyred, and preſently brake vp his ſiege, as deſpairing of the winning thereof. The Defendants of the Caſtle thinking themſelues deliuered of a great danger, greatly reioyced: and as in the like caſe it oftentimes falleth out, in their great jolitie ſurcharged themſelues that night with exceſſe

exceſſe both of meat and drink. But Abdurachman at the time in the letter appointed, put himſelfe vpon the way with certaine ſelect ſouldiers, and about midnight came to the appointed place of the caſtle, where the yong gentlewoman was attending his comming: and hee by her means was conueyed into the caſtle, and ſo by her directed to the porters lodge; where hee ſlew the porter being faſt aſleepe, and opening the gates, let in his followers; which went directly to the captains lodging, and there took him priſoner, being before their comming ouertaken with wine, and faſt aſleepe. Thus was the caſtle of Abydus ſurpriſed by the Turks, from whence they had a faire proſpect out of Aſia into Europe. The captaine with his faire daughter, and the greateſt part of the rich ſpoyle of the caſtle, was deliuered to Abdurachman, to be preſented to Orchanes at his court, then lying at Neapolis. Who wonderfull glad of ſo good news, gaue the faire gentlewoman, with the greateſt part of the prey to Abdurachman. The poſteritie of this man (as they ſay) yet remaine among the Turkes. Amongſt others of the warlike captaines there was alſo one Cararachman, whoſe name was ſo dreadfull to them of Conſtantinople, that when their children cried, they would terrifie them to make them hold their peace, by ſaying, Cararachman comes. Not long after, the two valiant aforenamed worthy captains, Cunger-Alpes and Accecozza died. After whoſe death, Orchanes made his ſons, Solyman & Amurath, lords and gouernors of thoſe countries and prouinces. And intending (by the perſuaſion of Abdurachman) to beſiege Nicomedia, he leuied a great armie, wherewith he tooke diuers ſmall caſtles and forts as he marched towards the citie. Nicomedia was at that time gouerned by an honorable ladie, kinſwoman vnto Andronicus the Emperor of Conſtantinople: but ſhe ſeeing her citie beſieged by the Turks, and doubting her own forces not to be able to hold out the ſiege, by a truſtie meſſenger offered to yeeld the city vnto Orchanes, vpon condition, That ſhe with ſo many citizens as would, might in ſafetie depart with their liues, liberty, and goods: which being granted, ſhe with ſo many as would follow her, departed out of the citie by night, taking ſhipping for Conſtantinople.

Nicomedia yeelded vnto Orchanes.

Orchanes hauing taken Nicomedia, made his ſon Solyman gouernor of the ſame. The churches of the Chriſtians he conuerted vnto Turkiſh Meſchitas or temples. The greateſt church (being of wonderfull beauty) he conuerted into a colledge or ſchoole, for the learned profeſſors and ſtudents of Mahomets law, which is yet called in Nicomedia, Orchanes his ſchoole or colledge. And becauſe the Countrey neere vnto Nicomedia, lying vpon the ſea, was euer in danger to be ſpoyled by the gallies of Conſtantinople, he placed in thoſe countries diuers of his moſt experienced ſoldiers to defend the ſame, appointing to euery of them poſſeſſions & penſions, according to their degrees and merit. After this, Orchanes by the councel of his brother Aladin, commanded all his men of war to weare white caps, thereby to be knowne from others, which commonly wore red. Such manner of caps the Ianizaries vſe at this day. The Turks alſo in Orchanes raigne, and long time after, vſed not to cut or ſhaue their beards, but did weare them long: ſo that if the King would diſgrace any man, hee would in his diſpleaſure command his beard to be cut or ſhaued. The maner of cutting and ſhauing their beards which they now vſe, they learned of the Italians; of whom they haue alſo borrowed many other faſhions, not only differing, but quite contrary to their antient manners & cuſtomes. Orchanes about this time remoued his court to Nice, where hee lay a long time after. There he built a ſumptuous church, appointing a Preacher to preach to the people euery Friday: he erected in Nice alſo two faire abbies, in the one of which, he with his own hands ſerued the ſtrangers & poore the firſt dinner. He was the firſt that builded abbies or monaſteries among the Turks; whoſe example moſt of his ſucceſſors haue imitated, and is amongſt them vſed vnto this day.

Orchanes remoueth his Court to Nice.

The gouernment of Nicomedia Orchanes committed to his eldeſt ſon Solyman (as is before ſaid) a prince of great towardlineſſe; giuing him in great charge to haue a vigilant eye to the townes of Taraxa, Gouinuca, and Mudurne, which were nigh vnto Nicomedia, yet in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians: all which townes, with the countries adioyning, Solyman in ſhort time got without force, by compoſition. This Solyman was of a princely diſpoſition, ſo tempring juſtice with clemencie in his gouernment, that many Chriſtians allured with his vertues, became of his religion, & gladly put themſelues vnder his ſubiection: the politicke lawes of the country he neither abrogated nor changed, but maintained as they had beene of antient time accuſtomed, whereby he greatly woon the hearts of the people. Amurath his younger ſonne, Orchanes made lord and gouernour of Pruſa, after he had remooued his court to Nice. And the caſtle castle of Chara-chisar, with the seigniorie thereto belonging, he gaue to his cousin Artemure, G the sonne of his vncle Iundus.

Orchanes inuadeth the countrey of Carasina

There was at this time in Orchanes court a noble yong gentleman called Turson-beg, the son of Dharasis King of Charasia; by whose persuasion Orchanes in person himselfe with a strong armie, made an expedition into that country: for that his fathers subiects after the death of the King his father, denied their obedience to his elder brother, wishing rather to haue Turson for their soueraign. In whose behalfe Orchanes taking that journy, surprised by the way many castles and townes to his own vse. Orchanes was no sooner entred the countrey of Charasia, but Tursons elder brother fled to Pergamum, whither the Turks shortly pursued him: where Turson desirous to speake with his brother, vnwarily approching the city, was wounded with an arrow shot from the walls, and there slaine. With whose death Orchanes was so greatly offen- H ded, that he threatned to destroy the whole country with fire and sword, if they did not by a day prefixed, generally submit themselues to his mercie.

The country of Carasina yeelded vnto Orchanes.

The people terrified with this proclamation of so great a Prince alreadie in armes, yeelded themselues vnto his subiection. The Kings sonne also that was fled into Pergamum, vpon reasonable conditions yeelded himselfe vnto Orchanes, who sent him to Prusa, where after he had there liued two yeres, he died of the plague: after whose death Orchanes made his son Solyman Prince of Carasina. Neither is this taking in of the country of Carasina to be accounted a smal conquest; one of the greatest houses of the Turks the successors of the Iconian Sultan Aladin, now thereby taking end, & their dominions (which were not small, as containing almost Lydia, with some good parts of Misia, Troas, and the lesser Phrygia) now vnited vnto the Othoman kingdome. Orchanes vpon his re- I turne, for the good successe of this journy, built a Church and Monasterie at Prusa, placing therein religious men, with all diligence sought for out of all his kingdome: of which religious the Turks write many fables, better worth the smiling at, than the serious reporting. Hitherto the kingdome of Othoman and Orchanes his son, was contained within the bounds of the lesser Asia, which the Turks call Anatolia.

Now it resteth to be shewed, vpon what occasion Orchanes, or rather his son Solyman Bassa, as it were fatally, with a small power first passed ouer Hellespontus into Europe; where they and their successours haue by little and little so enlarged their dominions, that they haue now long ago quite ouerthrown the Grecian empire, with many other great kingdomes, and are at this present a terror to all Christian Princes bordering vpon them: to the perpetuall infamie K of the Greekes, who for want of courage, and busied with ciuil discord, neuer sought in time to impeach their greatnesse.

Orchanes hauing now so augmented his kingdome, that he might from many parts therof out of Asia take view of the pleasant borders of Europ, from whence he was excluded only by the narrow sea of Hellespontus; and continually incited with the insatiable & restles desire of soueraignte, began to deuise how he might possibly passe that strait sea, and set foot into Europ another part of the world. Which his conceit one day he imparted to his son Solyman: who presently answered his father, That if it would please him to giue him leaue, hee would not doubt to passe the strait of Hellespontus, & in time to plant the Mahometan religion in those countries of Europe possessed by the Christians. Which answer of Solyman much pleased his L father, who gaue him leaue to depart into his country, and in that matter to proceed further, as he thought best, & as occasion should best serue. Solyman taking leaue of his father, tooke his journy into Carasina, where riding vp & down the country, as it had bin for his pleasure only, he made his way to the place where it is thought the famous citie of Troy sometime stood; where yet (as the Turks and some others say) are to be seen the wonderful ruins of that vnfortunate citie by the sea side. In this place Solyman stood still a great while, as it were in a studie, forecasting (as it seemed) some great matter, without speaking one word to any of his followers. When one of his chiefe traines called Ezes-beg, to put him out of his deepe thoughts, boldly said vnto him, My lord and great soueraign, what strange thing is this, that you are so deepely drowned in these your melancholy thoughts? vndoubtedly it is some great matter that you are studying vpon. Truth it is, (said Solyman) for I was thinking how it were possible to passe ouer this sea of Hellespontus into the borders of Europ, and to take view of that country, and so to returne vndiscouered. If this be the matter, (said Ezes-beg, ioyning vnto him one Fazil-beg, a man of no lesse valour than himselfe) wee two will by the power of God performe

A vnto you this enterprise. Then was Solyman desirous to know of them, about what place they would passe ouer: which they well knowing the sea coast, shewed him not far off. Wherefore Solyman giuing them leaue, they departed: and shortly after making a little boat, or rather as some suppose a raffe, passed ouer Hellespontus by night, and arriued in Europe side, neere vnto a castle of the Turks, called Zemenic or Zembenic, but of the Greeks Coiridocastron, that is to say, The hogs castle, not farre from Sestus: where going ashore, they tooke prisoner a Greeke in a vineyard neere vnto the castle, whom they finding to be a good sensible fellow, without delay put him into their boat or raffe, and returning backe againe, presented him to Solyman. This Christian captiue Solyman entertained courteously, giuing him great gifts, & rich apparel, to discouer vnto him the estate of his countrey: and in fine, learned of him a means to take B the castle Zembenic, before the Christians should thereof be aware. For atchieuement wherof, certaine boats were speedily made ready by Solymans commandement, and he with eightie chosen soldiers easily passed ouer in them by night, with their Christian guid the Greeke: for in that place, the strait betwixt Asia and Europe, is not past an Italian mile ouer. This guid brought Solyman directly to the aforesaid castle, where was a great dunghil, so high, that from the top thereof Solyman with his souldiers easily got into the castle, which they woon without any great resistance; for it was then haruest time, and most part of the people were in the vineyards, or treading out of their corne al night, as the vse of those countries is. Solyman thus possessed of the castle of Zembenic, vsed no extremity against the inhabitants therof, seeking rather by courtesie to gaine their good wils, than by extremitie to force them to his: yet such C gentlemen as he took, with some others also of the better sort, he sent by shipping into Asia, and by the same ships returned souldiers as fast as he could into Europe: so that he had in one day two hundred souldiers more brought ouer vnto him: and manning such smal vessels as he had left about the castle, sent Ezes-beg alongst the coast on Europe side, to burne such shipping or vessels as hee could find, least the Christians should by them hinder his passage vpon the strait of Hellespontus. So in a few dayes Solyman had transported into Europe two thousand good souldiers of the Turks, whom he so gouerned, that they did not in any violent sort iniurie the vulgar Christians, by reason whereof the common people began to like reasonable well of the Turks, and to conuerse with them without feare. This was the first comming ouer of the Turks into Europe, with purpose there to conquer and inhabit, vnder the fortune of the D Othoman kings. For albeit that some of that nation had at sundry times before come ouer, as men seeking after spoile, or otherwise sent for, yea sometimes by the Greek Emperors themselues, yet neuer staied they long, but hauing done what they came for, or els lost themselues, returned backe againe into Asia; vntil that now conducted by Solyman, and possessed of the little castle of Zembenic (as is aforesaid) they there tooke so fast footing, as that they and their posteritie after them, were neuer thence to be since that time remoued; but stil more and more encroching vpon the Christians, haue vnto their Asian kingdome ioyned a great part of Europe also, to the terrour of the rest that yet remaineth, as in the processe of this Historie shall (if God will) at large appeare.

About two miles from Zembenic in Chersonesus was another castle called Maito, or more E truly Maditus, which Solyman also tooke: so that now hee had gotten two castles in Europe, both which he strongly manned. After which time, the Turkes in great numbers came out of Asia into Europe ouer that narrow strait of Hellespontus, to dwell in Chersonesus: and Solyman instead of them, to make roome for his Turkes, sent Christians out of Europe to bee placed amongst the Turkes in Asia. The report of this comming ouer of the Turkes into Chersonesus, and of the taking of the castle of Zembenic, carried in post to Constantinople, was sufficient to haue stirred vp any prouident or carefull men, presently to haue taken vp armes for the recouerie of the lost castle, and the driuing out againe of the barbarous enemies out of Europe, before they had gathered any greater strength, or setled themselues in those places: but such was the careless negligence and great securitie of the proud Greekes, that F instead thereof, they to extenuate the greatnesse of the losse, commonly said, That there was but a hogstie lost; alluding vnto the name of the castle: and vainely (as said a graue father of their owne) ieasting at that was not to be ieasted at, and laughing at that was not to be laughed at but lamented for, as in few yeres it proued; their fooolish laughter beeing not without good cause conuerted into most bitter teares.

Solymans strength so stil increasing by the daily comming ouer of the Turks, he proceeded further to spoyle the country of Chersonesus, almost as far as Calipolis, distant from the castle Zembenic about two and twentie miles: after which pleasant citie the proud Turk began now to long. Which the gouernor thereof perceiuing by the Turks continuall incroaching vpon him, raised what power he was able to make, and so went out against them; all the rest of the Greeks in the mean time lying still, as if they had bin asleepe, or that the matter had not concerned them: but meeting the Turks, he was by them (after a great conflict) ouerthrown, and for safegard of his life glad to flie into his city: after whom the Turks following, spoiled the country round about, and in their returne, by plain force tooke the city, together with the castle also: which hapned in the yere of our Lord 1358. Where the madnesse of the Greeks was againe more than before to be wondred at; for the newes of the losse of Callipolis beeing brought to Constantinople, the people there made small account thereof, although it was indeed a right great losse, and much concerned the state: but to extenuate the matter, when they had any talke therof, in jesting wise commonly said, That the Turks had but taken from them a pottle of wine. But by taking of such hogstyues and pottles of wine (as they termed it) the Turks in a few yeres after had gone so far in Thracia, that Amurath (the same Solymans nephew which now tooke from the Greeks the city of Callipolis) euen in the heart as it were of the Greeke Empire, placed his royall seat at Hadrianople: and immediately after him, Baiazet his sonne (hauing subdued all the countrey euen to the walls of Constantinople) for certaine yeares layd hard siege vnto the Imperiall citie it selfe; and had no doubt then carried it, had not the great expedition of the mightie Tartar Prince Tamerlane (vnto Baiazet fatall) in the meane time happened: whereby (God so appointing it) the prosperous succeedings of the Turkes were for a space well stayed, that they should not before the time by him prefined, deuoure the reliques of the Greeke Empire. And it were to be wished, that the Christians of our time also (by their example warned) would at length awake out of their dead sleepe: who of late hath lost vnto the same enemie, not the castle of Zembenic, or the city of Callipolis, but whole kingdomes, as Hungarie and Cyprus, and are still faire in the way: I say no more for griefe, and foreboding of euill fortune. But againe to our purpose: Solyman hauing made this prosperous entrance into Europe, and there got strong footing, by speedie messengers certified his father what he had done, and that it was expedient for him with all speede to send vnto him a great supplie of men of warre, as well for the sure defence and keeping of those castles and forts by him alreadie gotten, as for the further inuasion of the Countrey. This message was wonderfull welcome vnto Orchanes, and whereas many families of the Sarasins at that present were come into the countrey of Carasina, to possesse the dwellings and places of them, which in hope to better their estate were before gone ouer into Europe; all these Sarasins hee commaunded to passe ouer into Europe likewise: which they did accordingly, seating themselues for a time in the country neere to Callipolis. In the meane time Solyman omitted no opportunitie to enter further into the country, winning small forts and Holds, and still peopling the same with his Turks. And on the other side, they of Carasina passed ouer into Europe, placing themselues as it were in a new world. For which cause, and for the great desire they had to extend the Turkish Dominion and Religion, they refused no paines of warre: so that all things at that time prospered with the Turks, and went backward with the Christians.

In the time of these wars, not far from Callipolis was a little castle called Congere, the captain whereof was by a Greeke name called Calo Ioannes, a valiant and painfull man: this captain continually molested and troubled the Turkes which lay on that side of Callipolis, vnder the leading of Ezes-beg, many of whom he slew and tooke prisoners, as he could find them at any aduantage. Solyman much angred herewith, by crattie and secret espials learned a certaine time when he was gone out of his castle to do some exployt vpon the Turks. Whereupon he presently so beset the Castle with souldiers, that he could by no means returne thither, but he must first fall into their hands; and for more assurance placed others also in by-wayes, lest he should by any way escape. The Captaine ignorant of all this, prosecuted his enterprise, and hauing taken a Turke prisoner, thinking to returne to his castle, was hastily pursued by Fazil-beg; for which cause making the more haste, hee suddenly fell into the danger of the Turks layd in ambush: where his men were all slaine, and himselfe taken and brought before before his own castle, and had there his head presently strucke off: whereupon the castle was forthwith by them that were therein (hauing now lost their captaine) surrendred, and Chazi Ili Beg, a valiant captaine of the Turks, placed therein: who from thence neuer ceased to trouble the country, euen to the walls of Didymotichum, as did Solyman also out of Callipolis.

Thus in the space of one yere the Turks got strong footing in Europe, possessing diuers Castles and towns, with the country about them, which Solyman gaue in reward vnto his captains and soldiers, as appeareth by the graues and tombes of Ezes-beg and Fazil-beg, the two which first came ouer into Europe, which are there yet well knowne.

About this time it fortuned, that as this martial Prince Solyman was for his disport hawking in the fields of Bolayre on Europe side, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horse ouerthrowne in a ditch, of which fall hee being sore bruised, shortly after died. The newes of his death being brought to Orchanes his father, gaue vnto him (then beeing sicke) iust occasion of great sorrow: so that within two months after he died also, being fourescore yeres old, when he had raigned thereof 31 yeres; and died about the yere of our Lord 1359. Some histories report otherwise, both of his death, and of the time wherein hee liued: as that hee should be slaine in a battell against the Tartars: or as others write, with an arrow at the siege of Prusa, in the yere of our Lord 1349. But Ioannes Leunclauius in his historie collected out of the Turkes owne chronicles (whom we follow as most probable) reporteth it as before.

The death of Solyman Bassa, Orchanes his eldest sonne.

The death of Orchanes.

This Orchanes was wise, curteous, and bountiful, more ingenious than his father in deuising warlike engins. He built diuers princely Churches, Abbies, Colledges, and Cels, and was in his superstitious religion verie zealous: in so much that hee appointed pensions to all such as could in the Church say the book of Mahomets law by heart: and appointed competent maintenance for all Iudges of his Courts, because they should not take any thing in reward of his subiects, for the peruerting of justice. He greatly inlarged his kingdome in Asia, and not content to be inclosed with the seas of Euxinum & Hellespontus, set fast footing in Europ, which some attribute to his sonne Amurath. He was to the Christians always a most mortal enemy, and so died.

RICH. KNOLLES.

Whilest Amurath in his deepe thoughts, of greatnesse plots the ground:
The wrangling Greekes by force of armes he seekes how to confound.
And wholly bent for to extend his kingdome, with his power, Piercing the confines of Europe, doth what he meets deuoure.
As men dismaid, the Thracians quake, to see their foule disgrace: Amiddest whom, the tyrant stout his scepter proud doth place.
The fierce Bulgarians he did meet, and in the field subdue:
And in Cossou'as fatall plaines, the wofull Despot slue.
But long is not the wickeds ioy, which they in mischiefe take:
Stab'd by a slaue, the wretch his end in that same place did make.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THIRD KING OF THE TVRKS, AND THE GREAT AVGMENTOR OF THEIR KINGDOME.

Amurath the younger sonne of Orchanes succeeded his father in the Turkish kingdome, his elder brother Solyman being dead a little before his father. This Amurath with greater zeale than any one of the Turkish Kings, aduanced the Mahometan religion, and had therein wonderfull successe. In the beginning of his raigne, he gathered a great armie out of all parts of his kingdome, to Prusa; purposing to passe ouer Hellespontus, to inuade the Christians in Thracia. But vnderstanding, that the other Mahometan Princes in Asia had combined themselues against him, he was thereby inforced to leaue his former determination for Europe, and to turne his forces vpon them. In which warres hee mightily preuailed against them, and returned with victorie to Prusa. But hauing so subdued those confederate Princes, hee the next yeare after prosecuted his warres before intended against the Christians in Europe. For which purpose hauing leuied a strong armie in Asia, he passed ouer to Callipolis, accompanied with his tutor, whom the Turkes call Lala Schabin: whose graue aduice and counsell hee most followed in all his waightie affaires, beeing at that time one of his chiefe counsellors. From Callipolis hee marched to the castle of Benutum, which was by composition yeelded vnto him. From thence he went to Tzurulus, where the Christians gaue him a sharpe encounter: but in the end he woon the towne, and carried away the victorie. And so proceeding farther, tooke diuers other small castles and townes in that part of Thracia, which of the antient Romane colonies was then called Romania, and now of the Turkes Rumilia, namely Mesine, Burgos, and others; whereof some he vtterly rased, and into the rest put strong garrisons. At this time also, Chasi-Ilbeg and Eurenoses, two of his most valiant captaines, tooke certaine forts standing vpon the Riuer Meritza, in antient time called Hebrus: whereby they much troubled the inhabitants of the countrey thereabouts. Wherewith the captaine of Didymotichum offended, gathered his souldiers together, intending to haue intercepted the great captaine Chasi-Ilbeg: in which attempt he lost most of his followers, and was himselfe there taken prisoner. For whose ransome and certaine other conditions, the citizens of Didymotichum yeelded the citie vnto the Turkes.

Amurath succeedeth his father Orchanes in the Turkish kingdome.

Didymoticum yeelded vnto the Turke.

Shortly after, Amurath sent his tutor Lala Schahin to besiege Hadrianople, now called Andrianople, but in ancient time Orestias: of whose comming the Christians hearing, encountred him vpon the way, and fought with him a great battell, wherein many were on both sides lost: but in the end the Christians being put to the worst, retired againe to the citie. Of this victorie Schahin sent news vnto Amurath, with certaine of the heads of the slaine Christians: who therupon sending Chasis and Eurenoses before, he himselfe with a great army followed after to the siege of Hadrianople: of whose comming, the gouernor of Hadrianople vnderstanding, fled secretly out of the citie by night to Ænus. The citizens seeing themselues so forsaken of their gouernour, yeelded their citie vnto Amurath, in the yeare of our Lord 1362.

Hadrianople yeelded vnto the Turke.

The taking of these strong cities in Thracia, especially of Didymotichum and Hadrianople, is (by some of the Turks owne Historiens) otherwise reported: which, because it is neither improbable nor disagreeing from the subtil dealings of the Turks, & of themselues also

receiued, I haue thought good to set downe as their owne Historiographers report the same.

The Turkish King Amurath had(as they say,and as truth was)in the beginning of his raigne concluded a peace with the Christians of Thracia: during which peace,the gouernor of Didymotichum intending to fortifie his city with new and stronger fortifications against the assaults of the Turks,entertained all the masons, carpenters, and other workemen he could by any meanes get: which Amurath vnderstanding,secretly caused two hundred good and lustie workemen and labourers to come out of Asia,to offer their seruice vnto the gouernour; who gladly entertained them,vsing their help in that his great and hastie worke. Which thing some of the wiser sort of the citizens disliking,wished the gouernor to beware of those Asian workmen,as by them suspected. But he presuming vpon the peace made with Amurath, and considering they were but base workemen and no soldiers, had the lesse care of them: neuertheles (vsing their worke all day) he commanded them to lodge without the wals of the citie euery night. Amurath vnderstanding that these workemen were thus by the gouernor entertained, sent for the valiant captaine Chasis-Ilbeg, and requested him with thirtie other good souldiers disguised as poore labourers,to goe to Didymotichum to seeke for worke,and in doing therof to espie if any opportunitie might be found for the surprising of the citie. Chasis with these thirtie according to Amurath his direction,comming as poore men lacking worke,found entertainment at Didymotichum, where they carried stones,morter, and such like things, euer shewing themselues very diligent in their worke: Chasis with vigilent eye still awaiting what might best serue his turne for the surprising of the citie. When night was come, the Turkish worke men and labourers after their accustomed manner, and as they were by the gouernour appointed,went out of the citie into the suburbs to their lodgings: from whence Chasis secretly departing in the night, came to Amurath and shewed him how one of the gates of the citie might vpon the sudden be taken, if it would please him to place a sufficient number of Turks in ambush neere vnto the citie,to ioyne with him and the other Turkish labourers when occasion should serue. Which being resolued vpon, Amurath sent him backe againe to put this his deuice in execution: So Chasis returning to Didymotichum, brake the matter to so many of the Asian workemen as he thought conuenient, fully instructing them what was to bee done. The next day(according to his appointment)the Christians being then at dinner,these Turkish workemen and labourers fell at words among themselues,and from words to fained blowes: in which counterfeit brawle and tumult, they suddenly ran to one of the gates of the citie fast by (as was before appointed) and there laying hands vpon the warders weapons, as if it had beene to defend themselues against their fellowes,suddenly set vpon those warders, being in number but few,and then at dinner also, and so presently slew them: which done, they opened the gate of the citie, and let in the other Turks which lay in wait not farre off: who with great celeritie entring the citie,presently tooke the same,and there put the chiefest of their citizens to the sword, sparing the rest of the meaner sort.

Rhodestum surprised by the Turks.

The citie of Rhodestum (of the old writers called Rhœdestum) was by Amurath his commandement, in this time of peace, by sudden assault giuen in the night by the Lord Eurenoses, taken also.

With this foule dealing & breach of league,yet in force,the Christians hardly charged Amurath; who turned it ouer to the vnrulines of his captains and men of war, whom he threatned with great seuerity to punish:& to giue the better color that it was done without his priuity,he had fained himself sick al the while these things were in doing:but being requested to restore those cities so wrongfuly taken from the Christians,he vtterly refused so to do,saying That it was against the law of his great Prophet Mahomet,to deliuer againe to the Christians, any towne or citie wherein the Mahometan religion had bin once openly taught. Whereupon wars began again to arise on fresh betwixt the Christians and him,wherein sometime the one preuailed, and sometime the other: in such sort, as that those warres at length became vnto them both very tedious. Wherefore Amurath made peace againe with the Christians of Hadrianople, Selybria, and Constantinople: yet desiring nothing more in heart,than to take the citie of Hadrianople: which the better to bring to passe, hee caused Chasis-Ilbeg as a discontented captaine to flie to Hadrianople, pretending himselfe to haue beene hardly vsed by the tyrant his master: where hauing in his company other such dissembling fugitiues as was himselfe,he oftentimes issued out of the citie and valiantly skirmished with the Turks; which so greatly greatly pleased the gouernour of Hadrianople, that he thereby grew into his great fauour. Many other Turkes also vnder pretence of like discontentment, resorted vnto Chasis: wherewith finding himselfe well strengthned,he writ letters secretly vnto Amurath,That he would deliuer one of the gates of Hadrianople vnto him at a certaine appointed time, if hee would against the same time be readie to send him present succors. All things being agreed vpon,Chasis at the appointed time came in the dawning of the day to one of the gates of the city,accompanied but with ten of his followers,as if he would haue gone forth to hunt,as he had before accustomed. But so soone as the gates were opened, he with the other ten well appointed for the purpose,furiously set vpon the warders,whom they slew; and being aided by the rest of the fugitiue Turks (which with all speed by appointment before made, resorted vnto them) they possessed the gate; vntill a great power of the Turks,whom Amurath the night before had placed in ambush neere vnto the city,hauing knowledge what was done,and hearing the alarme,speedily came on,and by that gate entred the citie: where was fought a cruell fight all that day,euen from morning vntill night. But in the end the Turks preuailing,tooke the citie, which they haue euer since possessed vnto this day.

These great cities of Thracia thus taken,or otherwise as aforesaid (for that I leaue for the Reader to thinke of as he pleaseth) Amurath appointed the seat of his royall court at Hadrianople, as a place of all others most fit for the further inuasion of the Christians, and inlarging of his kingdome in Europe: from whence such a world of mischiefs and woe hath since that time ouerflowed a great part of Christendome,& drowned so many goodly kingdoms in Europe, as that both they,and most part of the rest that yet remain (daily in dread of like destruction)might iustly accurse and detest the wofull careles nesse and degenerate cowardise of the Greeks,were not they themselues together with the glorie of their church and empire,swallowed vp in the same gulfe of calamity & wo,and so become of al others most miserable: but what auail vain complaints,but to increase old griefs? wherfore again to that we haue in hand

The proud Sultan Amurath (hauing to his great content thus seated himselfe at Hadrianople,in the middest of Thracia) presently sent out his tutor Lala Schahin with a great power to inuade the countrey about Philippopolis with the countrey of Zagora,which lyeth towards the great mountain Hœmus,where the best Turkish Scimitars were made;giuing like charge vnto Eurenoses, for the subduing of the territorie of Ipsala; who both notably performed what he had commanded,and in short time brought all those countries vnder his subiection, wherein he shortly after placed diuers sanzacks or gouernours, for the better assurance thereof, being so lately gained.

About this time (by the suggestion of Cara Rustemes a doctor of the Mahometan law) Zinderlu Chelil,then Cadeleskher or chiefe Iustice among the Turks,but afterwards better knowne by the name of Catradin Bassa, by the commandement of Amurath,took order, that euery fifth captiue of the Christians,being aboue fifteen yeres old,should be taken vp for the King,as by law due vnto him: and if the number were vnder fiue, then to pay to the King for euery head 25 aspers, by way of tribute: apointing officers for collecting both of such captiues and tribute mony,of whom the aforesaid Cara Rustemes himself was chief,as first deuiser of the matter. By which means great numbers of Christiã youths were brought to the court as the kings captiues,which by the counsell of the same Zinderlu Chelil, were distributed among the Turkish husbandmen in Asia,there to learn the Turkish language,religion,& maners:where after they had bin brought vp in all painfull labour and trauell by the space of two or three yeares, they were called vnto the court, & choice made of the better sort of them to attend vpon the person of the prince,or to serue him in his wars: where they daily practising all feats of actiuity,are called by the name of Ianizars(that is to say,new soldiers.) This was the first beginning of the Ianizars vnder this Sultan Amurath the first,but had great increase vnder Amurath the second, insomuch that Iouius with some other Historiographers, attribute the beginning of this order to him:which neuertheles (as appeareth by the Turks own histories)had the beginning as is aforesaid;& hath euer since bin continued by the Turkish kings & emperors,by the same and some other greater means;so that in processe of time they be grown to that greatnes as that they are oftentimes right dreadful to the great Turke himselfe:after whose death they haue somtimes preferred to the empire,such of the Emperors sons as they best liked,without respect of prerogatiue of age,contrary to the wil of the great Sultan himself;& are at this day the the greateſt ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire, and not vnlike in time to be the greateſt cauſe of the ruin thereof: the finger of the Higheſt oftentimes (as wee haue before ſaid) turning euen thoſe helps which were by mans wiſedome prouided for the eſtabliſhing of kingdomes, vnto their more ſpeedie deſtruction: and eſpecially theſe continuall garriſons of martiall men, no leſſe to be feared than truſted, as in the courſe of this Hiſtorie may appeare.

When Amurath had thus a great while continued at Hadrianople, determining now to returne vnto Aſia, hee made Schahin his tutor Beg-Lerbeg or viceroy of Romania; and Eurenoſes lord gouernor of the marches; Zinderlu Chelil he made Vezir Azemes or lord preſident of his counſell, and changing his name, called him Cairadin Baſſa, that is to ſay, The Baſſa that had wel deſerued, his name witneſſing his good deſert. After this he returned into Aſia, where he ſpent that winter at Pruſa. Theſe two great men Cairadin Baſſa and Cara Ruſtemes before named, ſometimes two doctors of the Mahometan law, were (as the Turkiſh Hiſtories report) the firſt that corrupted the Turkiſh court with couetouſneſſe and briberie, and are therefore of them euen yet much blamed.

Whileſt Amurath thus wintred in Aſia, news was brought vnto him, That the Chriſtians of Seruia and Bulgaria had gathered a great armie for the beſieging of Hadrianople: which caused him to prepare great forces in Aſia, to aid his captaines in Europe. But in returning out of Aſia, he by the way tooke the towne of Boga; where he put to ſword all the Chriſtians that were therein able to beare armes, leading the reſt into captiuitie, and with the ſpoile rewarded his ſouldiers. This ſtrong towne was not long after againe recouered by the Chriſtians, who requited the Turkes with like meaſure, and doubting the keeping thereof, raſed it downe to the ground: yet was it afterwards reedified by the Turks, as it is at this preſent to be ſeene: which was done in the yeare of our Lord 1365.

Boga taken by Amurath and recouered again and raſed by the Chriſtians.

Boga new built by the Turks.

In the meane time, the Chriſtian armie of Seruia and Bulgaria, in number betwixt fortie and fiftie thouſand, marching towards Hadrianople, and now come very neere the ſame, fell in mutinie among themſelues. Whereof the Turks by their eſpials hauing intelligence, ſuddenly in the night ſet vpon them: who blinded with inward hatred, and no leſſe fearing one another, than their enemies, neglected to ioyne their forces againſt them, but were readie to turn their weapons one vpon another; and ſo by their owne diſcord, more than by the enemies force, were made a prey to the Turkes, by whom they were put to flight, and ſlaine with ſo great a ſlaughter, that the place wherein they fell, not far from Germia, is thereof at this day called Zirf-Zindugi, that is to ſay, the place wherein the Seruians were ouerthrown. The news of this ſo notable a victorie, with the fift part of the ſpoile, & a great number of the heads of the ſlaine Chriſtians, were (after the barbarous manner of the Turks) ſent to Amurath into Aſia, being now readie with a great power to haue come ouer to Callipolis: who ioyful therof, and glad to ſee ſuch a preſent, the aſſured witneſſe of the victorie, returned againe to Pruſa. This was done in the yeare 1366. In which yeare alſo Amurath with wonderfull triumph circumciſed his two ſons, Baiazet, & Iacup. At which time he alſo built a temple, with a monaſterie & a colledge, at Bilezuga: & another faire church at Neapolis: at Pruſa he alſo built a ſtatly pallace in the caſtle, with a great church at the gates thereof: in which citie he alſo founded an abbey and a colledge. Germean Ogli, a great Mahometan prince in Aſia (whoſe territorie for the moſt part lay in the greater Phrygia, and the countries thereabout, bordering vpon the Othoman kingdome) hauing alwaies enuied at the riſing of the Othoman kings (as did al the reſt of the Mahometan princes of the Selzuccian familie) and fearing that their greatnes might after his death grow dangerous to his ſon Iacup, being now himſelfe very aged, thought good for the more ſafetie of his ſtate to ioyn in alliance with Amurath. And for that purpoſe ſent Iſaac (a learned doctor of the Mahometan law) embaſſador to him, with many rich preſents, & to offer his daughter, the Lady Hatun, in marriage vnto his ſon Baiazet: promiſing with her in dowrie diuers great cities and townes, with their territories in Phrygia and Bythinia, adioyning vpon the Othoman kingdom; namely Cutaie, Simau, Egregios, Tauſanle, & others. Neither was this a ſmall dowrie, but well beſeeming ſo great a prince: the citie of Cutaie being at this day the place whereat the Turkiſh emperors great lieutenant or viceroy in Aſia is alwaies reſiant, as in the heart of his kingdome in the leſſer Aſia. Of which match ſo offered, Amurath liking well, contracted his ſon Baiazet vnto the ſaid ladie: and for ſolemniation of the mariage, prepared al things with great magnificence, ſending his embaſſadors to moſt of the Mahometane

A tane kings and princes both far and neere, to inuite them thereunto: commanding alſo moſt of the nobilitie of his kingdome, to honor the ſame with their preſence. The time of this marriage drawing neere, Embaſſadors came to Amuraths court, from all the Princes before inuited: amongſt whom, the Embaſſador from the Ægyptian Sultan had the higheſt place. Theſe Embaſſadors brought with them many great and rich gifts, ſuch as well beſeemed the great princes their maſters, which they with all reuerence preſented vnto Amurath. At length amongſt the reſt of his own nobilitie came the lord Eurenoſes, whom he had before left gouernour of the frontiers of his kingdome in Europe: who beſides many other rich gifts not eaſily to be valued, preſented vnto Amurath a hundred goodly boyes, with as many beautifull yong maidens, all Chriſtian captiues, ſutably attired in garments richly embroidred with gold & ſiluer, B euery one of them carrying a cup of gold in the one hand, and a cup of ſiluer in the other; the cups of gold hauing in them diuers precious ſtones of great value, and the cups of ſiluer being filled with gold. The richnes of this preſent was ſo great, that all the embaſſadors of the forrein princes much wondred thereat. All which rich gift Amurath moſt bountifully beſtowed D vpon the ſtrange Embaſſadors; and the Preſents which were ſent vnto him from other princes, he liberally gaue to Eurenoſes. The learned and religious which came to that marriage he ſo bountifully rewarded alſo, that none came to the ſame poore, but hee went away rich. He had before ſent diuers of his nobilitie, with an hundred ladies and gentlemen, and a guard of three thouſand horſemen, to attend the comming of the bride. On the other ſide, the old prince Germean-Ogli meeting this honorable companie vpon the way, ſaluted euery man of account C according to his degree: and bringing them to one of his cities, in moſt royall manner feaſted them, beſtowing vpon them many rich and princely gifts: all which things with great ſolemnitie performed, he deliuered his daughter the bride to two of the moſt antient ladies, wherof the one had bin Baiazets nurſe; and ſo taking leaue of his daughter, ſent her away, accompanied with his wife Ienſes, and other of his courtiers: who conueying her to Pruſa, ſhe was there in moſt royal manner married to Baiazet. The cities and townes promiſed in dowrie, were accordingly deliuered into the poſſeſſion of Amurath, who ſhortly after tooke poſſeſſion of the ſame, and furniſhed them with his own garriſons.

At this marriage Chuſen-Beg prince of Amiſum in Galatia, by his Embaſſador ſold his territorie of Amiſum vnto Amurath, with many faire cities & townes; doubting, as it was thought, D how to be able to keepe them, now that Amurath was come ſo neere him, whom hee ſaw not to let ſlip any occaſion offered vnto him for the inlarging of his kingdome. When Amurath had in this ſort ſpent great time in Aſia, he gathered a ſtrong armie to returne into Europe: but before his departure, he committed the gouernment of his kingdom in Aſia (which the Turks call Anatolia) vnto his ſonne Baiazet, ioyning with him Temurtaſes a valiant man of great experience: and hauing ſet all things in order in Aſia, paſſed ouer Helleſpontus, to Callipolis; from whence he marched towards Hadrianople: and becauſe he would take ſomething in his way, he beſieged Magalgara, which he in ſhort time woon: where Lala Schahin and Eurenoſes with all their forces came to him; which two captaines hee ſent to beſiege the citie Pheræ, which was by them after a few days ſiege taken. But he himſelfe to be reuenged vpon Lazarus the Deſpot, led his armie into Seruia: where after he had without reſiſtance forraged the E countrey fourteene days, vnderſtanding by his captaines, That the ſtrong citie of Niſſa, being the metropoliticall citie of Seruia, was as it were the key of that kingdome, he preſently marched thither, and layd ſiege to the ſame; and by the aduice of Iaxii-Beg the ſonne of Temurtaſes, in ſhort time woon it. Which thing ſo daunted Lazarus Deſpot or Lord of Seruia, that he diſpairing in his own forces, hauing ſo ſoon loſt one of his ſtrongeſt cities, forthwith ſent Embaſſadours to Amurath to intreat a peace; offering to pay him a yearely tribute of fifty thouſand pounds, and to aid him with a thouſand men in his warres, whenſoeuer he ſhould require: vpon which conditions Amurath granted him peace, and ſo departed out of Seruia. In this expedition hee alſo with much adoo woon the great Citie of Appolonia, neere vnto the F mount Athos, and gaue leaue vnto moſt of the Chriſtians, with their wiues and childeren to depart, and ſuch part of their goods as was not in the taking thereof ſpoyled by the ſoldiers. This done, he returned backe to Hadrianople, leauing Eurenoſes vpon the marches, who ſhortly after tooke Berrhea, with diuers other towns. At which time alſo Lala Schahin woon Zichne and Seres, in the confines of Macedonia, with many other ſtrong towns vpon the frontiers of Thessalia and Thrace. In the Citie Seres Eurenoses made his abode, as in a chiefe frontier G to wit: and because the Christians for feare of the Turks were all fled out of the country about Seres, great numbers of people were sent for out of Asia, to inhabit that country by the Christians forsaken in the confines of Macedonia. Amurath had not long continued at Hadrianople, but that he was aduertised out of Asia, That Aladin his son in law king of Caramania, did with fire and sword inuade his dominions in Asia: with which news he was exceedingly troubled. And for that cause sending for his councellors and nobility to the court, told them, how that Aladin forgetting all the bonds of religion, faith, peace, and alliance, with all hostility inuaded his prouinces in Asia, whilest he with great danger of his person, and greater terrour of his enemies, fought with honour to increase the Mahometan sincere religon (as he termed it) in Europe: from which godly war (said he) I am against my will enforced to turn my sword, H in iust defence of my selfe, against men ioyned with vs both in religion and alliance. And hauing thus declared his mind, he appointed Chairadin Bassa his lieutenant generall in Europ, and also made his sonne Alis Bassa one of his Councell, although hee were by some thought too yong for so great a place. And so hauing set all things in order according to his minde in Europe, tooke passage from Callipolis into Asia, and so to his court at Prusa, where he spent that Winter. In which time Embassadors came vnto him from the Sultan of Ægypt, for the renewing of their former amitie and friendship; which Amurath tooke verie thankefully, and sent them backe againe loden with kind letters and princely rewards.

Amurath and Aladin prepare themselues for warre.

When the Spring was come, in the yere 1387, he leuied a mightie armie to make war vp- I on the Caramanian king his son in law. Whereof Aladin certainly informed, prepared no lesse power to meet him, associating vnto him all the lesse Mahometan Princes of Asia, which were not vnder Amuraths obeisance, to whom the Othoman kings were now grown terrible; which princes brought with them great supplies to ioyne with Aladin.

Aladin thus aided by his friends, thinking himselfe now strong enough for Amurath his father in law, sent an Embassador vnto him, certifying him, That he was nothing in power inferior to him, & therfore nothing feared him: yet if it pleased him to haue peace, that he could for his part be content to hearken vnto the same vpon reasonable conditions: but if he had rather haue war, he should find him readie to dare him battel in the field, whensoeuer he should come. For answere of which embassage, Amurath willed the Embassadour to tell the periured K King his master, That he had of late, contrarie to his faith before giuen, in most cruell manner inuaded his dominions, whilest he was busied in most godly wars (as he termed it) against the misbeleeuing Christians: from prosecuting whereof, he was by his violence (as he said) withdrawn, contrarie to the law of their great Prophet: for which outrages and wrongs he would shortly come and take of him sharpe reuenge; and that therefore he was to expect nothing at his hands but war, for which he willed him so to prouide, as that at his comming he might not find him wanting to himselfe. Aladin by his Embassadour hauing receiued this answer from Amurath, assembled all the confederat Princes his allies, with great persuasions & greater promises encouraging them to this war: and they againe kissing the ground at his feet, as the manner of that nation is before great princes, promised with solemne oathes neuer to forsake him, L but to do all things which Princes desirous of honour or fame, ought by their oath to doe for their Soueraigne, to whom they ought homage and dutie.

The death of Chairadin Bassa

In this great preparation for wars in Asia, Charaidin Bassa generall gouernor in Europe died: which Amurath vnderstanding, appointed Alis Bassa his sonne to go into Europe, there to be gouernor in his fathers stead. But hee was stayed in his journey by vrgent occasions; which Amurath vnderstanding, sent for him backe againe in post.

Aladin forecasting the great dangers like to ensue of this war, sent another Embassadour to Amurath, with reasonable conditions of peace: to whom Amurath answered, That if Aladin had made that offer one month before, he would perhaps haue accepted thereof: but for so much as he had done him great wrong, and that he had now to his infinite charge drawn him M into the field so far from home, he would not make any other end than such as the chance of war should appoint: And wheras he in disgrace had called me a heardsman or shepheard (said he) if he be not such a one himself, as he saith me to be, let him meet me in the field & there try his valor. Hereunto the Embassador replied, saying, That the King his master made this offer of peace not for any feare, but to saue the effusion of innocent bloud; which consideration set apart,

A apart, he should find him not inferior to himselfe, either in number of most expert soldiers, or other warlike prouision: and that therefore if he reiected this offer of peace, hee needed not to doubt but to meet with men of courage, which would beare themselues so valiantly in the field against his Turks, as that he should haue no great cause to reioyce of his comming thither. Which words of the Embassador so netled Amurath, that in great rage hee commanded him to depart, & to wil his master, if he were a man of such courage & valor as he said, to shew himselfe in the field with all his forces, there to make an end of all quarrels; where he doubted not but in short time to chastice him according to his due deserts. So after the Embassador was departed, marching forward three days, Alis Beg came vnto him: of whose comming he not a little reioyced: for why, he loued him deerly, and although he was yet of yeares but B yong, relied much vpon his councell.

The Embassador returning, recounted vnto Aladin all that Amurath had said, not omitting his hard speeches and proud threats, and how that he hoped shortly to take from him Iconium and Larenda (the principall cities of Caramania) with many things more, leauing nothing vntold. Which Aladin hearing, said vnto the confederate Princes that were with him, Verily Amurath threatneth to take from vs the cities of Iconium and Larenda; but let him take heed that we take not from him his faire citie of Prusa. Then demanding of the Embassadour, of what strength Amurath might be; it was answered by him, that hee deemed him to be about seuentie thousand strong. Whereat Aladin not a little reioycing, said, Assuredly when hee shall see our armie, he will not dare to giue vs battell; or if he do, he shal fight vpon great disC aduantage, his men being both fewer in number than we, and sore wearied with long and painfull trauell.

In the mean time Amurath held on his way towards Caramania, dayly encouraging his soldiers with persuasions and gifts bountifully bestowed vpon them, filling their heads with promises of greater, the wars once happily ended. At length he came to the great plaines in Caramania, called the French plains, because in former time the Christians (whom the Turks for most part cal Franks) in those places incamped their great armies, as they went to the winning of Ierusalem (as in the former part of this Historie is declared.) Into these plaines also came Aladin with his armie, and was now incamped within one days march of Amurath, and so rested that night.

D The next morning Amurath put his armie in order of battell, appointing the leading of the right wing to his youngest sonne Iacup, with whom he ioyned Cutluzes Beg, Ein Beg Subbassa, Egridum Subbassa, Seraze, and Custendil, two Christian Princes, all captains of great experience. The left wing was led by Baiazes his eldest son, with Ferize and Hozze both valiant captains: in which wings were also placed the Christian soldiers sent by Lazarus out of Seruia, according to the late conuention of peace: in the maine battell hee stood himselfe; the vauntgard was conducted by Temurtases; and the rereward by the Subbassa of Oxyllithus (called also Temurtases) and Achmetes. Aladin on the other side, with no lesse care and diligence set his men likewise in order of battell, placing himselfe in the maine battell, as did Amurath; and the Princes his allies, with his other expert captaines, some in the right wing, and some in the E left, as he thought most conuenient: in such sort, as that in all mens iudgment he was in force nothing inferior to his father in law.

The great battel in the plains of Caramania, betwixt Amurath & Aladin.

These great enemies thus ranged, with ensignes displaid came on couragiously, one directly vpon the other: where approching together, the confused noise of trumpets, drums, fifes, with other instruments of warre, the neighing of horses, and clattering of armour, was so great, that whilest warlike minds thereat reioiced, cowards thought heauen fel. But the signe of battel on both sides giuen, Samagazes one of the confederat Princes, with exceeding courage first charged Temurtases in the vantgard, and broke his ranks: at which time Teberruses a Tartar Prince, and Varsacides another of the confederats, deliuered their arrows also vpon the vantgard, as if it had been a shoure of haile. Which Baiazet seeing, and how hardly Temurtases was charged, F hauing before obtained leaue of his father, brake in vpon the enemie with such violence, as if it had been the lightning; whereof he was euer after syrnamed Gilderun, which is to say, The lightening. Ferizes and Hozza, with the other valiant Captaines in that wing, following Baiazet, with inuincible courage entred the battell; where for a great space was made a most dreadfull and doubtfull fight. A man would haue thought two rough seas had met together, swaying swaying one against the other, doubtfull which way the current would at length fall. In this G conflict many thousands were on both sides slain, so that the field lay couered with the dead bodies of worthy men and valiant souldiers: yet at length these confederate Princes, finding Aladin flieth to Iconium. themselues ouermatched by Baiazet and his soldiers, reseruing themselues to their better fortunes, turned their backes and fled; when Aladin seeing a great part of his armie thus ouer-throwne, and himselfe now ready to be charged with Amurath his whole power, despairing of victorie, sped himselfe in all hast to Iconium, his strong citie. The spoile which Amurath Iconium besieged by Amurath. got in this battel was great, most part whereof he gaue in reward to Temurtases and his souldiers, which had indured the greatest furie of the battell. Amurath after this victorie with all speed marched to Iconium, and there besieged Aladin the Caramanian King, in his strongest citie, giuing out proclamation in the meane time, That none of his souldiers vpon paine of H death should vse any violence to any of the countrey people, or take any thing from them: to the intent it might appeare vnto the world, that he made that warre against that Mahometane King, rather to propulse iniurie and wrong, than for desire of soueraignetie or spoile. Which his so strait a proclamation, the Christians sent by Lazerus, amongst others, transgressed; and therefore by his commandement suffered (many of them) exemplarie punishment; which was the cause of the Seruian warre which not long after ensued, fatall both vnto Amurath and La- zarus the Despot, as hereafter shall appeare.

Aladin now on euery side besieged in Iconium, and without all hope of escape, sent to the Queene his wife, Amuraths daughter, bewailing vnto her his desperate estate, and requesting her by all the loue that so honourable a minded Ladie might beare vnto her miserable hus- I band, to aduenture her selfe to goe to her angrie father, and to craue pardon for his great tres-passe & offence. The Queen forthwith attiring her selfe, as was fittest for her husbands present estate, came to her father: where falling downe at his feet vpon her knees, with words wisely placed, and teares distilling down her faire cheeks from her faire eies, as if it had bin from two fountains, in most sorrowful manner, craued her husbands pardon, imputing to the heat of youth whatsoeuer he had done: and would not be comforted or taken vp, vntil she had obtained grace. Amurath most entirely loued this his daughter, and therefore for her sake not only granted vnto her, her husbands life (which in short time was like to haue bin in his power to haue spilt) but also his kingdom, which he as a victorious conqueror might by law of armes haue of right detained. She now assured of her fathers promise, sent vnto her husband Aladin, K wishing him the next day without feare to come out of the citie, & in humble sort to acknowledge his fault before her father. Who the next morning accordingly came out, and prostrating himselfe before Amurath, acknowledged his vndutifulnes: of whom (for his wiues sake) he obtained pardon, and restitution to his kinkdome, with many other great gifts, contrary to his euell desert. The Latine histories mistaking the man, report this Caramanian war, to haue bin fought against the king of Caramania, Amurath his own grandfather by the mother side; and that hee was by Amurath then spoiled of a great part of his kingdome: but it agreeth not with the Turkish histories, which make Amurath to be the sonne of Orchanes and Lulufer, the daughter of the gouernour of the castle of Iarchiser, as is before declared in the life of Otho- L man; which Lulufer lieth buried by her husband Orchanes in Prusa.

This great victorie gotten by Amurath against the Caramanian King, and the other confederat Princes, was the true beginning of the greatnesse of the Othoman kingdom in Asia: wherwith the other Mahometan Princes of the Selzuccian family were so discouraged, that they were glad to submit themselues thus first vnto Amurath, and after that vnto his sonne Baiazet: vntil that Tamberlaine the great Tartarian Prince, some few yeares after, taking Baiazet prisoner in a great battell at mount Stella, abated the Othoman pride, and restored the other oppressed Mahometane Princes to their old possessions and kingdomes.

Amurath returning homewards, by the way tooke the city of Despotopolis, and comming to Curaie brake vp his armie, and so in triumph returned to his court at Prusa. M

Lazarus, Despot of Seruia (in old time called Mysia) had sent a thousand armed men to Amu- rath in this the late Caramanian warre, according to the conuention of the peace not long before made betwixt them: some of which souldiers, were with great seueritie (to the terror of others) executed in Caramania, for transgressing Amurath his commandement. This great warre being ended, and the army broken vp at Curaie, they with others were licensed to depart into

A into their owne country. Whose General (whom they call the Vayuod) returning home, reported vnto Lazarus the Despot, the successe of that war, and withall in what cruell and tyran-nicall manner the men he had sent were in that seruice vsed by the commandment of Amurath.
With whom (said this Generall) you without cause haue made a most dishonourable peace: first, by giuing your faith to such a miscreant, and then in sending your loyall subiects, in recompence of their good seruice, to be so butchered at his pleasure; beside the shamefull tribute which you yerely pay vnto him. Whereas if it would please you in the depth of your wisedome but to know your owne strength, you should find your selfe in warlike force and power nothing inferiour to the tyrant: for we your seruants beeing in number but a handfull, B were in these his late wars a terror vnto his enemies, and by our valor, and not his own, he got the victorie ouer them. What cause is there then, that you should subiect your self vnto your inferiour? I know hee cannot of himselfe bring into the field aboue fiftie thousand fighting men: but admit he were able to bring a hundred thousand, are not you (if you so please) able to leauie a far greater power? and for all other warlike prouision you are ten fold better prouided than he. Besides that, the mightie Christian Princes wil send you such aid against this hatefull and common enemie, that being vnited with yours, his Barbarian forces will be nothing in comparison of those which you shall then be able to bring into the field against him: which no doubt the Christian Princes will the rather do, as men desirous to quench this de-uouring, fire in another mans house, rather than in their owne.

These words of the Vayuod so much moued Lazarus, that hee determined in himselfe to Lazarus the de- C breake that seruile league which he before had made with Amurath. And for that cause sent spot by his Em- his Embassador with secret instructions to the King of Bosna (in time past called Illyria) his bassadour cra- neighbour: whereof the chiefe point was, to craue his aid against the Turke their common ueth aid of the enemie. By whom the King of Bosna returned this answere, That it had been much better king of Bosna. such consideration had bin thought vpon before the foule contract (full of disgrace both to himselfe and all other Christian Princes) was vpon a vaine feare by him rashly made with the Turkish tyrant: yet for so much as things done could not be vndone, letting that passe which was remediless, he promised to ioyne with him his whole forces against so dangerous an ene-mie. And therupon appointing a place for an interuiew, met accordingly, and there fully concluded all the articles of their confederation.

D There was in the confines of Bosna a castle called Alexandria, the captaine whereof being a Christian, was yet tributarie vnto the Turk; wishing vnto him such good, as men oppressed vse to do to them by whom they are so wronged. This captain vnder the colour of friendship went to Amurath, & in great secrecy opened to him the whole state of the kingdom of Bosna; and withall, that the King thereof intended some great matter against him: for the preuenting whereof he offered his owne seruice, and shewed some probable meanes how that kingdome might be brought into his subiection, if hee would but send some worthie Generall with a conuenient power for the vndertaking thereof. This wonderfully pleased the ambitious old tyrant, who therefore commanded a rich garment to be cast vpon the captain (which amongst the Turks is taken for a sure token of the kings great fauor) and forthwith appointed his tutor E Lala Schahin, according to this captains direction, to inuade the kingdome of Bosna. Who joining himselfe with this deceitfull captaine of Alexandria, with an armie of twentie thousand men entred into Bosna; where ouerrunning a side of the country, he without resistance tooke great booties: and seeing no apparant cause of feare, to doe the more harme, by the aduice of the same captain diuided his armie, which he sent into diuers parts of the country, the more to burne and spoyle the same. Of all whose proceedings the King of Bosna by secret messengers from the captain aduertised, had in conuenient places layd strong ambushes for the intercepting of his enemies. So that as Schahin was returning homeward with a rich bootie, hauing then with him but a thousand men, suddenly appeared in his way thirtie thousand Christians well armed: which Schahin seeing, thinking it follie to oppose so few against so many, would F haue presently fled; but the rest of the gallants that were with him, presuming of their good fortune, and loth to lose their rich prey, would needs first skirmish with the Christians: in which desperat conflict they were almost all slaine, and the spoyle they had taken, all recouered by the Christians. As for Schahin, he was glad by shameful flight to saue himselfe. The like mishap befell the other Turkes in the other parts of Bosna, who for the most part were likewise

wise intercepted and slaine: so that of twenty thousand, scarce fiue thousand returned home. G Amurath marrieth the Emperor of Constantinoples daughter.

Whilest these things were doing in Europe, Amurath in great triumph at Neapolis married the Emperor of Constantinople his daughter: whose two sisters were also giuen in marriage to his two sons: at which time he with great solemnity circumcised three of Baiazets sons. At this time also returned Iazigi Ogli, whom he had before sent Embassador to the Sultan of Ægypt, in requitall of the honorable embassage before to him sent from the said Sultan. Now Amurath vnderstanding of the losse of his men in Bosna, with the reuolt of Lazarus Despot of Seruia, was therewith much disquieted. Wherefore he commanded Alis Bassa his chiefe councellor, with all speed to send forth commissions into all parts of his kingdome, for the leuying of a royall armie: which was done in such post hast, that it was thought he would haue taken the field before the beginning of the Spring. At which time also the other Mahometan H Kings and Princes of Asia, Caraman Ogli, Teke Ogli, and the rest, bound vnto him by homage, with diuers others of smaller power, were sent for, to aid him in this warre: who partly for feare, and partly mooued with the zeale of their Mahometane superstition, brought their forces with great deuotion. Vnto this war against the Christians, came also great numbers of the Mahometans from far countries, as voluntarie soldiers. Baiazet his sonne also, then gouernor of Cutaie, with a great part of Galatia, gathring all his forces, came to aid his father in this religious war (as it was by them termed.) The Christian tributarie Princes were not then forgotten; of whom two came, namely Custendil and Seratzil: other two forsaking Amurath, came not, which was Sasmenos Prince of Bulgaria, and the Prince of Varna and Dobritza; with whom Amurath was highly offended. In the time of this so great preparation, old Lala Shahin, I Amuraths tutor and faithfull seruitor, died, being a man of great yeres: and Temurtases was appointed gouernor in his place.

The reuolting of the two Christian Princes, Sasmenos and the Prince of Varna, much grieued Amurath: Wherefore he commanded Alis Bassa, with an armie of thirtie thousand to inuade and spoyle Sasmenos his countrey, now called Bulgaria, and in antient time the lower Mysia. Alis Bassa according to that was giuen him in charge, calling vnto him Iaxis Beg the son of Temurtases, Vlu Beg, Suratze Bassa, with other captaines and commanders of the Turkes prouinces in Europe, assembled an armie of thirtie thousand for the inuasion of Bulgaria. With this armie the Bassa tooke many strong townes and castles in Bulgaria, as Pirauade, Venuzina, Madra, Suni, and others.

In the mean time, whilest Alis Bassa had thus begun the wars against the Christians in Bulgaria, Amurath hauing gathered a great Armie in Asia, determined in the beginning of the Spring to passe ouer with the same into Europe: commending the gouernment of his Countries in Asia, to Temurtases Bassa, Ferices Beg, Temurtases Subbassa, Cutlu Beg, & Haza Beg: and so all things set in order in Asia, he drew downe his Asian forces toward Hellespontus, where he was a while stayed with contrarie winds, but was afterwards transported to Callipolis, by Ienitze Beg Sanzack there. This was the third time that Amurath brought his armie out of Asia into Europe. But whilest he stayed at Callipolis, Baiazet his son with a great power came vnto him thither: Alis Bassa also vnderstanding of Amuraths arriuall in Europe, retyred out of Bulgaria, and came to him at Alcide, recounting vnto him the whole successe of his expedition L into Bulgaria.

Sasmenos Prince of Bulgaria, seeing his countrey spoyled, his strong cities and castles taken by the Turks, and withal hearing of their great preparations for war; by the aduice of his nobilitie thought it best betimes againe to submit himselfe vnto Amurath: wherefore tying a winding sheet about his necke, in token that he had deserued death (after the manner of the Barbarians) he came to Amurath at Calcide, where falling flat vpon the ground, at the horses feet whereon Amurath sate, he in most humble wise craued pardon, offring by a certain day to deliuer Silistria the chiefe city of his dominion, into Amuraths possession, as a pledge of his fidelitie: who thereupon granted him pardon, and to assure him of his fauor, commanded a rich garment to be cast vpon him, after the manner of the Turkes, sending Alis Bassa at the time ap- M appointed, to take possession of Silistria. But Sasmenos repenting himself of that he had so largely promised, would not deliuer his citie, but in strongest manner hee could presently fortified the same. Wherewith Amurath more offended than before, commanded the Bassa with fire and sword againe to spoyle and wast his Countrey: who according to his commaundement entred

A entred againe into Bulgaria, and stucke such a terrour of his comming into the hearts of the people, that many strong places were voluntarily yeelded into his power, namely Diritze, Cossoua, with the citie Ternoua, the seat of the Princes court; Tzerneui, Nouakestri, Zistoua, with diuers others: and proceeding farther, he layed siege to Nicopolis, the strongest city of Bulgaria, vpon the side of the great riuer Danubius, whether Sasmenos was for feare himselfe fled. Who finding himselfe vnable to hold out the siege, once againe (with shame enough) tying a winding sheet about his necke, as he had done before, and taking his sonne with him, went out of the citie, and in most abiect manner falling downe at the Bassa his feet, craued pardon: which the Bassa, moued with compassion to see the miserie of so great a man, and hauing alreadie taken from him the greatest part of his dominion, and now out of feare of B further resistance, easily granted. And hauing thus ended the Bulgarian warre, returned to Amurath, of whom he was right ioyfully receiued.

Amurath had now made great preparation for the inuading of Seruia, for which purpose hee had drawne ouer into Europe the greatest forces he possibly could out of Asia: sending also for his yongest sonne Iacup, gouernor of Carasia, who vnderstanding his fathers pleasure, repaired vnto him with all the power he could make. This army by Amurath thus assembled, was the greatest that euer was before that, brought by the Turkes into Europe. Lazerus not ignorant of this great preparation made by Amurath, had drawne into the society of this war, the King of Bosna (as is aforesaid) with Vulcus Prince of Macedonia, his sonne in law, who both brought vnto him great ayd: he had also by his embassadours procured great supplies C from other Christian Kings and Princes, out of Valachia, Hungaria, Croatia, Sclauonia, Albania, Bulgaria, and Italie, besides great numbers of other voluntarie deuout Christians, which all assembled and met together, did in number farre exceed the great armie of the Turkes.

The castle of Sarkiue with the city ioyning vnto it, taken by the Christians and rased.

With this army Lazarus the Despot encamped vpon the side of the riuer Morona the greater, not farre from whence stood the strong castle of Sarkiue, which Alis Bassa had of late taken from Sasmenos the Bulgarian Prince, standing as it were betwixt Bulgaria and Seruia: this castle being now possessed of the Turkes, was thought by Lazarus dangerous to his country, who therefore sent one Demetrius, a right valiant captaine, with certaine companies of select men to take in the same. The name of this captaine Demetrius, was a generall terrour vnto the D Turks, for the harme he had done them: so that they in the castle hearing that he was come, without further resistance yeelded the same vnto him. Whereof Amurath vnderstanding, sent Eine, and Sarutze Bassa to recouer the same: but Lazarus doubting that the castle would hardly bee kept in that dangerous warre, sent Vulcus his sonne in law with twentie thousand men, to bring away all that was therein, and in the citie neere vnto it, lest it should become a prey vnto the greedie Turks; which he accordingly did, and at the same time rased both the castle and the city, before the comming of Iaxis Beg, sent from Amurath to haue done the same exploit; which he comming thither, found alreadie done to his hand by Vulcus.

As Amurath was marching towards Seruia, Seratze and Custendyl, two Christian Princes his tributaries, met him with their forces, whom hee caused to march before him, as his guides: E and passing thorow Custendyl his countrey, was there refreshed with plenty of all things necessarie: vntill at length passing the riuer of Moroua the lesse, he drew so neere to the plaines of Cossoua (where the Christian armie lay) that he with his sonne Baiazet from a little hil tooke full view of the Christian campe, which was so great, that it couered all those large plaines from side to side, and so daunted Amurath, as that returning to his armie, he presently entered into a great consultation with his greatest captaines and commaunders, what course to take against such a puissant enemie.

These great armies being now come so nigh together, as that they might the one wel descry the other, Amurath had purposed the same day to haue giuen the Christians battel: but being dissuaded by Eurenoses, both for that it was extreame hot, & his soldiers wearied with trauell, he rested that night. The next morning as soone as it was day, he put his armie in order of F battell, placing his sonne Baiazet with Eurenoses and Eine Beg Subbassa, in the right wing; his youngest son Iacup, with Sarutze Bassa in the left wing; the maine battel he led himselfe. Lazarus in the meane time had also set his army in good order: giuing the charge of the right wing to Vulcus his son in law; the left wing was led by the King of Bosna, and his sons; in the maine maine battell ſtood Lazerus himſelfe; the Italians, Valachians, Hungarians, Bohemians, and Bulgarians, he placed in both wings. It is thought, greater armies than thoſe two had ſeldom before met in Europe. Lazarus as the Turkiſh Hiſtories report (but how truly I know not) hauing in his armie fiue hundred thouſand men; and Amurath ſcarce halfe ſo many. G

To begin the battel, Amurath had drawne a thouſand of his beſt archers, vnder the leading of Maleozzeus, out of the right wing of his armie; & the like number of archers out of the left, vnder the conduct of one Muſtapha: which ſo placed on both ſides of the army, as he thought beſt, Eurenoſes a man of great experience, told Amurath, That the Chriſtians were for the moſt part wel and ſtrongly armed, & ſhouldring cloſe together in their charge, would be like a rock of yron, vnable to be pierced: but if in ioyning the battell, he would a little retire, the Chriſtians following vpon good hope, would ſo looſe their cloſe ſtanding (the chiefe part of their H ſtrength) and leaue an entrance for his men. Vpon which reſolution, Amurath commanded the archers to giue the firſt charge: which they courageouſly performed. At which time, the Turks army gaue ground a litle: which the Chriſtians perceiuing, with great force aſſailed the left wing of their armie, and after a hard & cruell fight put the ſame to flight: which Baiazet ſeeing, with ſuch fury renewed the battel, that the Turks wich before as men diſcouraged fled in the left wing, began now to turn again vpon their enemies; & the Chriſtians, hauing as they thought already got the victory, were to begin a great battell. In which bloudy fight many thouſands fel on both ſides: the brightnes of the armor & weapons, was as it had bin the lightning: the multitude of launces and other horſemens ſtaues, ſhadowed the light of the ſun: arrows and darts fell ſo faſt, that a man would haue thought they had powred down from heauen, the noiſe of the inſtruments of war, with the neighing of horſes, and outcries of men was ſo terrible and great, that the wild beaſts in the mountains ſtood aſtonied therewith: and the Turkiſh hiſtories, to expreſſe the terror of the day (vainly ſay) that the Angels in heauen amaſed with that hideous noiſe, for that time forgot the heauenly hymns wherwith they alwaies glorifie God. About noon time of the day, the fortune of the Turks preuailing, the Chriſtians began to giue ground, & at length betooke themſelues to plaine fight; whom the Turks with all their force purſued and ſlew them down right, without number or mercy. In which battel Lazarus ſlaine. Lazarus the Deſpot himſelfe was alſo ſlain. Howbeit ſome hiſtories report otherwiſe, as that he with his ſon were taken priſoners, and by and by afterwards (in reuenge of Amurath his death) cruelly ſlain: other ſome alſo reporting that he died in priſon. Amurath after this great K victorie, with ſome few of his chiefe captains taking view of the dead bodies, which without number lay on heaps in the field like mountaines; a Chriſtian ſouldier, ſore wounded and all bloodie, ſeeing him, in ſtaggering manner aroſe (as if it had bin from death) out of a heape of ſlain men, and making towards him, for want of ſtrength fell down diuers times by the way as he came, as if he had been a drunken man: at length drawing nigh vnto him, when they which guarded the Kings perſon would haue ſtayed him, he was by Amurath himſelfe commanded to come neerer; ſuppoſing, that hee would haue craued his life of him. Thus the halfe dead Chriſtian preſſing neere vnto him, as if he would for honor ſake haue kiſſed his feet, ſuddenly Amurath ſlain. ſtabbed him in the bottome of his bellie with a ſhort dagger, which he had vnder his ſoldiers coat: of which wound that great King and conquerour preſently died. The name of this man, L (for his courage worthy of eternall memorie) was Miles Cobelitz: who before ſore wounded was ſhortly after in the preſence of Baiazet cut into ſmall pieces. The Turks in their Annales ſomewhat otherwiſe report of the death of Amurath: as that this Cobelitz, one of the Deſpot his ſeruants, in time of the battell, comming to Amurath as a fugitiue, offering him his ſeruice and admitted to his preſence, in humbling himſelfe to haue kiſſed his feete (as the barbarous manner of the Turks is) ſtabbed him into the bellie and ſo ſlew him: being himſelfe therefore ſhortly after (as is aforeſaid) in the preſence of Baiazet moſt cruell hewen into ſmall peeces. Whereupon euer ſince that time, the manner of the Turks hath been, and yet is, that when any Embaſſadour or ſtranger is to come to kiſſe the Sultan his hand, or otherwiſe to approch his perſon, he is as it were for honours ſake, led by the armes vnto his preſence, betwixt two of the M great courtiers: but indeed by ſo intangling him, to be ſure that he ſhall not offer him the like violence, that did this Cobelits vnto Amurath.

The dead bodie of Amurath was preſently with all ſecrecie conueyed into his tent by the Baſſaes and captaines preſent at his death: whether Baiazet was alſo brought with an enſigne before

A before him, as the ſucceſſour in his fathers kingdome. His yonger brother Iacup, ſyrnamed Zelebi (or the noble) yet ignorant of that had hapned, was by the great Baſſaes ſent for, as from his father: who caſting no perill, but comming into his fathers tent, was there preſently by them ſtrangled, by the commandement of Baiazet, as moſt hiſtories report: howbeit the Turks annales charge him not therewith. This was the beginning of the moſt vnnaturall and inhumane cuſtome, euer ſince holden for a moſt wholeſome and good policie among the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors, in the beginning of their raigne moſt cruelly to maſſacre their brethren and neereſt kinſmen, ſo at once to rid themſelues of all feare of their competitors.

This Amurath was in his ſuperſtition more zealous than any other of the Turkiſh Kings; a man of great courage, and in all his attempts fortunate: he made greater ſlaughter of his ene- B mies, than both his father and grandfather: his kingdome in Aſia he greatly inlarged by the ſword, marriage, and purchaſe: and vſing the diſcord and cowardiſe of the Grecian Princes, to his profit, ſubdued a great part of Thracia, called Romania, with the territories thereto adioyning, leauing vnto the Emperour of Conſtantinople, litle or nothing more in Thracia, than the imperiall citie it ſelfe, with the bare name of an Emperour, almoſt without an empire: he woon a great part of Bulgaria, and entred into Seruia, Boſna, and Macedonia: hee was liberall, and withall ſeuere: of his ſubiects both beloued and feared: a man of very few wordes, and one that could diſſemble deeply. He was ſlaine when he was threeſcore and eight yeares old, and had thereof raigned thirtie one, in the yeare of our Lord 1390. His dead bodie was by Baiazet conueied into Aſia, and there royally buried at Pruſa, in a faire chappell at the Weſt Amurath buried at Pruſa. C end of the citie, neere vnto the Bathes there: where, vpon his tombe lyeth his ſouldiers cloake, with a little Turkiſh tulipant, much differing from thoſe great turbants which the Turks now weare. Neere vnto the ſame tombe are placed three launces, with three horſe tailes faſtened at the vpper end of them, which he vſed as guidons in his wars: a thing in ancient time not ſtrange. There ſtandeth a caſtle with a tombe, made in remembrance of him, in the plaines of Coſſoua, where hee was ſlaine and his entrailes buried: which giueth occaſion for ſome to report that he was there alſo himſelfe enterred.

Fulminis in morem celeri rapit agmina motu Baiazethes, fidei pacis & impatiens.
Regni Hadrianopolim sedes sibi legit vt esset, Posset vt Europæ iungere regna suis.
Constantinopolim gemina obsidione fatigat: Iam Græcas vana spe sibi spondet opes.
Cum Tamburlano præbet sua terga, catenis Vinctus, & in cauea probra pudenda subit.

Proud Baiazet most false of faith, and loathing blessed peace, His warlike troupes like lightning, to shake he doth not cease.
Of Hadrianople he makes choice for his imperiall seat, That Europes kingdome he might ioyne vnto his Empire great.
Constantinople he distrest twice with strait siege and long:
And vainly thought to haue possest the Grecians wealth by wrong.
But ouercome by Tamberlane, fast bound in fetters sure, Trod vnder foot, and cloas'd in cage, great shame did there endure.

THE LIFE OF BAIAZET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE FOVRTH AND MOST VNFORTVNATE KING OF THE TVRKES.

C Aiazet, or as the Turks call him, Baiasit, of his violent and fierce nature syrnamed Gilderun, or lightning, succeeded his father Amurath in the Turkish kingdome, his younger brother Iacup being strangled immediatly after his fathers death, as is before declared. He in the first yeare of his raigne inuaded Seruia, and there besieged Cratoua, a citie of the Despors: whereunto the siluer mines of Seruia (not the least cause of that warre) belonged. Which city was yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That the Christian inhabitants might with life and libertie depart. Who were no sooner gone out of the city, but that by his commandement they were all most cruelly slaine by his men of war, for that purpose sent out after them. At this time he also woon Vscupia, with diuers other castles in the country neere vnto Cratoua. Baiazet inuadeth Seruia.

D Sigismund at the same time king of Hungarie (a young Prince of great hope, and brother to Wenceslans, then Emperour of the West) aduertised from the Seruians his allies and confederates, of these proud proceedings of Baiazet; by his embassadours sent of purpose, requested him, That as he was a iust Prince, and wished to liue in quiet with his owne, to desist from doing of such open wrong, and from inuading of such countries of his friends and confederates, as he had no right in. Which Embassadours so sent, Baiazet detained without answere, vntill such time as hee had ouerrun a great part of the Despot his countrey, and therein done what he thought good. Then calling the said Embassadours vnto him into one of the strong townes which he had in euery corner filled with his owne souldiers, told them that they might there see, that his right both vnto that towne and the rest by him taken, was good enough, for as much as the very wals acknowledged the same: And so giuing them leaue to depart, willed E them so to tell their master. Which his proud answer, by the same embassadours reported vnto the young King, no lesse troubled him, than if open warre had by them beene denounced vnto him, seeing the tyrant (as it should seeme) pretended right vnto whatsoeuer he could by force get: neuertheles, being himself'e not yet wel setled in his kingdom, and in doubt of the contrary faction (that altogether liked not of his election into Hungarie for their King) hee was glad at that time to put it vp, and so to hold himselfe content.

The next yeare, Baiazet by Serises Beg, tooke the citie of Vidina, with many other strong townes and castles in Seruia, and afterwards returned to Hadrianople. But whilest that hee thus raged in Europe, the Caramanian King inuaded and spoiled the frontiers of his countries in Asia: which although hee was not then at leisure, hee forgot not afterwards to reuenge to F the full. At the same time Eurenoses, Lord gouernour of the marches of his kingdome in Europe towards Grecia, departing from Seres (where hee then lay) tooke the Citie of Sitros in Thessalia. And Serises Beg, not content to haue taken Vidina (as is aforesaide) passed ouer the great Riuer of Danubius, and grieuously spoiled Valachia: From whence hee returned loaden with a great prey. This was the first time (that I read of) that the Turks euer passed Seruia the second time inuaded by Baiazet.

sed ouer the Riuer Danubius. At this time also Iegides Bassa entred the kingdome of Bosna, from whence he carried a great number of captiues to Hadrianople, where Baiazet spent that Winter.

In the beginning of the next Spring Baiazet passed ouer Hellespontus to Prusa, where hee built a faire Mahometan temple, with a colledge, and an almes-house: which works finished, he returned againe into Europe, and built a monasterie at Hadrianople: and so returned again into Asia, leauing Temurtases, Begler-Beg (or his viceroy) in Hadrianople. After he was come into Asia, he laid siege to the strong city of Philadelphia in Lydia, which was at that time the onely citie in the lesser Asia, yet holden by the Christians in the middest of the Mahometane Princes: for now was the Greeke Emperour by the Othoman Kings & the other Turks quite driuen out of the lesser Asia. In the beginning of this siege, Baiazet gaue straight commandement to his souldiers, That they shall not spoile or hurt any thing in the countrey belonging to the citizens: hoping by such faigned courtesie to make them the more willing to yeeld themselues vnto his obedience. But disappointed of his expectation, and finding them resolued to hold it out vnto the last, he forthwith gaue out contrarie commandement, not to spare any thing they could waste or destroy: which was accordingly by his greedie souldiers performed. After long siege, the citizens seeing the country about them vtterly wasted, & themselues vnable longer to indure, and out of all hope of reliefe, yeelded their citie vnto the pleasure of Baiazet. It is written by some, that this famous citie was not besieged without the consent of the Emperor of Constantinople: and that the Greeks themselues, moued with enuie to see that citie so long hold out, did helpe the Turkes in the winning thereof.

Philadelphia besieged by Baiazet.

In time of this siege Aidin Ogli Prince of Caria, a Mahometane, came to Baiazet, and yeelded himselfe into his power as his vassale: vnto whom Baiazet restored certain places which he had in this expedition a little before taken from him: yet vpon such condition, as that hee should not from that time coine any mony in his own name, either be remembred in publick praiers as a prince in their Mahometan temples, as he had before bin: but that all such things should be done in the name of Baiazet, as his dread Lord & Soueraigne. With which disgrace the poore Prince was glad to content himselfe, and to liue as his vassale. From Philadelphia he led his armie into the country of Saruchania, in ancient time called Ionia Maritima, which he subdued vnto himselfe vpon like conditions. After that, he passed farther to Mentesia, or Mentz, sometime called Myndos in Caria; the Prince whereof for feare fled to Cutrun Baiazet, Prince of Castamona and part of Pontus, leauing his countrey to the pleasure of the Tyrant. And forasmuch as the young King of Caramania had inuaded his countries whilest he was busied in Europe, Baiazet in reuenge thereof entred with his armie into Caramania, and tooke Cesaria, with diuers other places there: so that the young King discouraged with the losse of his townes, and fearing Baiazet his greatnesse, was glad to hold himselfe content with his losse, and to make peace with him as it pleased him to grant it. As Baiazet was making this expedition into Caramania, another young Mahometan Prince, the sonne of Prince Germian, came vnto him with one of his chiefe counsellors, and were both by him sent prisoners ouer the strait to the castle of Ipsala, where they lay in durance many yeares after. Thus Baiazet hauing oppressed & wronged most of the Mahometan Princes, the successors of Sultan Aladin in the lesser Asia, at last returned againe himselfe in triumph to Prusa.

The Prince of Mentesia, who for feare of Baiazet was fled out of his countrey, as is aforesaid, had now incited Cutrun Baiazet, Prince of Castamona, with a great power to inuade that side of Baiazet his kingdome which bordered vpon him. Which Baiazet vnderstanding, gathered a great armie to goe against this Mahometane Prince. At which very time the Vayuod of Valachia, hearing of Baiazet his troubles in Asia, with a strong armie passed ouer Danubius into those parts of Seruia and Bulgaria that were by the Turks as then possessed; where he spoyled the countrey, and slew great numbers of the Turkes, making Mahometan Saints and martyrs by heapes: for so the Turkes account all them whom the Christians kill in their warre: which done, hee retired backe againe into Valachia, carrying with him also many of the Turkes prisoners. Baiazet thus at once inuaded both in Asia and Europe, deferred his warres purposed against the Prince of Pontus, vntill a more conuenient time, conuerting his forces against the Valachians. Wherefore passing ouer the straite to Hadrianople, hee sent his armie from thence to Nicopolis, and there passing the Riuer of Danubius, entered into into Valachia, burning and spoiling the countrey before him as he went. Where the Vayuod to represse his furie, met him in the field and gaue him battell, but was therein ouerthrowne, and many of his people slaine; so that at last he was glad to sue for peace, which he obtained, by submitting himselfe to Baiazet, and yeelding to pay him a yearely tribute.

Whilest Baiazet was thus busied in Valachia, newes was brought vnto him, That the Christians of the West with a fleet of Gallies did great harme alongst the coasts of his dominions in Asia. In reuenge whereof, he entred with his armie into Thessalie, destroying all the countrey vnto Thessalonica: in which expedition he tooke the Citie of Neapolis in Greece, and Ioannina in Ætolia, and after that returned into Asia, where he spent that Winter.

Thessalia inuaded by Baiazet.

In the beginning of the next Spring, he with a great power passed the strait of Callipolis to Hadrianople, intending to haue inuaded Hungarie. But as he was vpon the way, it chanced that a Constantinopolitan spie was by the Turks intercepted, with letters from the Greeke Emperor to the King of Hungarie, giuing him warning both of the Turks preparation & comming. By which spie Baiazet also vnderstood of another messenger before sent into Hungarie for like purpose. Whereupon Temurtases (then his great lieutenant in Europe) perswaded him to desist from his intended wars in Hungarie, and to besiege the imperial city of Constantinople, as a thing of more honour, and lesse danger; the city being alreadie (as he said, and as in truth it was) surrounded with the Turkish prouinces: bringing in Philadelphia (but a few yeres before woon) for example of the like exploit. Of whose councell Baiazet liking well, returned with his armie, and shortly after came & sate downe therewith before Constantinople, laying hard siege thereunto, first by land, and after by sea, with his gallies sent from Callipolis. Which hard siege continued (as most histories report) the space of eight yeres: in which long time he draue the Emperor Emanuel Palæologus to that strait, that he was glad to leaue his city, & himselfe in person to craue aid of Wenceslaus the Germane Emperour, and Charles the sixth the French King, and other Christian Princes also. At which time the Citisens were at length brought to such extremitie, that they were euen at the point to haue yeelded vp the city; and happely had so done, had not Sigismund King of Hungarie (assisted with a great armie of the French, & other voluntarie Christians almost out of euery part of Christendome, to the number of an hundred and thirty thousand, vnder the leading of Iohn Countie of Niuers, and after Duke of Burgondie) for the reliefe of the besieged Emperour, passed ouer Danubius into the Turkish dominions; and there hauing recouered Vidina, with certaine other strong Holds in Bulgaria, layd siege to Nicopolis: out of which citie the Turkes oftentimes sallied, and gaue him many an hot skirmish. It is reported, That the yong King Sigismund beholding the greatnesse of his armie, in his great iollitie hearing of the comming of the Turkes Armie, should proudly say, What need we to feare the Turke, who need not at all to feare the falling of the heauens; which if they should fall, yet were we able with our speares and halberts to hold them vp for falling vpon vs. But Baiazet vnderstanding what spoyle the Hungarian King had made in his late gained Countries, and of the siege of Nicopolis; commanded the ladders and other great prouision now in readinesse for the scaling and assaulting of the citie of Constantinople, to be burnt, because they should not come into the hands of the Christians; & so raising his siege, marched with a right puissant armie to Nicopolis, sending Eurenoses before, of purpose to intercept some of the Christians, thereby to learne the state of their campe and armie. But they hearing of his comming, so well looked to themselues, that he with shame returned to his master as he came, without any one prisoner taken. Which thing much troubled Baiazet, as fearing he should haue to doe with a warie enemie. Sigismund vnderstanding of the approch of Baiazet, leauing a sufficient power for the continuing of the siege, rose himselfe, and with the rest of his Armie went to meet his proud enemie. Of whose comming and approch Baiazet vnderstanding, diuided his Armie into two parts; and being now come within the sight of the Christian Armie, made shew but of the one halfe, keeping himselfe close in secret ambush not farre off with the other. The Christians deeming themselues (as they were) far more in number than the Turkes which they saw, diuided their Armie also into two parts, purposing betwixt them to haue inclosed the Turks. Of all the Christians that were there present, the French desired to haue the honour of the first charge to be giuen vpon the Turks, and in their heat vpon good hope set forward (the Hungarians, with a great part of the Armie, not yet set in order) and so began the battell: where betwixt them and the Turkes was fought a right cruell

Constantinople eight yeares besieged by Baiazet.

cruell fight, and in a little time many thousands slaine. But this fight had not long endured, C when Baiazet with the other half of his armie suddenly arising, came on with such violence, as well became his syrname of Ildirim or lightning; and so hardly charged the French, that they amased at the suddennesse of the danger, and oppressed with the furie and multitude of the vnexpected enemy, stood at the first as men dismaid; but seeing no remedie, encouraging one another, valiantly fought it out vntill they were almost all either slaine or taken prisoners; still in hope to haue been relieued by the Hungarians and the rest. In this hard conflict diuers of the French horsemen hauing forsaken their horses, fought on foot, as their manner was: which horses running backe without their riders, vpon the Hungarians, caused them to doubt that the French were quite ouerthrowne; wherewith dismayed, they without further comming on, all turned their backs and fled, in so great hast, as that it booted not the King or ny H other great commander to goe about to stay their flight. The French thus by their too much hast ouerthrowne, the Turks pursuing the Hungarians and the rest of the Christians, made of them a great slaughter: of whom also many were drowned in the great riuer Danubius. At which time also the Turks tooke so many prisoners, that it was thought euery seuerall Turke had his prisoner. King Sigismund himselfe, who but a little before had despised euen the falling of the heauens, had then also vndoubtedly fallen into his enemies hands, had he not in a little boat by good hap got ouer Danubius: not vnlike another Xerxes, who hauing couered the seas with his ships, & with a world of men passed ouer into Grecia, was afterwards by the strange change of fortune, himself alone in a smal fisher boat glad to get back again into Asia. Sigismund beeing thus got ouer Danubius, and fearing the violence of the Hungarians for the I losse of the battell, fled by sea into Thracia vnto Constantinople, from whence he sailed vnto the Iland of the Rhodes; and from thence sailing thorow the Ægean and Ionian sea, landed at length at Dalmatia; and so hauing wandred from place to place, tossed with many fortunes, after eighteene moneths long and painefull trauell returned againe into Hungary. Where hee found the state of his kingdome in his absence much troubled, the contrarie faction in the meane time hauing made choice of Ladislaus King of Naples for their King; who was euen then with a great armie going to haue taken possession of the kingdome, had not Sigismund in good time, by the helpe of certaine of the chiefe of the Hungarian nobilitie preuented him. In this battell, called the battell of Nicopolis, were of the Christians twentie thousand slain, and of the Turks three score thousand. The Countie of Niuiers the French Kings neere kinsman, I was there taken prisoner, with three hundred great commanders more: where after hee had endured great contumelie and reproch in the presence of Baiazet, he was commanded to make choice of fiue other of the captaines, such as he liked best, all the rest beeing cut in pieces before his face, and hee with the other fiue left aliue, sent prisoners to Prusa, from whence they were afterwards ransomed for two hundred thousand Duckats. This bloudie battell of Nicopolis was fought in the yere of our Lord 1396.

Constantinople the second time besieged by Baiazet.

Baiazet after this great victorie, hauing worthily relieued his besieged citie, returned againe to the siege of Constantinople, laying more hardly vnto it than before, building forts and bulwarks against it on the one side towards the land; and passing ouer the straight of Bosphorus, built a strong castle vpon that strait ouer against Constantinople, to impeach so much as was L possible, all passage thereunto by sea. This streight siege (as most write) continued also two yeres, which I suppose by the circumstance of the historie, to haue been part of the aforesaid eight yeres. Emanuel the besieged Emperor wearied with these long wars, sent an embassador to Baiazet to intreat with him a peace: which Baiazet was the more willing to hearken vnto, for that he heard newes, that Tamerlane the great Tartarian Prince intended shortly to warre vpon him. Yet could this peace not be obtained, but vpon condition, that the emperor should grant free libertie for the Turks to dwell together in one street of Constantinople, with free exercise of their owne religion and lawes, vnder a judge of their owne nation; and further, to pay vnto the Turkish King a yeerely tribute of ten thousand duckats. Which dishonourable conditions the distressed Emperor was glad to accept of. So was this long siege broken vp, M and presently a great sort of Turks with their families were sent out of Bithynia, to dwell in Constantinople, and a church there built for them: which not long after was by the Emperor pulled downe to the ground, and the Turks againe driuen out of the citie, at such time as Baiazet was by the mightie Tamerlane ouerthrowne and taken prisoner.

A Baiazet in the beginning of his raigne, presently after the death of Lazarus the Despot, slain in the battell of Cossoua, woon part of Seruia, (as is aforesaid) the other part beeing still holden by Lazarus his son, called Stephen the Despot; who about this time sent an honorable embassador to Baiazet with louing letters, and royall Presents: by which embassador also the old Princesse Lazarus his widow, offred her faire daughter Despina, Stephens sister, a lady of incomparable beauty, in mariage to him, if it should please him to vouchsafe his handmaid (as she termed her) so high a place. This lady was long before promised him, whilest his father Amurath yet liued. Of this embassador Baiazet was verie glad, but especially for the faire ladies sake: which being known to the Princes her mother, & the Despot her brother, she was forthwith honorably sent to Baiazet, and so to him with great solemnitie and triumph shortly after ma- Baiazet marieth Despina the faire daughter of Lazarus the Despot.
B ried. Of all his wiues he held her deerest, and for her sake restored to her brother Stephen the citie & castle of Semendre (otherwise called S. Andrew) and Columbarium in Seruia: she allured him to drink wine, forbidden the Turks by their law; and caused him to delight in sumptuous banquets, which his predecessors, Othoman, Orchanes, and Amurath, neuer vsed.

As the Turkish kingdome grew in greatnesse, so corruption, the canker of great states and commonweales, increased likewise; but especially in the men of law, and judges of his courts. Wherewith Baiazet grieuously offended, commanded diuers of the same judges to be apprehended, determinig (to the terror of others) to haue executed them; whose dangerous estate was much pitied, and also fauoured of Alis Bassa, and other the Kings great Councellors: yet for so much as Baiazet was of a furious nature, and in his anger dangerous to be spoken vnto, C none of them durst aduenture to intreat him in their behalfe; no not Alis Bassa, Charadyn Bassa his sonne, sometime Iudge of Prusa, although he were a man in such speciall fauour with him, that he was therefore of the common people not onely reuerenced, but as the King himselfe honoured.

There was at that time in the court an Æthiopian jeaster, who vnder some couert pleasant jeast, would many times bolt out that to the king in his greatest heat, which his graues councellors durst not once speake to him of in secret: this jester, Alis Bassa requested to deuise some means to intreat with the angrie King in the behalfe of these Iudges; promising to giue him what he would reasonably desire, if he could appease the Kings displeasure. The Æthyopian without feare vndertooke the matter, & presently putting vpon his head a rich hat al wrought D ouer with gold, after the manner of the Turks embassadors, and fitting himselfe with other apparell better beseeming an embassador than a jeaster; thus attired presented himselfe before the King, with a great counterfeit grauitie. Whereat Baiazet maruelling, asked him the cause why he was so gay. I haue a request vnto your Maiesty (said he) and wish to find fauor in your sight. Baiazet more desirous than before to know the matter, asked what his request was. If it stand with your pleasure (said the jeaster) I would faine go as your embassador to the emperor of Constantinople, in hope whereof I haue put my selfe in this readinesse. To what purpose wouldst thou go? (said Baiazet) To craue of the Emperor (said he) some forty or fifty of his old graue Monks and Friers to bring with me hither to the court. And what should they doe bere? (said Baiazet) I would haue them placed (said the jeaster) in the roomes of the old do-E ting judges, whom you intend (as I heare) to put to death. Why (said Baiazet) I can place others of my own people in their roomes. True (said the Æthyopian) for grauitie of look and countenance, and so would the old Monks and Friers serue as well; but not so learned in your laws and customes of your kingdome, as are those in your displeasure. If they be learned (said Baiazet) why do they then contrary to their learning, peruert justice, and take bribes? There is a good reason for that too (said the jeaster.) What reason? (said the King.) That can hee that there standeth by tell better than I, (said the jeaster, pointing to Alis Bassa:) who forthwith commanded by Baiazet to giue the reason; with great reuerence before done, shewed, That those Iudges so in displeasure, were not conueniently prouided for, and were therefore inforF ced many times for their necessarie maintenance to take rewards, to the staying of the due course of justice. Which Baiazet vnderstanding to be true, commanded Alis Bassa to appoint them conuenient stipends for their maintenance, and forthwith granted their pardon. Whereupon the Bassa set downe order, That of euerie matter in suit exceeding one thousand Aspers, the Iudge should haue twentie Aspers fee for judgment; and for euery writing and instrument out of the court, twelue Aspers: which fees they yet take in those courts at this day.

Not long after, Baiazet in his furie ſent for certain of his captaines and commanders of his men of war, with whom he was for ſome ſmall occaſion grieuouſly offended, intending in his rage to haue put them all to death, which was with him no great matter. Theſe captains being brought before him, the councellors ſeeing him al in choler, ſat looking on the ground, hanging down their heads, as the manner of the Turks is, not daring to looke him in the face, nor to ſpeak a good word for them. When ſuddenly the aforeſaid Æthiopian jeaſter ſtept forth, earneſtly requeſting the king, not to ſhew them any fauour, but to execute them preſently, as villains & traitors; railing vpon them, as if he had known ſome great fault by them. Baiazet thinking he could haue accuſed them of ſome great crime, becauſe of his earneſtneſſe, asked what reaſon he had ſo to exclaime againſt them. Reaſon, (quoth the jeaſter) becauſe the knaues be good for nothing; and they ſay that Tamerlane is with a great army comming againſt vs: if you wil but take vp an enſigne in your hand, and I go before you with a drum, I wil ſtrike vp ſuch a terrible march, and you make ſuch a dreadfull ſhew, that we ſhall need none of theſe bad fellows or their ſoldiers in the field to get the victory ouer our enemies. This conceit of the jeaſter ſtruck ſuch a melancholie imagination into Baiazet his head, that hee ſtood muſing a great while as it were in a deepe ſtudie: at laſt hauing well conſidered the drift of the jeſters ſpeech, and his furie now ſomewhat aſſuaged, granted them pardon, which they looked not for.

This Æthyopian jeaſter, Baiazet vpon a time ſent vnto the old Queene his mother, to bring her newes of the good ſucceſſe of his wars againſt the Chriſtians, for that ſhe had ſo deſired: who comming vnto her, of by her commanded to ſit down, ſhe began to demand of him, how the King her ſonne did, and of the ſucceſſe of his wars. Whereunto he anſwered, That hee did very wel, and had woon from the Chriſtians a great countrey, and greatly inriched his ſoldiers. But after a little more talke, the Queene mother deſirous to heare againe the good newes, (or elſe after the manner of ſome, which thinke nothing ſufficiently told, except it be told an hundred times) asked him againe, how the King her ſonne did, and how he ſped in his wars. Whereunto he anſwered euery word as before: but asking him the third time the verie ſame queſtion, how her ſon did? Do'ſt thou aske me ſo often (ſaid the Æthyopian) how hee doth? Bre Cachpe (ô whore, ſaid he) thou haſt brought forth a ſon like a diuell, who roaming vp and downe, doth nothing but burne and deſtroy the world where hee commeth. Whereat the Queen crying out, vp ſtart the Æthiopian, and betaking himſelfe to his heeles, was neuer more afterwards ſeene.

In the wars which Baiazet had againſt Sigiſmund, the Vayuod of Valachia had giuen aid vnto the Hungarian king, wherwith Baiazet being offended, determined now at length to be reuenged: and therefore intending to make war vpon the Valachian prince, left Temurtaſes his great lieutenant at Ancyra in Aſia, and ſo paſſed ouer Helleſpontus himſelfe againſt the Valachian. Vpon whoſe departure, Aladin his ſiſters ſonne the yong king of Caramania, with a great power came ſuddenly in the night to Ancyra, and tooke Temurtaſes priſoner: who then feared nothing leſſe, than in time of peace to be ſo ſurpriſed, and carried away in bonds into Caramania. But when he vnderſtood that Baiazet had ended his wars in Valachia, and was with victorie returned to Pruſa, he fearing his heauy indignarion for ſo great an outrage, preſently releaſed Temurtaſes out of priſon, apparelled him richly after the manner of that nation, craued pardon for the wrong he had done him, and ſet him at libertie to go whither he would, & withal ſent one of his noblemen with great gifts and Preſents to Baiazet, to make his excuſe in beſt manner he could: vnto which embaſſador Baiazet (yet in choler) would not giue audience, or ſuffer him to come in his ſight: but at the ſame time leuied a great armie to inuade Caramania. Which Aladin vnderſtanding, and now out of all hope to appeaſe this mightie enemie, leuied all the forces he could in his own kingdome, and withall entertained all the mercenarie ſoldiers he could ger, intending to trie his fortune in the field, as a man of valour, rather than to be thruſt out of his kingdome like a coward: and ſo in readines, hearing of the comming of Baiazet, met him vpon the way, & at a place called Aczac gaue him battel: but being too weak, he was ouercome & put to flight; in which flight his horſe ſtumbling, & he falling to the ground, was there before he could recouer himſelf, taken by his enemies which had him in chaſe, and ſo brought bound to Baiazet: his two ſons Muhamet Beg & Alis Beg, being taken in that battell alſo, were ſent priſoners to Pruſa. Aladin himſelfe was by Baiazets command deliuered to his enemy Temurtaſes: who in reuenge of the wrong hee had before done him, preſently cauſed him him to be hanged: which when Baiazet vnderſtood, he ſeemed verie ſorie that he had ſo put him to death, for that he was his owne ſiſters ſon. Baiazet following the courſe of his victorie, woon Iconium, Larenda, Nigde, with all the reſt of Aladin his kingdome. About this time alſo, Amaſia the great metropoliticall city of Capadocia, was by the prince thereof deliuered vnto Baiazet, being too weake himſelfe to defend the ſame againſt the force of Caſi-Burchanidin, Prince of the great and ſtrong citie of Sebaſtia, his enemie; now growne to be a man of great power in that part of Aſia, and had ſolicited the Sultan of Ægypt to aid him againſt Baiazet. Whereupon Baiazet returning from the conqueſt of Caramania, led his armie towards Sebaſtia, where the Citiſens had a little before depriued Caſi-Burchanidin of his gouernment, for his crueltie, and placed his ſonne in his ſtead: but in ſhort time no leſſe wearie of the ſon, than before of the father, they with like inconſtancie ſent word to Baiazet, That if he would come that way, they would yeeld vnto him the citie: vpon whoſe approch, Caſit (his ſon) for feare fled out of the citie, to Prince Naſradin his brother in law. After whoſe departure, the citiſens according to their promiſe, deliuered the citie vnto Baiazet at his comming, wherein he left Solyman his eldeſt ſonne gouernor. And ſo hauing in this notable expedition conquered the kingdome of Caramania, and taken the great cities of Amaſia and Sebaſtia, with moſt part of Capadocia, and all that part of Aſia which the Turks call Rumilia Aſiatica, hee returned to Pruſa and there wintred.

Amaſia yeelded vnto Baiazet.

Sebaſtia deliuered to Baiazet.

The next Spring, Baiazet hearing that his old enemy Cutrun Baiazet prince of Caſtamona & Pontus, was dead, came to Caſtamona with a great armie: which Iſfendiar (Cutrun Baiazets ſonne, and then Prince of that countrey) hearing, fled out of the citie of Synope, a little Citie vpon the coaſt of the Euxine: from whence he ſent an Embaſſador to Baiazet, humbly requeſting him, to ſuffer him to haue that little citie, as his ſeruant to liue in, (which he was ſure he would otherwiſe beſtow vpon ſome other of his ſeruants) and not to ſeeke the innocent bloud of the ſonne for the fathers offence. Which his requeſt Baiazet, mooued with pittie, eaſily granted: yet neuertheleſſe tooke from him Caſtamona, with the greateſt part of his dominion in Pontus, which he gaue to his ſonne Solyman. At the ſame time hee violently oppreſſed the prince Germean, and tooke from him the cities of Deſpotopolis and Hierapolis, with all the reſt of his dominion.

Baiazet inuadeth Iſfendiar Prince of Caſtamona.

The Prince of Menteſia long before driuen out of his countrie by Baiazet, (as is before declared) and hauing all this while made his abode at Caſtamona, doubting now of his owne ſafetie, after the death of his good friend Cutrun Baiazet, in the habit of an hermit fled to the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlane.

Baiazet returning to Pruſa, there built a magnificent Mahometane Temple; during which worke he with great ſuperſtition forbore drinking of wine, repoſing himſelfe with the companie of graue and learned men, and the adminiſtration of juſtice: whereby hee greatly woon the hearts of his ſubiects, and had now ſo inlarged his kingdome, that all Kings and Princes bordring vpon him ſtood in great feare of him.

It fortuned about this time, that Achmetes King of Bagdat (or new Babylon) and Eitacum, with Ioſephus Niger King of Colchis, inforced with the violent incurſions of Tamerlane & his Tartars, for ſafegard of their liues were glad to flie into Syria: where they being diſcouered, were both caſt in priſon by the commandment of the Ægyptian Sultan, who then commanded ouer Syria: from whence they afterwards hardly eſcaping, fled to Baiazets court. Where after Achmetes had ſtayd two moneths, he by the aid of Baiazet recouered the poſſeſſion of Eitacum part of his own inheritance. Ioſephus the other Mahometane King hauing tarried in Baiazets court eight moneths, at length procured him to inuade the dominions of the Ægyptian Sultan: in which expedition he mightily preuailed, and hauing ſlaine the Ægyptian Sultans General, and diſcomfited his forces, tooke the citie of Malatie or Meletine in Armenia, with Diorige, Derende, and Bexene, taken from the Turcomans, and ſpoyled all the country thereabours. From thence marching with his armie towards Erznitzane, the Prince thereof called Tachretin met him vpon the way, yeelding his citie and country into his power; which Baiazet preſently gaue to Ioſephus Niger: who after he had ſix days enioyed this new gouernment, finding the people vnwilling to be gouerned by him a ſtranger, ſurrendered the ſame againe into the hands of him that gaue it. Whereupon the Citiſens of Erznitzane humbly requeſted of Baiazet, That they might be againe gouerned by their old Prince Tachretin, now his vaſſall.

vassall. Which thing he at their earnest request granted: but taking his wife and children as a C pledge of his loyalty, sent them away to Prusa, where they were all not long after made away.

The Mahometan princes of Asia oppressed by Baiazet, disguised flie vnto Tamerlane for eyd.

When Baiazet had now many yeres thus mightily preuailed against the Christian Princes in Romania, Bulgaria, Bosna, Thessalia, Valachia, & other places of Europe, as is before declared, and inflamed with insatiable ambition, had in worse manner oppressed the Mahometane Kings and Princes of Asia (of whom some were by him slaine, some driuen into exile, some imprisoned, and othersome brought into such subiection, that they liued as it were but at his deuotion) and was now growne to that greatnesse, that in the pride of his heart he stood in feare of no man, but was (as he thought) a terror vnto the world, hauing vnder his obeysance great and large dominions in Europe, but farre greater in Asia: it fortuned that diuers of these miserable & discontented Mahometane Princes, by great fortune, as if it had bin by appoint- H ment, to meet together at the Court of the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlane, whether they were fled for reliefe and succor. The Prince Germian Ogli, after long imprisonment in the castle of Ipsala in Europe, brake prison, and with Hissar-beg his great councellour and prison fellow, consorted themselues with a companie of loytring companions, roaming from place to place, delighting the countrey people with their apish toyes: in which companie hee passed Hellespontus, as a Beareward, and at length with much ado came to Tamerlane his court: whether the Prince of Mentesia was come before in the habit of an hermit (as is afore said) with his head and beard shauen: Aidin Ogli passing thorow the countrey as a pedlar, with a packe at his backe, came thither also: the Prince Tachretin as a seruingman, came attending vpon the prince Isfendiar; who came also, but in some better fashion than the rest, as an Embassador from some I other prince. All these poore princes, with diuers others in like miserie, in short time arriued at Samarcand (great Tamerlane his court;) euery one particularly complaining of his own priuat griefe, and all together earnestly requesting that mighty prince, to take vpon him their defence, and to reuenge the wrong done vnto them by the Turkish tyrant Baiazet. Whose pittifull complaints much mooued the noble Tartarian; but especially the long and wrongfull imprisonment of Germian Ogli; and the pittifull complaint and moane of Tachretin, who had of late lost his wife and children by the cruelty of Baiazet. Yet in this matter of so great and important consequence, Tamerlane made no great shew of his forwardnesse, (although he was by nature in nothing more delighted, than in the relieuing of the distressed, and chastising of the proud) but coldly answered these Princes, That hee could not tell whither all were so as K they had reported of Baiazet, or not, but that hee well knew him to be a very zealous King in setting forth of the Mahometan religion; and that he had therefore made great warres vpon the Christians, in which godly cause (he said) perhaps they had refused to assist him, or else had giuen him some other greater occasion of offence, to him vnknown: For I can hardly beleeue (said he) that so great and religious a prince as he, would without iust and sufficient cause, offer such violence as you complaine of, especially vnto you his neighbour princes, and of the same religion with himselfe: neuertheless, whatsoeuer I intend concerning your request (said Tamerlane) I will send first an Embassadour vnto him, to vnderstand more of him and his proceedings, before I resolue vpon any thing: with which answer he willed them vntill then to L hold themselues contented. But as Tamerlane was about to haue dispatched his Embassador to Baiazet, he was aduertised, that Achmetes late King of new Babylon, and Iosephus King of Colchis, both by him driuen out of their Kingdomes, hauing broken out of prison from the Sultan of Ægypt, were now come to Baiazet his court, to craue his aid and assistance: wherefore he deferred to send his Embassadour, suspecting that Baiazet incited by these two exiled Kings, would first in their quarrell begin to make war vpon him. But not long after, vnderstanding that they were both again departed from his court, as is before declared; he then dispatched his embassador to Baiazet, with many rich gifts and Presents; curteously requesting him, the rather for his sake, to deale kindly with these poore Mahometan princes, his friends; as also with the Greeke Emperor Emanuel his allye, for whom he was now become an intercessour vnto him. Some report also, that he besides this, requested to haue the two aforesaid Maho- M metan Kings of Bagdat and Colchis deliuered vnto him; and withal seemed not a little to dislike of Baiazets his proceedings against the Turcomans his friends. But Baiazet being a prince of a great and haughtie spirit, and vnaccustomed to heare of any thing which fitted not his humor, highly offended with this embassage, in great scorne reiected the Presents by Tamerlane

A lane sent to him, and specially certain garments which Tamberlane after the manner of those Easterne nations, had in kindnes amongst other things sent him: willing the embassador to bid his master meddle with his owne matters, and to prescribe lawes vnto his owne subiects, and not vnto him, with whom he had nought to do; & to send his raggs for presents vnto his inferiours, and not vnto Princes of greater power and state than himselfe. Adding thereunto many other words full of despight and disdain, affording him no better stile than the plain name of Tamberlane: calling him the husband of a whore, if he met him not in the field; and wishing vnto himselfe againe, to take vnto him his thrice diuorced wife, after she had bin polluted by another man (as the greatest dishonor that might be) if he failed to meet him wheresoeuer he durst to dare him battel. Which proud answere of the Turke, by the embassador reported B vnto Tamberlane, and aggrauated by Axalla (a Christian of the race of the Genowaies, born at Capha, and then one of the greatest counsellors about him, and the Greeke Emperours great friend) was so euill taken by him, that all other things set apart, he resolued to go against the Turke, and to take in hand that war, as of all other the fittest for the increase of his honor and glorie. Besides that, he thought it not in reason fit for the greatnes of the Tartarian empire, to suffer such an vnquiet neighbor to grow great; as still enchroching vpon other the weak Princes confining to him, and adding conquests vnto conquests; and yet neuer the more contented, might in the end proue dangerous vnto his owne estate and soueraignitie: a common care to such as be themselues great, & mounted vp vnto the highest degrees of worldly honour, to haue in iealousie and distrust the sudden rising of others neer or farther off, as perillous or dis-C gracefull to themselues, or their estate: whose growing greatnes they therefore seeke by all meanes to hinder; as did now the mightie Tamberlane the proceedings and increasing of the great Othoman king, Baiazet: and the rather being continually prickt forward so to do, by the solicitation of the Greek Emperor Emanuel, the other oppressed Mahometan Princes, and by the great captain Axalla (as is afore said) a Christian: of whom for all that Tamberlane himself, a Mahometan, for the great fidelitie, valor and vertue he found in him, made no smal reckoning, but was contented euen in his greatest and most waightie affaires to be by him aduised; disliking of no man for his religion whatsoeuer, so as he did worship but one only God, creator of heauen & earth, and of al that therin is: being himselfe of opinion, That God in essence one, & in himselfe imutable, without change or diuersity; yet for the manifesting of his omni- Tamberlanes his opinion concerning the diuersity of religions
D potencie & power, as he had created in the world sundry kinds of people, much differing both in nature, manners, & condition, and yet al framed to the image of himself: so was he also contented to be of them diuersly serued, according to the diuersity of their natures & manners: so that they worshipt none other strange gods, but him alone, the maker and creator of all things: which was the cause that he suffered the vse of al religions within the countries subiect to his obedience, were they not meere Atheists, Idolaters, or worshippers of strange and vain gods.

Neither was proud Baiazet as one ignorant of the power or purpose of Tamberlane, in the meane time idle, but stil prosecuted his good fortune for the inlarging of his empire, and increasing of his strength: wisely deeming (as the truth was) whatsoeuer messages were sent to him from Tamberlane, to be no other than meere threatnings & forewarnings of his more dan-E gerous purposes and designes against him and his state: which he was so far from fearing, as that to prouoke him the more, hee spared no intemperate speech, which might moue him to wrath; wishing (as should seeme) for nothing more, than to meet him in the field, there to try the fortune of a battell with him. So weake is our foresight of our fortunes to come, and the reach of our vnderstanding for the apprehension or declining of the fatal doom euen presently hanging ouer our heads; as that we oftentimes through ignorance most desirously wish for those things which are vnto vs the chiefe occasions of our vtter ruine and ouerthrow.

But here before we enter into farther discourse of the mortal war betwixt these two so puissant Princes, it shall not be much from our purpose to step a little out of the way, to see what this mighty Tamberlane (of whom so many Princes craued aid) was, who liuing, held the East F in such awe, as that he was commonly called, The wrath of God, and Terror of the world; which he then filled with the glorie of his name. Most Historiographers report him to haue bin poorly borne, of base and obscure parents: and so himselfe also in his youth to haue liued as a poore shepheard or heardsman in the mountains; where consorting himselfe with other sturdy companions of like qualitie and disposition, such as there liued by robbing of marchants & other passengers, The base opinion some haue, concerning the birth & rising of Tamberlane passengers, he became a masterfull theefe amongst them: vnto whom other such leaud mates daily still more and more reforting, he in short time grew (as they say) to that greatnes, that he is reported to haue been of such power, as neuer man but he euer yet came vnto. A matter almost incredible: for albeit that the Roman empire, yea and this great empire of the Turks also, with some others, had their beginnings not much better or greater, the one vnder Romulus, and the other vnder Othoman; yet grew they not as on the sudden, in their times to any great lustre (neither was it possible for them of so small beginnings so to do) but by many degrees, and that in long time; euery of the succeeding Princes, according to their fortunes, adding something to their state, before it could be made great: whereas he (by their report, contrary to the course of things both naturall & ciuill (which from their small beginnings grow to no notable perfection or greatnes, but by degrees, and than in the long reuolution of time, taking his beginning of nothing, grew vpon the sudden to be a burthen & terror vnto the world. Wherin our late historiographers seem too much to haue followed the report of the Turks, who by him brought low, and their kingdom almost in one battel subuerted, report nothing of him; but in what they may, detracting from his worthy praises, wrongfully charge him with many vntruths, not concerning his parentage only, but euen in the course of his life: so making him (as they would haue the world to beleeue) first to haue been a [illegible] men; & then for his inhumane crueltie a very monster in nature, or as it were more truly said of another great one much like himself) a dumb of great intemperancie. Which incredible reports concerning so great a monarch, I am not to follow, as [illegible] honor; especially wheras others of no lesse credit than they, with [illegible] more probability report of him the great [illegible] for that [illegible] (as they say) borne at Samarcand, the [illegible] on [illegible] Zagatain Tartarie Parthia) third [illegible] the former part of [illegible]

from Cambalu towards Samarcand, the place of his birth and seat of his empire; leauing behind him the forces brought from the great Emperor his vncle, to come after him to Ozara, where he had appointed the general meeting of his army. At which time amongst other Princes that thither brought or sent their supplies, the great Muscouite being requested so to do, promised to send him fifteen thousand horse, with a certain sum of mony, and leaue for his armie to passe thorow so much of his territories as should be necessary: all which he afterwards performed vnto Tamberlane, being glad that he did set vpon others, rather than on himselfe; and that so great a preparation should fall vpon them, whose greatnes was as dreadfull & dangerous vnto him as to any other. All the earth almost at that time being astonished at the sudden greatnes of this Othoman king, and the happy successe he had in all his wars: not the least cause that moued Tamberlane to oppose himselfe against him, deeming it much better to goe and set vpon him in his new conquests, than to stay vntil he therin setled, were come neerer to him, and so should debate the quarrell within his owne empire, to his dammage. A good and sound resolution: first in that it tended to the destruction of the enemies country; & then, that if any thing should fal out otherwise with him than wel, his country should not therby receiue any such astonishment as if the danger were neerer or within the bowels of the same. Now in the mean time that Tamberlane lay at Samarchand, Axalla the great captaine & Tamberlane his lieutenant generall, had assembled all the army at Ozara. Whereof Tamberlane vnderstanding, sent for him to Samarcand, to confer with him about the setting forward of his army. For although he were still accompanied with great renowned Princes, yet were they no body in comparison of Axalla, whose sound counsel had won him such credit with his Lord & master, as by his aduice he did al things, and without him nothing: which his so great authority and fauor with his Prince, wanted not the enuie of the court, but that his great vertues, and rare found courtesie (in so great fortune) together with so many worthy seruices as he had done, supported him against the malice of the same. He by the commandement of Tamberlane, leauing the charge of the army at Ozara, with the prince of Thanais, another of Tamberlains great captains, came himselfe to Samarcand, & there at large discoursed with him, about the estate and order of his army. And shortly after, departing with Axalla and the rest from Samarcand, for to goe to Ozara the place where all his army met: being come thither, entred into a great consultation with his most expert captaines, about the taking of his iourney, & conducting of his army: as whether it were better to lead the same by the coasts of the Muscouit directly towards Capha, or else on the other side of the Caspian sea by the skirts of Persia: where after long discourse and sundry opinions with their reasons deliuered, it was at resolued (although the way were the longer) to passe by the Muscouit, so to come to the Georgians, & to Trebizonda, and from thence to enter into the Othoman King his country. And so setting forward from Ozara, he came at length to Maranis, where he staied three dayes looking for the forces which Prince Odmar should send him from China, not long before by him conquered: whereof he there receiued news, & there caused his army to be paid, and a general muster therof to be taken. He had also there newes of the aid the Muscouit did send him: and caused an infinite quantity of victuals, and most part of his furniture to be conueied by the Caspian sea, being a great commodity & ease to his army, which marching by land, was of necessity to passe some twenty leagues thorow places destitute both of victuals & water. Tamberlane al the way coasting along the sea shore, passed the time in hunting, his army not comming neere him by ten leagues; which was so great, that it extended it selfe ful twenty leagues. Comming to the riuer of Edel, he staid at Zarazich whilst his army passed the riuer at Mechet, and two other bridges which he had caused to be made for that purpose. Now the Circassians, & Georgians, hearing of the approch of Tamberlane with his huge army, by their embassadors offred him al the help and assistance they could in his iourney as he passed that way. These Georgians were and yet are Christians, a great and warlike people, of long time tributaries vnto the Greek Emperors: and afterwards somtimes tributaries, & sometimes confederats vnto the Persians: but alwaies enemies vnto the Turks, by whom of late (and in our remembrance) but especiall by Amurath the third, they together with some part of the Persian kingdome, haue bin grieuously oppressed, as in the processe of this historie may appeare. Of these warlike people, glad of Tamberlane his comming for the repressing of the Turk, Axalla drew great numbers vnto the seruice of his Prince: who not a little esteemed of them, being al tall men, very beautifull, of great strength and

A and courage, and withall most expert soldiers; as hauing oftentimes resisted the power of the Othoman Kings, by reason of the aduantage their countrey affordeth them, being very rough and hard to come into. By these kind people, Tamberlane was in euery place honorably entertained, and his great army with all necessaries plentifully relieued. In passing thorow which country and the rest as he marched, he took such order with his soldiers, that none of the people whereby he passed, were any thing by them iniuried; insomuch that if a soldier had taken but an apple, or other thing of like value from any man, hee died therefore, so seuere were his commands. It is reported that one of his soldiers, hauing taken a little milke from a countrey woman, and she thereof complaining, he caused the said soldier to be presently killed, and his stomacke to be ript; where the milke that he had of late drunk being found, he contented the B woman, and so sent her away; who had otherwise vndoubtedly died for her false accusation, had it not so appeared. Which his so great seueritie, and in other like cases, was of many accounted for extream crueltie: yet was it indeed the wholsom preseruation of his army, being so great, as that it was thought almost impossible to haue found sufficient victuals for the reliefe thereof: whereof for all that, there was no want, either of any thing else necessarie for the vse of man, his camp being stil as a most populous and wel gouerned citie, stored with al manner of things: wherunto both artificers and marchants, from far countries resorted with their commodities & marchandise, as to some famous mart; and the country people, without feare from euery place brought in their country commodities, for which they receiued present mony, and so in safety again departed. So marching on, he at length came to Bachichich where he C staid to refresh his army eight daies, and there againe took a generall muster thereof, wherein were found (as most write) foure hundred thousand horse, & six hundred thousand foot; or as some others that were there present affirme, three hundred thousand horsmen, and siue hundred thousand foot of al nations. Vnto whom he there gaue a generall pay, and as his manner was, made vnto them an oration, informing them of such orders as he would haue kept, to the end they might the better obserue the same: with much other militarie discipline, whereof he was very curious with his captains. At which time also, it was lawfull for euery common soldier to behold him with more boldnes than on other daies, forasmuch as he did for that time, and such like, lay aside his imperial maiestie, and shew himselfe more familiar vnto them.

The number of Tamberlanes great armie.

Now could he hardly be perswaded, that Baiazet hauing subdued the most part of Grecia, D distressed the Greeke Emperour, and so great means to recouer whatsoeuer he should lose in Asia, would be so aduenturous as to come ouer the straits out of Europe, to trie the fortune of a battell with him; but rather warily protract the time, to wearie him at length with wants, that in a strange countrey drew such a world of people after him. Wherein hee found himselfe much deceiued: for hauing passed the Georgian country, and being come to Buysabuich Axalla (whom he had not seen in eight dais before, because he led the head of the armie) came vnto him with such newes as hee knew would be right welcome vnto him: which was, that Baiazet had raised his siege of Constantinople (as indeed he had) for to come and defend his new conquests in Asia: and that he was certainely resolued, to come to a day of battell, not so much trusting vnto the multitude of his army, as to the valour and experience of his soldiers, E beeing all men of long well trained vp in the wars. At which vnexpected newes, Tamberlane greatly reioiced: yet without insolencie or vaunting, but rather with the countenance of such a one as iudged the euents of battels to be (as they are) alwaies doubtfull: saying sometimes, that a smal number wel conducted, did oftentimes carrie away the victorie from the confused multitude. Three dayes he staied at Buysabuich, and caused his souldiers continually to march forward, which at Garga and Chiuserig passed ouer the riuer Euphrates: which he did the rather to maintaine his armie vpon the spoile of the enemie, in attending his comming, than vpon himselfe, or his allies. All the cities that yeelded vnto him by the way as he marched, hee F receiued fauorably; the other that refused to submit themselues vnto his obedience, hee vsed with all extremitie: specially the great and strong citie of Sebastia, where certaine of the forerunners of his army were by the Turks there in garrison cut off and slaine, & the gates of the citty as it were in contempt of him, set wide open: wherwith Tamberlane offended, sent out certain of his Tartarian horsmen, commanding them on pain of his displeasure, so to beare themselues against their enemies, as that he might at his comming either find the citie taken, or the gates thereof shut against him: for hee had his men at so great commaund, that no danger was vnto vnto them more dreadfull than his displeasure, neither did he punish any thing so seuerely as cowardise: insomuch, that if in his disport of hunting the wild beast, any did for feare giue way to the Lyon or Beare, and slew him not, was sure to die therefore himselfe: and to turne his backe vpon the enemie, was no lesse danger than to run vpon his owne death. Now the Turks in garrison at Sebastia, seeing these Tartarian horsemen marching towards the citie, making little account of them, for that they were not in number many, issued out for to meet them, where they were so furiously charged by these few horsemen, that they were glad to retire, and for haste to shut part of their owne men out of the citie, least the enemie following them at their heeles, should haue entred the gates together with them: Which Turkes so shut out, were by the Tartarians slaine at the gates of the citie. Shortly after came Tamberlane with all his armie, and sate downe before the citie, where he lay still seuen dayes, not making shew of any violence at all; the defendants becausse the citie was of great strength, all that while thinking that heo had intended by long siege to distresse the same, and the more, becausse of his long lying still. But about the eight day, the walls and towers of the citie in many places vndermined, were suddenly ouerthrowne, leauing large breaches for the enemie to enter. Wherewith the Turkes in the citie dismayed, foorthwith yeelded the citie to Tamberlan, in hope so to haue saued their liues: but hee (as the Turkes report) beeing entred the citie, commaunded a great number of deepe pits to be digged, and all the people of the citie, without respect of age, sex, or condition, to be throwne into the same, and there buried quicke. Which done, the citie was by his commandement vtterly rased also. After that, calling vnto him Malcozzius, the gouernour of the citie, whom he had for that purpose onely spared, he commanded him to goe and tell his Master what was happened to his strong Citie of Sebastia, and what hee had there himselfe seene. Of which tragicall action, Malcozzius hauing made true relation vnto Baiazet, was by him demanded, whether of the two armies he thought bigger or stronger: for now Baiazet had assembled a mightie armie of three hundred thousand men, as some report of three hundred thousand horsmen, and two hundred thousand foot. Whereunto Malcozzius hauing before craued pardon, answered, That it could not be, but that Tamberlane might in reason haue the greater number, for that he was a commander of farre greater countries. Wherewith proud Baiazet offended, in great choller replied, Out of doubt, the fight of the Tartarian hath made this coward so affraid, that he thinketh euery enemie to be two.

Sebastia beseiged by Tamberlane.

Sebastia yeelded to Tamberlane.

Most of the Latine histories report, that when Tamberlane had taken Sebastia, hee put all the men to the sword, & bringing the women and children into the fields without the city, there ouer-ran them with his horsemen, excepting some few which were reserued for prisoners. As also that Baiazet there lost his eldest son Erthogrul (of some called Orthobules) whose death with the losse of the citie, so much grieued him (as it is reported) that marching with his great army against Tamberlane, & by the way hearing a country sheepheard merily reposing himself with his homely pipe, as he sate vpon the side of a mountaine feeding his poore flocke; standing still a great while listening vnto him, to the great admiration of many, at last fetching a deep sigh, brake foorth into these wordes: O happie sheepheard, which haddest neither Orthobules nor Sebastia to loose: bewraying therein his owne discontentment; and yet withall shewing, That worldly blisse consisteth not so much in possessing of much, subiect vnto danger, as inioying in a little, contentment deuoide of feare. Howbeit the Turkes themselues reporting the taking of Sebastia, speake not of Orthobules at all, but giue him lost six yeares before, in the warres against Casi Burchaniden, and lyeth buried by his father at Prusa. In this citie of Sebastia was lost twelue thousand Turkes, men women, and children; as their Histories report. The rest of the cities all the way as Tamberlane marched, warned by the destruction of Sebastia, yeelded themselues for feare of like danger: the citizens whereof he courteously vsed, specially the Christians, whom he set at libertie, in respect of Emanuel the Greeke Emperour, whome hee seemed wholly therein to gratifie. But hee had not gone farre into the Turkes dominion, but that hee was certainly aduertized, how that Baiazet, with a great armie was comming against him, and now within thirtie leagues of him: which caused him after that time, to march with his armie more closely. Axalla leading the Vantgard sent foorth Chianson Prince of Ciarchan, with foure thousand Parthian horsemen, to get knowledge of the Turkes armie, and where Baiazet lay, as also what countrey that

A was beyond Sennas; and if he could learne any thing thereof, to make relation of it vnto him. This Prince of Ciarcan was Tamerlanes neere kinsman, a man of great reputation, & next vnto Axalla, in whose absence he had the commanding of the auantgard, his charge; who also sent before him another Parthian captaine with 500 horsemen. So he had not ridden ten leagues but that he heard news of Baiazets comming, & hauing surprised Sennas, vnderstood there the certain estate of the Turks army, which was then at Tataia, and so marching forward. Whereof Tamerlane certified, commanded him not to retire from that place, vntill he did see the arriual of the enemie, and thereof to giue him aduertisement euery houre; being himselfe reiolued to passe on no further, as come to a faire large plain, & a country of aduantage for the order of his battel: for he knew that his army was far greater than Baiazets, & therfore he made choice B of those great plains. Yet for that his armie consisted of diuers nations, and withal considering that he was not to fight against the Chinois, a soft effeminat people, (as of late) but against the Turks a most warlike nation, & wel acquainted with all maner of fights & martial stratagems, he thought it good to be wel aduised how he proceeded against them. Wherefore he presently sent for Axalla, with him to view the said place, and to haue his opinion, Whether it would be for his aduantage or not, there to stay: who not misliking of the choice of the place, yet aduised him also to keepe Sennas so long as he possibly could: and so sent word vnto them that were therein, vpon the approch of the enemie to set fire vpon the same, and so to withdraw themselues from thence, to the end that the enemie should not haue any desire to incampe there, but come still forward neere to those plains where Tamerlane desired to fight, especially C for that he was stronger in horse than Baiazet. Thus the Turks still marching on, thought to haue surprised some of their enemies in Sennas; who as soon as they drew neere, retired al excepting some hundred left of purpose to fire the town: who hauing performed the same, retired of purpose in great disorder. Now the Prince of Ciarcan had diuided his forces into two parts, & giuen commandment to the first, that as soon as they perceiued the enemies to pursue the hundred horse that so disorderly of purpose fled, they should receiue them, and so retyre all together. He in the mean time with the rest of his power stood close in a valley, neere to a wood side, vnseen at all. Where hauing suffred 2000 of the enemies horse (the vantcurriers of the Turks army) to passe by him, he following them in the taile, charg'd them home, the other which before retired, now turning vpon them also: so that the Turks seeing themselues thus D beset, & hardly laid vnto both before & behind, as men discouraged fled: in which flight most of them were slain, and the rest taken prisoners. This was the first incounter betwixt the Turks and the Parthians: all the prisoners there taken, were by the prince as a present sent to Tamerlane, & among the rest the Bassa of Natolia who led these troups: of whom Tamerlane earnestly demanded, what caused Baiazet so little to esteeme of him, as to shew so great contempt of his armie, which he should find strong enough to abate his pride. Whereunto the Bassa answered, That his lord was the Sun vpon earth, which could not endure any equall; and that he rather was astonied to see, how he from so far had enterprised so dangerous a journy, to hinder the fortune of his lord, in whose fauor the heauens (as he said) did bend themselues to further his greatnes, and vnto whom all the world subiected it selfe; and that he committed great fol-E lie in going about to resist the same. Vnto which so proud a speech Tamerlane replied, That he was sent from heauen to punish his rashnesse, & to teach him, that the proud are hated of God, whose promise is to plucke down the mightie, and raise vp the lowly. As for thy self (said he) thou hast alreadie felt (although I pitty thy mishap) what the valour of my Parthian horse is against thy Turkish: and thy master I haue already caused to raise his siege of Constantinople, and to looke to his own things here in Asia. Furthermore, Tamerlane changing his speech demanded, If his master did come resolued to bid him battell? Assure your self (said he) there is nothing he more desireth; and would to God I might acknowlege your greatnesse, in giuing me leaue to assist my Lord at that battell. Good leaue haue thou, (said Tamerlane) go thy ways and tell thy lord that thou hast seen me, and that he shall in the battell find me on horseback, F where he shall see a greene ensigne displayd. The Bassa thanking him, swore, that next vnto his lord he vowed vnto him his seruice. And so returning, declared vnto Baiazet, how that he had seene Tamerlane, and truly reported vnto him all that he had willed him to say; not forgetting ouer all, to publish his courtesie and bountie: who besides that he had franckely set him at libertie, had also giuen him a verie faire horse well furnished, although hee well knew hee was to ſerue againſt himſelfe. Whereunto Baiazet anſwered no more, but that hee would ſhortly make triall of him, & that he well hoped before the march were ended, to make him acknowledge his own folly. The next day the two armies drew neere together, and incamped within a league the one of the other: where all the night long you might haue heard ſuch noyſe of horſes, as that it ſeemed the heauens were full of voyces, the aire did ſo reſound, & euery man thought the night long, to come to the triall of his valour, and the gaining of his deſires. The Scythians (a people no leſſe greedie than needie) talked of nothing but the ſpoyle; the proud Parthians, of their honor; & the poore Chriſtians, of their deliuerance, all to be gained by the next days victorie: euery man during the night time ſpeaking according to his owne humour. All which Tamerlane walking this night vp & down in his campe heard, and much reioiced to ſee the hope that his ſoldiers had alreadie in general conceiued of the victorie. Who after the ſecond watch returning vnto his pauilion, & there caſting himſelf vpon a carpet, had thought to haue ſlept a while: but his cares not ſuffring him ſo to do, he then, as his manner was, called for a booke, wherein was contained the liues of his fathers and anceſtors, and of other valiant worthies, the which he vſed ordinarily to read, as he then did: not as therwith vainly to deceiue the time, but to make vſe thereof, by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done, & declining of ſuch dangers as they by their raſhnes or ouerſight fel into. And afterwards hauing a little ſlumbred, he commanded Axalla to be ſent for, who forthwith came to him, with diuers other great lords & captaines the chiefe commanders of his army: with whom after he had a while conſulted of the order of the battell, he mounted on horſebacke himſelfe, & ſent euery one of them to their own charges, to put the ſame in readines. At which very inſtant he receiued news, that the enemy marched forward, and came to take his ground for the battell: whoſe order of march Tamerlane was deſirous to ſee, that ſo accordingly he might marſhal his own. And hauing cauſed 3000 horſemen to aduance forward, with charge to begin the skirmiſh, himſelfe followed after to lodge euery part of his forces in ſuch places as hee had foreſeen to be fitteſt for his aduantage. Now ſeeing the Ianizaries march in a ſquare battell in the midſt, and vpon the two fronts two great ſquadrons of horſemen, which ſeemed to be thirtie thouſand horſe; and another which aduanced and couered the battalion of the Ianizaries: he thought this their order to be very good, and hard to be broken; and thereupon turning himſelfe to Axalla, who was neere vnto him, ſaid, I had thought this day to haue fought on foot, but I ſee that it behoooueth me now to fight on horſebacke, to giue courage vnto my ſoldiers, to open the great battalion of our enemies. And my will is, that my men come forward vnto me as ſoone as they may, for I will aduance forward with an hundred thouſand footmen, fiftie thouſand vpon each of my two wings, and in the middeſt of them fortie thouſand of my beſt horſeman. My pleaſure is, that after they haue tried the force of theſe men, that they come vnto my auauntgard, of whom I wil diſpoſe, & fifty thouſand horſe more in three bodies, whom thou ſhalt command: which I will aſſiſt with 80000 horſe, wherein ſhal be mine own perſon; hauing 100000 footmen behind me, who ſhal march in two ſquadrons: and for my arereward I appoint 40000 horſe, and fiftie thouſand footmen, who ſhall not march but to my aid. And I wil make choice of 10000 of my beſt horſe, whom I wil ſend into euery place where I ſhal thinke needfull within my Armie, for to impart my commands. Ouer the firſt fortie thouſand horſe the Prince Ciarcan commanded: ouer the formoſt footmen was the lord Synopes a Genouois, kinſman to Axalla, and his lieutenant ouer the footmen, a captaine of great eſtimation: the Prince Axalla his owne charge conſiſted of fiue ſquadrons of horſemen. Baiazet his armie being alſo both faire and great, came brauely ſtill on forwards towards their enemies, who ſtirred not one whit from the place they had taken for the battell: except certaine light horſemen, Scythians, Parthians, and Muſcouits, who ſent out as looſe men, hotly skirmiſhed betwixt the two armies. Now was Tamerlane by an eſpie aduertiſed, that Baiazet hauing before giuen order for the diſpoſing of his armie, was on foot in the midſt of thirtie thouſand Ianizaries, his principall men of war, and greateſt ſtrength, wherein he meant that day to fight, and in whom he had repoſed his greateſt hope. His battell of horſe was very faire, amounting to the number of a hundred and fortie thouſand horſe, all old ſoldiers. The Sultan of Ægipt hauing alſo ſent vnto his aid thirtie thouſand Mamalukes, all very good horſemen, with thirtie thouſand foot. So that his armie marching all in one front, in forme of an halfe-Moone (but not ſo well knit together as was Tamerlanes, whoſe ſquadrons directly followed one another)

ſeemed almoſt as great as his: and ſo with infinite numbers of moſt horrible outeries ſtill aduanced forward; Tamerlane his ſouldiers all the while ſtanding faſt, with great ſilence.

There was not poſſible to be ſeen a more furious charge, than was by the Turks giuen vpon the prince of Ciarcan, who had commandment not to fight before the enemy came vnto him: neither could haue bin choſen a fairer plaine, and where the skilfull choice of the place was of leſſe aduantage for the one or the other; but that Tamerlane had the riuer on the left hand of his armie, ſeruing him to ſome ſmall aduantage. Now this young prince of Ciarcan with his 40000 horſe, was in this firſt encounter almoſt wholly ouerthrowne: yet hauing fought right valiantly, and entred euen into the midſt of the Ianizaries, (where the perſon of Baiazet was) putting them in diſorder, was himſelfe there ſlaine. About which time Axalla ſet vpon them with the auauntgard, but not with like danger: for hauing ouerthrowne one of the enemies wings, & cut it al to pieces, and his footmen comming to ioine with him, as they had bin commanded, he faced the battalion of the Ianizaries, who right valiantly behaued themſelues for the ſafetie of their Prince. This hard fight continued one hower, and yet you could not haue ſeene any ſcattered, but the one ſtill reſolutely fighting againſt the other. You might there haue ſeene the horſemen like mountaines ruſh together, and infinit numbers of men die, cry, lament, & threaten all at one inſtant. Tamerlane had patience all this while, to ſee the euent of this ſo mortall a fight: but perceiuing his men at length to giue ground, he ſent ten thouſand of his horſe to ioyne again with the ten thouſand appointed for the arereward, and commanded them to aſſiſt him at ſuch time as he ſhould haue need of them; and at the very ſame time charged himſelfe, and made them to giue him roome; cauſing the footmen to charge alſo, ouer whome the prince of Thanais commanded, who gaue a furious onſet vpon the battalion of the Ianizaries, wherein was yet the perſon of Baiazet, who had ſuſtained a great burden. Now Baiazet had in his armie a great number of mercenary Tartars, called Deſtenſes, with manie thouſands of other ſouldiers taken vp in the countries of the poore exiled Mahometane princes; in whoſe iuſt quarrel, & the Greeke emperors, Tamerlane had chiefly vndertaken that war: theſe Tartarians and other ſouldiers, ſeeing ſome their friends, and otherſome their naturall and louing princes in the armie of Tamerlane; ſtricken with the terror of diſloialtie, and abhorring the crueltie of the proud tyrant, in the heat of the battell reuolted from Baiazet to their owne princes; which their reuolt much weakened Baiazets forces. Who neuertheleſſe with his owne men of warre, eſpecially the Ianizaries, and the helpe of the Chriſtian ſoldiers brought to his aid from Seruia and other places of Europe, with great courage maintained the fight: but the multitude, & not true valor, preuailed; for, as much as might be done by valiant and couragious men, was by the Ianizaries & the reſt performed, both for the preſeruation of the perſon of their prince, and the gaining of the victorie. But in the end, the horſemen with whom Tamerlane himſelfe was, giuing a freſh charge, and his auantgard wholly knit again vnto him, re-inforcing the charge, he with much adoo obtained the victorie. Baiazet himſelfe wounded, and now mounted on horſebacke, thinking to haue eſcaped by flight, fell into the hands of Axalla: vnto whom he yeelded himſelfe, thinking it had bin Tamerlane: who for a ſpace knew him not, but took him for ſome other great commander of the Turks. Muſa (firnamed Zelebi, or, the Noble) one of Baiazet his ſons, with diuers others of Baiazet his great captaines, were there taken alſo: and amongſt the reſt, George the Deſpot of Seruia, who notwithſtanding this misfortune, had that day gained vnto himſelfe the reputation of a great and worthie captain; inſomuch that Tamerlane euen in the very heat of the battel maruelling to ſee him and the Seruians, with the other Chriſtians which he had brought to the aid of Baiazet, ſo valiantly to fight, ſaid vnto ſome of the captaines that were neere vnto him, See how couragiſly yonder Religious fight: ſuppoſing them by their ſtrange attire to haue beene ſome of the Turkes ſuperſtitious votaries. But being now taken, and afterwards brought to Tamerlane, he was by him courteouſly welcomed; but yet withall reproued, for that he had fought for Baiazet againſt him, who was come in fauor of the Chriſtian emperor, & the other poore oppreſſed Princes, ſuch as the Deſpot himſelfe was. Who thereunto boldly anſwered, That indeed it was not according to his dutie, but according to the proſperitie of Baiazet, vnto whome it ſeemed that all the world did bend: and that his own ſafetie had cauſed him, though againſt his wil, to take part with him. Whereupon Tamerlane held him excuſed; and ſo without more ado gaue him leaue at his owne pleaſure to depart.

The Prince of Ciarcan ſlaine.

The Turkes ouerthrowne.

Baiazet and his ſon Muſa taken priſoners.

Baiazet brought before Tamerlane, with his pride.

Baiazet also himselfe being afterwards brought vnto Tamerlane as a prisoner, and by him curteously entertained, neuer shewed any token of submission at all; but according to his proud nature, without respect of his present state, presumptuously answered him vnto whatsoeuer he demanded. Wherewith Tamerlane moued, told him, That it was now in his power to make him to lose his life. Whereunto he answered no more, but, Doe it for that, that losse should be his greatest happines. Tamerlane afterwards demanding of him, What made him so proud, as to enterprise to bring into his subiection so noble a Prince as was the Greeke Emperour? he answered, Euen the same thing that hath mooued thee to inuade me, namely the desire of glorie and sourraigntie. But wherefore then (said Tamerlane) do'st thou vse so great crueltie towards them thou hast ouercome, without respect of age or sex? That did I (said he) to giue the greater terror vnto my enemies. And what would'st thou haue done with me (said Tamerlane) had it bin my fortune to haue fallen into thy hands, as thou art now in mine? I would (said Baiazet) haue inclosed thee in a cage of yron, and so in triumph haue carried thee vp & down my kingdome. Euen so (said Tamerlane) shalt thou be serued. And so causing him to be taken out of his presence, turning vnto his followers, said, Behold a proud and cruell man, he deserueth to be chastised accordingly, and to be made an example vnto all the proud and cruell of the world, of the iust wrath of God against them. I acknowledge, that God hath this day deliuered into my hands a great enemie, to whom we must therefore giue thanks. Which he performed the same day: for the battell was woon at foure of the clocke, and there was yet fiue houres of day light. The next day Tamerlane commanded the dead to be buried, where among the rest they found the bodie of the Prince of Ciarcan, dead in the middest of the Ianizaries, where he lay inclosed with their dead bodies, in token he died not vnreuenged: whose vntimely death Tamerlane for all that greatly lamented, for he was his kinsman, and like enough one day to haue done great seruice. Whose dead bodie Tamerlane caused to be imbalmed, and with two thousand horse (and diuers of the Turks prisoners chained and tied together) to be conueyed to Samercand, vntill his comming thither. All the other dead bodies were with all honour that might be, buried at Sennas.

This great bloudie battell fought in the yere of our Lord 1397, not farre from the Mount Stella, (where somtime the great King Mithrydates was by Pompey the Great in a great battell ouerthrown) was fought from seuen a clocke in the morning, vntill foure in the afternoon: victorie all that while, as it were with doubtfull wings, houering ouer both armies, as vncertain where to light; vntill at length the fortune of Tamerlane preuailed. Whose wisedome, next vnto God, gaue that dayes victorie vnto his soldiers: for that the politicke tyring of the strong forces of Baiazet, was the safegard of his own; whereas if he had gone vnto the battell in one front, assuredly the multitude finding such strong resistance, had put it selfe into confusion: whereas this successiue manner of aiding of his men, made them all vnto him profitable. The number of them that were in this battel slaine, is of diuers diuersly reported: the Turks themselues reporting, That Baiazet there lost the noble Mustapha his son, with two hundred thousand of his men, and Tamerlane not many fewer: and some other speaking of a farre lesse number, as that there should be slaine of the Turks about threescore thousand, and of Tamerlane his armie not past twentie thousand. But leauing the certaintie of the number vnto the credit of the reporters, like enough it is, that the slaughter was exceeding great in so long a fight, betwixt two such armies as neuer before (as I suppose) met in field together.

By this one days euent is plainly to be seen the vncertaintie of worldly things, & what small assurance euen the greatest haue in them. Behold, Baiazet the terrour of the world, and as hee thought, superior to fortune, in an instant with his state in one battel ouerthrown into the bottom of miserie & despaire; and that at such time as he thought least, euen in the middest of his greatest strength. It was three days (as they report) before he could be pacified, but as a desperat man still seeking after death, & calling for it: neither did Tamerlane after he had once spoken with him, at all afterwards curteously vse him, but as of a proud man caused small account to be made of him: And to manifest that hee knew how to punish the haughtie, made him to be shackled in fetters and chaines of gold, and so to be shut vp in an iron cage made like a grate, in such sort as that he might on euery side be seen; and so carried him vp and down as he passed thorow Asia, to be of his own people scorned & derided. And to his further disgrace, vpon festiual dayes vsed him for a footstoole to tread vpon, when he mounted to horse: and at other times

Baiazet like a beast shut vp in an yron cage.

A times scornfully fed him like a dog, with crums fallen from his table. A rare example of the vncertaintie of wordly honour, that he vnto whose ambitious mind Asia and Europe, two great parts of the world, were too little, should be now carried vp and downe cooped vp in a little yron cage, like some perillous wild beast. All which Tamerlane did not so much for the hatred to the man, as to manifest the iust iudgement of God against the arrogant follie of the Proud. It is reported, That Tamerlane being requested by one of his Noblemen that might be bold to speake vnto him, to remit some part of his seueritie against the person of so great a Prince; answered, That hee did not vse that rigor against him as a King, but rather did punish him as a proud ambitious tyrant, polluted with the bloud of his owne brother.

Now this so great an ouerthrow brought such a feare vpon all the Countries possessed by B Baiazet in Asia, that Axalla sent before by Tamerlane with 40000 horse, and 100000 foot, without carriages, to prosecute the victorie, came without resistance to Prusa, whither all the remainder of Baiazet his armie was retyred, with the Bassa Mustapha: the countrey as he went still yeelding vnto him. Yea, the great Bassa with the rest hearing of his comming, and thinking themselues not now in any safetie in Asia, fled ouer the strait of Hellespontus to Callipolis, and so to Hadrianople; carrying with them out of the battell, Solyman, Baiazet his eldest sonne, whom they set vp in his fathers place: Mahomet his yonger brother presently vpon the ouerthrow being fled to Amasia; of whom, and the rest of Baiazet his children, more shall be said hereafter. Axalla comming to Prusa, had the citie without resistance yeelded vnto him, which he rifled; and there with other of Baiazet his wiues and concubines, tooke prisoner C the faire Despina, Baiazet his best beloued wife, to the doubling of his griefe.

Solyman set vp in his fathers stead.

Prusa taken by Axalla.

Emanuel the Greeke Emperor now hearing of Tamerlane his comming to Prusa, sent his embassadors (the most honorable of his court) thither before to Axalla: by whom they were there stayd vntil the comming of Tamerlane; who receiued them with all the honor that might be, shewing vnto them all his magnificence, and the order of his campe, to their great admiration: For it resembled a most populous and well gouerned citie, for the order that was therein, which brought vnto it plentie of all kind of victuals & other merchandise, as wel for pleasure as for vse. By these Embassadors the Greeke Emperor submitted all his empire, together with his person, vnto Tamerlane the great conqueror, as his most faithfull subiect and vassall: which he was bound (as he said) to do, for that he was by him deliuered from the most cruel tyrant of D the world: as also for that the long journy he had passed, and the discommodities he had indured, with the losse of his people, and the danger of his person, could not be recompenced but by the offer of his own life and his subiects; which he did for euer dedicate vnto his seruice, with all the fidelitie and loyaltie that so great a benefit might deserue: besides that, his so manie vertues & rare accomplishments, which made him famous thorow the world, did bind him so to do. And that therfore he would attend him in his chiefe citie, to deliuer it into his hands as his own, with all the empire of Greece. Now the Greeke Embassadors looked for no lesse than to fall into bondage to Tamerlane; thinking that which they offered to be so great and delicate a morsell, as that it would not be refused, especially of such a conquering prince as was Tamerlane; and that the acceptance thereof in kindnesse and friendship, was the best bargaine E they could make therein. But they receiued answer from this worthie Prince, farre beyond their expectation: for he with a mild countenance beholding them, answered them, That he was not come from so far a country, or vndertaken so much paines, for the inlargement of his dominions, alreadie large enough, (too base a thing for him to put himselfe into so great danger and trauell for) but rather to winne honour, and thereby to make his name famous vnto all posteritie for euer: And that therefore it should well appeare vnto the world, that he was come to aid him, being requested as his friend & allie: & that his vpright meaning therin was the greatest cause, that God from aboue had beheld his power, and thereby bruised the head of the greatest and fiercest enemie of mankind that was vnder heauen: and now to get him an immortall name, would make free so great and flourishing a Citie as was Constantinople, go-F uerned by so noble and antient an House as the Emperors: That vnto his courage he had always faith ioyned, such as should neuer suffer him to make so great a breach in his reputation, as that it should be reported of him, That in the colour of a friend he came to inuade the Dominions of his allies: That he desired no more, but that the seruice he had done for the Greek Emperor, might for euer be ingrauen in the memorie of his posteritie, to the end they might for for euer wish well vnto him and his succeſſours, by remembring the good he had done them; That long might the noble Emperour liue, happily to gouerne his eſtate: and that before his returne he would ſo well conſider for the eſtabliſhing of the ſame, as that he ſhould not lightly fall againe into the like jeopardie, alwayes aſſuring himſelfe of his good will and fauour towards him. Eaſie it is to iudge what ioy theſe Greeke Embaſſadors receiued, to heare this ſo kind an anſwer from the mouth of Tamerlane himſelfe: who rather than hee would ſeeme to breake his faith, refuſed an empire offered vnto him, with one of the moſt ſtately and magnificent cities of the world. Few princes, I ſuppoſe, would performe ſuch a part: but ſo there be likewiſe but few Tamerlanes in the world. Theſe Embaſſadors by the commandement of Tamerlane, were by Axalla royally feaſted, and all the honour done them that might be. One of them being ſent backe to carrie theſe vnexpected news vnto the Greeke Emperor, filled both him and all the citie of Conſtantinople with exceeding ioy and gladneſſe, which both he and his ſubiects in generall ſpared not with bonfires and all other ſignes of ioy and pleaſure to manifeſt. And the more to ſhew his thankfulneſſe, ſhortly after by the aduice of his graue Councellors, paſſed ouer the ſtrait into Aſia, to ſee Tamerlane at Pruſa, and in perſon himſelfe to giue him thanks: who hearing of his comming, and very glad thereof, preſently vpon the firſt days journy ſent the prince Axalla to meet him, and to certifie him of the ioy that he conceiued, to haue the good hap for to ſee him, as alſo to conduct him to Pruſa: where thoſe two great princes, with the greateſt magnificence that might be, met, and ſo ſpent one whole day together. The Greeke Emperor the next day taking his leaue, was by Tamerlane with much honor conducted out of the citie. Now had Tamerlane himſelfe conceiued a ſecret deſire to ſee this ſo famous a city as was Conſtantinople, from which he was not now farre, yet would he not goe thither as a conqueror, but as a priuat perſon: which by the meanes of Axalla was accompliſhed, and he thereinto by the Greeke Emperor priuatly receiued, and with all familiarity poſſible, entertained; the Emperor ſhewing vnto him all the rare and excellent things that were therein to be ſeen: and the other Greeke Princes deuiſing all the means they could to do him pleaſure, and them which did accompanie him; who were in a manner all apparelled after the Greeke faſhion. At which time the Greeke Emperour himſelfe was curious to ſhew vnto him all the faire gardens alongſt the ſea coaſt, a league or two from Conſtantinople, and ſo priuatly conducting him, ſpent fiue or ſix days with all the mirth that might be poſſible; Tamerlane by the way oftentimes ſaying, That he had neuer ſeen a fairer citie: and that it was indeed the city (conſidering the faire and rich ſcituation thereof) of right, worthie to command al the world. He wondred at the coſtly buildings of the temples, the faire ingrauen pillars, the high piramides, & the making of the faire gardens; and oftentimes afterwards ſaid, That he nothing repented him of his ſo long and dangerous a voyage, if it had bin onely but to haue preſerued from fire & ſword ſo noble a citie as that was. In the Greeke Emperor he commended greatly his mild nature and curteſie; who knowing him aboue al things to take pleaſure in faire ſeruiceable horſes, gaue vnto him thirtie of the faireſt, ſtrongeſt, and readieſt, that were poſſible to be gotten, all moſt richly furniſhed; and ſent likewiſe faire Preſents vnto all the Princes and great Commanders of the armie, and bountifully cauſed to be deliuered vnto them all things which he thought to be neceſſarie for the armie. So after many great kindneſſes in ſhort time paſſed, and a ſtrait bond of friendſhip made, and by ſolemne oath confirmed betwixt the two great Princes, Tamerlane with great contentment tooke his leaue of the Emperor, and returned againe to his armie at Pruſa. Wherewith he now at his pleaſure without reſiſtance waſted and ſpoyled al Baiazet his dominion in Aſia, no man daring to make head againſt him.

Tamerlane goeth to Conſtantinople.

Tamerlan much delighted with the pleaſures of conſtantinople.

The yere being now wel ſpent, and Winter drawing on, Tamerlane diſperſed his armie into diuers of the prouinces of the leſſer Aſia, expecting ſtill when ſome of Baiazet his ſonnes or other friends ſhould make ſuit or meanes vnto him for his deliuerance, but none came: ſome fearing Tamerlane his heauie indignation, and others no leſſe dreading the fierce nature of Baiazet himſelfe, who if he had beene deliuered, was like enough (as was thought) to haue taken ſharp reuenge vpon all them which forſooke him in the late battel; and therefore neuer made interceſſion for him. Whereupon Tamerlane, one day paſſing by him, ſaid vnto him, I maruell that none of thy ſons or friends either come to ſee thee, or to intreat for thee, it muſt needs be that thou haſt euill deſerued of them, as thou haſt of others: yet how thinkeſt thou, if I ſhould ſet thee at libertie, would they againe receiue thee as their Lord and Soueraigne, or not? To whom whom Baiazet boldly anſwered; Were I at libertie, thou ſhouldeſt well ſee, how that I want neither courage nor means to reuenge all my wrongs and to make thoſe diſobedient and forgetfull, to know their duties better. Which his proud anſwere, made Tamerlane to keepe a ſtraighter hand ouer him.

In this great and bloudie war, wherein the Othoman empire had almoſt taken end, the Sultan of Ægypt had (as is aforeſaid) giuen aid vnto Baiazet: which Tamerlane tooke in ſo euill part, as that he reſolued to be therof reuenged: for as he was vnto his friends of al others moſt kind & courteous, ſo was he to his enemies no leſſe terrible and dreadful. Yet thinking it good before his departure out of the leſſer Aſia, to take ſome good order with theſe his new conqueſts: and finding nothing more honorable to reſolue vpon, he reſtored vnto the poore Mahometan Princes (Tachretin, Iſfendiar, Germian, and the reſt before fled vnto him for refuge) al their antient inheritance, with ſomething more; as hee did alſo diuers cities and countries of Natolia vnto the Greeke Emperour, for the yearely tribute of foure hundred thouſand duckats of gold, and eight hundred thouſand franks of ſiluer, which the Emperour promiſed to pay vnto him yerely. And ſo hauing enriched his armie with the ſpoiles of the Othoman empire in Aſia, he turned his forces againſt the Ægyptian Sultan, and ſo paſſing thorow Caramania, entered into Syria, then part of the Sultans kingdome: where neere vnto Aleppo (beeing before yeelded vnto him) was fought betwixt them a great & mortal batel, the Sultan hauing in his army an hundred thouſand foot, and ſeuenty foure thouſand horſe: whereof there were thirty thouſand Mamelukes, accounted the beſt horſmen of the world. In which battel, Axalla the great captaine, with the auauntgard of Tamerlane his armie, was hardly diſtreſſed, and Axalla himſelfe taken: but forthwith againe reſcued by Tamerlane: who had he not by his comming on with new forces, ſpeedily reſtored the battell, cunningly protracted by Axalla, that day was like enough to haue made an end of his good fortune. But the victory after a long and cruell fight (wherein were foureſcore thouſand men on both ſides ſlaine) inclining to Tamerlane, the Sultan fled, Tamerlane purſuing him by the ſpace of three leagues. After which victorie, Tamerlane diuiding his armie, ſent Axalla with fortie thouſand horſe and fiftie thouſand foot to purſue the Sultan alongſt the coaſt of Arabia: who oftentimes ſhewed himſelfe with ſome foure thouſand horſe to haue hindred Axalla, who hauing the ſmalleſt forces, followed him the neareſt. Tamerlane himſelfe in the mean time, with threeſcore thouſand horſe, and an hundred thouſand foot, marching alongſt the ſea coaſt, had all the cities as he went yeelded vnto him; as Magata, Aman, otherwiſe called Apamea, Tortoſa, Barruto, and Nephthalin: onely the ſtrong citie of Damaſco refuſed to receiue him, whereinto the Sultan had put the Prince Zamadzen, with a ſtrong garriſon, who did what he might to haue defended the ſame: But all in vaine, for Tamerlane hauing by batterie ouerthrowne a great part of the wall, by aſſault won the citie, only the caſtle yet remaining, as being of a wonderfull ſtrength, and almoſt impregnable; whereinto ſuch a multitude had at the taking of the citie retired themſelues, as was not poſſible therein long to liue: who in ſhort time pinched with hunger, and many of them dead, the reſt vpon ſafegard of their liues offered to yeeld: whom for all that Tamerlane would not receiue to mercie, to make them feele what it was to hold out againſt him: ſo that moſt of them dying of famine, the reſt yeelded without condition, and were for their obſtinacie almoſt al ſlaine. Which his ſeuerity towards them of Damaſco, cauſed, that thirty leagues off they brought the keyes of their cities vnto him, in token of their ſubmiſſion: whom he no way moleſted, more than in contributing vnto the charge of his army. From Damaſco, hee turned directly towards Ieruſalem, at which time they of the citie had driuen out the Sultans garriſon, as had almoſt all they of Iudea, ſubmitting themſelues vnto Tamerlane. At Chorazin the Sultan had left ſix thouſand men in garriſon for the defence of the place, who at the firſt ſeemed to ſtand vpon their guard; but afterwards diſmaied to ſee ſo great an army before it, and that Tamerlane hauing approched the wals, was ſet down to haue it, they ſubmitted themſelues and found mercie. In which citie Tamerlane left certaine of his men in garriſon, for the better repreſſing of the Mamelukes, who with often incurſions troubled his armie. So marching on, he himſelfe with certain horſemen for his guard, rode to Ieruſalem to viſit the ſepulchre ſo much reuerenced of all nations, and there to make his oblations: where hee was of the inhabitants ioyfully receiued, and hauing ſought out all the antiquities of that ancient citie, would be conducted vnto all the places thereabouts, where Ieſus Chriſt had preached, euen euen as the pilgrimes doe : and comming to the ſepulchre, gaue thereunto, and the deuout there, many rich and precious gifts, to the great contentment of all men (to ſee him honour thoſe holy places) but of the Iewes only, who greatly blamed him for ſo doing: of whom of al others, Tamerlane made no reckoning, but called them the accurſed of God. There had he newes that the Sultan had gathered al his forces, and being come into Ægipt, was there fortifi. ing of his cities, eſpecially the great cities of Alexandria and Caier. Tamerlane his armie in the mean time by his commandment came towards Ægipt to Damiata: which ſtrong city he thought not good to leaue behind him, although he was by ſome perſuaded ſo to do, for that it was thought impregnable, as well in reſpect of the caſtle, as of the ſtrong garriſon that the Sultan had put thereinto: but hee, whoſe fortune nothing could hinder, would needs goe thither: and ſo hauing commanded Axalla to ſet vpon it, followed himſelfe after with the reſt of his armie. Now Axalla hauing ſummoned the citie, and declared vnto the inhabitants (who were moſt of them Chriſtians) the mildneſſe and courteſie of Tamerlane, as alſo who himſelfe was, and what religion he held; cauſing many of the Greeke captains to ſpeake vnto them, and to tell them of the miſerie they indured vnder the Moores and Mamalukes: ſo farre preuailed with them, that they all determined to aduenture their liues, to put the Mamalukes out of the citie, with all them that fauoured the Sultan. And ſo in the night taking vp armes, made themſelues maſters of one quarter of the citie, and deliuered one of the gates to Axalla: wherby he entering, put al the Mamalukes to the ſword, or took them priſoners, and ſo gained the citie. Whereof Tamerlane hearing, beeing as yet vpon his march, was in good hope of ſo proſperous a beginning, to find an happie end alſo of his deſignes in Ægypt. For beſides the good fortune thereof, he knew that this hauen of Damiata might ſerue him with victuals out of all the parts of Greece, as the Emperor Emanuel had promiſed him, & wherein he nothing failed him. Into which port Tamerlane hauing made his entrie, left there in garriſon two thouſand of the Emperour Emanuel his ſouldiers, with a gouernour, of whom hee tooke an oath for their obedience. So hauing ſtayed a ſpace at Damiata, hee cauſed his vauntgard to march towards Alexandria: and, hauing paſſed ouer the riuer, euen in an inſtant turned directly vnto Caier, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Sultan, who made prouiſion for the defence of Alexandria, as the neereſt vnto danger. But vnderſtanding of theſe newes, vſed ſuch diligence, that he entered into the citie with fortie thouſand horſe, and threeſcore thouſand foot, euen as Tamerlane his armie approached, purpoſing in perſon himſelfe to defend it. By whoſe comming the great citie readie before to haue reuolted, was againe in his obedience confirmed, to the great hinderance of Tamerlane his affaires: for to remain long before it, was impoſſible, for want of victuals for ſo great an army in the enemies country. Yet notwithſtanding all this, did not Tamerlane forbeare to draw neere vnto it, and with all his army to encamp neere vnto the ſame, hauing cauſed a great trench to be made for to couer his horſemen, and thereby to lodge his armie more ſafely: during which time hee cauſed diuers onſets to be giuen, as well to trie what confidence the enemie had in himſelfe, as to ſee how the people of the citie, eſpecially the ſlaues (which in that populous citie are infinite) were affected towards him: who certainely informed him of the ſtate of the citie, and the armie; as glad to ſee the ſame by him ſhut vp, and the proud Mamalukes ſtill put to the worſt. But thus lying ſtill at the ſiege, one day hee thought it good to ſhew his armie before the citie, to trie whether the enemie had a deſire to come to a day of battell or not: as alſo to view what forces he had, and ſo indeed to ſeek occaſion to fight: in hope alſo, that if the Sultan did come forth with al his armie into the field, ſome reuolt might happen within the citie, as well by the ſlaues (vnto whom liberty was by him promiſed) as by the citizens themſelues (diſcontented with the inſolencie of the Mamalukes entered of late into the citie with the Sultan) vnto whom he had made it knowne by certaine ſlaues (for that purpoſe fled as fugitiues out of his army into the citie) how that he was not come to hurt them, but only for the deſtruction of the Mamalukes, both his and their enemies. But betimes ſtanding ſo in battell array, no man came foorth, neither was there any tumult or ſtirre raiſed in the citie, as he had expected. For the Sultan in ſo great a citie well prouided of all things, was reſolued to wearie him out with lying ſtill, and not to put all to the hazard of a battell. Which Tamerlane perceiuing, and ſet downe not to depart from thence, but victorious, reſolued likewiſe to force him euen in his greateſt ſtrength, in the heart of his greateſt citie; although it were not to be done, but with great aduenaduenture: ſuch confidence he had in the ſtrength & multitude of his army. Now his purpoſe was, firſt to take one of the cities (for Caire is diuided into three) & therin incamping himſelf, by little & little to aduance forward as he might, ſtil fighting with the enemy. Vpon which reſolution, he commanded an aſſault to be giuen, and hauing brought his footmen to the place where he would haue them to giue the onſet (for the citie was not walled, but only fortified with ditches & trenches) he commanded the Prince of Thanais with fifty thouſand footmen, to begin the aſſault, euen in the face of the enemie; which he moſt valiantly performed, and there began a moſt terrible and cruel fight. Axalla in the meantime, deeming (as the truth was) that the Sultan had drawn his greateſt forces to the place where the Prince of Thanais fought to enter, as vnto a place of greateſt danger; fet a compaſſe about, & vpon another quarter of the city, with ſmall reſiſtance paſſed the trenches; where hee preſently left thirtie thouſand men to fil vp the ditches, and to make way for the horſmen to enter: aduancing forward himſelfe, againſt twentie thouſand ſent by the Sultan to haue ſtopt his further paſſage: the Prince of Thanais being at that ſame time almoſt beaten back by the Mamelukes. But the way being made plain, by them that were for that purpoſe left by Axalla, and ten thouſand horſe entred, which charged vpon the backs of the Mamelukes, where the Sultan himſelfe was; and they ſeconded by ten thouſand moe ſent in by Tamerlane, following himſelf after, with al his power: the Sultan retired vnto a ſecond ſtrength, which he had made in the next city. The fight indured full the ſpace of ſeuen houres; wherein were ſlain of the Sultan his men aboue ſixteene thouſand; and of Tamerlanes betwixt ſeuen and eight thouſand. Who contented to haue diſlodged the enemy, and gained a third part of the citie, cauſed a retrait to bee founded, in hope the next day to win all the reſt, as indeed he did. For the Prince of Thanais the next day forcing the enemies trenches in one place, and Axalla in another, the Sultan after a great fight finding himſelfe hardly preſſed by the obſtinat enemy, and too weake long to hold out, retired; and ſo forthwith abandoned the citie, & encamped himſelfe along the ſide of the riuer Nilus, with purpoſe to paſſe the ſame, and to flie to Alexandria his ſecond ſtrength & refuge. Which Tamerlane ſuſpecting, followed after him with his horſemen (who onely were in order) and ſome few foot, hardly drawn from the citie, which their fellowes were in ſpoiling; ſo as hee was glad to promiſe them eſpecially, to regard and reward their good ſeruice. Againſt whom the Sultan vpon a narrow cauſey, had oppoſed twelue or fifteen thouſand men, whom he called his ſlaues (to fauor his paſſage) but were indeed his beſt ſouldiers, and ſtood faſt, he place ſeruing greatly for their aduantage: who for all that at length forced by their enemies, ſtil increaſing vpon them, (though not without great loſſe) caſt themſelues into the great riuer, and made a moſt honorable retrait: euery man hauing his weapon in the one hand, and ſwimming with the other to the further bank. The Sultan flying with ſome eighteen thouſand horſe (for the reſt were ſundry waies fled or els drowned) is reported in his flight, to haue comforted his men, by telling of them, that they were not men that had vanquiſhed them, but gods, there appeared in them ſo great wiſedome, force, and valor: diuers of the Mamelukes taken in the late fight, being brought before Tamerlane, and by him courteouſly vſed, were of him demanded, if they could be content to ſerue him, now that their maſter was fled and gone: which they al vtterly refuſed: whom notwithſtanding, for their fidelitie, Tamerlane ſet at liberty to go again to the Sultan: as no leſſe deſirous to be admired of his enemies for his bounty and courteſie, than feared for his force and valor. The wonderfull wealth of this ſo great and famous a city became a prey vnto his ſoldiers; who for the ſpace of foure and twentie houres had the ſpoile thereof, euery man being then by open proclamation commaunded to repaire to his quarter. The citizens he ſet al at liberty, not ſuffering any of them to be taken priſoners: and ſo leauing ten thouſand good ſoldiers, with a great number of others (wherof he caried a great multitude in his army, planting euery where as he paſſed as it were new colonies) & carrying away with him ſuch of the inhabitants as he thought might hurt him, and taking order for all things neceſſary for the keeping of ſuch a city, hee cauſed his army to paſſe ouer the riuer for to follow the Sultan to Alexandria, to the end not to leaue his victorie vnperfect: Axalla haſting before with the avauntgard, for to hinder the Sultan for ioyning his forces againe together; and the reſt of his army conducted by the Prince of Thanais; he himſelfe with an infinite number of boats & ſoldiers to attend vpon him, going by water, taking great pleaſure to behold the faire riuer, & his ſwift courſe ſomtimes, and in an inſtant to become ſo calme as if it ſcarce moued.

The

The citizens of Alexandria hearing of his comming, and fearing what might betide them, be- G sought the Sultan to haue compassion of their estate, and to withdraw himselfe into Lybia, whither Tamerlane for the barrennesse of the country could not with any great power follow him; resolued for their parts to giue place vnto fortune, and to do as the time required, and no more to resist so great a force, whereof they had already made sufficient triall: promising yet The Sultan flieth from Alexandria. to remain in heart stil his, and vpon the first occasion offered, to make the same to him appeare.
Whereupon the Sultan seeing all things desperat, determined for a time to flie, in hope, that time would bring some change: as also that Tamerlane his populous host would not long remaine there. And so departing out of Alexandria with teares standing in his eyes, oftentimes said, That God was angrie with him and his people, and that he must of necessitie suffer the fatal ouerthrow of his estate; himselfe hauing done as much as in him lay, according to his H charge, and the expectation the world had of him: and yet that he hoped at length to returne againe, and deliuer his people from the bondage, whereunto they must now needes submit themselues. Tamerlane comming to Alexandria (before ye elded to Axalla) there staied a great while, sending Axalla to pursue the Sultan, exceedingly grieued that he could not get him into his hands; and therefore still fearing some innouation to be by him raised, which caused him to deale the more hardly with them, whom he suspected to fauour him. Now the bruit of these victories hauing with Axalla passed beyond Alexandria into Lybia, had brought such a feare, not onely vpon the people adioyning vnto these conquests, but also vpon all Affrica (they supposing that Tamerlane did follow) that two and twentie of the Moore kings sent their embassadours vnto him, to offer vnto him their obedience: the Sultan as a man forsaken I of fortune, still flying before him. Of the neerest of which Kings, Tamerlane tooke hostages: as for the other further off, hee contented himselfe with their faith giuen, and with the other outward signes of their good wils.

Tamerlane desirous to return into his countrey. Now after this long trauell and paines taken, was Tamerlane more desirous than he had before vsed, to see the pleasures of his owne natiue country: the rather thereunto moued by the request of his wife, then longing for his returne; and the newes he heard of the sicknes of the old Tartarian Emperor his father in law; besides that, age it selfe began to bring vnto him a desire of rest: with whom also, the desires of his souldiers well agreed, as men now wearie to haue run so many and diuers fortunes. The onely stay was, that he expected the comming of Calibes, an old and faithfull seruant of his, whom he for his good desert had of his own accord K appointed gouernor of al his new conquests in Ægypt and Syria: a great honour no doubt, but not too great for him that had so wel deserued. So mindfull was he of the good deserts of his faithful seruants, as that he needed not by others to be of them put in remembrance, were they neuer so farre off, as was now Calibes, who at this time was with the third part of his armie making way for him along the great riuer Euphrates, for the conquest of Mesopotamia, and Persia: whose comming was now with great deuotion looked for of the whole army, desirous to returne. Which their expectation he long delayed not, but beeing sent for, came to Alexandria, whither the whole armie was now by the commandement of Tamerlane againe assembled. Vpon whose comming, Tamerlane departed from Alexandria, hauing there left L the Prince Zamalzan (a man of great reputation) with six thousand horsemen and ten thousand foot, as gouernour of that place, and lieutenant generall vnder Calibes: whom Tamerlane (as I haue said) had now appointed to commaund ouer all Ægypt and Syria, together with the countries newly conquered in Lybia and Barbarie: and now conducting him vnto the great citie of Caire, and there taking the best order he could for the preseruation of his new conquest, left him with fortie thousand horse and fiftie thousand foot. And so hauing sufficiently instructed him how hee would haue those kingdomes gouerned, dismissed him, not like a master, but as a companion, seeming very sorry to leaue him destitute of his presence. So setting forward with his armie, conducted by the Prince of Thanais, Tamerlane himselfe, with a few to guard him, by the way turned aside vnto Ierusalem: Where hee remained eleuen dayes, daylie visiting the sepulchre of Christ Iesus (whom he called the God M of the Christians) and the ruins of Salomon his Temple: much wondering thereat, and at Ie-rusalem, the seat of Dauids Kingdome, and of that great Salomon; but grieued that hee could not see them fully in their former beautie. He only despised the Iewes, which had commitmitted so cruell a murder against him that came to saue them. And to shew his deuotion towards

A wards the holy city commanded it to be free from all subsidies and garrisons of men of war; and gaue great gifts vnto the Monasteries, and honoured them so long as hee remained there.
Departing from Ierusalem, he came to Damasco: which great citie, as well for that it was infected with the opinion of Iezides (accounted an arch heriticke among the Mahometans) as also euill affected to his proceedings, he caused to be rased, and the bones of Iezides the false Prophet to be digged vp and burnt, and his graue before much honored, in despight to be filled with dung. So marching on, & blasting the world before him as he went (for long it were and from our purpose, to recount all his victories) he passed ouer the riuer Euphrates, and hauing conquered Mesopotamia, with the great citie of Babylon, and all the kingdome of Persia, laded with the spoile of the world, and eternized for euer, he returned at length to Samer-cand, the famous place of his birth, and glorious seat of his empire.

The miserable death of Baiazet. Now had Baiazet (but a little before one of the greatest princes on earth, and now the scorn of fortune, and a by word to the world) with great impatiencie laine two yeres in most miserable thraldom, for most part shut vp in an yron cage, as some dangerous wild beast: and hauing no better means to end his loathed life, did violently beat out his braines against the barres of the yron grate wherin he was inclosed, and so died about the yeare of our Lord 1399. Yet of his death are diuers other reports: some saying, that he died of an ague, proceeding of sorrow and griefe: others, that he poysoned himselfe: and the Turks affirming, that he was set at liber-tie by Tamberlane, being by him beforehand poysoned, whereof he dyed three daies after hee was inlarged (a report not like to be true:) but howsoeuer it was, his end appeareth to haue bin C right miserable. His dead bodie at the request of his son Mahomet, was by Tamberlane sent to Asprapolis, from whence it was afterwards conueied to Prusa, and there lyeth buried in a Chappell neere vnto the great Mahometan Temple without the citie Eastward: where also lieth his beloued wife Despina, with his eldest sonne Erthogrul. And fast by in a little Chappell lieth buried his brother Iacup, whom he in the beginning of his raigne murthered.

A comparison betwixt Baiazet and Tamberlane. These two great and mighty Princes, Tamberlane and Baiazet, (both of them whilst they liued, a burthen to the world) as they took their beginning from the Scyths or Tartars, so were they of like honorable progenitors descended: Baiazet being the fourth in descent from the warlike Othoman, the raiser of his family; & Tamberlan in like degree from the great Zingis, the first and most fortunat leader of the Tartars (his countrymen) vnto the pleasures of the East: D both Princes of great power and like spirit; wise, hardy, painful, resolute, and most skilfull in martial affaires; but ambitious aboue measure, the ground of al the former troubles by them raised, to the astonishment of the world. Howbeit, the great vertues and other the honourable qualities of Baiazet, were in him by his cholerick and waiward nature much obscured: which made him to exceed both in cruelty & pride: being also much more handfast than were his honorable predecessors. For which causes he was much feared and lesse beloued of his soldiers and men of war in general, & of them at his most need forsaken: He vsed commonly to say, That his treasures were his childrens meat, and not his soldiers pay: which by way of reproch was by a common soldier cast in his teeth, when he raged to see himselfe by them forsaken in the great battel against Tamerlane; telling him as he fled, that he ran not away, but went to seek E his pay, wherewith to prouide his children bread. Whereas all the aforesaid vertues in Tam-berlane were graced with diuers other of like nature, no man being to his freinds more courteous or kinde, either vnto his enemies more dreadfull or terrible. The good seruice of his ser-uants he neuer forgot, either left the same long vnrewarded: being therof so mindful, as that he needed not by them or others in their behalf, to be put in remembrance therof, hauing always by him a catalogue both of their names and good deserts, which he daily perused. Oftentimes saying that day to be lost, wherein hee had not giuen them something: and yet neuer bestowing his preferments on such as ambitiously sought the same (as deeming them in so doing vnworthy thereof) but vpon such as whose modesty or desert he thought worthy those his great fauors; so tempering the seuerity of his commands with the greatnes of his bounty, as F that it is hard to say, whither he was of his nobility & men of war, for the one more feared, or for the other beloued: both, the great staies of princes states; feare keeping the obstinat in obedience; & loue, the dutiful in deuotion. But with Baiazet it was not so, who deeming all done for him but duty, & by nature chollerick & proud (after the maner of tyrants) desired aboue al to be of his subiects feared, not much regarding how little he was of thē beloued; not the lest cause

Baiazet in his posteritie more fortunate than Tamberlane.

cause of his great fall and miserie, and that therein hee was of his owne so smally regarded: wherein for all that he is to be accounted more fortunate than the other great conqueror his enemie, hauing euer since in the lineall descent of himselfe, had one of the greatest Monarchs of the world to succeed stil in his kingdome and empire: as he hath euen at this day, the great Sultan Mahomet, the third of that name, who now in great maiesty raigneth in Constantinople. Whereas the glorie of Tamberlane his empire, euen in his owne time growne to the height thereof, and labouring with the greatnesse of it selfe, and by him diuided amongst his sonnes, shortly after his death decaied, rent in sunder by ambition and ciuill discord; and not long after, together with his posteritie, rooted out by Vsun-Cassanes the Persian King, to the worlds wonder, tooke end: nothing of the huge greatnesse thereof now or since then remaining, more than the fame thereof: as doth also the miserie of the other so brought low. But leauing this mirrour of mishap (Baiazet) vnto his rest, and Tamberlane for a while to triumph in Samarcand; let vs now proceed in the course of our historie, yet not forgetting by the way to remember such Christian Princes as then liued together with these two great Monarchs.

Vindicibus Mahomet patrium sibi vendicat armis Imperium, & fractas feruidus auget opes.
Quod patri abstulerat violentia Tamberlani, Imperio reddit Marte fauente suo.
Ille sagittiferosque Dacas, validosque Triballos Contudit, & populos Ister amœne tuos.
Turcica sic rursus sublata potentia, stragem Attulit imperio Romule magne tuo.

By force of armes stout Mahomet his fathers kingdome gaines, And doth the broken state thereof repaire with restlesse paines.
What so the force of Tamerlane had from his father tane, He by his fortune and his force restor'd the same again.
The Dacians he vanquished, and Seruians in field,
And forc'd the people neere to thee faire Ister, for to yeeld.
So once againe the Turkish state (by him rais'd vp on hie) Hath to thine empire, Romulus, brought great calamitie.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, FIFTH KING OF THE TVRKES, AND RESTORER OF THEIR SORE SHAKEN KINGDOME.

Diuers opinions concerning the successors of Baiazet.

C HOw wonderfully the Turkish kingdome was by the violence of Tamerlane shaken, and the maiestie thereof defaced, it well appeareth, in that the Histories of that time, as well those of the Greeks, as of the Turks, in nothing more differ, than in the successors of Baiazet, their late vnfortunat King. Some writing, that he had two sons, Orchanes (otherwise called Calepinus) and Mahomet: and that Calepinus in the second yeare of his raigne was slaine, and his kingdome possessed by Mahomet his brother. Others reporting, that Baiazet had two sons namely, Calepinus and Mustapha: and that Calepinus succeeding his father in the Turkish kingdome, when he had raigned six yeres, died, leauing behind him two sonnes Orchanes and Mahomet: and that Orchanes being young, was slaine by his vncle: whom Mahomet in reuenge of his brothers death, afterwards slew, and possessed the kingdome himselfe. Others reckon vp seuen sons of Baiazet; Iosua, Musulmanes, Moses, Calepinus, Iosua the D yonger, Mustapha and Halil; with an vncertaine succession amongst them also. This diuersitie of opinions, full of no lesse vncertaintie; as I mean not to follow in report of this Historie, so wil I not spend any time in refuting the same, (although much might be said in the matter) but leaue these reports, together with the historie following, to such credit as they shall hap to find with the considerat readers.

The Greeke Historiographers (best like to know the Turkish succession, as wel by reason of their neerenesse, as in that they were by them as their bad neighbors, so much troubled) make no mention at all either of Calepinus or of Orchanes: In like manner, Historia Musulmana Turcorum, diligently gathred out of the Turks own histories by Io. Leunclauius (a learned Physitian, and himselfe a great traueller amongst them, & therefore deseruing the more credit) do not so E much as name the succession of Calepinus or Orchanes, after the captiuitie of Baiazet, but reiecteth them both ■ counterfets. But in my opinion (without preiudice to any, that vpon better reason may deeme otherwise) the great confusion of the Turkish Kingdome, in short time wrought by the mightie Tamerlane and his Tartars, with the ciuill discord and war afterwards arising among the sons of Baiazet, striuing all as it were at once, for the restlesse room of soueraintie, which suffereth no partners; and euery one of them, according to his hap or power, laying hand vpon some one part or other thereof, and bearing himselfe therein for a time as a King, in countries so far distant; neuer leauing, vntill they had like the earth-borne bretheren, wrought one anothers destruction; might giue iust occasion of such diuersitie of reports as is before spoken of, concerning the succession of that time, in that troubled and rent kingdom: F some reckoning one, some another; and some, such as neuer were, to haue succeeded in the gouernment, and so vntruly augmenting the number of the Turkish Kings. Wherefore leauing Calepinus & Orchanes vnto them that first found them, with that little, which without any good ground and lesse probabilitie is written of their supposed raigne; I (following the authoritie of the Turkish history) reckon this Mahomet one of the yongest sonnes of Baiazet (of whom we are now to intreat) fifth king of the Turk: who after great and dangerous wars as well against his own brethren, as his forrein enemies, was at length solely inuested in the Turkish Kingdome, about ten yeares after the captiuitie of his father Baiazet, as shall hereafter be declared. G

The true posteritie of Baiazet

Baiazet after the manner of the Turkish Kings, hauing layd vp the hope of his posteritie in the common treasure house of nature, rather than in the bodie of one lawfull wife, had by diuers wiues and concubins seuen sonnes, Ethogrul, otherwise called Orthobules, Emer-Solyman, Mustapha-Zelebi, (that is to say, the noble) Isa-Zelebi, Musa-Zelebi, Sultan Mahomet, and Casan-Zelebi. Of whom Erthogrul the eldest was lost in the wars against Casi Burchaniden, as is before said in the life of Baiazet. Mustapha was slaine in the great battell against Tamerlane, and there buried in the bed of fame. Cusan the yongest was a child in Baiazet his court, when his father was taken, and afterwards with his sister Fatime deliuered as hostages, by their brother Solyman, vnto Emanuel the Emperor of Constantinople, where they both happily became Christians, and so shortly after died. H

Solyman was by Alu Bassa President of Baiazet his Councel, and other great captaines, conueyed out of the battell against Tamerlane, into Europe, and so by them at Hadrianople saluted Sultan. Mahomet fled out of the same battell to Amasia in Capadocia, where he was in his fathers time gouernour. Isa hearing of his fathers captiuitie, after the departing of Tamerlane with his Tartars, seised vpon Prusa a citie of Bithynia, the antient seat of the Turkish Kings, with the country adioyning, and there raigned as King. Musa-Zelebi was taken prisoner with Baiazet his father, and afterwards set at libertie by Tamerlane. But of their fortunes more shal be sayd in this history following. I Mahomet gouernor of Amasia.

Mahomet was but fifteene yeares old when his father Baiazet in the vnfortunate battell of mount Stella was taken prisoner, and was at the same time by his appointment Gouernour of Amasia, with a great part of Capadocia adioyning: which places became so troublesome after the great victory of Tamerlane, that the Turkes in that country were glad day and night for the safegard of themselues, their wiues, and children, to keepe continuall watch and ward: in so much that many of them wearied with those troubles, & despairing of better times, went into voluntary exile, because they would not see so great miseries: which thing much grieu'd yong Mahomet. Wherefore calling vnto him his most faithful councellors, to consult what course to take in the midst of so many dangers, it was by generall consent thought best (for so much as they could not without apparent danger continue neere vnto Tamerlanes forces) to get themselues further off into places of more strength, & from thence to expect the departure of their enemies, and in the meane time to content themselues with such aduantages as occasion and chance of war might minister; cutting them short by policy, whom they were not able to meet in the plain field, and so by little & little to weaken or wearie their mightie stragling enemies. For albeit that Tamerlane himselfe was not neere him, as then lying in Caria; yet did the Captains of his great and victorious army, at their pleasure spoile and forrage the countries far and neere all ouer the lesser Asia. Vpon this resolution he with all his forces departed from Amasia, to Derby in Paphlagonia: where by the way he incountred with Cara Iahia a nigh kinsman to the prince Isfendiar of Castamona, his enemie; whom he put to flight with great slaughter of his men. This was the beginning of Mahomets good fortune. From thence he went to Kereden, and there staying certain dayes, sent a spie into Tamerlanes campe, to see how all things went there: and afterwards entred again into councel with his captains, concerning his further proceedings. In which consultation some were of opinion, That it was best for him to withdraw himselfe into the mountains of the lesser Asia, as a place of good safetie, vntill the departure of Tamerlane, which was shortly hoped for: for that it was not to be thought, that Tamerlaine would with his huge armie pursue him in that mountaine country, flying from hil to hil, and as it were from strength to strength. Others better aduised, thought those mountains to be no places to trust vnto, and therfore that it were more honorable, and as free from danger, for him to return again to Amasia, and there to liue amongst his subiects, protecting them in such sort as he might, & not to leaue them for a prey to euery stragling companie of the rude Tartarians: which councel he followed, as most reasonable; & being readie to set forward, the spie before by him sent into Tamerlanes campe, returned, certifying him that he had seen his father Baiazet in good health in the Tartars Campe, but could not by any means speake with him, by reason of the straight Guard set ouer him: and that all that part of Asia was by Tamerlane possessed, K L M Mahomet sendeth Spies into Tamerlane his Campe.

A possessed, who then with his army wintred in Caria and Lysia: whereupon Mahomet returned backe againe into Amasia; where he had not long stayed, but that newes was brought vnto him, That one of the Tartarian Princes called Cara Dulet schach (that is to say, the fortunate blacke King) was with an armie of twentie thousand comming to spoyle his countrey; being giuen him by Tamerlane. With which newes hee was exceedingly troubled: wherefore with all speed calling together his forces for the safegard of his country, he sent before a spie to discouer the enemies doings. This diligent spie returning in all hast, told Mahomet, That Cara Dulet lay at the towne of Ægiolus in Galatia, in great securitie, hauing about him but a small power; for that he fearing no danger, had at that time dispersed his armie, to seeke after pillage abroad in the couutry. Mahomet taking hold of this opportunitie, marched thither with B great celeritie, and suddenly setting vpon Cara Dulet, ouercame him. In which conflict Cara Dulet himselfe was shot thorow the head with an arrow and slaine, and his armie vtterly discomfited. Mahomet returning backe to Amasia with victorie, refreshed and rewarded his soldiers, yet no lesse carefull for the safetie of his kingdome than before. Cara Dulet slaine.

Shortly after, he was aduertised that Cubad Ogli with a great armie laid hard siege to the citie of Cæsaria in Capadocia, & was like in short time to take it, if it were not speedily relieued. By taking of which citie, that Tartar Prince was like to make a great entrance, to the hazarding of the whole country. Wherefore Mahomet hauing his army always in readinesse, marched day and night with such speed to Cæsaria, as that he was vpon Cubad Ogli before he was aware of his comming, and there slew most of his soldiers, and put him with the rest to flight. C ter that, he returned into Cubad Ogli his Countrey in Pontus, and grieuously spoyled and destroyed the same: at which time he also by force woon the strong castle Pelræ in the confines of Phrygia.

Immediatly after that, Inall Ogli another of Tamerlanes Captaines (which at their pleasure without let forraged all the countries of the lesser Asia, during the time that Tamerlane made his abode within the Turks dominions) vpon the sudden entred into Capadocia with an army of twentie thousand fighting men, killing the inhabitants, & spoyling the country before him: so that the people for feare left their dwellings, and fled into the woods and mountaines, to hide themselues from his furie. Whereof Mahomet hearing, was therewith exceedingly grieued, and wrote vnto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet, vnto the Prince Inall Ogli.

Mahomet his Letters to Inall Ogli the Tartar Prince.

Whereas without any iust or lawfull cause, or any war proclaimed, you haue inuaded Our Kingdome, and cease not cruelly to kill Our subiects, by God committed to Our protection; and to spoyle their wealth and labours, to the great disturbance of the Mahometan commonweale; and make no end of your malice and crueltie: you do therein quite digresse from the manners and laws of the true Mahometans, or right beleeuers. For if thou wouldest not only be accounted, but indeed be a true Musul-man, thou shouldest forthwith depart out of my kingdome with thine armie; thou shouldest not thus shed the innocent bloud, or without cause thus wrong my people: but forasmuch as thou knowest not what beseemeth thee, neither E wilt listen vnto good councell, but wilfully proceed in thy wicked purpose, falsly persuading thy selfe, this my Kingdome to be destitute of a lawfull inheritor, and therefore do'st so great wrong and iniurie vnto the defenders of the true Mahometan religion; I would thou shouldest know, that I with my so often victorious armie will shortly by the power of God come against thee, and in plaine field according to thy deserts chastise thee. Therefore whilest thou yet maist, reclaime thy selfe, and proceed not too far in thine obstinacie: too late repentance did neuer man yet good. Thus much We thought good to aduertise thee, that thou shouldest not be ignorant of Our purpose, but mightest so better consider and dispose both of thy selfe and thine affaires. In the yere after the departure of the great Prophet Mahomet 806.

Vnto which Letters Inall Ogli returned this answer in writing:

F

Prince Inall Ogli, to Mahomet.

Inall Ogli his answer to Mahomet.

Why do'st thou Mahomet with such letters prouoke me? why do'st thou so vnciuilly taunt me, being thy selfe but a boy, and in truth a very child? It beseemeth thee not to haue entred into these countries, or to to lay hands thereon, wrongfully gracing thy selfe with the title of a Sultan. Neither is there any cause C why thou shouldest complaine, that I should lie in wait or seeke after thy life, thy kingdome, or any thing that thine is. I challenge vnto my selfe this kingdome, but none of thine: out of which it is reason for thee, as a wrongfull intruder of thy selfe, to depart; whom otherwise I will forthwith thrust out, and ioyne the same vnto the rest of my territories. Wherefore except thou without delay get thee packing, and cease to oppose thy selfe against my designes; I denounce vnto thee all the calamities of war, and wish thee with speed to prepare thy selfe to battell, for that I meane shortly to meet with thee. This yeare of our great Prophet 806.

Inall ogli ouerthrown by Mahomet.

Shortly after, Mahomet according to his promise meeting with this Tartar Prince, by plaine force ouerthrew him, and had of him a notable victorie.

The like good hap he had also not long after, against Coser Ogli and Kinpeck Ogli, two other B Tartarian captaines, at the castle of Chara chizar and the Plaine of Artuck-Oua. And hearing that one Mostes a Turke, had fortified himselfe in the ruins of Sebastia, and from thence spoiled the country round about, he sent Baiazet one of his Bassa's against him; who in short time tooke him, and brought him bound vnto him: by whom he was adiudged to die. But seeing in the man an inuincible courage, and contempt of death at such time as he should haue been executed, mooued therewith, hee gaue him his pardon; for which he euer after continued vnto him faithfull, and did him great seruice.

Mahomet hauing many times thus vanquished the stragling Tartarian Princes, which had fought the spoyle of his countrey, became thereby famous amongst the great commanders of Tamerlane his armie, in so much that the bruit of his name came at length to Tamerlanes eare, I yet lying in the lesser Asia: who as he thought it not worth his greatnesse and labor, himself in person to goe against so great an enemie; so hee thought it not good or conuenient quite to neglect him, but by some other meanes (if he could) to ouertake him. For which purpose he began to speake many times very honourably of him, highly commending his great valor and forwardnesse in so tender yeres. And calling for Baiazet, told him what great commendation he had heard of his sonne Mahomet, and that he was therefore very desirous to see him: where at he found that true which was reported of his great vertues, hee would bestow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage, with many other great preferments: and therfore willed Baiazet to write vnto him, not to doubt to come vnto him, to the great good both of himselfe and his father. Which thing Baiazet at the first doubting the worst, requested Tamerlane not K to be so much offended with his sonne, being yet very young, and not worthie of so great a fauor. Neuerthelesse partly perswaded by Tamerlane his protestations, & importuned by him that might now command him, he with an euill will went to his sonne Mahomet to such effect as Tamerlane required. With which letters, and other of like purport from himself, with many rich Presents, Tamerlane sent Hacen Mahomet one of his secret counsellors) embassador to Mahomet, of whom he was right honorably receiued, and like wise entertained. But hauing read the aforesaid letters, and thereby vnderstood the cause of his comming, he entred into counsell with the great Bassa's about him, whether he were best to go to Tamerlane or not. Where his Councellors were all of opinion, that it was not good for him to aduenture his person to the danger of such a journey, in the mercie of so mighty an enemie, of whose faith he had no assu- L rance. And if he should say they should therewith offended, will by force seeke to haue you, we at his commyng will take the refuge of the woods and mountains, and there throwd our selues vntil he be departed againe: for that he with his huge armie cannot here long stay in this bare country, for want of necessaries. Notwithstanding Mahomet hoping that his journy might be both for the good of his father, and his owne aduancement, continued to the mind of all his councellors resolued to ground so hauing prepared all things needfull for the honor & safety of his journy, set forth. But as he was vpon the way in the marches of Pontus, Caraiabin whom he had before ouerthrowne, vnderstanding of his comming that way, thinking now to be reuenged, and hauing got vnto him some of the Prince Isfendiars forces, set vpon him by the way: but M with as euill successe as before, most of his men being there by Mahomet slain, & himself glad shamefully to flie. So trauelling on further, he vnderstood that Alis beg, a great Lord in those countries, went about to intercept him also: which caused him in such hast to goe on, that he was vpon Alis before he was aware of his comming, or well prouided for him: so that for feare he was glad to betake himself to flight. Mahomet cõsidering the danger he had escaped in that journey,

A iourney, and that the neerer he came to Tamerlane, the more like he was to fall into greater, although happily without Tamerlane his knowledge: by the aduice of his graue and faithfull counsellours, resolued to goe no further. Wherefore calling vnto him Tamerlanes embassador, he thus spake vnto him:

Mahomet his speech to Tamerlanes embassadour.

You see the dangers and iniuries I indure in this my iourny, and my mind forbodeth greater to ensue: for which causes I may not goe any further, but here returne. Commend me therefore I pray you vnto the most mightie Tamerlane, with my father; and tel them what dangers haue happened vnto me vpon the way: which considered, I hope they will haue me excused. For which purpose I will also send in your companie an embassadour of mine owne.

Mahomet at that time had with him a graue, wise, and learned man, called Sophis Baiazet, B sometime his schoolemaster: whom he sent embassadour to Tamerlane and his father, to haue him vnto them both excused: and so departed, he homewards, leauing the way he came (for feare of further danger) and they towards Tamerlane, who honourably receiued Mahomets embassadour and letters. But taking pleasure in the man sent vnto him, gaue him honourable entertainment, but would neuer after suffer him to returne againe vnto his master.

It was not long after, but that old Baiazet died of impatiencie (as is aforesaid:) whose dead bodie Tamerlane left at Apropolis with the Prince Germean, to bee deliuered vnto his sonne Mahomet; with Musa his elder brother (who all this while had beene kept prisoner with Tamerlane) if Mahomet should require them. And so the mightie Prince Tamerlane, after he had long time wasted Phrygia, Caria, Lydia, with the most part of the lesser Asia; and con- C quered all Syria, Iudea, Ægypt, and Persia, with many other great countries and prouinces; returned at last into his owne kingdome, vnto the great citie of Samercand, which he wonderfully inlarged, and beautified with the spoiles of a great part of the world, before by him wasted: where he afterwards in great peace and glorie raigned, no lesse honoured than feared of all the Princes of the East. To the terrour of whom, and for the assuring of his estate, hee kept alwaies a standing armie of fortie thousand horse, and threescore thousand foot readie at all assaies: beside other his great garrisons which he kept in Syria, Ægypt, China, and Cambalu; as also against the Muscouite, and Turks; beeing commonly in euery place threescore thousand strong, though not still in field, but as occasion required. Vntill that at length hearing of the rising againe of the Turkish kingdome, vnder the Othoman Princes, the sons of Ba- D iazet, with whom the oppressed Mamelukes of Ægypt, and the Greeke Emperour (as doubtfull of his estate) had now also for feare of him combined themselues; he by the perswasion of Axalla (then Generall of his imperiall armie) made great preparation for a second expedition to be made for the vtter rooting out of the Othoman familie, & the conquest of the Greeke empire. But hauing now all things in readinesse, and also giuen a good beginning vnto these his intended conquests, (one of the Turkes great Bassaes beeing by Axalla his lieutenant in a great battell ouerthrowne, and thirtie thousand of the Turks slaine) he in the middest of these his great hopes, as also of his greatest power, died of an ague the 27 day of Ianuary, in the yere of our Lord 1402. A little before whose death, appeared a great and terrible blasing-star, portending as it were to the world the death of so great a Prince. He was a man of the middle sta- E ture, somewhat narrow in the shoulders, otherwise wel limmed, and of a great strength. In his eies sate such a rare maiestie, as a man could hardly indure to behold them without closing of his owne: and many in talking with him, and often beholding of him became dumbe; which caused him oftentimes with a comely modestie to abstaine from looking too earnestly vpon such as spake vnto him, or discoursed with him. All the rest of his visage was amiable & wel proportioned: he had but little haire on his chinne; and ware the haire of his head long and curled, contrary to the manner of the Tartars, who shaue their heads, hauing the same alwaies couered: whereas he contrariwise was for the most part bare headed, commanding his son also to be so by his tutors brought vp: his haire was of a dark colour, somwhat drawing toward a violet, right beautifull to behold: which his mother comming of the race of Sampson (as hee F gaue it out) willed him to nourish, in token of his descent: the cause that made him to be the more respected of his men of war; most part of them beleeuing that in those haires was some rare vertue, or rather some fatal destiny: an old practise of many great commanders of former ages, to fil the heads of their soldiers with some strange opinion conceiued of them, to be the more of them honored; as if in them had bin some one thing or other more than in other men.

The great power Tamerlane continually kept.

Ille nouus Xerxes, orientis victor, & ingens Quacunque permearet, horror gentium: Compleuit totos Scythico qui milite campos, Hoc ſe ferebat ore trux Tamerlanes.
Cuius in aduentum tutæ altis mœnibus vrbes, Ipſumque terre contremiſcebat ſolum; Ipſi adeo montes, ipſæ per deuia valles, Vim Barbarorum non ferebant agminum.
Quare ab Caucaſeis Aſiam conuallibus omnem, Ad vſque Nili flumina armis ſubdidit; Euphratem, & Tigrim, & rapidũ tranauit Orontem, Vi, vaſtitate, cæde, cuncta proterens.
Vtque olim fœda cum tempeſtate coorta Erumpit atra nube fulmen igneum: Obuia quæque cadens perrumpit, & alta ſonanti Templa atque ſolidas ſtragę turres diſsicit.
Subſidit vallo tellus labefacta fragori, Humil[illegible] mentes ſternit humanas pauor:

Hand ſecus ille viam ferro molitus, & igni,

Regem Aſiæ horribili captum impete Baiazetem Caueaque clauſum ferrea circumtulit.
Hac agitantem illum, & ſpirantem immania iuſſa.

In Engliſh thus:

Of Tamerlane a Xerxes new, which did the Eaſt ſubdue,
And in all places where he came, the nations ouerthrew;
That fild the fields with Scythian troupes, brought from thoſe climats cold, This was the feature and the ſhape which thou do'ſt here behold.
At whoſe approach, the ſtrongeſt townes could ſmall reſiſtance make,
The earth it ſelfe vnder his feet ſeeming for feare to quake.
The mountaines high, mating the skie, and vncouth vallies low, Vnable were the force to beare, where he did come or goe.
All Aſia from mount Caucaſus, vnto the bankes of Nile, With valiant hand he vanquiſhed and made his force to feele.
Euphrates, Tygris, and the ſwift Orantes gaue him way, With force, waſte, and deſtruction great, on what he liſt to prey.
And as in tempeſts great oft times, when all things goe to wracke, The fierie lightning flaſhing forth, out of the clouds ſo blacke, Doth breake downe what it lights vpon, and with a dreadfull fall Or'ethrowes the Temples, with their Towers, and ſtately buildings all:
So that the earth diſmaid therewith, doth lower downe deſcend, And feareful wights wrapt vp in woe, are brought to their wits end:
In like ſort he with fire and ſword ſeeking all to confound, The ſtrongeſt caſtles, towers, and townes, laid equall with the ground.
And like an whirlewind taking vp great Baiazet away, Coupt vp in cage, ſo carried him, for his diſport and play.
But whileſt he rageth thus about, and plotteth in his head Such hard commands and heauie doomes, as all the world ſhould dread:
A little feauer in three fits, oppreſſed him with woe,
And cloaſing vp his vitall ſprites, did lay his head full low.
So that for all the world of wealth and kingdomes he poſſeſt, The ſmall remainder of himſelfe in ſimple graue doth reſt.

Mahomet goeth againſt his brother.

His great empire by himſelf diuided betwixt his ſons, was by their diſcord, and the ambition of ſome of their diſloyal ſubiects, in ſhort time after brought to great confuſion, & his poſteritie vtterly rooted out by Vſun-Caſſanes, the Armenian Prince, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtory may appeare. But to return again to our purpoſe; Mahomet deliuered of his greateſt feare, by the departure of Tamerlane out of thoſe countries, determined to goe to Pruſa in Bythinia, where his brother Iſa as then raigned: but vnderſtanding that Iſa had before taken the ſtraits whereby he ſhould paſſe the mount Horminius, he tooke another way about, and came to Palæo-Caſtron, where the valiant captaine Eine-beg Sub-baſſa then remained: who with all honour and gladneſſe receiued him, and there for certaine dayes refreſhed both him and his army. Afterwards greater forces ſtill repairing vnto him, he marched thence to Vlabad, called in antient time Lopadium. Of whoſe comming Iſa before vnderſtanding, and hauing aſſembled his armie, marched thither alſo, & encamped on the other ſide of the towne towards Pruſa, readie to giue him battell. But Mahomet ſeeing his brother ſo forward, conſulted with his captaines, captaines what were best to be done: where Eine Sub-bassa a man of great experience, and of late one of Baiazet his great counsellors and captaines, told him, That it was not for their honours being brethren, to pollute their hands one in the others bloud; but to assaie if the quarrell might by some other good meanes be composed, and they made friends. For which purpose, Mahomet presently sent letters vnto his brother Isa, concerning the partition of their fathers kingdome in Asia betwixt them: offering vnto him the prouinces of Aidinia, Saruchania Germeania, Charasia, Charamania, with other countries to them belonging: so that hee might haue Prusa with all the other prouinces about the same. Which letters, when Isa had read, and saw that Mahomet offered him but titles for kingdomes, and such countries as were rather sometimes tributaries vnto their father Baiazet, than any part of his kingdom, and now of late by Tamerlane againe restored vnto their antient libertie and gouernors, sharing out the best and strongest part thereof vnto himselfe, he brake forth into choller and said:

The answere of Isa to Mahomets offers.

What, doth not my fathers kingdome of right belong vnto me being the elder brother? Mahomet is yet but a youth, and scarce crept out of the shell: by what right then can he claime my fathers kingdom as his inheritance? If he can by the sword win it, let him take it, and so hold it.

Mahomet hauing receiued his answere, prepared himselfe to the field, where his brother already as himselfe, stood expecting his comming: and hauing set his army in order of battell, gaue the first charge: which was the beginning of a most cruel and bloudy fight, wherein, as it commonly falleth out in doubtfull battels, many were on both sides slain. At last the fortune of Mahomet preuailing, Isa his armie began to retire: which he seeing, left nothing vndone for the encouraging of his fainting soldiers, which belonged to a politicke Generall, or valiant soldier to do; but pressing into the thickest of his enemies, there with his owne hand slew the antient and valiant captaine Eine Sub-bassa, who had many times beene Generall of the footmen in old Baiazet his wars. But what preuaileth courage against euil fortune? Isa must either flie or die. And therefore hauing done what he could in so desperat a case, being himselfe on euery side forsaken, in the end was glad himself to flie to the sea side: where finding a ship readie bound for Constantinople, he passed ouer thither in safety, and there yeelded himselfe vnto the protection of the Greeke Emperour Emanuel. In this chase Mahomet his souldiers tooke the valiant captaine Temurtases prisoner, another of Baiazet his great commanders, & brought him to Mahomet: who in reuenge of the death of Eine, commanded his head presently to bee smitten off, and his bodie to bee hanged vpon a tree by the high way side. Of this victorie, Mahomet certified his brother Solyman at Hadrianople, and in token thereof sent him Temurtases his head. This battell was much spoken of, both for that it was fought betwixt two brethren; and also for the death of the two famous and old captaines Eine and Temurtases, who both together as louing friends, had fortunately fought many great battels vnder Baiazet his ensignes; and now as it were by destinie, and against their wils, without any priuate grudge, were both drawne into contrarie factions and slaine: both whilest they liued wishing a good peace betwixt the ambitious brethren. But as the Turks vse to say, What is by God written in a mans fore head before his birth, cannot in his life be auoided.

After this victorie, Mahomet thinking himselfe now in sure possession of all his fathers dominions in Asia, led his army to Prusa, where he was of the citizens ioyfully receiued as their Sultan: and for his great bountie, of all men highly commended and honoured. From thence he went to Nice, and so to Neapolis, and there in both places was likewise receiued. Thither resorted vnto him all the garrisons of Carasina, Saruchania, and Aidinia, with other the inhabitants of those countries, with all loyaltie submitting themselues vnto him, with such honor and reuerence as belonged to their King.

All things thus sorting according to his desire in Asia, he sent to the Prince Germean for the bodie of his father Baiazet, and for his brother Musa, which were there left by Tamerlane, as is before declared. This bodie was by the same Prince at the request of Mahomet, with great solemnity sent to Prusa, and there sumptuously buried, with all the Turkish obsequies and ceremonies: the Turkish Alcoran or book of their Law, being read seuen daies vpon his tomb. All which time great cheere was kept for all commers, and much giuen to the poore (vpon the Turkish deuotion) for Baiazet his soule: but aboue all others, exceeding bounty was extended to the posterity of their Prophet Mahomet; which are knowne from others amongst the Mahometans, by the colour of their apparrell, which is all green, and not lawfull to be worn of any but but of them: so that they were by the bountie of Mahomet, at that time greatly enriched. Hee also endowed the abbey which his father had there lately built, with great lands and possessions for the maintenance thereof. All which things done, and the solemnitie past, he went in progresse to all parts of his kingdome, and was in euery place ioyfully receiued; and so afterward returned to Amasia; and there in great pleasure spent that summer. Where we will for a while leaue him, to see what Solyman his eldest brother in the meane time doth at Hadrianople: whose liuely countenance is by the skilfull workmans hand thus expressed:

Non malus es nisi te enerues male suada voluptas, Quæque minus bello conuenit ingluuies.
Hospitio Mirxi fruitur iam Musa Valachi: Ille tuum vigilat pronus in exitium.

IAC. BOISARDVS.

Euill art thou not, except leaud lust doe hasten on thy fall:
Or rior, which beseemeth not a martiall man at all.
Thy brother Musa entertain'd by Marke to thine annoy, Doth take no rest, but waiteth still how he may thee destroy.

Solyman

Solyman the eldeſt ſonne of Baiazet (who kept his court at Hadrianople, there peaceably G raigning all this while ouer the countries which his father Baiazet ſometime poſſeſſed in Europe) hearing what his brother Mahomet had done, and how violently againſt all right hee had driuen Iſa out of Pruſa, and made him glad to flie to Conſtantinople: was with this his outragious dealing much offended, and thereupon calling vnto him his Baſſaes and faithfull counſellers, declared vnto them the vnnaturall proceedings of Mahomet againſt his brother Iſa: Wherein (ſaid he) hee doth mee alſo great wrong in taking vpon him the ſouereignetie ouer thoſe great dominions and countries in Aſia, which of right belong to mee his elder brother, and not to him the youngeſt of ſix. In reuenge of which iniurie and wrong, I intend in mine owne right, to paſſe ouer into Aſia with a ſtrong armie, and by force of armes to recouer mine inheritance there, if I may not otherwiſe come by it. Vnto which ſpeech one of his graue counſellers replied, That in his opi- H Good counſell. nion it was not the beſt courſe for himſelfe to goe in perſon into thoſe warres. For although (ſaid hee) your brother Mahomet be but young, and therefore by your greatneſſe leſſe accounted of, yet is his fortune great, and his experience aboue his yeares. None haue yet had to doe with him, but they haue had enough of him: yea it is worth the noting, how politickly he hath borne himſelfe for his owne ſaftie, and the ſafegard of the countries which he gouerned all the while that the great and mightie Tamerlane with his innumerable forces couered the face of the countries faſt by him: moſt part whereof, Mahomet hath now ſince his departure, againe recouered. Wherefore it were beſt for you to ſend for your angrie brother Ila, to Conſtantinople, and to make him Generall of the armie you intend to ſend into Aſia againſt Mahomet. In which warres, it is not vnlike, but that one of your brethren will be loſt, wherby you ſhall haue one competitor of your kingdome the leſſe. So ſhall you afterwards with leſſe trouble ſubdue him that is left, or at leaſtwiſe pleaſe him with ſome part of that which they haue ſo mightily ſtriuen I for. This counſell was of Solyman and all the reſt well liked of, and approued. So was Iſa preſently ſent for vnto Conſtantinople, and a great armie leuied. Who beeing come to Hadria-Iſa with a great armie ſent by his brother Solyman into Aſia againſt Mahomet. nople, was by Solyman courteouſly welcommed, and made Generall of his armie: and therewith ſhipped ouer the ſtrait of Helleſpontus into Aſia. Where at his firſt comming, hee poſſeſſed the whole countrey of Caraſia or Lydia: and paſſing further, in all places where hee came, was receiued of the people with great reuerence, they all promiſing him their obedience, if it were his fortune to preuaile againſt his younger brother Mahomet: wherewith hee held himſelf wel contented. So cõming to the cit of Beg-Bazer, otherwiſe called Deſpotolis, he there wintered with his armie. In which time, he with many kind and louing letters ſtil K directed to Mahomet as his yonger brother, ſeemed to be glad that he was ſo wel obeied & liked of by his ſubiects: and that preſuming of his loue and fauour, he was as his louing brother, and not as an enemie come into Aſia, to intreat with him of ſuch matters as much concerned the good of them both. Whereunto Mahomet with like diſſimulation anſwered, That he was right glad of his commiñg; for which he needed not (as he ſayd) to make any excuſe, for that he was entered into a kingdome, in part his owne, and the reſt open before him: in token whereof he commanded a rich garment to be caſt vpon the meſſenger as a fauour, ſending alſo diuers rich preſents vnto his brother, with great prouiſion of victuals, and other neceſſaries for his ſouldiers.

But Winter paſt, and the Spring come, Iſa marched with his army to Pruſa, & there ſhewed L vnto the citizens the louing letters he had at ſundrie times before receiued from Mahomet: and telling them that he was in good hope that they ſhould in ſhort time right well agree; requeſted to haue the caſtle deliuered vnto him, ſometime their ſoueraigne: whereinto the better ſort of the citizens had retired themſelues, & made faſt the gates againſt him: but when he ſaw that he could by no faire words or policie gaine the poſſeſſion of the caſtle, enraged with Pruſa burnt by Iſa. that repulſe, he ſet fire vpon that goodly citie, and burnt it downe to the ground. Mahomet not ignorant how his brother Iſa roamed vp and downe his kingdome, vſing al kindnes to ſuch as yeelded vnto him; and exerciſing no leſſe crueltie vpon ſuch as refuſed his obedience: and how that he had raſed the royal citie of Pruſa: hauing gathered a ſtrong army, marched in ten dayes from Amaſia to Pruſa, and by the way meeting with his brother Iſa, in a great battell M ouerthrew him with all his forces. Iſa himſelfe accompanied with no more but ten perſons, fled vnto Caſtamona, Prince Iſfendiar his citie: who hearing of his arriuall there, entertained him with al the honor he could, in recompence of the great friendſhip he had before found at his hands, at what time he was an humble ſuter in his father Baiazet his court.

A Mahomet comming to Pruſa, grieued exceedingly to ſee that faire city ſo deſtroyed: yet to comfort the poore citiſens, he gaue exceeding ſummes of money to be beſtowed amongſt them, and tooke order for the new building of the citie, and there continued certain days himſelfe to ſee the worke begun.

Iſa in the mean time hauing incited the Prince Iſfendiar in his quarrel to inuade his brother Mahomet, and going thither himſelfe in perſon, was by him now the third time ouerthrowne and put to flight. Neuertheleſſe he with ſome ſmall forces twice afterwards entred into Mahomets dominion, but finding few or none willing to follow his euil fortune, was glad at laſt to flie to the prince of Smyrna, by whom he was both honorably entertained, and comforted.

This prince of Smyrna mooued with Iſa his pittifull complaints in ſo manifeſt a wrong, did B not only promiſe him what helpe he could of himſelfe, but alſo by his embaſſadors ſolicited the Princes of Aidinia, Saruchania, and Menteſia, to giue him aid in ſo iuſt a quarrell, for the reliefe of Iſa, againſt his vſurping brother. Theſe Princes pittying the caſe of the diſtreſſed Prince, and moued with the requeſt of the Prince of Smyrna, and fearing alſo the ambitious ſpirit of Mahomet; amongſt them ſent ſuch aid, that being all aſſembled together, Iſa had now twentie thouſand men in armes. Mahomet vnderſtanding of this great preparation made againſt him, and hauing raiſed a ſtrong armie, thought it not beſt to expect his brothers comming into his countrie (where perhaps many might ioyne themſelues vnto him, being ſo ſtrong in field) but entred the Prince of Smyrna his countrey, with ſuch ſpeed, that he was vpon him and the reſt of his enemies before he was looked for; where after a great and bloudie fight he obtai-C ned of them a notable victorie Iſa hauing loſt the battel, and therewith his hope alſo, fled into Caramania, and there in ſuch obſcuritie ended his dayes, that no man can tell where nor how he died. This was the end of this noble Prince, always of greater courage than fortune. The Prince of Smyrna the chiefe author of this war, humbling himſelfe to Mahomet, obtained his fauor. The other confederat Princes which gaue aid to Iſa, were ſhortly after by Mahomet for moſt part ſpoiled of their dominions. Which done, he returned with victorie to the building of Pruſa, hoping now to liue at more quiet.

Iſa flieth into Caramania, and there he dieth in obſcuritie.

But whileſt Mahomet after this victorie dreading no danger, was in the midſt of his pleaſures at Pruſa, he was certainly aduertiſed, That his brother Solyman had raiſed a great armie in Europe, to inuade him in Aſia. Vpon which aduertiſement he furniſhed the caſtle of Pruſa D with a ſtrong garriſon, and all things needfull for the induring of a long ſiege, and placed Iacup-Beg the ſonne of Firoſes, captaine therein; and afterwards departed himſelfe, becauſe that city (lately before burnt by Iſa) was not as yet to be defended, much leſſe to be accounted of as a place to retyre vnto if need ſhould ſo require. From Pruſa he came to Ancyra, & from thence directed commiſſions for the taking vp of ſoldiers in all parts of his kingdom. At which time he wrot letters alſo to Doioran a Tartar Prince (whom he had many times greatly pleaſured) for aid: who preſently came vnto him with certaine troups of braue horſe, promiſing him his faithfull ſeruice.

Not long after, hearing that his brother Solyman was with a puiſſant armie now come ouer Helleſpontus, he conſulted with his beſt leaders, what courſe firſt to take; being himſelf of o-E pinion, without delay to meet his brother in the field, deeming it great ſhame, not to offer him preſent battel. But he was by his more expert captains aduiſed, to conſider that he was to fight againſt his eldeſt brother, of whoſe good or bad fortune he had as yet no experience: and that many ſecretly fauored his quarrel and claime, as the eldeſt ſonne and right heire of his father Baiazet: and therefore it were better for him to retyre further off into the ſtrength of his kingdome, and ſo temporizing, to await all good opportunities that might chance, as it doth in nothing more than in martiall affaires; rather than to commit all to the hazard of one battell, wherein if fortune failed him, all were then vtterly loſt. Vpon which reſolution he retyred from Ancyra towards Amaſia. At which time Doioran the falſe Tartarian, marching out at the other ſide of the Citie, fell to robbing and ſpoyling of Mahomets ſubiects as an enemie, F burning the countrey villages as they went: which thing when Mahomet vnderſtood, he with his horſemen purſued him, and ouertaking him before he was looked for, ſlew moſt part of his men, and recouered all the ſpoyle which he had before taken; all which Mahomet gaue to his ſoldiers: Doioran himſelfe hardly eſcaping by flight. And ſo Mahomet hauing reuenged himſelfe vpon his diſſembling friend, held on his way towards Amaſia.

The castle of Prusa besieged by Solyman.

Solyman being come into Asia, led his armie towards Prusa; where the citizens vnderstanding of his comming, went out of the citie to meet him, and hauing done vnto him such honor G and reuerence as belonged to their Sultan, brought him peaceably into the citie. But Iacup-Beg stood vpon his guard, and would by no means deliuer vnto him the castle, which was before by Mahamet committed to his charge: for which cause Solyman laid hard siege vnto it, and gaue thereunto diuers sharpe assaults, whereby the defendants were greatly weakned, many of them being slain, & the rest for the most part wounded. Wherupon Iacup by letters sent by one Eine Hozze, certified Mahomet how things stood, and that the castle could not long be holden against the furious assaults of Solyman, except it were with speed relieued; vpon which news he in all hast made towards Prusa, returning the same messenger before him, with letters to the captain of the castle, if happily hee could find means to deliuer the same: wherein hee H highly commended him for his faithfull seruice, and promised him speedie reliefe. This messenger with his letters chanced by Solyman his soldiers to be intercepted, and brought to Alis Bassa, Solyman his chiefe Councellour, a man of a sharpe conceit, who of nothing could make something, but hauing any thing to worke vpon could do wonders: he hauing straitly examined the messenger, and perused the letters, suppressed the same, and presently writ others in the name of Mahomet, commending the captaine for that he had already done in his seruice; but yet forasmuch as he could not possibly in time relieue him, he willed him therefore to deliuer vp the castle, and to prouide for the safeguard of himselfe and his garrison, by such conditions as he could best obtaine. These counterfeit letters Alis Bassa found means to be as cunningly deliuered vnto the captaine, as they were craftily indited: who hauing read the same, I and now out of all hope of reliefe, expecting also euery houre to be assaulted by the furious enemie; vpon reasonable conditions yeelded the castle to Solyman. The news whereof being brought vnto Mahomet, now come within one days march of Prusa, exceedingly grieued him: but seeing no remedie, he returned backe againe to Amasia; whither Solyman (now possessed of the city and castle of Prusa, and hauing thereby got a great name in Asia) shortly after came with his armie, and hardly besieged his brother in Amasia: but seeing no hope to win the Citie, he retyred backe againe to Prusa, and there after his woonted manner spent his time in riot and excesse, whereunto he was exceedingly giuen. Iacup-Beg for yeelding of the castle, was afterward by Mahomet straitly imprisoned, and in danger to haue been put to death, had not the K great Bassa's become earnest intercessors for him.

Mahomet lying at Amasia, was by his secret espials aduertised, That his brother Solyman hauing dispersed his armie, lay in great securitie at Prusa, guarded but with a small power, passing his time in all voluptuous pleasure, his common exercise. Whereupon he in all hast marched with his armie thitherwards, to haue surprised him before hee should be able to call together his dispersed forces. But when he was come to the riuer Sangarius, he was discouered by Solyman Subbassa a great captain, whom Sultan Solyman had sent for the taking vp of men in that side of the country. Who returning in all hast, gaue Solyman knowledge of his brothers comming: with which sudden newes he was so dismaied, being now of small strength, that for L the auoiding of the imminent danger, he would presently haue fled into Europe, had not Alis Bassa otherwise perswaded him; telling him, That if he should so cowardly flie away, it would not only blemish and defame his honour, but discourage his friends also in Asia, & incourage his enemies to pursue him perhaps vnto the gates of Hadrianople: and that therefore it were better with such forces as he had to take the straights of Neapolis, and so to stay his brothers further passage into that countrey, vntill such time as he might assemble the rest of his armie. According to which good councell, hee first tooke the beforenamed straights and passages, whereby Mahomet was of necessitie to passe, and there strongly fortified himselfe. Mahomet comming thither, with great force entered those straights, but was still valiantly by Solyman repulsed. The like attempt he many times valiantly gaue, for that hee knew himselfe to be at that time too strong for his brother: but Solyman hauing the aduantage of the place, with lit- M tle danger or losse frustrated those his brothers braue attempts, although he were then a great deale the weaker. Alis Bassa, whose wilie head, fraught with long experience, could (with nothing) effect great matters, in the meane time was not idle, but (making Solyman before acquainted with his doings) sent a secret messenger (one of his owne trustie seruants) to Mahomet with letters; certifying him, That most of his nobilitie and great captaines had secretly conspired

A conspired to betray him into the hands of his elder brother Solyman, as the vndoubted heire of his father Baiazet; & so with the price of his head, to make their own peace & attonement with him: and that for the performance thereof they had bound themselues first vnto Solyman, and afterwards one to another, by solemne oath. Which treason he discouered vnto him, with great protestation of his loue and good will, as he that had a long time eaten bread and salt (as the Turks vse to say) in his fathers court, and therefore could not but wish well vnto him, being one of his lord and masters sonnes. These letters something troubled Mahomet, breeding in his head many a jealous conceit: for all that, hee ceased not for six or seuen dayes space, to giue many a hot skirmish for the gaining of those strait passages, but all in vaine. In which time it chanced, one of his seruants neere about his person, to flie vnto the enemie; which caused B him the more to suspect all that to be true, whereof Alis Bassa had forewarned him. Which considered, and that by lying there he preuailed nothing, but lost and wearied his men, (for it was all that while exceeding foule weather) and withall doubting to be betrayed, returned as he came, to Amasia. And Solyman glad also of his departure, retired to Prusa, giuing order into all parts of his kingdome, for the assembling of a great armie: but vnderstanding that the king of Caramania had made a league with his brother Mahomet, and that they were agreed to ioyne their forces against him, for the driuing of him out of Asia, hee forthwith drew all his forces to Ancyra, as a place of more safetie.

Whilest Solyman thus lay at Ancyra, it fortuned that Musa (which had all this while remained with his brother Mahomet, since he was set at libertie by Tamerlane, though not altogether C well pleased with his owne estate) one day by way of talke, thus spake vnto his brother; You see (said he) how our elder brother Solyman ceaseth not to vex and molest vs dayly, and is not vnlike in the end to preuaile against vs, to our vtter destruction: Now if it might please you to giue me leaue, I would go to Istendiar Prince of Castamona and Pontus, our brothers enemie, and of him procure shipping to passe ouer the Euxine sea, into Europe; where I doubt not to find opportunitie to make some great innouation in that kingdome, now in my brothers absence: by reason whereof Solyman shall of necessity be driuen to leaue Asia, to be againe by you solely possessed: or else be brought in danger there to lose his kingdome in Europe. Which if it shall be my good hap to gaine out of his hands by your supportation, I promise you faithfully to hold the same of you as of my Lord and Soueraigne. This greatly pleased Mahomet, and thereupon not long after they concluded betwixt themselues, one to stand fast D vnto another, and the one to helpe the other in what they could, during life; confirming the same with great solemnitie of their Turkish faith giuen and taken. Whereupon Mahomet furnished his brother Musa with great summes of money and other needfull things for the taking in hand of so great an enterprise.

Musa thus furnished, taking his leaue of his brother, set forwards towards the Prince Isfendiar: who hearing of his comming, met him on the way, and entertained him as a great prince. But after that Musa had made him acquainted with his purpose for passing into Europe, and had obtained grant of his helpe therein, he tooke his leaue of him for a time, and went to visit the King of Caramania; who also most honorably entertained him, and the rather in despight of Solyman. But whilest Musa was thus passing the time in Caramania, it fortuned that Mark (of E some called Merxes) Prince of Valachia, hauing his countrey much spoyled by Solyman his garrisons; and hearing that Musa one of Baiazet his sonnes was with the Prince Isfendiar, he writ vnto him, promising to bestow his daughter & heire in marriage vpon Musa; if he would come ouer into Europe, and reuenge the wrong done vnto him by Solyman. Whereof Musa aduertised by the Prince Isfendiar, gladly returned out of Caramania, and was by him transported ouer the Euxine or blacke sea, into Europe: where the Prince of Valachia glad of his comming, receiued him with great honor, and according to his promise gaue him his daughter in marriage.

Musa marrieth the Prince of Valachia his daughter.

The fame of Musa his comming into Europe, and of his marriage, was in short time bru-F ted thorow all Solyman his Kingdome in Europe, and wrought such effect in the minds of the mutable vulgar people (alwayes desirous of noueltie) that they all as it were with one consent submitted themselues vnto him, as vnto their Lord and Soueraign: in so much that comming to the royal citie of Hadrianople, in the absence of his brother Solyman he was there receiued as their King.

Musa in the absence of Solyman receiued at Hadrianople as King.

Solyman now lying at Ancira in Asia, vnderstanding of these proceedings of Musa in Europe, and that he was poſſeſſed of a great part of his kingdome there, was therewith exceedingly troubled. Wherefore leauing his deputie in Ancyra, hee with all his army came to the ſtraît of Boſphorus, and there of Emanuel the Greeke Emperor obtained paſſage, promiſing for the ſame to reſtore vnto him certaine places before taken from him in Aſia: for Muſa had ſo prouided, that he could haue no helpe of the Turkiſh ſhipping, which was by his commandment all before brought ouer vnto Europe ſide. Muſa hearing of Solyman his arriuall in Europe, made towards him with a great power: but after that both their armies were come the one within view of the other, and now readie to ioyne battell, many of Muſa his captains forſooke him, and fled to Solyman the elder brother, and their vndoubted king: which Muſa beholding, was glad to flie, and to take the ſafegard of the woods and mountaines for his refuge. After which victorie, Solyman returning to Hadrianople, tooke againe poſſeſſion of his Kingdome, and there without meaſure gaue himſelfe to riot and exceſſe, according to his woonted manner.

After the departure of Solyman out of Aſia Iacup-Beg (but lately before againe receiued into Mahomet his fauour, and now left as Solyman his deputie) deliuered Ancyra, with the caſtle of Pruſa, and all the reſt that Solyman had gained in Aſia, to Mahomet; who ſhortly after led his armie thorow the countries of Caraſia, Aydinia, Saracania, Tekenſis, and Germeania, reducing them once againe vnto his obeyſance: and afterwards returned to Pruſa, where hee now the ſecond time tooke poſſeſſion of his fathers kingdome in Aſia.

Muſa goeth againſt Solyman.

Muſa ſtil aided by the Valachian Prince his father in law, gaue many great attempts againſt his brother Solyman, but was ſtill put to the worſe. At length hauing gathered ſome good ſtrength, and diligently attending the leaſt ſmile of better fortune, drew neere vnto the place where Solyman lay; who at that time was (as his manner was) banqueting with great pleaſure in his campe, and ful of wine. Inſomuch that when news was brought vnto him, that his brother Muſa was at hand with a great power, he in his drunkennes cauſed the meſſenger that brought the news to be beaten: and when he had with greater earneſtnes than was to his liking, affirmed that his report to be true, he commanded him to be ſlain for troubling his mirth. But Shortly after, Muſa was come ſo neere, that the vantcourrours of his armie did skirmiſh with ſome of Solyman his ſoldiers: when as Chaſis Eurenoſes one of his fathers old captaines, preſſing in, told him that Muſa was at hand, and had skirmiſhed with part of his armie. Whereof Solyman (now far in wine) had no regard, but ſaid, Good Tutor do not trouble me no more; my brother Muſa dares not come ſo nigh me; if I do but hold vp my cap, he is gone. With which anſwer the old Captaine going out diſcontented, ſent in Chaſan, Aga of the Ianizaries: who boldly comming vnto him, told him plainly of the imminent danger, and ſharply reproued him for his intemperance and ſecuritie. With whoſe free ſpeech Solyman moued, in great rage commanded his beard to be cut off, then no ſmall diſgrace amongſt the Turkes. Chaſan preſently comming forth thus diſgraced, ſaid to them that ſtood waiting without, This is the honor wherewith Sultan Solyman in his exceſſe rewards his moſt faithfull ſeruants. Wherefore be it known to you all, I will from henceforth (and not without cauſe) ſerue Muſa, a Prince of greater temperance and diſcretion: who ſo will follow me, come and welcome. So mounting to horſe, and accompanied with a number of his Ianizaries (of whom he was greatly beloued) went ouer to Muſa; as did many other great captaines alſo with their companies, mooued by his example ſo to doe. But when Solyman vnderſtood that Chaſan with moſt part of the Ianizaries, and many other worthie captaines, with the greateſt ſtrength of his armie, were reuolted to Muſa, then faſt by, and readie to ſet vpon him; it then repented him too late of his diſſolute folly: and finding no other remedie now to eſcape, hid himſelfe vntil it was darke night; then taking horſe, accompanied only with Caratze-Beg and Cara Muchil, two of his noblemen, and one countrey Turke whom they had retained for their guide, thought to haue fled to Conſtantinople. This malicious clown hauing of purpoſe led them by vnknowne wayes all that night too and fro, as it were in a maze, (oftentimes miſnaming vnto them the places they paſſed by, as if they had been in the right way) brought them in the morning to a village not far from the place from whence they departed the euening before: and there riding a little before them of purpoſe, gaue warning to a ſturdie peaſant or two of his acquaintance, that Solyman was comming after; willing them to make ſtay of him. Theſe rude country churles, with ſome others of like breed, running out with bats and ſtaues, and ſuch other homely tooles as firſt came to hand, ſlew Caratze and Cara Muchill, which would would not yeeld vnto them, but ſtood vpon their guard, and tooke Solyman aliue: where, as it commonly falleth out in the vulgar peoples furie, ſome cried out to kill him, and ſo to end the warres; ſome likewiſe to burne him; and ſome to hang him; and ſome few to ſaue him: euery one as his rude affection lead him. In the heat of this countrey vprore came Muſa; who glad to his brother Solyman ſo hardly beſet, cauſed him preſently to be there ſtrangled, when he had raigned in Hadrianople ſix yeares and ten moneths.

Solyman ſtrangled by his brother Muſa.

This was the miſerable end of Solyman, the eldeſt ſonne that Baiazet left aliue. A man much giuen to exceſſe, otherwiſe indued with many great vertues, being both of great valor, and exceeding bountifull. In his time liued the learned Doctor Achmetes, which wrot the hiſtorie of Alexander the Great in Turkiſh Verſe, and publiſhed it in the name of Solyman himſelfe: for which he was by him bounteouſly rewarded. The dead bodie of Solyman himſelfe, was by the commandement of Muſa conueyed to Pruſa, and there lieth buried faſt by the bodie of his grandfather Amurath. So now of theſe Cadmeian brethren remained none but Mahomet and Muſa, the one raigning in Aſia, and the other in Europe, diuers parts of the world, and well bounded with the ſureſt bounds of nature: yet not ſufficient to content or containe their ambitious minds, vntill that the yonger had moſt vnnaturally deuoured the elder: whoſe liuely counterfeit, as it is by the skilfull workeman expreſſed, you may here behold:

This Solyman is that ſame whō ſome call Celebinus, and other ſome, Caleptinus, and reckon him for the fift king of the Turks.

Turkes would (if they were mindfull of their antient valure) haue chanced at the same time to haue made a full conquest of Asia. Perhaps her purpose was honourably conueyed from the way with much seruice following it. The Caramanian King hearing of the comming of his enimie, & fearing least that Mahomet with his power, called vs in, would haue ouerrun his countrey, whereas the Turke, long time after (suffring the Caramanian King quietly to reape of the fruit of the Ottoman King) what would he doe if he had come against him himselfe, but the first was, he feared Mahomet and his power.

Orchanes the sonne of Soyman (ouer whom hauing ruled at Constantinople euer since the death of his father, about this time departed thence, because of the league but lately made between the Emperour and his vncle Mahomet, purposing to haue gone into Valachia: but by the way as he was trauelling, the Turkish voluntarie souldiers vnderstanding that he was the son of their late King Solyman, reforted vnto him in great numbers, offering in his quarrell to spend their liues. Of which insurrection Mahomet hearing, marched thither in all haste, with a great power to suppresse the fame of whose comming the souldiers with Orchanes vnderstanding, despersed themselues & fled. As for Orchanes himselfe, he was by his vnlawful tutor Zagan betrayed vnto his vncle Mahomet: who presently caused his eyes to be put out, and so sent him to Prusa; allowing him great reuenewes to liue vpon, and euer after vsed him with great honour. The sister of this Orchanes hee gaue in marriage to one of his noblemen, with a great dowrie. This is that Orchanes, whom some Historiographers reckon vp among the Turkish Kings, as one of the successors of Baiazet; and that he was betrayed to his vncle Moses: erring as I suppose, both in succession and the name, mistaking Moses for Mahomet.

1416 Mahomet inuadeth the Caramanian King.

Now Mahomet calling to remembrance the iniury which the Caramanian king had done to him in his absence, returning to Prusa, assembled a great armie to reuenge himselfe of that wrong. At which time, he sent to the Prince Isfendiar for aid, who sent him his son Cassumes. Hee commanded also the Prince Germean Ogli, to make prouision for the victualling of his campe, as he should passe by his countrey: which was accordingly done. And so prouided of all things necessarie, he with his army entred into the Caramanian countrey: where he tooke the cities Aspropolis, Despotopolis, Hierapolis, and besieged Iconium; but by reason of the immoderat raine which at that time fel, he was glad to make peace with the Caramanian king, called also Mahomet. And so rasing his siege: departed towards Pontus; where he had not long staied, but that news was brought vnto him, That the Caramanian king renouncing his league, was againe vp in armes. Wherefore returning into Caramania, and so to Iconium, hee there ouerthrew the King in battell, and tooke both him and his sonne Mustapha prisoners: who redeemed themselues by deliuering many of their strong cities and castles into his hands: and afterward concluded a peace, they receiuing from him an ensigne (as the Turkish manner is) in token they were now become his vassals.

1417 Valachia tributarie to the Turke.

The Caramanian war thus happily ended, he went ouer into Europe, and passing ouer Danubius, foraged the country of Valachia, Transalpina, making there great spoile: for redresse whereof, the Valachian Prince by his Embassadours sent him such tribute as hee demanded, and his sonne also to serue him in his court. About which time hapned a great earthquake in Prusa, and other places of Asia, whereby many houses and townes were ouerthrowne; after which, ensued great troubles in most parts of Asia: howbeit Mahomet going thither, by his presence kept all his dominions in peace and quietnesse.

Isfendiar prince of Castamona and part of Pontus, reseruing vnto himselfe Castamona, with a little part more of his dominion, gaue the rest vnto Mahomet, vpon condition, that he should restore no part thereof againe vnto his sonne Cassumes; who hauing long time serued in Mahomet his court and warres, could not be perswaded to returne againe vnto his father; and therefore was by him thus disinherited. Which great gift, Mahomet thankefully accepted, and in lieu thereof assigned vnto Cassumes other great and large possessions within his owne kingdome.

Mahomet, after the death of his brother Musa, had sent Sebeichies Bouredin (his brothers Cadeleschier) to Nice in Asia, as vnto a place of exile, allowing him neuertheless a great pension wherein to liue. This Bedredin had in his house one Burgluzes, Mustapha his steward: these two consulted together, how to raise some tumult or rebellion to trouble the peaceable gouernement of Mahomet. For which purpose, Burgluzes (according to the plot by them laid) tooke his way

A way into Aydinia (sometime called Caria) and there pretending great zeale of reformed religion, with a wonderfull grauitie began to broach diuers new and strange opinions, far differing from the Turkish antient superstition, yet very plausible and wel fitting the humor of the vulgar people. By which means he was in short time reputed for a famous learned deuout man and had many followers, drawing after him much people, fit to begin some great innouation. Bedredin glad of his mans successe, fled from Nice into the Prince Isfendiar his countrey, from whence he tooke shipping ouer the Euxine into Valachia, and there withdrawing himselfe into a great forrest, as if he had beene some deuout and religious man, allured vnto him a great number of outlaws and theeues which there liued. Whom when he had sufficiently instructed and framed to his purpose, he sent them in the habit of religious men into the country of Zagora, and other places in the frontires of Mahomet his dominions, neere vnto him, as his disciples: who with great boldnes and confidency, published Bedredin his doctrine and authority; and how that he was by God appointed to be the King of Iustice, and commander of all the world: whose doctrine and maner of gouernment was (as they said) alreadie receiued (as they gaue it out) in Asia, being set forth but by one of his scholers, Burgluzes; whose fame was now dispersed throughout all the Turks dominion: and that therefore if any were desirous of preferment, they should repaire to Bedredin, who would in short time shew himselfe to the world, and promote his followers according to their deserts. Many of the country people deluded with this phantasie and practise of these seditious seed-men, reforted to Bedredin in hope of preferment, and with them some of good calling also. At last, out of the forrest commeth this C great Prophet with banner displaied, attended vpon with a great multitude of the seditious vulgar people, which daily reforred vnto him more and more. Mahomet for the repressing of these dangerous tumults, sent his son Amurath, and Baiazet the great Bassa, with two thousand men to apprehend Burgluzes in Aydinia: but when they came thither, they found him guarded with three thousand men well appointed, readie to aduenture their liues in defence of their foolish Prophet. Neuertheless, Amurath & Baiazet not dismaied with the multitude of those vplandish people, set vpon them: where was fought a right bloudy battell, for the number, & many slaine on both sides; yet at last the rebels fled: in which flight Burgluses himselfe was slain, and hewen al to peeces. After which victorie Baiazet from thence hasted to Magnesia, and there executed Torlac Kemal, another seditious Turkish Monke, which with two thou-D sand, by him seduced, did much harm in the country thereabout. At the same time also, Mahomet sent another power against Bedredin: but most of his followers seeing in him no such matter, as was by his disciples and himselfe promised, and as they hoped for, were alreadie fallen from him, so that of that great multitude which before followed him, few or none were left with him, wherby he was easily apprehended by them that Mahomet had sent against him: and so being brought to Mahomet to Serras, was there in the market place before a tauerne doore, faire hanged, without any further harme.

Mahomet in the short time of his raigne finished the great Mahometan Temple at Hadrianople, before begun by his brethren Solyman and Musa. Where hee also built a Princely Pallace, the seat of the Turkish Kings in Europe, vntil the taking of Constantinople. He also built E another Temple, with a most sumptuous Abbey, and a publick schoole thereto adioyning; endowing the same with great reuenewes, such as had by him and those his brethren of late bin taken from the Christians. He gaue also great summes of mony, yerely to be paid at Medina and Mecha, for the releefe of poore Pilgrims trauelling from far to the sepulchre of their great Prophet Mahomet, at Medina, or his Temple at Mecha.

Shortly after Mahomet fell sick at Hadrianople, and perceiuing himselfe in danger of death, by his last will appointed his eldest sonne Amurath to succeed him in his kingdome, and sent Eluan-beg (a man in great fauor with him) in post to Amasia, to will him with all speed to repaire to the court at Hadrianople. But feeling death to approch, and that he could not possibly F liue vntill the comming of his sonne, hee straightly charged his Bassaes with all secrecie to conceale his death, vntill his comming, for feare lest any trouble should rise vpon the bruit thereof, before his comming thither: and so hauing set all things in order, he departed out of this world vnto his Prophet Mahomet, about the yere of our sauior Christ 1422, when he had raigned seuenteen yeares: accounting in his raigne that troublesome ten yeares next after the captiuitie of Baiazet, in which time the Turks kingdome was by his ambitious sonnes rent in

sunder (as is afore said) vntil it was at length again by this Mahomet restored to the former integrity, about 7 yeers before his death, which the Turks account for the whol time of his raign; & the other troublesome 10 yeres as a vacancy or anarchy of their kingdome, as is aforesaid. G

Mahomet being dead, the three great Bassaes, Eiuases, Baiazet, and Ibrahim (to rid themselues of the feare they had of the Ianizaries, & other soldiers of the court) called a Diuano or counsel for the wars, as if the King had bin aliue: wherein it was pretended, That Mahomet had determined to make war vpon the prince of Smirna: and that for that seruice, it was his pleasure, That the Ianizaries should forthwith passe ouer into Asia, to the castle of Baga. Whereupon presse mony was presently giuen them, & they sent ouer with letters directed to the viceroy of Anatolia, for the assembling of an armie for Baga. In the meane time, the great Bassaes of the court sat daily in counsell, placing and displacing, promoting and disgracing whom they H thought good, as if the king had so commanded: the kings physicians also, to countenance the matter, were commanded continually to go to and fro with their potions & receits, after their wonted manner, as if they had had the king still in cure: and letters were sent in post to Eluan Beg, for speedy dispatch of the busines for which he was sent into Asia. Yet for al this cunning dissimulation, the pentioners and other souldiers of the court, wont to be neere vnto the kings person, and some of them alwayes of the priuie chamber, began to suspect the matter: and comming to the Bassaes, said they maruelled that the king in so long time did neuer shew himselfe, as he had alwaies before done. Wherunto the Bassaes answered, That he had bin dangerously sick, & was as yet but a little recouered, & that therfore the physitians would not suffer him to looke abroad, or take the aire, for feare of casting him down againe. Then will we our I selues, said the pentioners, go and see his Maiestie; and with that were readie to force in vpon the Bassaes. Eiuases seeing their importunitie, desired them to hold themselues contented, and not as then to trouble the king, for that he had that day, as he said, taken physick; but tomorrow (said he) we will request his Maiestie, it he so please to shew himselfe, that you may see him: wherwith they for that time held themselues content. Now among the kings physitians there was one Georgiron, a Persian, a man of a quick spirit & subtill deuice, which found means to deceiue the pentioners: he deuised, that the dead body of the king being apparelled in royall large robes, should be brought betwixt two, as if he had bin led into an high open gallery; and being there set, to haue a boy so neatly placed behind him vnder his large robes, as that he vnperceiued, might moue the kings hand vp to his head, as if he should strok his face or beard, K as his manner was. The next day the dead king being accordingly brought forth by the Bassaes in his rich robes, & wrapped with clothes about his head, as if it had bin for feare of the aire, or of taking cold, & so placed in an high open gallerie, as was before deuised, suddenly the physitian came running in, fuming and raging as if he had bin halfe mad, ready to teare his cloths for anger; & in great choller casting his cap against the ground, asked the Bassaes if they meant to kill the king, by bringing him into the open aire? We (said he) haue with great pains, in long time, a little recouered him, and will you thus foolishly cast him downe againe? Pardon vs good doctor (said Eiuases) for these gentlemen (pointing to the pentioners) were so importunat to see his maiestie, that to satisfie their desires, he was content to be led forth of his chamber; wherof we hope shall ensue no harme. The pentioners seeing the king many times L mouing his hand to his face, and as it were stroking his beard, held themselues wel contented, supposing him to haue bin aliue, although but weake, and therefore not willing to speake vnto them. The physitians taking him vp amongst them, carried him into his lodging again, which was but fast by, making as if they had carried a extreame sicke man. Thus was his death cunningly concealed one and fortie daies, vntill the comming of Amurath his sonne.

This Mahomet was both wise and valiant, and withall exceeding bountifull, but ambitious aboue measure: and may of right be accounted the restorer of the Turks kingdom; for he recouered againe all those countries in Asia, which Tamerlane had taken away and giuen vnto other Mahometan princes, after the ouerthrow of Baiazet. And when as the kingdome of the M Turks was rent in pieces and almost brought to nought by ciuile wars, and the ambition of himself and his brethren; he at length got possession of the whole, & so left it to his son Amurath an entire kingdome, in the former greatnesse, although not so much by him augmented. His bodie lieth buried in a faire tombe made of artificiall stone, very beautifull to behold, in a chappell at the East side of Prusa, where we leaue him at his rest.

Europam luctu & funestis cladibus implens,

Major at Huniades virtute & fortibus ausis, Cogit eum trepida vertere terga fuga.
Consilia Eugenij bellum furialia suadent, Sacrorum antistes Martia ad arma ruit:

Europæ exitium res tulit ista grave.

Fierce Amurath doth Europe fill with bloud and wofull cries:
And wholly giv'n to martiall deeds, doth whole in armes arise.
But yet Huniades (than he, of greater strength and might) Enforced him right fearefully to turne his backe in flight.
Eugenius his infernall spels stirres vp a fatall jarre:
Who hauing charge of sacred Rites, runnes headlong into warre.
(Leaue martiall deeds to martiall men, and let the Priest go pray) Such diuelish councell, worse receiu'd, wrought Europes great decay.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, SIXT KING OF THE TVRKS, AND THE GREAT ESTABLISHER OF THEIR KINGDOME.

C AFter that the death of Mahomet had beene politiquely concealed one and fortie days, by the three great Bassa's Baiazet, Einases, and Ibrahim, Amurath, or Murat (as the Turks call him) his eldest sonne, at that time comming to Prusa, was by them placed in his fathers seat, and the death of Mahomet at the same time published: whereupon great troubles began on euery side to arise. Murat is the same that we call Desiderius.

The Princes of Smyrna and Mentesia rose vp in armes: and at Thessalonica, an obscure fellow crept as it were out of a chimneys corner, tooke vpon him the name and person of Mustapha the sonne of Baiazet, which was slaine many yeres before, in the great battell against Tamerlane at mount Stella, as is before declared in the life of the vnfortunate Sultan Baiazet. This counterfeit Mustapha animated by the Grecian Princes, and going from Thessalonica to Vardarium, set so good a countenance vpon the matter, with such a D grace and majestie, that not onely the countrey people (apt to beleeue any thing) but men of greater place and calling also, as Tzanites Beg the Prince of Smyrna his sonne, with the sons of old Eurenoses Bassa, persuaded that he was the very sonne of the great Baiazet, repaired vnto him, as vnto their naturall Prince and Soueraigne. From Vardarium he went to Serræ, and from thence to Hadrianople, (Amurath being as then at Prusa) where he was receiued as if it had been that noble Prince Mustapha, whom he feigned himselfe to be: so that in short time he was honored as a King in all parts of the Turkish Kingdome in Europe. Mustapha the supposed son of Baiazet wasteth rebellion against Amurath.

Amurath to represse this so great and dangerous a rebellion, sent Baiazet Bassa a man of great authoritie in his court, with a strong armie into Europe. This great Bassa passing ouer Hellespontus, found all the countrey reuolted vnto their new found King Mustapha: but marE ching towards Hadrianople, with purpose to haue giuen him battell, hee was first forsaken of the Europeian souldiers which he brought out of Asia, and afterwards of all the rest also: and being left post alone, with his brother Hamze Beg, was for safegard of his life glad to yeeld himselfe to Mustapha; of whom he was graciously entertained, and vpon promise of his loyaltie, sworne one of his priuie Councell.

Mustapha thus now possessed of the Turkish kingdome in Europe, and entertaining great thoughts, the better to maintain his credit, leuied a great armie to make war vpon Amurath in Asia. And as he was vpon his way, at a place which the Turks call Saslidere, or the place of willowes, his other councellors repining at the great honour he gaue to Baiazet Bassa, aduised him to beware that he trusted him not too far, of whose smal faith he had sufficient trial alreaF die, & was like enough when occasion should serue, to reuolt from him to Amurath, & to draw after him some great part of his armie, to the great peril both of himselfe & all them his faithful seruants & followers. Vpon which jealous conceit, this great Bassa Baiazet was there forthwith as a traitor apprehended, and without further triall executed: at which time his brother Hamze was with much ado spared. This done, Mustapha proceeded on his journey, and passed ouer with his army at Callipolis into Asia. Amurath vnderstanding of the proceedings of Mustapha in Europe, and of his preparation made for his inuasion of Asia, created three new Bassa's, Omer, Vruge, and Alu, all three the sonnes of Temurtases; these he ioined with his old Bassa's Ibrahim and Einases. All these fiue he vsed as councellors for the wars; by whose aduice he sent for Mahomet Beg, syrnamed Michael Ogli, who in the time that Musa raigned was Viceroy in Europe, and therefore a man well knowne to most principall men in Mustapha his armie, but had been kept prisoner in the castle of Amasia, from the time that Musa was deposed and put to death by his brother Mahomet, vntil now that he was after eight yeares imprisonment, for this speciall purpose inlarged and receiued into fauour.

About the same time that Mustapha set footing in Asia, Amurath hauing gathered his army, set forward from Prusa to meet him; yet with such distrust in his forces, which were thought to be much inferior to the European soldiers that followed Mustapha, that he was glad vpon a superstitious opinion or zeale, to prostrat himselfe at the feet of an Emir (one of the false prophet Mahomets posteritie) to receiue at his hypocritical hands a graceles blessing for his better speed: by whom he was made to beleeue, that after two repulses, he had with much ado at the third time obtained grant of the great Prophet Mahomet, that he should preuaile in that war: and thereupon had his sword girt vnto him with the Emir his holy hands, with many other vaine and superstitious ceremonies. Yet for all these charmes, he marched on with his armie in feare enough, vntill he came to the riuer of Vlibad (otherwise called Rindacus:) where hauing intelligence of the approch of Mustapha, hee for feare caused the bridge ouer the riuer there to be broken downe, and incamped himselfe on that side the riuer. Not long after came Mustapha, and finding the bridge broken, incamped at the foot thereof on the other side: so that nothing parted the two armies, but the bredth of the riuer onely. Whilest they lay thus neere incamped together, that the soldiers might on both sides take the full view one of another, and also talke together; Mahomet Beg, syrnamed Michael Ogli, but lately deliuered out of his long imprisonment (as is aforesaid) came to the riuer side, and with a loud voyce called by name vpon the great captaines and old soldiers that were in Mustapha his armie; asking by name for many of his old friends and acquaintance: many of them being there present, reioycing to see that honorable man (whom they supposed to haue been dead in prison many yeres before) came gladly to the side of the riuer, to heare what he could say.

Then with a loud voyce he began to persuade them, that the man whom they followed was not the honourable Mustapha, but some base high minded fellow set vp by the Grecians, abusing the obscuritie of his birth, as the vaile vnder the couert wherof he went craftily about to intrude himselfe into the honorable discent of Baiazet; and so masking in the counterfeit titles of stolne honor, had mis-led them from their dutie to their natural King and Soueraign, to follow him a meere deceiuer. And further assured them, that Mustapha, Baiazet his son, was dead and buried in the bed of fame 22 yeres before; honorably ending his days in defence of his country, in the great battel of mount Stella against Tamerlane: wherefore they should doe well to forsake that supposed Mustapha, and again to yeeld their dutifull obedience vnto their vndoubted Soueraigne Amurath. These words deliuered vnto them by Mahomet, whom they generally both reuerenced and trusted, wrought such effect in their minds, that some presently aduentured to swim ouer the riuer, and ioyned themselues vnto him; and many others that stayed still, began now to doubt lest they had worshipped a wrong Saint. At the same time also, Einases Bassa, to terrifie Mustapha, sent vnto him letters as in great secret, aduertising him, that Amurath had the next night purposed with his armie to passe ouer the riuer aboue the broken bridge; at which time the chiefe captaines of his armie being (as he said) corrupted, had promised to deliuer Mustapha into his hands, and with his head to pay the ransom of them all. This he coloured with such faire glosses, that Mustapha partly beleeued the same. So when the dead time of the night was come, Einases with certain troups of horsemen passed ouer the riuer, at the verie same place he had in his letters named; and that with such a noyse and tumult, as Amurath with his whole armie had beene comming. Mustapha seeing things begin thus to worke according as Einases Bassa had before written; and with this, doubting also to be presently betrayd, and carrying about him a guiltie conscience (the mother of feare & distrust) tooke horse, (slenderly accompanied but with ten persons of his whole armie) and fled in hast, no man pursuing them, vntill he came to the riuer of Boga, and there with a great summe of of money obtained passage, by corrupting the captaine that dwelt in the castle vpon the passage of the riuer: and the third day after passing ouer the strait of Hellespontus, landed at Callipolis. The flight of Mustapha once knowne in his armie, they all yeelded themselues vnto Einases Bassa: who taking possession of Mustapha his tent, caused the broken bridge to be repaired; whereby Amurath passing with his armie, ioyned himselfe with Einases. The other Bassa Ibrahim, councelled Amurath to put to sword all those rebels that had followed Mustapha: but by the mediation of Einases (to whom they had yeelded themselues) they were generally pardoned.

Amurath departing from Vlibad or Lopadium, came to Boga, and there hanged vp the captaine that had giuen Mustapha passage. From thence he held on his way to Lampsacum, intending to pursue Mustapha into Europe: but being come to the sea side he could find no passage, for that Mustapha had caused all the shipping on that side, to be brought ouer into Europe. Yet at last Amurath by good fortune chanced vpon a great Genoway ship, which he hired for foure thousand duckats to transport his Armie, and so with much adoo at length landed in Europe. Mustapha seeing that Amurath was now come ouer, fled to Hadrianople, where he found such cold entertainment, that fearing to be betrayed, he was glad to speed himselfe thence, thinking all the world too little to hide himselfe in; and so came to an obscure place in the countrey of the Turks, called Kisul-Agatze-Genitze: where the soldiers sent to pursue him, ouertook him, and brought him bound to Amurath, then being at Hadrianople: by whose commandement he was shamefully hanged from the battlements of one of the highest towers of the citie, and there left to the worlds wonder.

Mustapha hanged.

This Mustapha is of some writers reported to haue been in deed the son of the great Sultan Baiazet, and that he was kept in prison all that long time, and thus at length set vp by the Greeks to trouble the state of the Turkish kingdome: but the Turkish Histories report as before, calling him Dusme or counterfeit Mustapha. And it is verie likely, that if hee had been one of the sons of Baiazet, he would haue found some means to haue made some great stirre long before that, as all the rest of the vnquiet brood of Baiazet did, which neuer rested vntil they had, like the earth-borne bretheen, one destroyed the other: besides that, their bloudie natures considered, it is very like, that Mahomet his younger brother, who raigned in Hadrianople almost eight yeres, and was in league all that time with the Emperour of Constantinople, would for his more safetie haue got him into his owne power, if hee had been in prison with the Emperour; or else haue dispatched him, if he had been in prison with himselfe. All which I am the rather perswaded to thinke, for that Orchanes a child, the sonne of Solyman, could find no safe place of abode at Constantinople in the raigne of Mahomet, but flying, was apprehended, and his eyes put out, as is before declared in the life of Mahomet: much lesse is it like, that Mustapha, being a warlike prince, and his elder brother, could haue been so long preserued and kept in prison from his furie.

It fortuned in these late broyles (as oftentimes it doth with others in like case) diuers of the rebels Asapi, or common soldiers (whom he for his greater countenance had apparelled & armed like Ianizaries) to fall into the hands of the true Ianizaries, Amurath his faithfull guard; whose liues indeed they spared, but vsing them with all the despight and indignities possible. Amongst the rest, one of the Ianizaries being an hungred, brought two of these Asapi his prisoners vnto a cookes shop, offering to sell them vnto him for a little victuall: which the cooke refused to giue him, as hauing no vse for such vnnecessarie seruants. Wherewith the proud Ianizary inraged, swore many a great oath, presently to cut off their heads, and to giue them him for nought, if he would not for a thing of nought redeeme them. And like enough hee was to haue so done, had not the cooke, moued with pittie, offered him for them both a sheepes head: which the Ianizarie tooke for them, swearing that the cooke had giuen for them more than indeed they were worth. Which disgrace so long since done vnto these Asapi, is yet oftentimes by way of reproch in great contempt, by the masterfull and insolent Ianizaries, obiected vnto the whole bodie of the Asapi, the greatest part of the Turks huge armies; of whom for all that the proud Ianizaries make small reckoning, accounting them scarcely for men, and in their rage oftentimes telling them, That two of them are not worth a sodden sheeps head.

Two Asapi sold by a Ianizarie for a Sheepes head.

Amurath hauing at length with much adoo thus pacified the dangerous rebellion raised by the counterfeit Mustapha both in Europe and Asia, was yet not a little grieued, to thinke how how the same had, to the great hazard of his estate, bin first plotted by the Greekes, and afterwards countenanced by the Greeke Emperor, of whom he thought now to be reuenged. And therefore sending before him Michael Ogli, his lieutenant generall in Europe, with his European soldiers to inuade the country about Constantinople, followed himselfe after with the Ianizaries and his Asian forces: and incamping before the Citie, filled all that necke of land which lieth before it, from sea to sea. And so incamped, began right furiously to batter the wals, in hope so to haue made a breach, & by the same to haue enred the city: but finding the wals of greater strength than he had before supposed, & the defendants still repairing whatsoeuer the furie of his artillery had beaten down or shaken, he ceased his batterie, & comming on with all his forces, desperatly attempted by assault to haue gained the citie: wherin his fortune was not answerable to his desire; for approching the city, with arrowes as shoures falling vpon the defendants, and scaling ladders in the mean time clapt vp to the walls, & the Ianizaries with other of his best soldiers valiantly mounting the same, they were by the defendants notably repulsed & beaten down, losing some their hands, some their arms, some their heads, but most their liues, no shot falling in vain from the wals. Which Amurath beholding, & grieued to see (though vnwilling) commanded a retrait to be sounded, and the assault giuen ouer: and shortly after seeing no hope to preuaile, in great rage raised his sieged & departed. Vnto whom for all that the Greek Emperor not long after sent his Embassadors to intreat with him for peace; whereof he would by no means heare, but proudly threatned to be ere long of all his wrongs reuenged: which caused the Greek emperor to deuise what he might for the troubling of his estate, so to keepe him otherwise busied: as he did shortly after with the Caramanian king, by countenancing another Mustapha (syrnamed Cutzug or the Little) Amuraths yonger brother, against him, to the raising of new stirres, and Amurath his no small trouble.

Mahomet the late King had fiue sons and seuen daughters, whereof Amurath was the eldest, and succeeded in his fathers kingdom; Mustapha the second, sirnamed the Little; Achmetes the third, who died before his father: the other two, Iosephus and Machmutes, both died of the plague, being but children, after the death of their father. Three of their sisters were married to the three sonnes of the King of Caramania, Ibrahim, Aladin, & Isa: other two were bestowed vpon the sonnes of the Prince Isfendiar, Ibrahim and Casimes: the sixt was giuen in mariage to Cozza-Beg Viceroy of Anatolia: and the seuenth, to the sonne of Ibrahim Bassa, who died at Mecha, whither she went vpon superstitious deuotion on pilgrimage.

At such time as Amurath was busied in his warres in Europe, against Mustapha the supposed son of Baiazet; the yonger son of Mahomet (called also Mustapha) being but thirteen yeres old, and Amurath his brother indeed was set vp to raise new troubles, by the King of Caramania and other Princes, as well Mahometans, as the Christian Princes of Grecia; who thought it good policie, by that means to impeach the greatnesse of Amurath. This yong prince Mustapha strengthned with the forces of his friends, entred into his brothers dominions in Asia, and besieged Nice, which was at length yeelded vnto him. Amurath aduertised of this new rebellion, by great gifts and large promises corrupted Ilias Beg, the young Princes tutor, to betray the Prince into his hands. Whereupon Amurath with great celeritie set forward with his Armie from Hadrianople, & in nine days came to Nice, where he entred the citie with smal resistance, as was to him before promised, where Mustapha was by his false tutor to him presented: who because he would not spill one drop of the sacred Othoman bloud, (as the Turkes call it) commanded the executioner presently to strangle him with a bow string; which was done accordingly, and his bodie afterwards buried by his father at Prusa.

Amurath hauing suppressed these two rebellions, and now out of all feare of any competitor, thought his fiue councellors too many by three, and therefore remoued the three Bassa's, Omure, Vrutzi, and Alis (the sons of Temurtases) into honorable places, retaining of his Councell, only the two old Bassa's, Ibrahim and Eiuases. But shortly after, Eiuases was secretly accused to Amurath, that he sought by his fauorits the soldiers of the court, to aspire vnto the kingdome himselfe, and to depose the King; and that intending some such matter, he did vsually weare a priuie coat. This suspicious report troubled the jealous tyrant: wherefore on a time as he rid accompanied with Eiuases, he cast his arme about him, as if it had been in kindnesse: but finding him secretly armed, would needs know the cause thereof: whereunto Eiuases answered, That it was for feare of some enemies he had in the court: but this excuse could by no no meanes serue his turne: wherefore he was forthwith apprehended by the commandement of Amurath, and both his eyes burnt out with a hot steele glasse. Eiuases Bassa his eyes put out.

Whilst Amurath was thus busied in subduing rebellions at home, Mahomethes the Caramanian King besieged Attalia, a great citie in Pamphilia, by the space of six moneths, which was valiantly defended by Hamza-beg, Amurath his lieutenant there: at which siege the vnfortunate King himselfe, as he was taking view of the citie, was slaine with a great shot out of the citie: whereupon Ibrahim, which succeeded him in the kingdome, brake vp the siege, and returned home to burie his father. The King of Caramania slaine. At this time also, Dracula Prince of Velachia, passing ouer Danubius, did the Turkes much harme about Silistria, but was afterwards enforced to submit himselfe to Amurath, and become his tributarie.

About this time also Tzunites, the Prince of Smyrna, which had before aided the rebell Mustapha, did by al meanes he could vex and molest Iaxis-beg, (Amurath his lieutenant in Aidinia) and hauing by chance taken his brother prisoner, put him to death. This prince of Smirna was descended of the antient Princes of Aidinia, and therefore pretended an interest in that seigniorie: which his claime the people of the country secretly fauoured, so far as they durst for feare of the Turks. Amurath hearing of the harmes that this Prince of Smyrna did, commanded Hamze-beg, viceroy of Anatolia, with all his power to make war vpon him. The viceroy without delay assembled a great armie, and inuaded the Princes countrey: and the Prince being well prouided for his comming, meeting him vpon the way, gaue him battell: wherein Hasan the Princes son, leading a great part of his fathers army, had put one part of the Turks army to flight: and pursuing them with too much furie, left his father at the same time so hardly beset by the viceroy, that he was glad to flie to his castle of Hipsily fast by. Hasan returning from the chace of the enemie, not knowing what had happened to his father, was by the Turks in his returne ouercome and taken prisoner. After which victorie the viceroy presently laid siege to the castle wherein the prince was. This siege continued a great while: at length the prince brought to extremity, was content to yeeld himselfe vnto the viceroy, vpon condition he should vse no violence against the person of himself or his son, but to send them prisoners vnto Amurath: which thing the viceroy by solemne oath promised, whereupon the Prince came out of the castle, and yeelded himselfe prisoner to the viceroy. Iaxis-beg, whose brother the Prince had before put to death, attended the going of Hamze the viceroy to his tent, where finding Hasan the princes son sitting vpon the ground, as the manner of the Turks is, took him by the choller with great fury, & drawing him along to the feet of the prince his father, there most cruelly strucke off his head: and in the same rage laying his bloudie hands vpon the aged prince, strucke off his head also; to the great dishonor of the viceroy, who had before giuen his faith for their safety. The heads of the Prince and his son were set vpon two launces, within the sight of the castle; which the defendants seeing, and now disparing of all rescue, yeelded themselues with the castle. This infortunate Tzunites was the last Prince of Smyrna, after whose death all his territorie was vnited to the Othoman kingdome. After all these troubles, Amurath with great triumph married the daughter of the Prince Isfendiar.

Amurath hauing laid vp in the depth of his thoughts the remembrance of that the Grecian Princes had done, in giuing aid to the rebels aforesaid, thought it now high time to take reuenge of that wrong: and for that purpose gathered a great army, wherewith he ranged at his pleasure thorow Macedonia, vntill he came to Thessalonica, surprising by the way diuers cities and castles, at that time belonging to the Constantinopolitan empire. This famous citie of Thessalonica, now called Salonichi, for beautie and wealth sometime not inferiour to any of the greatest and most renowned cities of Grecia, is situate vpon the borders of Macedonia, close vnto a bay of the Archipelago or the sea Ægeum: which bay was in antient time called Thermaicus-Sinus, and now the bay of Salonichi. To the Christian congregation there dwelling, S. Paul wrote two Epistles, in the latter wherof, he forewarneth them of a great defection to come before the latter day. Before this Christian citie, then in the protection of the Venetians, Amurath encamped his great armie of misbeleeuing Turks; and laid hard siege to it with most terrible batterie: at which time he by secret means corrupted certaine of the wicked citizens, to haue betraid the citie by a secret mine, and to haue let him in, which treason was by the Venetian gouernours perceiued, and the plotters thereof for safegard of their liues glad to leape ouer the wals, and to flie into the Turks campe. Thessalonica besieged.

Amurath

Amurath hauing greatly increased the wals of the citie, the more to encourage his soldiers, promised to giue them all the spoile that they could by force win. The greedy desire whereof made euery common soldier prouided with double measures, put to death a number of valiant men, before any could enter, for enuie of their valour: and especially of the Janizaries, striuing, and euen fighting one with another for the entrance, and vnmercifully slaying those that resisted them. The Venetian soldiers fled to their gallies, lying at anchor in the ocean, so got to sea from the infinit miseries which the poore Christian citizens endured in the furie of that barbarous nation, no tongue is able to expresse, or pen describe: death was lesse pain than the ignominious outrages and vnspeakable villanies which many good Christians there suffered, heartily wishing to die, and could not; and yet the furious enemies sword deuoured all the people, without respect of age or sex, except such as for strength of body, or comlines of person, were reserued for painfull labor or beastly lust; which poore soules were afterwards dispersed into most miserable seruitude and slauerie, thorow all parts of the Turkish kingdom. The infinit riches of that famous city, became a spoile vnto the barbarous soldiers; the goodly houses were left desolate, void of inhabitants. Thus the beautifull citie of Thessalonica, somtime one of the most glorious ornaments of Græcia, the late pleasant dwelling place of many rich Christians, was by the tyrant giuen for an habitation to such base Turkes, as at their pleasure repaired thither to seat themselues, and so is by them at this day possessed. This calamitie happened to Thessalonica in the yeare of our Lord 1432.

Thessalonica taken by Amurath.

Thessalonica beeing thus taken, Amurath returned to Hadrianople himselfe, and at the same time sent Caratze with the greatest part of his armie into Ætolia. Charles prince of that countrey dying a little before the comming of Amurath to Thessalonica, and hauing no lawfull issue, had diuided the countrey of Acharnania amongst his three base sons, Memnon, Turnus, and Hercules, leauing all the rest of his dominion to his brothers sonne, called also Charles. But shortly after, such discord fell among these bretheren, that Amurath sending his Turks to aid one of them against the other, as he was by them requested, in fine brought all that countrey of Ætolia into subiection to himselfe, leauing nothing for the foolish brethren to striue for, more than the bare titles of imaginatiue honour. The other Grecian princes of Athens, Phocis, Boetia, and al the rest of Græcia, vnto the strait of Corinth, terrified by their neighbours harmes, were glad to submit themselues to the barbarian yoke, and to become tributaries vnto the Turkish tyrant; vnder which slauerie they of long time most miserably liued, if intollerable slauery ioyned with infidelitie may be accounted a life. Thus the Grecians lost their libertie, which their ancestors had many times before, to their immortall praise, worthily defended against the greatest Monarchs of the world, and are now so degenerate, by the meanes of the Turkish oppression, that in all Græcia is hardly to be found any small remembrance of the antient glorie thereof: insomuch that whereas they were wont to account all other nations barbarous in comparison of themselues, they are now become no lesse barbarous, than those rude nations whom they before scornd. Which misery with a thousand more, they may iustly impute to their owne ambition and discord.

At this time, among the distressed Princes of Macedonia and Græcia, one Iohn Castriot raigned in Epirus: who seeing how mightily the Turke preuailed against the princes his neighbors, and considering that he was not able by any meanes to withstand so puissant an enemie, to obtaine peace, he was glad to deliuer into Amurath his possession, his foure sons, Stanisius, Reposius, Constantine, and George, for hostages: whom Amurath faithfully promised, well and honorably to intreat. But assoone as he had got them within his reach, he falsified his faith, and caused them to be circumcised after the Turkish maner, and to be instructed in the Turkish superstition, to the great griefe of their Christian parents: and afterwards, when he vnderstood of the death of Iohn Castriot their father, he poisoned all the three elder brethren: and by Sebaly (one of his great captains) seised vpon Croia, his chiefe citie, and all the rest of his territories, as if they had by good right deuolued vnto him. But George the yongest, whom the Turks named Scander-beg, or lord Alexander, for his excellent feature, and pregnant wit, he alwaies entirely loued, and as some thought, more passionatly than he should haue loued a boy. Him he caused to be diligently instructed in all kind of actiuitie and feats of war, wherein he excelled al other his equals in Amurath his court; & rising by many degrees of honor, came at last (being yet but very young) to be a great Sanzack or gouernor of a prouince, and was many times appointed

A appointed by Amurath to be Gouernor vnder him, or whether he might be beloued and honoured more of all men, or that men feared and reuerenced his person with Amurath himself, it had before opportunitie by great proofe and triall, not long before, to be manifest vnto him, that his prowesse commen from the hereditarie disease of the Turkish monarke, as hath before at large appeared.

Shortly after that Amurath had driuen all the Princes of Græcia, he turned his forces into Seruia, against Prince Lazarus, who refusing to pay him a yeerly tribute, and to doe him such other seruice, as he had reasonably demaunded, Amurath inuaded the countrie, minding to haue wonne vnto him by force, or faire caught in marriage, and that he should not disturbe the Hungarians to passe through his countrie, when he should lead forth the same for the inuasion of the kingdome of Bosna. All which vnreasonable conditions the Prince was glad to agree vnto, and sent his faire daughter by Saratze, who was afterwards married to Amurath.

B About this time, Isyphus and Machmutes, Amurath his brethren, and Orchanes the sonne of Solyman, who had his eyes put out by his vncle Mahomet, with many other men of great account among the Turks, died of the plague at Prusa. Plague among the Turkes.

Whileft Amurath was thus busied in his wars in Europe, the king of Caramania his brother in law, inuaded his dominions in Asia: for so it was agreed between the Christian Princes of Europe, and the Mahometan princes of Asia, to whom the greatnes of the Othoman kingdome was now become dreadful, That whensoeuer he inuaded the Christians in Europe, the Mahometan princes should inuade his countries in Asia; and that whensoeuer he should turn his forces into Asia, the Christian princes should spoile his countries in Europ. Against this Caramanian king, Amurath transported his army into Asia; & as he went, seised vpon the countries of Sarucania, Mentesia, and other prouinces, which were before but tributaries vnto him, driuing out the poore princes before him; & so entred into Caramania, and inforced the King so far, that he was glad to agree to such conditions of peace as it pleased him to propound vnto him, & to send his son to wait at his court. And at the same time picking a quarrel with Isfendiar prince of Castamona, caused him to become his tributarie, & to send his son to his court also. By which means the name of Amurath became terrible to all the Mahometan princes.

When Amurath had thus quieted all his troubles in Asia, he returned to Hadrianople: and vnderstanding that the Hungarians passing ouer Danubius, had in his absence made diuers incursions into his dominions, he was therewith greatly offended; and in reuenge thereof first sent Alis Bassa the son of Eurenoses, with an armie to inuade Hungaria; which he performed accordingly by the space of a moneth, and returned from thence with rich bootie. Not long after, he himselfe in person made another road into Hungary, commanding the prince of Seruia his father in law, to giue his armie free passage through his country; and charging Dracula prince of Valachia to aid him with his forces in that expedition: which his commandement both the Christian princes (more for feare, than of good will) diligently performed. So Amurath hauing inriched his souldiers with the spoile taken in Hungarie, returned home and wintred at his court at Hadrianople. Hungarie spoiled by Amurath

E The secret confederation betweene the Hungarians and the Mahometan King of Caramania, was not vnsuspected of Amurath, which hee was the rather induced to beleeue, for that whensoeuer he inuaded the one, he was presently set vpon by the other, either in Europe or in Asia: of which plot hee doubted not but that George prince of Seruia (his father in law) was chiefe author, although in shew he was therein the least actor. Wherfore Amurath intending to spill the play, sent for the prince his father in law to come to the court at Hadrianople: but he doubting some Turkish tragedie, pretended great occasions that he could not come; and fearing that which afterwards fel out, fortified and manned all his strong cities and castles by all means he could possibly, especially his chiefe citie Semendre (otherwise called Spenderouia) and left therein his son Gregorie (or as some call him, George) as gouernor; for his other

F son Stephan was long before in Amurath his court, with the Queene his sister. The prince of Seruia himselfe went into Hungarie to procure from thence some aid, hauing there also himselfe certaine territories, which he had in exchange of Sigismundus (late Emperor and King of Hungarie) for the citie of Belgrade. It was not long after, but Amurath forgetting both the affinitie and league hee had with the Prince his father in law, entered with a great armie into Seruia, Amurath contrary to his faith inuadeth Seruia and subdueth it.

Seruia, destroying all before him, and hardly besieged Semendre: where, after long siege the young gouernour (the Princes son) doubting to fall into his enemies hands by sudden assault, yeelded himselfe, with the citie: which thing so discouraged the rest of the Seruians, that in short time, Sophia, Nouomont, with all the rest of the cities of Seruia, were yeelded into the power of Amurath. After which conquest hee returned to Hadrianople, and hearing that the Prince of Seruia with the Hungarians, were making head against him, and that the two young Seruian Princes, Gregorie and Stephen, his wiues brethren, had intelligence with their father, he commanded them both to be cast in prison at Dydimoticum, & their eyes cruelly to be burnt out with a brasen bason made red hot, a common vnmercifull practise among the Turks.

About this time, Albertus duke of Austria, hauing before maried Elizabeth the only daughter of Sigismund the Emperour, and succeeding his father in law both in the empire and kingdome of Hungarie (vnto which type of highest honour nothing more furthered him than the remembrance of Sigismund) in the second yeare of his raigne, before hee was well setled in those new atchieued honors, died of the flix, as he was making great preparation against Amurath the Turkish King: who hauing lately driuen George Prince of Seruia and Rascia out of his dominions, had now extended the Turkish kingdom euen vnto the borders of Hungarie. This Albertus dying, left his wife great with childe. The Hungarians, in whose minds the remembrance of Sigismund was yet fresh, could haue bin contented to haue liued vnder the gouernment of the Queene his daughter, the widow of Albertus (then great with child;) but that the Turkish King was now grown so great, & come so nigh, that it was thought more than needfull by Iohn Huniades, and other of the Hungarian nobilitie, for the defence of that kingdome, not wholly to rest vpon the deuotion of the people toward the Queene, and the expectation of her issue, whereby they should be nothing strengthned: but to make choice of some great Prince, by whose power they might the better defend themselues and the kingdome against their dangerous enemies. Whereupon with consent of the Queene, it was resolued vpon, to make choice of Vladislaus, the yong King of Polonia, then a Prince of great power, but of farre greater fame and expectation: and by Embassadours to offer vnto him the marriage of the Queene, and with her, the kingdome also. This embassage being sent vnto Vladislaus, the matter was to and fro debated in the Polonian Court, whether it were to be accepted of or not? Some began to speake of the inequalitie of the match, considering that the King was but in the prime of his youth, and the Queen well stept into yeares; vrging farther, that nothing was offered in that match but wars; and that the Hungarians therein sought for nothing more, than by the Polonian forces to defend themselues against the Turkes. Others of the contrarie opinion, said, that the vniting of those two mightie kingdomes would be to the great good of them both, and to the great honour of the king, whose very name would thereby become terrible vnto the Turkes: and that it were greater pollicie, by the forces of both the Kingdomes, to keepe the Turkish king from entring into Hungarie, than to leaue that kingdome to him land for a prey, & afterward be inforst to fight with the same enemie in the heart of Polonia: and as for inequalitie of yeres betwixt the King and the Queene, it was not so great a matter, that in regard therof so honorable & commodious alliance should be reiected; for as much as Princes do more regard the vertues of their choice, with the increase of their honor & wealth of their kingdoms than the summer fruit of youth & beauty, which of it selfin short time doth rot & perish, although it be neuer so carefully kept and preserued: and that for as much as there can be but one king in a kingdom, such choice was to be preferred of Kings had not therin the greatest hope of many children. After long deliberation, Vladislaus gaue answer to the embassadors, That he would accept of the offers by them made: wherupon some of them returned to make relation to the Queene, and some of them staied behind to hasten the king forward. But whilst these things were a doing, the Queen in the mean time was deliuered of a faire sonne, whom she caused to be baptized & named Ladislaus. After the birth of this child, the Queen moued with a motherly affection, began to repent her selfe, that she had giuen her consent for the calling in of the Polonian king, to the preiudice of her son. And being animated by some of the Hungarian nobilitie (who presuming of the good grace they were in with the Queen, hoped to grow great themselues, if they might first draw the gouernment of that kingdom to the Queen & her yong son) determined now by all means to exclude the Polonian King: but the greater part of the nobilitie better considering what was most expedient for

for the present estate, and that they could neither with honour or safetie flie from that which was before (for the common good) by the Embassadors concluded; continued firme in their former resolution for the bringing in of Vladislaus: so that by this meanes, some taking part with the Queene and her young sonne, and others standing fast for Vladislaus, the kingdome of Hungarie was diuided into two factions, and as it were rent in pieces, & so grew to ciuil wars. The Queene with such as fauored her claime, the more to gaine the minds of the common people, (which are many times no lesse carried away with shews than matter) caused her son Ladislaus (being then but three moneths old) solemnly to be crowned King at Alba-Regalis, the vsuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian Kings. But after that the Polonian King had entred into Hungarie with a goodly armie, and ioyned his forces with his friends, most part of them which before followed the Queene and her sonne, reuolted vnto Vladislaus. So that when she had done what she could, shee was glad at last to commit the tuition of her son, together with the crowne of Hungarie, vnto Fredericke the third, then Emperour: neuer ceasing for all that, to the vttermost of her power, to trouble the gouernment of Vladislaus, continually stirring vp great warres against him both at home and abroad, vntill that at the last by her death her quarrell tooke end, together with her life.

In the midst of these ciuill wars, Amurath thought a faire opportunitie presented vnto him, to make an entrance vnto the conquest of Hungarie, which kingdome he had in his ambitious mind alreadie deuoured. And therefore gathering a great armie, he marched along the riuer Danubius, vntil he came to the strong citie of Belgrade, called in antient time Taurunum, and of some Alba Græca, but now commonly Grecis Weisenburg. This citie is inuironed on the East side with the famous riuer Danubius, and on the South with the great riuer of Saus or Sawe, which there falleth into Danubius; and on the other two sides is defended with strong walls, with deep and large ditches; and was then accounted the gate or entrance into Hungarie. Vnto this citie Amurath at his first comming gaue two terrible assaults, and was in good hope so to haue woon the same, but yet was both times valiantly repulsed, with great slaughter of his men. Wherefore finding it to be a matter of more difficultie than was by him at the first supposed, he began to raise mounts against the Citie, and high towers of wood to annoy the defendants, and furiously battered the walls. At this time also he caused great numbers of gallies and small pinnaces to be brought into both the riuers of Danubius and Sawe, to assault the citie on those parts where was least feared, and by that meanes also to keepe them of the citie from all succors to be sent that way out of Hungarie. Yet for all he could do or deuise, the citie was still valiantly defended by the Christian soldiers, which vnder the leading and conduct of Ioannes Vranus a Florentine, gouernor thereof, with often sallies and continual shot slew great numbers of the Turks. At the time of this siege, Vladislaus King of Polonia, & lately elect King of Hungarie, was sore troubled by the Queene & her faction in Hungarie: which thing the Turkish King knew right wel, and therupon continued his siege, although famin began greatly to increase in his campe, hoping in nothing more, than that the defendants despairing of helpe from the King, would in short time yeeld vp the citie. Vladislaus being so intangled with ciuill wars, as is aforesaid, that he could not possibly prepare such force as might raise the siege, by sending vnto him the like embassage. Wherupon he sent Debrogosius, Ostrorogenus, and Lucas Gorsensis, three of the Polonian nobilitie, embassadors vnto Amurath; declaring vnto him, That for so much as he had offered by his embassadors, to ioyne with him in league before he came out of Polonia, the remembrance thereof had taken such deep impression in his mind, that he would not take vp armes against him, although it were in his own iust defence, before he had offered him reasonable conditions of peace: wherefore if hee would desist from inuading of Hungarie (whereof Vladislaus was now by God his permission, & consent of the people, chosen King) and so raise his siege, that then they should afterwards easily agree vpon the desired peace: in concluding whereof, he should not find Vladislaus inferior to himselfe in any manner of princely courtesie: but if hee had rather proceed in armes, and to make proofe of his strength, he would then do the best that he could, to make him know that he was of sufficient power, in so iust a quarrel to withstand his greatest forces, & to reuenge the wrongs to him done. When Amurath had receiued this embassage, he appointed the Embassadors sadours to withdraw themselues for a while to Synderouia (a citie of Seruia, not farre off, vntill he might better consider of their demands; pretending, that he did it for their safetie: but as appeared afterward, secretly resoluing with himselfe, presently to do his vttermost deuoire, for the gaining of the city, & vpon the successe therof to shape them answer accordingly. Wherfore so soon as the embassadors were departed to Synderouia, he first by his messengers assured the minds of the citizens and soldiers with magnifical promises of large liberties, and infinit rewards and preferments, if they would yeeld vp the citie: and many arrowes with letters made fast vnto them, full of like promises, were at the same time shot into the citie. But when he saw no hope to preuaile by that means, he called together the captains and commanders of his armie, and there in the presence of them all, spake vnto them as followeth:

The notable speech of Amurath to encourage his soldiers to the assault of Belgrade.

Although I know it is in mine owne power, to grant, or not to grant, the peace whereof our enemies haue made a motion: yet it is my pleasure (worthie souldiers) to know your minds also. For so much as wee haue that warre in hand, wherein with worldly felicitie, (whereof amongst you I hold the chiefe place) is also endangered in our religion, and puritie of life; the defence and care whereof equally belongeth vnto vs all: for although we differ much one from another in the manner of our vocation, and liuing here, yet after death we all hope for one and the selfe same felicitie. And therefore I would haue you to vnderstand all that I shall say, as proceeding not of any regard of mine owne priuate, but vpon the consideration of the common good of you all. For as concerning mine owne estate, I possesse so large countries in Asia, such great dominions in Europe, that either part thereof (in good time bee it sayd) might seeme a sufficient kingdome: so that perhaps it might better stand with my estate, to take more care, for keeping of that I haue, than to trauell for the gaining of more: but you are to consider with your selues, whether you haue euery man sufficient to suffice himselfe or not, and how long you thinke your selues assured of the same; and moreouer, that together with these worldly things, wee shall be driuen at length to forsake our profession and religion, if wee shall now lay downe armes. For our enemies require, that wee should first cease from warre, and then afterwards they thinke it meete to talke of peace. I will not speake of the indignitie, that men besieged, and in euill plight, should propound condition of peace to them that besiege them, and are well furnished of all things; that feeble and cowardly men should prompt peace vnto couragious and expert souldiers: I omit what labour and paines we haue taken in laying our siege, in raising of mounts, in making of shipping; all which, our enemies command vs to forsake, as if they had vs alreadie bound or couped vp in hold, as wee haue them. All Bulgaria, and the greater part of Rascia is now by vs conquered, and most part of Seruia is at our commaund: all which places are by vs either to bee kept, or else all the rest of that wee possesse in Europe, is with them to bee quite lost and forsaken. Whosoeuer shall haue in their power this Citie which wee besiege (and that our enemies know right well) shall haue not onely as it were a fortresse and bulwarke of defence for his owne, but also a Castle and entrance for the subduing of others. The Kingdome of Hungarie is now diuided in it selfe, and full of domisticall sedition: neither is it so much strengthened by the uniting of the kingdome of Polonia, as it is by ciuill dissention weakened. And in this motion of peace nothing is sought for, but to gaine time for the pacifying of their priuate quarrels, that they may afterward with their double forces set vpon vs. For if wee shall breake vp our siege before wee haue woon the citie, they will easily finde delayes so long to protract the conclusion of peace, vntill that either Vladislaus his good fortune, or else the Hungarians beeing of themselues better aduised, shall make an end of their ciuill warres. What manner & conditions of peace wil they then require of vs, when they are at vnitie amongst themselues, and in armes against vs; seeing that now beeing in danger with mutuall discord, and almost by vs vanquished, they thinke it reasonable (as if they had woon the field) that wee should first raise our siege, and then intreat of peace? Their proud demaunds for the restitution of Bulgaria and Rascia, with other countries and cities woon by our trauell and danger, alreadie sound in mine eares: which if wee shall refuse to grant, not onely the Hungarians beeing then at vnitie among themselues, but also the Polonians, ioyned vnto them, will bring those warres home to our doores, which wee now at great aduantage make vpon them, troubled with discord and ciuill broiles. And if for desire of peace we could bee content to yeeld vnto such shamefull and miserable conditions, and restore vnto them all they should or in reason could desire: doe you thinke the Prince of Seruia would rest contented with his owne, whose haughtie minde (I am sure) beeing inflate with the combining of two such mightie kingdomes, thinketh not onely of the recouerie of that hee hath lost, but euen now gapeth at all that is ours in Europe. He will not thinke himselfe satisfied, before hee (hauing uing brought the Hungarian and Polonian Forces against vs) shal see the same hauocke and spoile made in our kingdome with fire and sword, which he hath before seene made by vs in his owne. Where if his fortune should answer his designes (which God forbid, but yet it may chance) beside all the miserable and intolerable outrages, which are to be feared of an angrie Conquerour, it is accounted with them for a goaly and religious worke, to vse all cruell and vnspeakeable villanies against our nation, except we wil forsake the faith and religion deliuered vnto vs by our ancestours, and follow their new and incredible ceremonies. Neither doe they thinke they can more easily and effectually procure the fauor of God with any kind of sacrifice or seruice, than by ouerthrowing and prophaning our Temples, by scoffing at our most sacred and secret Rites and ceremonies, by scorning our Religion and Priests: and that you may know all the furie wherewith they rage against vs and our Religion, they account all them for holie Saints which die in fight against vs. There is no cause (valiant souldiers) that vpon the vaine hope of peace, we should expect whilest the enemie doth gather and vnite his forces and armes against vs, especially such an enemie as propoundeth not spoyle and worldly honours, but immortalitie it selfe, as a reward of his victorie. We haue alreadie taken much more labour than we haue to take, we haue filled the ditches with restlesse labour, we haue cast vp bulwarkes equall with the walls, and part of the walls we haue beaten euen with the ground, so that you see the towne halfe opened: and that towne, by gaining whereof, all that ours is, may be made safe and quiet; and that which our enemie possesseth, subiect to our spoyle and prey. If you will but a little enforce your selues, as men mindful of our good fortune and forwardnesse, you shall find our temples, our sacrifices, our religion, all worlaly and heauenly felicitie to be then assured vnto vs, when as you shall to morrow ouerthrow the verie foundation of the enemies wal. Then (couragious souldiers) we may crie, Victorie, not for the present, but for euer. If this war should bring vnto vs nothing else but an assured securitie of our estate, it were sufficient reward; for which we ought cherefully to aduenture our selues to all dangers, and to challenge in combat euen death it selfe. But as this victorie doth defend all our things as with a deepe trench, or sure wall, so doth it lay open and expose all our enemies dominions vnto danger and spoyle. Hitherto we haue striuen with nature her selfe in the rough and abrupt mountaines of Bulgaria and Rascia, where we were to striue with hunger, thirst, labour, and desperation: all them we haue ouercome, allured with no other reward, but that at length we might attaine vnto the wealth of fruitfull Hungarie, from whence we must fetch the guerdon of our victorie, and the ground of our glorie. We are come to the gates, which being layd open, we are not to passe ouer inaccessible rockes, or vncoth desarts, but we shall goe thorow most pleasant places, decked both by Nature her selfe, and the industrie of man; where the temperatenesse of the aire, and liuely Springs, with the fruitfulnesse of the soile, doth euery where yeeld plentie of all manner of food both for man and beast, not only to serue for natures necessitie, but euen to glut our wanton desires. What thing soeuer curious endeauor hardly bringeth forth in other places, that the fertilitie of the soile yeeldeth plentifully of it selfe: so that it is to be thought, that nature adorned Hungary with a certain extraordinarie care, when as she would set forth a patterne of good husbandrie for other countries to imitate. Neither hath she in any place bin more bountifull in bestowing her rich gifts: for gold, which other men most painfully dig vp, and that in few places, the Hungarians gather at their ease, as if it were a growing plant. It is in your power (worthie souldiers) whether you will to morrow open a way to all these good things for your selues for euer, or else leaue the way open for your enemies vnto all that you hold. I would that you would remember when you go vnto the breach, that all the store of happie fortune is laid open vnto you for a prey, without any other defence, without any other garrison, without any other keeper; and that behind you are your wiues, children, your houses, your temples, and religion, together with the rewards of all your former victories: ouer whom, except you win this citie, the furie and insolencie of the victorious enemie will most cruelly and shamefully insult. I, according as I shall see you fight at the breach to morrow, shall easily perceiue how you are set downe to command as Conquerors, or else as slaues to be commanded; and also what to answer to the most insolent demands of the proud Embassadors. In the meane time make much of your selues, and together with your armor haue all things in readinesse, that to morrow with the dawning of the day we may assault the breach.

The Turkish captains for that time ioyfully departed, as if they had been alreadie assured of the victorie, & of all those good things which Amurath had so liuely set before their eys. The next morning verie early, Amurath commanded the assault to be giuen to a great breach which he had made in the wall with continuall batterie: the soldiers with great courage assailed the breach, especially the Ianizaries, who vnder the leading of Haly Bassa valiantly woon the sadours to withdraw themselues for a while to Synderouia (a citie of Seruia, not farre off, vntill he might better consider of their demands; pretending, that he did it for their safetie: but as appeared afterward, secretly resoluing with himselfe, presently to do his vttermost deuoire, for the gaining of the city, & vpon the successe therof to shape them answer accordingly. Wherfore so soon as the embassadors were departed to Synderouia, he first by his messengers assailed the minds of the citizens and soldiers with magnifical promises of large liberties, and infinit rewards and preferments, if they would yeeld vp the citie: and many arrowes with letters made fast vnto them, full of like promises, were at the same time shot into the citie. But when he saw no hope to preuaile by that means, he called together the captains and commanders of his armie, and there in the presence of them all, spake vnto them as followeth:

The notable speech of Amurath to encourage his souldiers to the assault of Belgrade.

Although I know it is in mine owne power, to grant, or not to grant, the peace whereof our enemies haue made a motion: yet it is my pleasure (worthie souldiers) to know your minds also. For so much as wee haue that warre in hand, wherein with worldly felicitie, (whereof amongst you I hold the chiefe place) is also endangered in our religion, and puritie of life; the defence and care whereof equally belongeth vnto vs all: for although we differ much one from another in the manner of our vocation, and liuing here, yet after death we all hope for one and the selfe same felicitie. The Turkish captains for that time joyfully departed, as if they had been alreadie assured of the victorie, & of all those good things which Amurath had so liuely set before their eys. The next morning verie early, Amurath commanded the assault to be giuen to a great breach which he had made in the wall with continuall batterie: the soldiers with great courage assailed the breach, especially the Ianizaries, who vnder the leading of Haly Bassa valiantly woon the

the same, and were entring the citie with assured hope of victorie. The Christians seeing all in danger to be lost, running to the breach from all parts of the citie, so forcibly charged the proud Ianizaries on euery side, that they were glad to retyre with more hast than they before entred: in which retrait many of them were slaine, and the rest flying out at the breach, were either slain, or burnt to death in the town ditch with wild fire; whereof the defendants had cast great store vpon the Turks at the breach, which hauing taken hold vpon the fagots, burdles, and other light matter, wherewith the Turks had vpon the sudden made their way ouer the town ditch, did so terribly burne, that the Ianizaries which had entred the breach, being again repulsed, were in that fierie lake consumed, or else with smoke strangled. In this assault Amurath is reported to haue lost 8000 of his best men, beside 7000 others ouerwhelmed or strangled in the mines, by the countermines of the Christians. The other part of the Turks, which at the same time assaulted the citie by water, out of their gallies and small ships, had as euill or rather worse successe: many of them were sunke with great shot, & some burnt by the fire cast from the walls, and so fired one another; and diuers of them in that sudden feare, for auoyding of that present danger, ran a ground vpon the shelfs in the riuer, and so split. Amurath wonderfully discouraged with the slaughter of his men, and shamefully beaten from the assault, returned to his campe with his Turks, much like men which had lately escaped from some great shipwracke. And thus partly by famin, and partly by the defendants force, hauing lost the greatest part of his army, he determined now after seuen months siege to return home. Yet because he would not encourage his enemies by shewing his feare, he sent for the Embassadors into the campe, and with sterne countenance answered them in this sort.

Belgrade notably defended by the Christians.

Amurath his answer to the Embassadors.

We will (said he) then talke of peace, when Vladislaus shall deliuer vnto vs all that part of Rascia which he yet holdeth, and also this citie of Belgrade as a pledge of the league. And for this time I will raise my siege, to giue Vladislaus time to aduise himselfe: yet I would wish him rather to accept of my friendship vpon these conditions, than by denying that little which is demanded, to hazard the state of both his kingdomes. I aske but that which is myne owne by Law of Armes, before Vladislaus was called into Hungarie: and the Hungarians cannot transferre vnto him that right which they had not themselues. Wherefore if he will proceed rather to striue for that which is other mens, than quietly to possesse his owne, I will in good time repaire hither againe, with my God the beholder and reuenger of wrong.

With this answer he dismissed the Embassadors, and forthwith rose with his armie, sore repenting his comming thither: yet because he would take something in his way, he left his nephew Isa-Beg with certaine troupes of horsemen at Scopia in Seruia, who so troubled the King of Bosna, that he was glad to require peace of Amurath, and to promise vnto him a yerely tribute of fiue and twentie thousand ducats.

Vladislaus newly elected King of Hungarie, seeing that part of his kingdome which is called Transyluania or Pannodacia, to be much suibect to the incursion of the Turks, (who hauing got into their possession all the countrey of Moldauia, and grown insolent by continuall victories, ceased not to inuade and spoyle the countrey of Transyluania) for remedie of that dayly mischief, created Iohn Huniades Vayuod, or his Vice-gerent in Trasyluania. This Huniades (as some write) was Earle of Bistrice, borne in Valachia: others say, that he was borne but of meane parents, and called Huniades of the village wherein he was borne, and grew to be great by his vertue and prowesse. Whatsoeuer his parents were, he himselfe was a politque, valiant, fortunate, and famous captaine, his victories so great, as the like was neuer before by any Christian Prince obtained against the Turks: so that his name became vnto them so dreadfull, that they vsed the same to feare their crying children withall. This worthie captain, according to the trust reposed in him, began to keepe the Turks short, by cutting them off, whensoeuer they presumed to enter into his countrey; and also by shutting vp the passages whereby they were woont to forrage the countrey of Transyluania: and when he had put his own charge into good safetie, he entred into Moldauia, and neuer rested vntill he had woon it quite out of the Turks hands. And not contented with this, passed many times ouer Danubius into the Turks dominions, making hauocke of the Turks, and carrying away with him great bootie, with many captiues.

Now

Now were two great and worthie captains met together, in places nigh one to another; Huniades in Transyluania and the next part of Hungarie, and Isa in Rascia & the vpper part of Seruia; the one lying at Temeswar, and the other at Sinderouia; both men of great spirit, and desirous of honour. Of these two, Isa in great fauour with Amurath, and by him highly preferred, to increase his credit with the Sultan his vncle, and to inlarge the bounds of the Turkish kingdome committed to his charge, continually forraged the country about Belgrade, to the intent that hauing wearied the inhabitants with the harmes he dayly did them, & brought the citie into great wants, he might so at length gaine the same, for the most part abandoned then of citizens, which Amurath could not by force obtaine, and so to open a way into Hungarie. Thus was the country by him spoyled, the villages rifled and burnt, and great numbers both of men and cattell dayly carried away: yea somtimes not contented to haue spoiled the open country, he assailed the verie suburbs of the citie, and was thence hardly repulsed: and finding Huniades the only man that hindred his further proceedings, to requite him, and prouoke him the more, brake somtimes into his country, laying in euery corner as he went, strong ambushes, so to haue circumuented that warie captain, if it had bin possible. But he grieued to see the countrey thus spoyled, and purposing thereof to be reuenged, secretly raised a strong power both of horse and foot, & with his companion Nicholas Vilach a right valiant captaine, passing ouer Danubius, came and incamped betwixt Belgrade and Sinderouia, being about 20 miles distant. Of whose comming Isa-Beg vnderstanding, forthwith set forward with a great armie against him, lest he should by longer delay seeme to stand in doubt of his enemy, whom he had by many iniuries so often prouoked. So marching on with his armie ranged in order of battell, he found Huniades as readie for battell as himselfe; who in both wings had placed his light horsemen, and behinde them his men at armes, with certaine companies of crossebows on horsebacke: in the midst stood his armed men, with his archers, and other soldiers more lightly armed, readie at all assayes, all strongly garded with men at armes: after whom in the rereward followed also a strong squadron of valiant footmen. The signal of battell being giuen, there began a great and cruell fight, as amongst men desirous either to ouercome, or there honourably to end their days. At the first incounter, the wings of Huniades his battell were by the Turks inforced to retire; but comming to the men at armes, their furie was there stayd, & a cruel battel fought, wherein many fel on both sides, but of the Turks mo, who trusting to their agilitie and nimblenes of bodie, were not able long to endure the shocke and strength of the men at armes, but were there by heapes ouerthrowne, and most miserably slain. Which Isa-Beg beholding, and perceiuing the Hungarians couragiously to fight, as men almost in possession of an assured victorie, to saue himselfe, turned his backe and fled to Sinderouia. The rest beholding the flight of their Generall, betook themselues to flight also: after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed, especially Huniades himselfe, who by his example to animate the rest, left not the chase vntil he was come almost to the suburbs of Sinderouia: few of the Turks escaped, the rest being either taken or slain. Huniades after so great a victory, with a rich prey and a multitude of prisoners returned to Belgrade; hauing now sufficiently reuenged himselfe of the wrongs he had before receiued. After which time Isa the Turke was more quiet, as hauing sufficient proofe of his valor. The fame of this victorie increased not a little the fame of Huniades, the report whereof comming to Buda, filled the citie with joy and gladnes; but most of all King Vladislaus, who thereupon caused publique prayers, with thanksgiuing to be made in euery Church; and by his letters gratulatorie, with many rich Presents incouraged Huniades to the prosecution of the religious warre; wherein was propounded vnto him not only the increase of his wealth (a base regard in the honorable) but the immortalitie of his name, and hope of eternall blisse. 1440.

Transyluania inuaded and spoiled by Mesites Bassa.

Not long after this victorie, Huniades obtained a far greater in Transyluania. For Amurath much grieued with the losse he had first by himselfe, and after by his lieutenant Isa, receiued at Belgrade, and in the countrie therabout; lest he should seem to yeeld vnto the Hungarians, repaired his broken forces with new supplies, with purpose againe to renew his wars in Valachia. And so hauing put all things in a readines, sent one of his Bassa's called Mesites (his Vicedroy in Asia, a man of great wisdome, experience, and valor) with a puissant armie vpon the sudden by the way of Valachia Transalpina, to inuade Transyluania. This worthie captain according to his charge departing out of Seruia, and passing from Danubius, suddenly entred into

Huniades his country, burning and spoyling whatsoeuer came in his way, and killing al that he G sight vpon, man, woman, & child, without respect of age, sex, or condition, filling al the countrey as he went with tumult and terror. Whereof Huniades (but lately come into the country) vnderstanding, and hauing as then no sufficient forces to oppose against the furie of so puissant an enemie, either means to raise any in so great a confusion and feare; was wonderfully grieued thereat, and perplexed in mind, as not well knowing which way to turne himselfe. At length Huniades flieth he tooke his flight into Alba Iula, vnto his old friend George Lepe Bishop of that citie, a man of great vertue and grauitie: but whilest he there stayeth with his friend, about the raising of a tumultuarie armie, the enemie was now come neere vnto him; who hauing ouerrun the greatest part of the country, had scraped together such a bootie, and taken such a multitude of pri-H soners, that surcharged as it were with the spoyle, he was glad to march softlier; yet still burning the country before him. Which Huniades and the good Bishop beholding out of the city, so much grieued thereat, that albeit that they both well knew themselues, with an handful of men taken vp in hast hand ouer head, too weake to encounter with their enemies; yet thought it better, with such power as they had to go out, and so in defence of their country honorably to die, than longer to behold the most miserable destruction of the same. But whilest they vpon this resolution (carried forth with too hot a desire of reuenge) march vnaduisedly forward, without any scouts or espials sent out before them, they fell before they were aware into such ambushes both of horse & foot, as the crafty enemie had in the secret woods & vallies where-Huniades and the Bishop of Alba Iula entrapped by the Turks. by they were to passe, laid of purpose to intercept them: which now with great force and horrible outcries breaking out vpon them on euery side, dismaied them with a great feare. Huniades and the Bishop seeing themselues so intrapped and beset with the multitude of their ene-
I mies, as that they must needs perish if they should longer stay, fled incontinently backe again; after whom followed all the rest of their armie, and at their heeles the eager Turks, who spared none of the flying Christians they could ouertake, but put them all to the sword: neuertheless most part of them escaped backe again to Alba Iula. The Bishop thinking to haue saued himselfe by the swiftnes of his horse, comming to a riuer, in taking the same was ouerthrown, and there by the enemie slain. With whose death the Bassa incouraged, as also with the present victorie, began now more at libertie to range abroad, and at his pleasure with fire & sword to waste that part of the country which yet remained vnspoiled: leauing in the meane time (as a man out of feare) the rich prey he had taken, together with his baggage & carriages, to be car-K ried all together, as a notable testimonie of his victorie, vnto his great lord & master. Huniades in the mean time with wonderfull celeritie running about the borders of his country, and out of euery town & village taking such soldiers as he could, perswaded also the Sicilians (or people commonly called Siculi) in defence of their wiues and children to take vp arms: who al in respect of the present necessitie, cheerfully did whatsoeuer he commanded. With this tumultuarie armie he followed the Bassa (who then in great pride was returning, laded with the spoile of the whole country) with purpose to set vpon him as time or place should giue him occasion. In the meantime Mesites being told, that Huniades with a great power was comming after him, and now euen at hand; is reported to haue made no reckoning thereof, but to haue proudly answered vnto him that brought the news, Let him come, and with the spoyle of himselfe L inrich our victorie. There was present when he thus said, one Iohn one of Huniades his espials; who discouered vnto him many of the Turks designes concerning the joyning of battel with him; but especially, that the Bassa had commanded thorow his armie, That aboue all things, they should in the beginning of the battell assaile the person of Huniades himselfe, for that he being once slain, the rest would easily be put to flight, as all depending on his direction: & that for the performance thereof, he had appointed certain companies of his best soldiers, giuing them certain tokens wherby they might know both him and his horse. There was then in the armie one Simon Kemene, a right valiant and couragious gentleman, not much vnlike to Huniades, with whom he changed both his horse and armor, appointing vnto him a strong troupe of his choice horsemen to attend vpon him: neither was this counterfeit Huniades vnwilling to M expose himselfe vnto the danger, accounting it honour enough, if by his death he might saue the life of his friend, and preserue so worthie a defender of the commonweale. Huniades following fast after the Bassa marching before him, fought by light skirmishes, somtimes on the one side, sometimes on the other, and sometimes in the rereward, to stay him, and at some aduantage,

A uantage, if any such were giuen, to fight with him before he should get out of the country. At length finding such an opportunitie as he thought good to lay hold vpon, he with all his forces, as if it had been a violent tempest, came vpon the Turks so suddenly, as that they had not time to put themselues in order of battell, but were glad confusedly to fight as they might, & without order: in which disordred fight many fel on both sides, but far more of the Turks. But whilest both armies with like obstinacy incounter together, certain troups of the most valiant Turks descrying Simon the counterfeit Huniades, & by the signes before deliuered vnto them, both of his horse and armor, supposing him to haue bin Huniades indeed; with al their power made towards him, to haue slain him, according as they had in charge: where meeting with right valiant men, of no lesse courage than themselues, there was fought a most terrible and A great battell betwixt the Turkes and Hungarians.
B bloudie battell, in such sort, as if in that verie place should haue been tried the whole fortune of the day. But the Turks still bending their forces more and more thither, for the killing of him of whom they stood in more dread than of all the rest; at length by plaine force made a way vnto him, & hauing slain them that were about him, though not without their own great losse, furiously assailing him, slew him, vainly supposing it to haue bin the very Generall himself: who had he there perished (as like enough it was he should, had he not bin before warned of the Bassa's purpose) no doubt but that the whole country had bin with him, or shortly after quite lost. But Huniades in the mean time riding to and fro in the armie, encouraged his soldiers not to forsake the victorie they were now as it were in possession of, nor leaue vnreuenged so many slaughters and harms so lately committed by their enemies, but to remember as they were fighting, that they carried in their hands their wiues and children, and were in that one C battell to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God and man. Somtime he with new supplies encouraged such as were ouercharged, and euen now readie to flie; otherwhile he with cheerfull words stayd, that had alreadie turned their backs; performing in euery place all the parts both of a worthie commander and valiant soldier, as the necessitie of the time and place required. In the heat of this battel (fortune yet fauoring neither part, but both fighting with all their power) the Transiluanian prisoners that in great number were kept in the camp, wishing rather to die, than to be carried away into captiuitie, and thinking it now or neuer, time for them to attempt their deliuerance; with one consent brake asunder their bonds, and with such weapons as first came to hand, set vpon their keepers, of whō they slew a great number, & so D desperatly issuing out into the battell, incouraged their countrimen, & discouraged their enemies. Yet was the battell hardly fought, though not altogether with like courage, or for like cause: for why, the Transyluanians fought for their country, their wiues, their children, their liues, their libertie, their religion, and alters: but the Turks, for the rich prey they had before taken, & that they were by victorie in hope of. But at length the Turks by the breaking out of the prisoners (who laid about them like desperat men) out of hope of the victorie, began by little and little to retyre; and the other on the contrarie part by this vnexpected aid encouraged, and quickly finding the enemies fainting, fought more fiercely than before. Mesites seeing his armie thus in euery part wauering, was therewith exceedingly troubled: but presently after, beholding some of his men retyring as if they had fled, and other some flying outright, E and no meanes to stay them, for safegard of his life turned his horse and fled also: after whom the Hungarians followed with most terrible execution, as men desirous of the bloud of them that had done them so great harme. In this chase Mesites himself with his son were both slain: the repoort of whose death in the pursuit, added swiftnes vnto the Hungarians, to the encreasing of the slaughter of the Turks, whom for the desire of reuenge they ceased not for certain days to pursue, vnto the top of the Alps. In this battel were slaine of the Turks 20000, and of the Hungarians about 3000. Huniades with this victorie recouered all the prey the Turks had taken of the spoile of the country, together with their tents and baggage: vnto whom at his return into the campe, a wonderfull number of the poore captiues came, and falling at his feet, Great reioycing for the victorie.
F and kissing them, gaue God thanks for their deliuerance by him; some called him the father, some the defender of his country; the soldiers, their inuincible Generall; the captiues, their deliuerer; the women, their protector; the yong men and children, their most louing father. In all which joyfull acclamations, no honorable additions was heard, which in the iudgement of all men, worthily agreed not with his deserts. He again with tears standing in his eys, courteously embraced them, rejoycing at the publique good; and himselfe giuing most heartie thanks vnto God, commanded the like to be done in all churches of that Prouince. Somtime G he commended the ſoldiers valor, and in generall, the peoples loyalty. The nobilitie & worthie captains he extolled by name, according as their deſerts had bin in that notable battell, not detracting any thing from any mans worthie prayſes: part of the ſpoyle of the Turkes he appointed vnto deuout vſes, and the other part he diuided amongſt the ſoldiers: and willing as it were with the firſt fruits thereof to gratifie King Vladiſlaus and the Deſpot of Seruia, then preſent with him, he ſent a great waggon, with 10 horſes which could ſcarce draw, laded with the Turks enſignes and the chief of their heads, where the heads of the Baſſa and his ſon ſtood formoſt, and aboue them was placed an old Turke, ſomtime wel known vnto the Deſpot: who in this order preſented vnto them, is ſayd to haue thus deliuered his meſſage, as followeth:

The ſpeech of an old Turk, in deliuering the Preſent vnto the King.

Huniades your Maieſties moſt humble ſeruant, and the moſt honourable Deſpots ſonne, ſendeth vnto H you this part of the ſpoyle gained by this late victorie, leſt he ſhould ſeeme to defraud you of the honour of the battell, happily fought vnder your good fortune. Theſe heads of the Aſian Nobilitie he ſendeth you for a Preſent, that you ſhould not want the aſſured teſtimonie of ſo notable a victorie: theſe are two princes heads, the one of Meſites Baſſa the Generall, and the other of his ſon; the reſt are the heads of the other great commanders and Sanzacks. All theſe witneſſe the greatneſſe of the late ſlaughter, and exhort you to greater atchieuements What your royal Maieſtie for the natural inſtinct of pietie and religion ingrafted into you, may hope for; and what an occaſion of immortalitie and glorie is offred vnto you, Huniades wiſheth you hereby to conſider: and humbly requeſteth, that generall ſupplications may be commanded, and a great armie prouided, foraſmuch as all men ſuppoſe, that the Turke will gage his whole I forces, and leaue nothing vnattempted, in reuenge of ſo great a ſlaughter of his people.

Hauing ended his ſpeech, he ſhewed vnto them the griſely mortified heads: which the nobilitie and others there preſent, earneſtly beheld, and wondred at, eſpecially the King & the Deſpot; who by letters further vnderſtanding the whole proceeding of the war, and fortune of the battel, highly commended the diſcreet valour of Huniades, together with the glorious victorie, worthie (as they ſaid) of a Roman triumph: for which, Vladiſlaus commanded publike ſupplications to be made in all churches thorow Hungarie, and by honorable meſſengers ſent of purpoſe to Huniades, gaue him great thanks, according to his deſerts, with many rich Preſents alſo, commending his faithfull and worthie ſeruice: and requeſting him, with like courage and care, to proſecute the war, ſo happily begun; promiſing him, That he ſhould neither K want men nor mony, or any thing elſe needfull thereunto. Vpon this victorie, the countries of Moldauia and Valachia, before tributaries vnto the Turks, now reuolted again vnto the Hungarians, to the great griefe of Amurath: and the fame of Huniades was in ſhort time diſperſed thorow all Europe, and a generall hope conceiued of him, as of one moſt like to be one of the greateſt champions of the Chriſtian commonweale, as in his time vndoubtedly he was.

The report of this late ouerthrow, with the death of the Baſſa Meſites, and the loſſe of his Armie, being brought to Hadrianople, much troubled the Turkiſh Tyrant; but moſt of all, the reuolt of the two Countreys, Moldauia and Valachia. So that full of wrathfull indignation, and deſire of reuenge, he commaunded a great armie to be raiſed againſt the next Spring, with intent to haue gone therewith himſelfe: but afterward vpon better aduice changing his L purpoſe, he committed the leading thereof vnto one Schech Abedin Baſſa (corruptly called Sciabedin Baſſa) an Eunuch, and yet neuertheleſſe a right valiant and expert captaine, and his Viceroy in Europe; with charge firſt to enter into Valachia, and there hauing done what harme he could with fire and ſword, to doe the like in Moldauia: and after that, with all his power to breake into Tranſyluania, there to reuenge vnto the full, the loſſes before receiued, and with the ſlaughter of the Hungarians to ſacrifice vnto the ghoſts of their dead friends and companions. The Baſſa according to his charge, departing out of Macedonia, and marching thorow Myſia, and ſo paſſing ouer Danubius, with an armie of feureſcore thouſand fighting men, whereof foure thouſand were of the beſt Ianizaries, entred into Valachia, filling the country with feare and tumult; the Valachians now altogether in deſpaire to be able to de- M fend themſelues againſt the furie of the Turkes, and ſore repenting them of their reuolt from them, vnto the Hungarians. Whom for all that, Huniades comforted with cheereful words, willing them betime to retyre themſelues vnto the ſafeſt places of the Countrey, and not to expoſe themſelues with their too weake forces againſt the furie of the Barbarians; promiſing

Valachia grieuouſly ſpoyled by the Turkes.

A miſing in good time to come himſelfe to their reliefe, not doubting by the power of Ieſus Chriſt, to dare them battel in the plain field, and to haue of them a glorious victory, although they were in number far moe than they were reported to be. The Baſſa diuiding his armie into two parts, forraged the countrey far and neere, burning the countrey townes and villages before them, ſpoiling whatſoeuer came in their way, and killing whoſoeuer they light vpon, men, women, or children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition. But the Valachians for the moſt part had retired themſelues, ſome into the mountains, ſome into the ſtrong townes, and ſome into places further off; ſo that few fell into the enemies hands, but ſuch as were not able to flie, or not regarding the danger, had negligently ſtaid the enemies comming, and ſo periſhed. Valachia thus ſpoiled, the Turks paſſing ouer the mountaines, deſcended into Tranſyluania, as Amurath had commanded, with purpoſe there to haue don the like or greater harm, if poſſible it had been to haue ſo done: but there was Huniades with 15000 choſen ſouldiers readie to encounter them. A ſmall power indeed, in compariſon of the multitude the Baſſa led: but all men of great experience & reſolution, in valor counteruailing the great number of their enemies, men reſolued rather to die than to flie. Of whoſe approch the Baſſa (vnto whom the name & fortune of the man was dreadful) by his eſpials vnderſtanding, ſtaied his intended furie, and as one well aware with whom he had to doe, without farther proceeding, encamped himſelfe with his armie, to ſee what power and courage the enemie had. But certainly informed by his ſcouts, for that purpoſe ſent out, That he was not in number a quarter ſo many as the Turks, but lay ſtrongly encamped with his waggons & carriages, as in a ſure fort, in ſuch order, as that he could not without great danger be aſſailed, & yet might at his pleaſure come
C forth, and ſo if need were retire again, as into a ſtrong hold: he wondered at his courage and skilfull manner of encamping; yet preſuming of his own multitude and ſtrength, he doubted not to march forward, and to offer him battel. Being come within halfe a mile the one of the other, although they were on neither ſide vnwilling to fight, yet hoping both for a great victorie, they thought it not beſt to attempt any thing raſhly, but betooke themſelues both vnto the higheſt of their wits, as willing in ſo great a conflict, as wel to ſhew the vtmoſt of their policie and skil, as of their courage & valor. The Turk thought it beſt not to ioyn battel with his enemies in one front, for feare of confounding ſo great a multitude, but to diuide his army into certain battalions, & ſo to fight by degrees and in good order, whereby to make al his men D profitable: or if he could not do ſo, then with his multitude to encloſe the Chriſtians round, & ſo to ouerwhelme them. On the other ſide, Huniades charged his ſoldiers, aboue all things to keep their order, and in no caſe to ſuffer themſelues to be diuided by their enemies. The next day, being come vnto a place which they call Vaſcape, both the armies by the breake of day began to diſlodge; at which time the Baſſa ſpent a good ſpace in the martialling of his great army, as did alſo Huniades, ſeeking by prouident foreſight and policie to match the multitude of his enemies. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order, calling vnto him the chiefe captaines and commanders of his armie, with cheerefull countenance encouraged them as followeth:

No courage (beleeue me) worthie companions, and fellowes in arms, could haue induced me to encoun-E ter ſo great a multitude, did not neceſſity it ſelfe enforce me, your approued valour perſuade me, and the aſſured hope I haue in Chriſt Ieſus aboue all things confirme me: hauing made choice of vs to fight this his ſacred battell, and by our right hands to reuenge the diſhonour of his holy name. In which his eſpeciall choice wee are to conſider how much hee hath beloued vs: and for the ſame to praiſe his infinite goodneſſe and mercie. Three ſuch commodities hath God thereby euen this day propounded vnto vs, if we will be the ſame men we haue beene in times paſt, as that the leaſt thereof were ſufficient to encourage men of worth, for the ſame to lay downe their liues, held they them neuer ſo deare. Firſt, you are to fight for the health and welfare of your children, wiues, and countrey, ioyned with your whole eſtate: then, for eternall glorie and renowne in this world: and laſt of all, for immortalitie and a crowne that F ſhall neuer be taken from you, in the world to come. How many miſeries and calamities we haue in former times, and of late receiued from the Turks, would to God you had rather heard thereof by report, than ſeene the ſame with your eyes, and indured them in your ſelues. You had long ſince beene bereft of your beloued wiues and children, whome moſt miſerable ſeruitude had ouerwhelmed; you had had neither houſe nor Church, wherein to dwell or to ſerue God, had not the diuine power of God, and your rare proweſſe beene at hand for preſent reſcue: your countrey, your goods, your honour, your liberty, you want men nor mony, or any thing elſe needfull thereunto. Vpon this victorie, the countries of Moldauia and Valachia, before tributaries vnto the Turks, now reuolted again vnto the Hungarians, to the great griefe of Amurath: and the fame of Huniades was in ſhort time diſperſed thorow all Europe, and a generall hope conceiued of him, as of one moſt like to be one of the greateſt champions of the Chriſtian commonweale, as in his time vndoubtedly he was.

Hauing ended his ſpeech, he ſhewed vnto them the griſely mortified heads: which the nobilitie and others there preſent, earneſtly beheld, and wondred at, eſpecially the King & the Deſpot; who by letters further vnderſtanding the whole proceeding of the war, and fortune of the battel, highly commended the diſcreet valour of Huniades, together with the glorious victorie, worthie (as they ſaid) of a Roman triumph: for which, Vladiſlaus commanded publike ſupplications to be made in all churches thorow Hungarie, and by honorable meſſengers ſent of purpoſe to Huniades, gaue him great thanks, according to his deſerts, with many rich Preſents alſo, commending his faithfull and worthie ſeruice: and requeſting him, with like courage and care, to proſecute the war, ſo happily begun; promiſing him, That he ſhould neither K

The report of this late ouerthrow, with the death of the Baſſa Meſites, and the loſſe of his Armie, being brought to Hadrianople, much troubled the Turkiſh Tyrant; but moſt of all, the reuolt of the two Countreys, Moldauia and Valachia. So that full of wrathfull indignation, and deſire of reuenge, he commaunded a great armie to be raiſed againſt the next Spring, with intent to haue gone therewith himſelfe: but afterward vpon better aduice changing his L purpoſe, he committed the leading thereof vnto one Schech Abedin Baſſa (corruptly called Sciabedin Baſſa) an Eunuch, and yet neuertheleſſe a right valiant and expert captaine, and his Viceroy in Europe; with charge firſt to enter into Valachia, and there hauing done what harme he could with fire and ſword, to doe the like in Moldauia: and after that, with all his power to breake into Tranſyluania, there to reuenge vnto the full, the loſſes before receiued, and with the ſlaughter of the Hungarians to ſacrifice vnto the ghoſts of their dead friends and companions. The Baſſa according to his charge, departing out of Macedonia, and marching thorow Myſia, and ſo paſſing ouer Danubius, with an armie of foureſcore thouſand fighting men, whereof foure thouſand were of the beſt Ianizaries, entred into Valachia, filling the country with feare and tumult; the Valachians now altogether in deſpaire to be able to de- M fend themſelues againſt the furie of the Turkes, and ſore repenting them of their reuolt from them, vnto the Hungarians. Whom for all that, Huniades comforted with cheereful words, willing them betime to retyre themſelues vnto the ſafeſt places of the Countrey, and not to expoſe themſelues with their too weake forces againſt the furie of the Barbarians; promiſing

Valachia grieuouſly ſpoyled by the Turks.

A miſſing in good time to come himſelfe to their reliefe, not doubting by the power of Ieſus Chriſt, to dare them battel in the plain field, and to haue of them a glorious victory, although they were in number far moe than they were reported to be. The Baſſa diuiding his armie into two parts, forraged the countrey far and neere, burning the countrey townes and villages before them, ſpoiling whatſoeuer came in their way, and killing whoſoeuer they light vpon, men, women, or children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition. But the Valachians for the moſt part had retired themſelues, ſome into the mountains, ſome into the ſtrong townes, and ſome into places further off; ſo that few fell into the enemies hands, but ſuch as were not able to flie, or not regarding the danger, had negligently ſtaid the enemies comming, and ſo periſhed. Valachia thus ſpoiled, the Turks paſſing ouer the mountaines, deſcended into Tranſyluania, as Amurath had commanded, with purpoſe there to haue don the like or greater harm, if poſſible it had been to haue ſo done: but there was Huniades with 15000 choſen ſouldiers readie to encounter them. A ſmall power indeed, in compariſon of the multitude the Baſſa led: but all men of great experience & reſolution, in valor counteruailing the great number of their enemies, men reſolued rather to die than to flie. Of whoſe approch the Baſſa (vnto whom the name & fortune of the man was dreadful) by his eſpials vnderſtanding, ſtaied his intended furie, and as one well aware with whom he had to doe, without farther proceeding, encamped himſelfe with his armie, to ſee what power and courage the enemie had. But certainly informed by his ſcouts, for that purpoſe ſent out, That he was not in number a quarter ſo many as the Turks, but lay ſtrongly encamped with his waggons & carriages, as in a ſure fort, in ſuch order, as that he could not without great danger be aſſailed, & yet might at his pleaſure come
C forth, and ſo if need were retire again, as into a ſtrong hold: he wondered at his courage and skilfull manner of encamping; yet preſuming of his own multitude and ſtrength, he doubted not to march forward, and to offer him battel. Being come within halfe a mile the one of the other, although they were on neither ſide vnwilling to fight, yet hoping both for a great victorie, they thought it not beſt to attempt any thing raſhly, but betooke themſelues both vnto the higheſt of their wits, as willing in ſo great a conflict, as wel to ſhew the vtmoſt of their policie and skil, as of their courage & valor. The Turk thought it beſt not to ioyn battel with his enemies in one front, for feare of confounding ſo great a multitude, but to diuide his army into certain battalions, & ſo to fight by degrees and in good order, whereby to make al his men D profitable: or if he could not do ſo, then with his multitude to encloſe the Chriſtians round, & ſo to ouerwhelme them. On the other ſide, Huniades charged his ſoldiers, aboue all things to keep their order, and in no caſe to ſuffer themſelues to be diuided by their enemies. The next day, being come vnto a place which they call Vaſcape, both the armies by the breake of day began to diſlodge; at which time the Baſſa ſpent a good ſpace in the martialling of his great army, as did alſo Huniades, ſeeking by prouident foreſight and policie to match the multitude of his enemies. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order, calling vnto him the chiefe captaines and commanders of his armie, with cheerefull countenance encouraged them as followeth:

The moſt chriſtian ſpeech of Huniades to encourage his ſoldiers againſt the Turke.

E No courage (beleeue me) worthie companions, and fellowes in arms, could haue induced me to encoun- ter ſo great a multitude, did not neceſſity it ſelfe enforce me, your approued valour perſuade me, and the aſſured hope I haue in Chriſt Ieſus aboue all things confirme me: hauing made choice of vs to fight this his ſacred battell, and by our right hands to reuenge the diſhonour of his holy name. In which his eſpe-ciall choice wee are to conſider how much hee hath beloued vs: and for the ſame to praiſe his infinite goodneſſe and mercie. Three ſuch commodities hath God thereby euen this day propounded vnto vs, if we will be the ſame men we haue beene in times paſt, as that the leaſt thereof were ſufficient to encourage men of worth, for the ſame to lay downe their liues, held they them neuer ſo deare. Firſt, you are to fight for the health and welfare of your children, wiues, and countrey, ioyned with your whole eſtate: then, for eternall glorie and renowne in this world: and laſt of all, for immortalitie and a crowne that ſhall neuer be taken from you, in the world to come. How many miſeries and calamities we haue in former times, and of late receiued from the Turks, would to God you had rather heard thereof by report, F than ſeene the ſame with your eyes, and indured them in your ſelues. You had long ſince beene bereft of your beloued wiues and children, whome moſt miſerable ſeruitude had ouerwhelmed; you had had neither houſe nor Church, wherein to dwell or to ſerue God, had not the diuine power of God, and your rare proweſſe beene at hand for preſent reſcue: your countrey, your goods, your honour, your liberty, you could could not haue kept, had not your valour confirmed by an assured confidence in the highest, preserued all C these things vnto your selues: The horrible furie of the Turke had now brought all these things into the power of his sword, had they not beene by your armes defended, and hee by so many bloudie ouerthrowes repressed. He could not before be staied; the Grecians, the Macedonians (both sometimes the greatest commanders) the old Thracians, the strong Bulgarians, the valiant Epirots, & Dalmatians, could not abide their force: The Athenians, the Thebans, the Lacedemonians, authors & maisters of the antient disciplin of warre, willingly gaue place vnto these. Vnto vs, is the praise and great glorie of this victorie by God assigned, who often times with a small power, yea and that sometime against all hope, haue with a notable slaughter ouerthrowne them, vanquished them, and put them to flight. Neither is there any men in the world whom they more feare and stand in dread of, than you, whom though in number but few, they haue H by their daily slaughter and losses, learned no lesse to feare, than if you were many. And now to trie the vttermost of their power, they are come with their innumerable legions: but are not for that of you any thing the more to bee feared than before: seeing that wee all beare armes vnder the conduct of the most mightie God; and are by daily victorie, long experience, and approoued valour taught, what wee are to dare: besides that the greatest part of their armie is of common soldiers, slaues, or rude countrey pesants, or men by force by them compelled; more than the Ianizaries, are no good soldiers among them, the rest as men enforced, serue them for feare, and against their wils, and they by their cowardise brought into that bondage and slauerie. What Greekes, Macedonians, or Sclauonians soeuer are sent to their aid, for asmuch as they are not yet reuolted from the Christian faith, deeme them not to stand for them, but for vs: they long for vs the reuengers of their wrongs, and for you as victorious conquerors: in this warre they haue giuen vnto the Turks their names, but vnto vs their hearts and power; and pray heartily for I our victorie: wherefore you ought so much the more valiantly and courageously to fight, by how much greater you see the victory, the honor, the prey before your eyes. We are not to fight for other mens houses and altars, but for our owne: so our present necessity requireth, in such sort, that if we our selues deliuer not our selues, and beare our selues vpon our wonted hope and valour, we shall this day be enforced to endure the greatest misorie that men may possibly. First, the losse of our goods and substance, the captiuity of our children, the defloured of our daughters, the rauishing of our wiues, the slaughter of our parents, the burning of our houses and churches; and that which worse is than all this, the scorne of our Sauiour Christ Iesus, and his Saints; whose images you shall see in despight broken, or dragged in the durt, or moulten and conuerted into other prophane vses; all Religion trodden downe, and God himselfe (if it were possible) with violence and despaire driuen out of our hearts, if we stand not manfully vnto it as be- K commeth worthie champions. God is able with his little finger if he so will, forthwith, to destroy all the Turks in the world; but seeing he hath committed vnto our right hands the defence of his name, he first maketh proofe of our courage and valour, that finding the same faithfull and readie, he may strengthen and defend it with his owne right hand. He neuer yet forsooke any faithfull or deuout man, neither wil our Sauiour Christ be wanting vnto you, if you be not wanting to your selues: in the power of his name which is aboue al names, he shal tread down his rebellious enemies, and exalt the righteous that put their trust in him. Moreouer, the causes that they and we combat for, are diuers, and our hopes much stronger: They fight for their Prophet, a most prophane man, author of all impietie, for spoile and prey, for the destruction of nations & countries, for other mens kingdoms, for the inlarging of their dominions, and territories, for worldly praise and glorie: But wee contrariwise beare armes for the Sauior of the world, for L our faith and religion, for the Christian common wealth, for our native countrey, for our wiues and children, for our fortune and state; than which nothing can be more excellent, more commendable, or honorable. What reward is laid vp for them in heauen which haue worthily protected or deliuered their countrey, or laid downe their liues in defence of their faith and religion? Neither, hauing often proued, are we ignorant, that God wil neuer forsake them that honor, feare, and serue him. Wherby (fellow soldiers) you may plainly perceiue, how far your hopes are beyond theirs. Beleeue our Sauior promising vnto you an eternal reward: and shew your fidelitie and valor vnto God and your countrey together. Wherefore, seeing without the power of God we can do nothing, before the signal of battel be giuen, I beseech you collonels, captains, and lieutenants, by your effectuall & Christian exhortations in your regiments & companies, to encourage your soldiers, valiantly to fight the Lords battel; & for the present, euery man by ta- M king a little earth in his mouth, to prepare himself according to the necessitie of the time, as it were to the receiuing of the Lords Supper: so hauing cleansed your soules, embrace you one another, plight your mutual faith with your right hand & a kisse; & make a perpetual couenant among your selues, none of you to forsake one another in this holy battel, but for your religion & country valiantly to fight it out, euen to

the

A the last man. And a little refreshing your selues with a short repast as you stand, vpon the signall giuen, thrice calling aloud vpon the mightie name of Christ Iesus, fight with the like valour and courage so neere as you can, that he in the agonie of death fought for your redemption and libertie: which that you wil willingly do, I request and charge you this for our Sauiors sake, for the loue of our country, & for the faith you owe both to God and man. I also pray and beseech you, so to fight, as men resolued either to gaine a most glorious victorie, (whereof I doubt not) or else if it should otherwise chance, this day to purchase vnto your selues a blessed life in the kingdome of heauen: not to sup in hel with the Turkes, but with the blessed wights in heauen: for Christ Iesus our Sauiour will be alwaies present with vs, who (beleeue me, and so hope) wil this day not only deliuer vs out of the hands of the Turks, but to our immortal glory lode vs with the rich spoiles of our enemies, and so in safetie bring al home again with much ioy & triumph.

B The Bassa on the other side likewise encouraged his soldiers, putting them in remembrance of their former victories, exhorting them not to degenerat from their worthie ancestors and themselues, by whose great valor the glory and empire of the Turks had bin so mightily increased; and vnto whom their great prophet Mahomet, the interpreter of the gods, had foretold the empire of the whole world to be by al the gods allotted; & had by diuine inspiration propheeied, that antient and stately nation in time to become the terror of the world, the scourge of the wicked, and commander of all nations. He farther declared vnto them, what an increase of kingdomes they had got in that short time, since which they first passed ouer into Europe: and filled them with the hope of a great spoile; promising vnto them that should in the battell valiantly behaue themselues, not onely the spoile and prey, but whole villages, C towns, and cities, and other great preferments, according as they should deserue. As for the victorie, considering the weake power of their enemies, and the great number of themselues, he assured them thereof, if they would but a while valiantly fight it out like men. In conclusion, he told them, that hauing ouercome Huniades (whom only, as he confessed, he had found to be the most valiant and skilfull captaine of the Christians) nothing should afterward be able to stand in their way, or to hinder their further conquests: and that if this day they should vtterly ouerthrow him, they should gain the most honorable victorie that was euer yet got in Europe. Wherefore he willed them aboue all things, in the battell to seeke after him; promising vnto him that should kill him, a great reward, with most honourable preferments. Hauing thus D sufficiently, as he thought, encouraged his Turks, he set forward with his armie in order of battell. His horsmen and footmen he diuided into two great wings, betwixt which marched the Ianizaries in a square battell, all men of approued valour: after whom followed the rereward: vnto the wings he had also ioyned certaine loose companies of light horsemen to begin the battell, and to flie about the enemies, and so as occasion should serue, either to charge or retire. Huniades likewise had placed in both wings two square battalions of men at armes, and with them certaine horsemen with crosse bowes: before these wings he had also placed certaine troupes of light horsemen, to encounter the enemies: in the midst stood two square battels of men at armes: and betwixt them a strong squadron of armed men, guarded behind with a conuenient number of pikemen and archers: both the wings hee had compassed E about with a multitude of carts and waggons, and they also well manned. So marching forward, and both armies being come within a quarter of a mile together, the signall of battell was on both sides giuen, and the battell begun. Huniades seeing the multitude of his enemies, cast his first battel into the forme of a wedge, the more easily to diuide them: and they on the other side in form of a paire of sheeres, were readie to receiue him: where on both sides they encountred together with such furie and outerie, as neuer was thing more terrible to be heard or seen. The Turks trusting vnto the multitude of their nimble light horsemen, first with their light staues, and afterward with their crooked Scimaters fiercely assailed the Christians light horsemen, in which first incounter many fell on both sides. But the wedge battel of the Christians could not of the Turks be broken, as consisting all of valiant expert souldiers, and they also strongly armed; who, doe the Turks what they could, with a great slaughter cut their armie in sunder, but not without a great fight, and some losse also vnto themselues. In the wings F also the light horsemen for a while fought couragiously and with like hope: but the Turkes with that kind of fight better acquainted than the Christians, & better appointed for that purpose, and exceeding in number also, put the Christian light horsemen to the worst, and enforced

ced them to retire to the men at armes. Here began the fortune of the Turkes to ſtay, where both parts deſperatly aſſailing the one the other, was made a moſt terrible fight, wherein moſt G part of the Turks light horſemen were ſlain: for why, they were not able to abide the force of the men at arms, although in compariſon of them, but few; but were with their lances and armed ſwords ouerthrowne and ſlain, no otherwiſe than if they had bin naked men: ſo that in both wings the Turks began now to faint. But the battell in both the wings yet wauering, and the victory donbtful, in the maine battaile was fought a moſt cruell fight: the Ianizaries with a ſtrong power of men at arms, & certain troups of light horſmen, compaſſed about the men at armes that ſtood (as wee ſaid) in the maine battel of the Chriſtians, were the old Ianizaries with their crooked Scimitaries, with great courage cut in ſunder the legs of the horſes of the men at arms; of whom many fel down, & lying along vpon the ground, were made ſhorter by H the head: as likewiſe on the other ſide, the Ianizaries whileſt they ſeek the deſtruction of the men at arms, were themſelues ouerborn & troden vnder foot. Wherupon ſuch a ſlaughter was made, that the bloud ran like riuers, whileſt they deſperatly fight with furious rage both on the one ſide & the other. In this cruel fight moſt part of the Ianizaries were ſlain, and many of the Chriſtian men at arms alſo. The Baſſa now perceiuing the Hungarians to haue the better, both in the wings and in the main battell, & yet in hope that with long fight they would faint (although he ſaw great ſlaughter of his men in euery place) came on with the rereward, & a number of other freſh ſoldiers which he had left for the guarding of his baggage, al yet ſound men, in good hope ſo to ouerwhelme the wearied Hungarians. It was now foure houres that this cruell fight had endured, when as the Baſſa beganne it afreſh: neither was this by him I don without reaſon; for why, he was afraid leſt if his men ſhould turn their backs and flie, the whole armie ſhould follow after: and therefore to make vſe of all the men he had, he brought on his rereward, in hope that his enemies, now ſpent with long fight, would not longer endure a freſh charge. And the more to encourage his men, he commanded them to compaſſe in the Hungarians round, and to diſpatch their wearied enemies, vainly boaſting, That it would be the laſt battel that euer the Hungarians would fight. On the other ſide, Hunaides perceiuing the enemies purpoſe, ſuffered his men to be in part enuironed, and by and by cauſed the waggoners with the armed carts & waggons to thruſt in behind them, and ſo to compaſſe them in, diuided in part from the reſt, & afterward with freſh ſupplies renewed the battel with the enemy. The fight was great, and in euery place right terrible: and albeit that the ſlaughter of the K Turkes was in many places great, yet by reaſon of their multitude they felt it not much, but fought yet ſtill moſt deſperatly: vntil that they in the right wing ſeeing themſelues compaſſed in behind with the waggons, & ſo from them charged with ſhot, darts, & other ſuch miſſiue weapons, ſtanding in doubt which way to turn themſelues, & beſet with danger on euery ſide, began to faint, and fearing the danger behind them, ſhrunke from the fight. On the other ſide, the Hungarians, now in good hope of victorie, with great & cheerful outcries, as men inſpired with freſh ſpirits, more furiouſly aſſailed their fainting enemies afront, than before; encouraging them alſo that aſſailed them behind in the waggons, to approch them neerer: with which double danger the turks hardly beſet, fought diſorderly, & doubting to be all incloſed The Turks flie. round, firſt retired, & preſently after betooke themſelues to plain flight. But they which were L already ſhut in betwixt the waggons & them that fought before them, periſhed euery mothers ſon. They which fought in the left wing alſo, diſcouraged with the flight of their fellows, fled likewiſe: after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed. The Baſſa himſelfe ſeeing both the wings of his battel put to flight, & his own battel ſore broken alſo, ſtruken with deſpaire fled, with certain companies of the Ianizaries, which he had ſtil kept about him againſt all euents, for the ſafegard of his perſon: after whom followed alſo ſo many other of the Turks as could; the reſt diſperſedly flying thorow the woods, foreſts, & mountains, either there periſhed with hunger, or falling into the hands of the Valachians, were by them ſlaine. Of ſo great an armie as the Baſſa brought into Tranſiluania, ſcarce the one halfe returned again ouer Danubius. It is reported by ſome that were in that battell, that if Hunaides hauing them in chace, had purſued M them to Danubius, ſcarcely one of them had eſcaped ouer the riuer. But he contented with ſo great a victory, & to haue driuen his enemies out of the field, purſued them not far: but entring into their camp, with the ſpoile therof greatly inricht both himſelf & his ſoldiers. Beſide the great multitude of the Turks here ſlain, 5000 more were taken priſoners, & 100 of their enſignes.

A ſignes. Long it were to rehearſe and reckon vp the rich ſpoile there taken, the guilt armor, and goodly furniture, both of men and horſes, beſide the rich pauilions and tents there ſtanding. In briefe, the wealth there found, was ſo great, as that there was no man in Huniades armie, which was not thereby for euer inriched. Huniades for this ſo great a victory, & for his country, deliuered from ſo great a feare, cauſed general praiers with thankſgiuing, for the ſpace of three dayes, to be made in all churches of thoſe three prouinces, vnto whom that danger was threatned; and at Vaſcape, where the battel was fought, hanged vp certaine of the Turkes enſignes, as trophies of the victorie there gotten. This was the famous battle of Vaſcape, wherein Huniades got the greateſt victory that euer any Chriſtian Prince before that time obtained againſt the Turkiſh Kings. The fields thereabouts lay couered with the dead bodies of the B ſlain Turks, whoſe carrion carkaſſes ſo infected the aire, that many of the better ſort of the inhabitants of the country were glad for a ſeaſon to leaue their dwellings, & to get them further off, for feare of infection. Afterwards he in great triumph came to Buda, & there preſented to King Vladiſlaus the enemies enſignes, with ſuch a part of the ſpoile, as might both wel declare the greatneſſe of the victorie, and beſeeme the greatneſſe of ſo great a Prince; which the king thankefully receiued, highly commending his great valour, the fame whereof had in ſhort time filled euery corner of Europe.

Amurath, a little before this great ouerthrow of his army in Tranſyltania, aſſuring himſelf of the victory, had ſent a proud embaſſage to King Vladiſlaus into Hungarie, offring him peace vpon condition, That he ſhould deliuer vnto him the ſtrong city of Belgrade, or elſe yeeld to C pay him a yerely tribute: to which, vpon the firſt report of the victorie, anſwer was giuen by the king, anſwerable to the proud demand, That according to the iſſue of matters in Tranſiluania, he would ſhortly in perſon himſelfe come & giue him farther anſwer. With which ſhort anſwer, the proud embaſſadours were diſmiſſed and gone, a little before the comming of Huniades to Buda.

How much this late ouerthrow grieued the great king Amurath, Vladiſlaus was not ignorant; either of his power and deſire of reuenge, as ſufficiently warned thereof by the worthie Huniades: for the withſtanding wherof, he thought it good not to be vnprouided. Wherfore calling together the ſtates of his kingdome, and with them Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angel, the Popes Legat; at ſuch time as they were all aſſembled, he propounded vnto them the great-D neſſe of the danger threatned by the angrie Turke, leauing vnto their graue conſideration, to determine how the ſame were by ſtrong hand and plaine force, or otherwiſe to be auerted. In which moſt honorably aſſemblie, Iulian the Cardinall, of purpoſe ſent thither by Pope Vrban to ſtir vp the Hungarians againſt the Turks, being requeſted by the King to deliuer his opinion firſt, ſpake vnto them as followeth:

The effectuall ſpeech of Iulian the Popes Legat in the parlament to perſuade the war.

Since the time that the Turkiſh peſtilence began to rage in Europe, no newes was euer more welcome vnto the great Biſhop, vnto the Apoſtolicall Senate, and other Princes of Italie (moſt mightie King, and you other moſt worthie Princes) than when it was told them, That Vladiſlaus, King of Polonia was by you alſo choſen King of Hungarie. For a fitter gouernour of the Hungarian ſtate, and E leader of their power, could not the Hungarians any where haue found: As he in whome Iuſtice, religion, wiſedome, valour, and martiall skill, doth ſo abound, that he ſeemeth rather for the good of this kingdome by God ſent from heauen, than here in earth choſen by men. By this happie & fortunat choice, the minds alſo of all the Italians, which before lay heauie and diſcouraged, were lightned and reuiued: and therefore that this choice might be vnto the Chriſtian common-weale both glorious and fortunate, they made their ſolemne vowes and praiers. At ſuch time as the moſt holy Senate vnderſtood of the ciuill diſcord of this kingdome, and the danger of the Turks faſt by, it ſent mee hither to deale with you for the appeaſing of thoſe troubles, and repreſſing of that miſchiefe (as you haue oftentimes heard mee ſay.) The kingdome is by your force and valour, by my mediation, and the death of the Queene, wel paciſied: but yet the other remaineth full of honour, full of profit, full of ſafetie, glorie, and immortalitie, beſt fitting Vladiſlaus conduct and fortune, and the valour of the Hungarians. The Turkiſh tyF rannie and their proud command (worthie Princes) is to bee repreſſed: yea their ſeruile yoke, hanging euen now ouer our necks, is to be ſhaken off, and to be driuen away. What you are to dare to doe, the valour and fortune of Huniades foretelleth you: the fortune ſaid I of Huniades, nay the fortune of the Chriſtian common-weale, and preſent mercie of our bleſſed Sauiour, which ſuffereth his people to be vp and downe toſſed, but not quite drowned. If ſo great an armie of the enemies was vanquiſhed and put the Chriſtian men at arms alſo. The Baſſa now perceiuing the Hungarians to haue the better, both in the wings and in the main battell, & yet in hope that with long fight they would faint (although he ſaw great ſlaughter of his men in euery place) came on with the rereward, & a number of other freſh ſoldiers which he had left for the guarding of his baggage, al yet ſound men, in good hope ſo to ouerwhelme the wearied Hungarians. It was now foure houres that this cruell fight had endured, when as the Baſſa beganne it afreſh: neither was this by him I don without reaſon; for why, he was afraid leſt if his men ſhould turn their backs and flie, the whole armie ſhould follow after: and therefore to make vſe of all the men he had, he brought on his rereward, in hope that his enemies, now ſpent with long fight, would not longer endure a freſh charge. And the more to encourage his men, he commanded them to compaſſe in the Hungarians round, and to diſpatch their wearied enemies, vainly boaſting, That it would be the laſt battel that euer the Hungarians would fight. On the other ſide, Hunaides perceiuing the enemies purpoſe, ſuffered his men to be in part enuironed, and by and by cauſed the waggoners with the armed carts & waggons to thruſt in behind them, and ſo to compaſſe them in, diuided in part from the reſt, & afterward with freſh ſupplies renewed the battel with the enemy. The fight was great, and in euery place right terrible: and albeit that the ſlaughter of the K Turkes was in many places great, yet by reaſon of their multitude they felt it not much, but fought yet ſtill moſt deſperatly: vntil that they in the right wing ſeeing themſelues compaſſed in behind with the waggons, & ſo from them charged with ſhot, darts, & other ſuch miſ-ſiue weapons; ſtanding in doubt which way to turn themſelues, & beſet with danger on euery ſide, began to faint, and fearing the danger behind them, ſhrunke from the fight. On the other ſide, the Hungarians, now in good hope of victorie, with great & cheerful outcries, as men inſpired with freſh ſpirits, more furiouſly aſſailed their fainting enemies afront, than before; encouraging them alſo that aſſailed them behind in the waggons, to approch them neerer: with which double danger the turks hardly beſet, fought diſorderly, & doubting to be all incloſed The Turks flie. round, firſt retired, & preſently after betooke themſelues to plain flight. But they which were L already ſhut in betwixt the waggons & them that fought before them, periſhed euery mothers ſon. They which fought in the left wing alſo, diſcouraged with the flight of their fellows, fled likewiſe: after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed. The Baſſa himſelfe ſeeing both the wings of his battel put to flight, & his own battel ſore broken alſo, ſtruken with deſpaire fled, with certain companies of the Ianizaries, which he had ſtil kept about him againſt all euents, for the ſafegard of his perſon: after whom followed alſo ſo many other of the Turks as could;

the reſt diſperſedly flying thorow the woods, foreſts, & mountains, either there periſhed with hunger, or falling into the hands of the Valachians, were by them ſlaine. Of ſo great an armie as the Baſſa brought into Tranſiluania, ſcarce the one halfe returned again ouer Danubius. It is reported by ſome that were in that battell, that if Hunaides hauing them in chace, had purſued M them to Danubius, ſcarcely one of them had eſcaped ouer the riuer. But he contented with ſo great a victory, & to haue driuen his enemies out of the field, purſued them not far: but entring into their camp, with the ſpoile therof greatly inricht both himſelf & his ſoldiers. Beſide the great multitude of the Turks here ſlain, 5000 more were taken priſoners, & 100 of their en-ſignes.

A ſignes. Long it were to rehearſe and reckon vp the rich ſpoile there taken, the guilt armor, and goodly furniture, both of men and horſes, beſide the rich pauilions and tents there ſtanding.
In briefe, the wealth there found, was ſo great, as that there was no man in Huniades armie, which was not thereby for euer inriched. Huniades for this ſo great a victory, & for his country, deliuered from ſo great a feare, cauſed general praiers with thankſgiuing, for the ſpace of three dayes, to be made in all churches of thoſe three prouinces, vnto whom that danger was threatned; and at Vaſcape, where the battel was fought, hanged vp certaine of the Turkes en-ſignes, as trophies of the victorie there gotten. This was the famous battle of Vaſcape, wherein Huniades got the greateſt victory that euer any Chriſtian Prince before that time obtained againſt the Turkiſh Kings. The fields thereabours lay couered with the dead bodies of the ■ ſlain Turks, whoſe carrion carkaſſes ſo infected the aire, that many of the better ſort of the inhabitants of the country were glad for a ſeaſon to leaue their dwellings, & to get them further off, for feare of infection. Afterwards he in great triumph came to Buda, & there preſented to King Vladiſlaus the enemies enſignes, with ſuch a part of the ſpoile, as might both wel declare the greatneſſe of the victorie, and beſeeme the greatneſſe of ſo great a Prince; which the king thankefully receiued, highly commending his great valour, the fame whereof had in ſhort time filled euery corner of Europe.

Amurath, a little before this great ouerthrow of his army in Tranſyltuania, aſſuring himſelf of the victory, had ſent a proud embaſſage to King Vladiſlaus into Hungarie, offring him peace vpon condition, That he ſhould deliuer vnto him the ſtrong city of Belgrade, or elſe yeeld to C pay him a yerely tribute: to which, vpon the firſt report of the victorie, anſwer was giuen by the king, anſwerable to the proud demand, That according to the iſſue of matters in Tranſiluania, he would ſhortly in perſon himſelfe come & giue him farther anſwer. With which ſhort anſwer, the proud embaſſadours were diſmiſſed and gone, a little before the comming of Huniades to Buda.

How much this late ouerthrow grieued the great king Amurath, Vladiſlaus was not ignorant; either of his power and deſire of reuenge, as ſufficiently warned thereof by the worthie Hunides: for the withſtanding wherof, he thought it good not to be vnprouided. Wherfore, calling together the ſtates of his kingdome, and with them Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angel, the Popes Legat; at ſuch time as they were all aſſembled, he propounded vnto them the great-D neſſe of the danger threatned by the angrie Turke, leauing vnto their graue conſideration, to determine how the ſame were by ſtrong hand and plaine force, or otherwiſe to be auerted. In which moſt honorably aſſemblie, Iulian the Cardinall, of purpoſe ſent thither by Pope Vrban to ſtir vp the Hungarians againſt the Turks, being requeſted by the King to deliuer his opinion firſt, ſpake vnto them as followeth:

The effectuall ſpeech of Iulian the Popes Legat in the parla-ment to perſuade the war.

Since the time that the Turkiſh peſtilence began to rage in Europe, no newes was euer more welcome vnto the great Biſhop, vnto the Apoſtolicall Senate, and other Princes of Italie (moſt mightie King, and you other moſt worthie Princes) than when it was told them, That Vladiſlaus, King of Polonia was by you alſo choſen King of Hungarie. For a fitter gouernour of the Hungarian ſtate, and leader of their power, could not the Hungarians any where haue found: As he in whome Iuſtice, re- E ligion, wiſedome, valour, and martiall skill, doth ſo abound, that he ſeemeth rather for the good of this kingdome by God ſent from heauen, than here in earth choſen by men. By this happie & fortunat choice, the minds alſo of all the Italians, which before lay beaute and diſcouraged, were lightned and reuiued: and therefore that this choice might be vnto the Chriſtian common-weale both glorious and fortunate, they made their ſolemne vowes and praiers. At ſuch time as the moſt holy Senate vnderſtood of the ciuill diſcord of this kingdome, and the danger of the Turks faſt by, it ſent mee hither to deale with you for the appeaſing of thoſe troubles, and repreſſing of that miſchiefe (as you haue oftentimes heard mee ſay.) The kingdome is by your force and valour, by my mediation, and the death of the Queene, wel pa-ciſied: but yet the other remaineth full of honour, full of profit, full of ſafetie, glorie, and immortali-tie, beſt fitting Vladiſlaus conduct and fortune, and the valour of the Hungarians. The Turkiſh ty- F rannie and their proud command (worthie Princes) is to bee repreſſed: yea their ſeruile yoke, hanging euen now ouer our necks, is to be ſhaken off, and to be driuen away. What you are to dare to doe, the valour and fortune of Huniades foretelleth you: the fortune ſaid I of Huniades, nay the fortune of the Chriſtian common-weale, and preſent mercie of our bleſſed Sauiour, which ſuffereth his people to be vp and downe toſſed, but not quite drowned. If ſo great an armie of the enemies was vanquiſhed and put

to

to flight by the power of one of thy captaines, and that but small: what is to be hoped of thee (most mightie King) if thou shalt lead forth thine armies thy selfe in person, vnder thine owne conduct, and the protection of Christ Iesus? The eyes of all Christian Princes are cast vpon thee, vpon the Hungarian and Polonian forces; vpon thee haue they repосed all their hopes, they all expect that thou shoulast be the reuenger of the Barbarian crueltie, the defender of the faith, and protector of Europe: and that is it, for which the Pope doth with his letters daily solicite and importune you. And albeit, that the common cause and quarrell of the Christian religion require it, yet doth the necessitie of Hungarie and Polonia no lesse enforce it: of which, the one is most miserably and daily vexed with the Turks forces and furie out of Seruia and Dalmatia; and the other out of Moldauia and Valachia. Now if any there be, whom neither the zeale of religion, the necessitie of the cause, the hope of immortall fame and glorie, can moue, let their owne safetie, the present seruitude of their wiues and children, the safegard of their wealth and substance, the lawfull reuenge of the wrongs don them, stir them vp to take in hand this sacred expedition. So fit an opportunitie is now giuen vnto you, that at one and the selfesame time you may set your bodies in perpetuall safetie and happinesse; your soules in quietnesse and rest, and vnto both giue eternall glory and happinesse. You lacke not (worthy captaines) money, the sinewes of the warre, which shall be brought vnto you from all parts of the Christian common-wealth, not iustice and couragious souldiers; not power, not fortune, not the propitious heauenly powers, which haue made choice of you for the defence of the true faith and religion: you want nothing (worthie Princes) but Will. It is an expedition necessarie, religious, profitable, and honourable: wherein are propounded most ample rewards both in this life, and in the life to come. Wherefore (most mightie Prince, and your right worthy Princes all) I pray and beseech you by the faith of Christ Iesus by the loue of your children, by the health of your kingdome, and deliuerance from your present destruction, with valiant courage & one consent to take this sacred war in hand, and so thereby to enroll your names in the eternall booke of Fame. And sith that you are to goe, not so much to a worldly as a spirituall warre, against the enemies of Christ and his truth, take vp your armes with such zeale, courage, and cheerfulnesse, as the expectation and hope of men, as your valor, the present danger, and the mercies of God towards you, seeme of right to require.

The pitifull complaint of the Despot, of the crueltie of the Turks, perswading the Hungarians to take the war against them in hand.

The Legate hauing made an end, forthwith ensued the miserable supplication and teares of the Despot; perswadiug them, of the necessitie of that expedition to be taken in hand, declaring vnto them the crueltie of the Turks, their torments and strange tortures, his sonnes depriued of their sight, and spoiled of their genitories, many halfe mangled, and moe cut in sunder with sawes; some slaine quicke, and others buried aliue, with many other strange kindes of death, such as would abhorre any Christian eares to heare. And warning the Hungarians, by his example to beware how much they had need to looke to themselues, told them, That they were but by the riuer Savus diuided from the Turks; which in summer was oftentimes to be waded ouer, and in Winter hard frozen, & so to be passed: that the country beyond Danubius lay all open vpon them; and that hee, sometime the rich King of Seruia, was now driuen into exile by the power of the Turke, depriued of his kingdom, of his children, shamefully disgraced, spoiled of his wealth and fortune, glad to flie from place to place, and yet not able to finde any safe place to rest in. First he fled (as hee said) to Ragusium, where by and by he was sought after, and endangered by the Turks: then into Hungarie, which was also forthwith by them on euery side infested: and whereof the Barbarian King now asked tribute, to haue some colour for the inuasion thereof: which dreadfull enemy was not farre off from it, but still houered euen ouer it: as well witnessed Valachia and Transyluania, two of the greatest and richest prouinces of the Hungarian kingdome: which had not the valour of Huniades, the fortune of the common-weale, and aboue all, the mercy of God, deliuered out of the hands of this filthie Nation, the state of Hungarie had now beene vtterly forlorne. The euents of warre (hee said) were diuers, fortune vncertaine, and that God would not euery day bee tempted. Wherefore with many teares abundantly running downe his aged face, he besought King Vladislaus and the rest, not to let slip this faire occasion, neither by cowardise or negligence to breake off the course of their good fortune and victorie: but to make choice rather to become reuengers of other mens harmes, than of their owne, and to satisfie the good opinion the world had conceiued of them. He was (as he said) a sufficient example to al men. Besides that, he offered a great summe of money himselfe towards the defraying of the charges of the war, assuring them also of great supplies both of men and mony from diuers other Christian

Christian Princes. Which opinion of the Legat and Despots being generally liked & approued, a decree was made by a whole court of Parlament there assembled, That the king should himselfe in person, with al speed possible entertain that honorable war. So that though it were now vpon the approch of winter, yet were men taken vp in euery place, and embassadors sent vnto the Emperour and the other neighbour Princes, to pray of them aid against the common enemie. Who for the most part excused themselues by their own particular affaires, but sent no aid at all. Neuertheless many deuout Christians both out of France and Germanie, for the zeale they bare vnto Christ and the Christian religion, forsaking wife and children, and whatsoeuer they had else, came and worthily serued vpon their owne charge. The Spring being come, and supplications made in all places, for the prosperous successe of this religious war, King Vladislaus the first of May set forward from Buda; where passing the riuer Danubius, and marching faire and softly, & comming to the riuer Tibiscus, he there stayed three days for the comming of his armie. Departing thence, and marching on alongst the side of Danubius, vntil he came within the sight of Bulgaria, he there at a place called Cobis, ouer against Sinderouia, passed ouer Danubius with his army, which was now grown very great: and so marched directly to Sophia, scituate about six dayes march from Danubius, in the frontiers of Bulgaria, so called of a most sumptuous and magnificent temple there built by Iustinian the great emperor. Which citie being then old and ruinous, & but badly fortified, was easily taken; and afterward for that it was not well to be holden, was by the Kings commandement burnt, as were all the other country towns and villages thereabouts, to the terror of the rest. Marching thence, he came vnto the riuer Moraua, and there incamped: where the plain country easily riseth & falleth in manner of the sea, when it is moued with a little wind. Here 500 horsemen being sent ouer the riuer, not so much to seeke after prey, as to view the countrey, which way the armie might most safely and easily passe, hapned vpon the Turks scouts, of whom they tooke foure: and vnderstanding by them, that 2000 of the Turks were comming at hand, knowing themselues too weake to encounter them, they retyred backe again with all speed they could, vnto the riuer; where many of them for feare leapt headlong from the high and broken banks, and so perished in the deepe; the rest terrified with the misfortune of their fellowes, stood still, doubtfully expecting what should become of themselues. Beyond the riuer was another hil, vpon the top whereof the King with a great number of horsemen were hunting: whome the Turks a far off descrying, and doubtful to fall into some ambush, of purpose layd for them betwixt them & the riuer, without comming on further, retyred. Which they that before feare-fully stayd on the further side of the riuer, perceiuing, and now encouraged by the comming of the King downe to the riuer, followed a while after, so to increase their feare; and so hauing well feared one another, retired on both sides worse affraid than hurt. The next day the King passed ouer the riuer, sending out his scouts to see if all were cleere before him: by whom he was aduertised, that the Turks were at hand, hauing placed certain ambushes fast by, expecting but a fit time to set vpon him. Whereupon entring into councell with his best and most expert captains, what were best to be done, it was resolued vpon, That Huniades the next night with 10000 choice horsemen, should vpon the sudden set vpon the enemie, then fearing nothing lesse. Who conducted by the espials, was in the first watch of the night brought verie neere vnto them. The Moone by chance, as fauouring his great attempt, did then shine out, so that he might wil discerne how the enemie lay incamped, & which way for to charge them for his best aduantage; which was by the same way they were most like to flie, if they should be put to the worst: vnto which place he led his men, and there with a most hideous outcrie entred the campe, as then for the most part buried in sleepe and securitie: when as the Turks awaked with the sudden noyse, as it were out of a dead sleepe, and dismayed with the horror of the crie, began to betake them some to their weapons, some to their heeles. Of whom such as fled, lighting vpon the enemies troups standing in their way, ranne as fast backe again: the other scarce yet well awake, and ouercome with feare, & now scarcely themselues, had much adoo to make themselues readie to fight. Huniades in the mean time riding vp and downe amongst his men, cheered them vp, still crying out and calling vpon them, courageously to assaile their sleepie, naked, and fearefull enemies, and not to let slip so faire an occasion, and so notable a victorie now alreadie in their hands. At the first encounter the Turkes rather made a stirre, than fought; but after that they heard that Huniades was there, as men dismayed maied with his name, they turned their backs and fled, finding, which way soeuer they tooke, G their fellows halfe dead or wounded: yea, such a confusion was raised amongst them with the greatnesse of the sudden feare, that thrusting together, with an inconsiderate desire of flight, they trod one another vnder foot, & thrust themselues one vpon anothers weapons: the greatest part of them driuen headlong into the thickets and other straits, & not able in time to get out thence, were there by the victorious enemie, fiercely pursuing of them, slain. All that night the fearefull Turks were with great slaughter held in chace: but as soon as it was day, the rest that remained of them, ran also the same fortune with their fellowes. A far greater slaughter was there made, than a man would thinke that so few men could haue made, when as but with 10000 horse, 30000 Turks were in one night slain, and 4000 taken, with a number of their en-signes. Of Huniades his men were not many lost, for the greatnesse of the slaughter: most re- H port not aboue 500, for few of them found any enemie to resist them. There was taken all the spoile of a most rich campe, the enemie hauing carried with them nothing out of it. Huniades hauing in so short time gained so notable a victorie, and inriched his army, returned to the king in great triumph: neither was that day more joyfull vnto these victorious souldiers, than vnto the rest of the armie, who most joyfully expected their returne. The King and the Despot hearing of the approch of Huniades from the slaughter of the Turks, with the great applause and joyful acclamation of the other legions, went to meet him three miles: and at such time as at The meeting of Vladislaus and Huniades after the victorie. their first meeting Huniades was about to haue lighted to haue done him honour, he would in no case suffer him so to do, but taking him by the right hand, joyed with him for the victory, thanking God in the hearing of the whole armie, that he of his mercie had giuen him such a I Captaine, as, without enuie, in all mens iudgments was worthie to rule the Roman empire. In briefe, he shewed how much his country, his kingdome, yea the Christian commonweale, was bound and indebted vnto him, gaue him his due praises, exhorting all others to imitate his glorie: the like honour did also all the rest of the nobilitie vnto him. As for the common soldiers, they could not be satisfied with beholding of him, but imbracing one another, as if they would haue died one in anothers arms, welcommed their victorious friends. So with joy joyning their forces together, & sending the rich spoile of the enemy, with the prisoners chained together in long ranks before them; the King and Huniades in great triumph returned into the campe, where they caused generall prayers, with thanksgiuing vnto almighty God for so great a victorie, to be made thorowout the armie. K

The Legat Iulian, Generall of the voluntarie Christians, which for deuotion sake serued of their own charge, after so great a victorie most earnestly perswaded the King and the rest of the great commanders of the armie, to prosecute their good fortune, and in God his so great fauor not to loiter, but daily to march forward, and to take in the rest of Bulgaria. Now had Hu- niades by his espials learned, that from Sophia it was but three days journey to Philippopolis, a great citie of Thracia; and the like distance from thence to Hadrianople, the chiefe seat of the Turkish tyrant; and as much more to Constantinople. The onely difficultie was, how to passe the great and rough mountain Hemus; which running a maruellous way in length, euen vnto the Euxine sea, and mating almost the skie, diuideth the countries of Bulgaria and Seruia, from Macedonia and Thrace: and for the great height and roughnesse therof, is not to be pas- L sed ouer but in two places; the one made by the great Emperor Traian & the Romans, where as yet is to be seen a mightie strong gate built of great square stone, whereby the passage that way was opened or shut at the pleasure of them that had the keeping thereof: the other neere vnto a little riuer, which the Bulgarians now call Saltiza. By either of these ways, if he should find them open, Huniades, vnto whom the King had committed both the leading and the conduct of the armie, purposed to enter. Wherefore marching forward, they tooke all such towns of Bulgaria as stood in their way; some by force, some by composition: wherein was no small helpe, the conformitie of the Christian religion, the horrible crueltie of the Turks, the great affinitie of language, the most effectuall means to win the loue of strangers: for the Polonians and the Bulgarians both discended of the Sclauonians, and vsing the same language, the Polo- M nian horsemen came to no town, but it presently yeelded. But being come vnto the mountain Hemus, to haue entred into Thracia, the Winter weather being now verie cold; they learned by their espials, that the aforesaid passages were both fast shut vp with great stones, timber, and such other like matter, so strongly, as that they were verie hardly to be forced. Wherfore Hu- niades

A niades leauing the straiter way made by the hand of man (which beside the former fortification at the great gate, the Turks had in many places, with abundance of water poured downe the steep hil in the night, and hard frozen with the coldnesse of the weather, made so slippery, as that it was not possible either for man or beast there to stand, or to get vp that way) vpon Christmas euen came to the other, by which the riuer Saltiza runnes, the which he found likewise shut. Here they met with many inconueniences: first, the difficultie of the passage, which old Amurath had (not without great reason) shut vp, & there placed strong garrisons, so at ease, and without danger of battel (so often by his Bassa's vnfortunatly proued) to defend his kingdome in Macedonia and Thracia, from the inuasion of the Hungarians, who now of all nations he most dreaded. Beside that, in the armie was such want of all things, as that the soldiers were B readie to forsake their ensignes, and to rise vp in a general mutinie: for the country neere vnto the mountain Hemus, riling high, with broken rocks, and inaccessible places, was altogether barren; and victuals failing in the camp, they were glad to liue with a little wheat & flesh boiled together, and that so sparingly, as that the souldiers began now generally to grow weake and faint. Besides that, the Winter was exceeding cold, and the frost so great, that many times they could not go out of their tents to seeke for forrage or water. So that the armie enforced The Hungarians inforced with the difficultie of the passage of the mountaine Hemus, retyre. with hunger and cold, and the difficultie of the passage, began to retire, and had vndoubtedly bin dissolued, had it not bin for the often and earnest persuasions of Huniades: for he daily told them, that the greatest difficulties were past, that that which remained, was with their wonted valour and courage to be indured, whereunto nothing was high or difficult: that they should forthwith come into the borders of Thracia, where they should find plentie of all things: that C they were now come so far, that if they would go back again, they should in those wast countries through which they were to passe, find greater difficulties & dangers, than in going forward: that these straits once opened, remained no more trauell, but cheerefully to fal to the spoile of a most rich and pleasant country. They were not (as he said) to stay in the midst of their fortunes, for that it was not always permanent, and for that the contempt of Gods fauors caused them to be oftentimes taken from vs: al that was yet done (he said) was nothing, if they proceeded not further: for that whatsoeuer they had already woon, was easily by the enemy to be recouered, except that those which yet remained (for that most part of them, as he said, were slain, with their houses burnt ouer their heads) were driuen out of Thracia and Macedonia, and so quite out of Europe. So whilest the soldiers heard Huniades speake, euery man was D wel incouraged; but when they remembred the miseries wherwith they were inuironed, they cursed all the rash attempts of ambitious princes. In the mean time news was brought by the scouts, that the Turks were comming after them: but then began they to rejoyce, as deeming it much more honor, manfully to die in battell, than to starue with hunger and cold. Against these Turks was Huniades sent with certain troups of horsemen: who incountring with them, easily inforced them with losse to retire. Eight times he incountred them (as the soldiers there present reported) & as often put them to flight. In retiring back from the impregnable mountain, the king with the greatest part of the armie went before; after whom followed Huniades and the Despot, a good days march: when the Turks that kept the passage vpon the mountain, vnderstanding of their return, followed them down the hill, in good hope to be of them well E reuenged, before they should get out of Bulgaria. Carambey the Bassa of Romania, & brother to Caly-Bassa (a man of all others in greatest fauor with Amurath, and his brother in law, as hauing married his sister) was General of this army, & by him appointed for the keeping of these straits; with expresse charge, vpon no occasion whatsoeuer, although it made shew of neuer so assured a victorie, to fight with the enemie: for he thought it victorie enough, without any losse to haue kept his enemies out of Thracia. Which the old Kings command, Carambey for all that neglected, in good hope by a notable victory easily to answer the contempt of that he was commanded. The Christian armie descending down the broken mountains, was come to a great mountain, which the Bulgarians call Cunobiza, and part of the mountain Hemus: at F whose heeles followed Carambey, with his Turks, still houering ouer their heads, to take them at some aduantage: whom the Christians beholding, could not by their captains be stayd, but that they would many times by companies flie forth vpon them, and desperately fight with them in places of great aduantage, saying, That they had rather die in fight like men, than to starue with hunger and cold. Here Carambey, being himselfe a man of great courage, and desirous

rous of honor, and by the rashnesse of his enemies allured to fight; and withall, beside the advantage of the ground, perceiuing himselfe to exceed his enemies both in strength & number of men, could not be stayd, but would needs giue battell, with such a desire, as if he had bin alreadie assured of the victorie. Huniades and the Despot had before perceiued, that the Turks, prouoked with the brauing of their men, would assuredly fall vpon them, and were therefore much troubled with the absence of the King, who (as is before said) was gone a days march before they saw they could neither shun battel, neither if they could haue so done, would their desperat souldiers be stayed, for the desire they had to fight. Yet seeing Carambey comming down vpon them, they put themselues (though vnwillingly) in best order they could to receiue him; persuading their soldiers not rashly in furie to run vpon their enemies, as desperate men prodigall of their liues, but to keepe their rankes, and orderly to fight, and so like valiant men to carrie away the victorie, or to leaue vnto their enemies a bloudy remembrance therof.

A great battell betwixt Huniades and the Bassa Carambey.

Now had Carambey sent his horsmen down the hil, and the battel was begun, where both the armies met together with great furie, and a cruel fight was made both at the foot of the hil, and amongst the hils and vallies also: in which hard incounter many were slain, as well on the one side as the other. The Polonian men at arms (whom the king but a little before had left with Huniades against all euents) with the Hungarian light horsemen (of whom the Despot had the leading) fought so that day, as if they had fought for nothing more, but how honourably to die; & the Turks for a space stood hard to it, so that many were there slain: yet at length finding themselues hardly layd to, as by desperat men, resolued to sel their liues deere, they began to faint & to giue ground: when as Carambey comming in behind them with new supplies, rated the cowardly, stayd them that were flying, and somtime with rough speeches, sometime with faire persuasion, incouraged the wauering, and restored the battell, before almost quite lost. Neither did Huniades and the Despot lesse bestir them, but as soon as they perceiued the enemie a little to faint, by and by cried out, Victorie; with cheerful speech incouraging their men, still calling vpon them, To keepe their ranks strong, and to vrge their present good fortune, assuring themselues, that they fought against those infidels vnder the fauor & protection of the Almighty: and forthwith sent certain companies of footmen, who climbing vp the hil among the bushes, with their halfe pikes & boare-spears panched the Turks horses as they passed by them. These loose companies did the Turks horsemen much harm, and here began their battel to decline; they which were comming down, for feare of the danger retyring back again vnto them that were left aboue for the keeping of the straits: and the bolder sort of them, which were come down into the vallies, compassed about with the men at armes, hardly recouered the rising of the hill. Carambey in the mean time crying out behind them, one while called back them that fled, another while relieued them that fainted, and to the vttermost of his power restoring the battell, performed all the parts both of a valiant souldier & worthy captaine, couragiously fighting himselfe in the thickest of his enemies, and by his own valor stained for a time the lost battel. At length performing his last indeauor, deceiued by the snow, he fel into a bog, where sticking fast with his horse, and not able to helpe himselfe, he was taken prisoner by a common soldier. The rest that escaped out of this bloudie battel, retired themselues vnto them that were left aboue vpon the mountain, for the defence of the passage. After whom the Christians followed, through the vntract and rough places, vntill that hindered of their further pursuit by the approch of the night, and the abruptnesse of the way, they were glad to sound a retrait, and so retyred vnto the campe. Many other great men were taken beside Carambey, but many moe slaine in the battell, and most of all in the flight; few escaped, but such as fled backe againe vp into the mountaines. In the retrait, Huniades seeing so gallant a man as was Carambey (though to him altogether vnknown) vnworthily bound, and led prisoner by a common soldier, asked the souldier, if he would sell his prisoner? who sayd, hee would; and asked for him ten duckats, (a poore price for so great a man:) vnto whom Huniades commanded to be giuen foure hundred, and so sent him vnto his tent, comforting of him vp with cheerefull words, and willing that he should be well vsed. The Despot the same night comming to Huniades his tent, to confer with him about the remainder of the war, and seeing so braue a man standing among the rest by the fire side, began to talke with him in the Turkish language, whereof he had some knowledge, by reason of the neerenesse of the Nation, and such matters as he had sometime to do with them; and hauing some gesse by his talke, what he

The Turks ouerthrowne, & Carambey taken prisoner.

A he was, and pitying his estate, asked Huniades, how he would ransome him? who said, that he cost him foure hundred duckats, but that he valued him at forty thousand; which the Despot offered to pay him. Thus by the strange change of fortune, was Carambey, of late so great a commander, and so neere allied vnto the great Turke, valued & prized twice in one day by his enemies, as a mirror of the vncertaintie of worldly blisse and felicitie. The Polonians report somewhat otherwise of this battell; as that Vladislaus should himselfe therein be present, and the chiefe that therein commanded: howbeit the Hungarian writers, whose credit herein we follow, report it as before, not to haue been fought vnder the good fortune of the King then absent, but vnder the leading of Huniades and the Despot.

Out of this battell (or as some others report, a little before, out of the battell of Morau) Scanderbeg reuolteth from the Turke

B fled the great captaine George Castriot, otherwise of the Turks called Scanderbeg, now seeking to deliuer both himselfe, and his natiue country of Epirus, out of the thraldome of the Turks, as presently after he did: whose vnwoonted flight not a little terrified the rest of the Turkes armie, and much furthered the Christians victorie, whose proceedings he alwayes secretly fauored; hauing (as it was thought) secret intelligence with the great captaine Huniades, who not without instructions from him (as some say) gaue that great ouerthrow vnto the Turks at Morau. But of him and his worthie acts done for the deliuerance and defence of his countrey, more shall be said hereafter.

Shortly after this great ouerthrow and discomfiture of the Turks, the two great captains, Huniades & the Despot, together with the King, consulted for the remouing of the Turks garrisons, left aboue for the keeping of the strait passages of the mountain, & the prosecution of C the war. Which Vladislaus (considering the difficultie of the matter, and his soldiers necessitie) thought it not good further to prosecute, but forthwith to return. But Huniades & the Despot, the one thirsting after honour, and the other no lesse hope, by the good successe of this war, to recouer again his lost kingdome, said, That the Turks were in any case to be remoued, the passage opened, & the sparks that yet remained, for feare of raising a greater fire, extinguished: opposing against the difficultie by the king alledged, the inuincible courage of his souldiers, whereunto (they said) nothing was impossible or difficult. To which opinion the king also (lest he should seem to distrust the valor of his captains or soldiers) easily yeelded, & so commanded on Gods name to set forward. The first that mounted the hil was the kings battel, which Vladislaus seeketh in vaine to open the passage of the mountain Hemus.

D by the roughnesse and abruptnesse of the mountain hindered, oftentimes stayd. But Huniades still carried with an earnest desire to prosecute the victorie, and leauing nothing vnattempted, in searching about found a crooked turning way, whereby he with his men, more easily & readily got vp to the top of the mountain, euen with their enemies, vndescried or molested, by reason of the broken couert of the place: from whence they were in good hope easily to haue come vnto their enemies. But being come vp to the place they desired, they found such a deep and wide gaping of the rocke betwixt them and the enemie, as was neither to be passed, or filled vp: yet being come verie neere, they attempted by crossebow shot, & great stones cast out of slings, and other such engins, to haue remooued the Turkes from their places: who were therewith, and with their vnexpected approch, at the first so greatly both annoyed and discomfited, that they were almost at the point to haue forsaken the passage, had not Alis Beg (but the night before chosen for their General instead of Carambey) incouraged them and taught them how by shrouding themselues vnder the broken rocks, & parapets with tumultuary labor cast vp, to saue themselues from the shot of their enemies. In the mean time also Huniades, by another more high & steep way, whereby the enemie was also to be approched, had sent vp other companies of soldiers, who fighting at too much disaduantage, were by the Turks easily rejected. So at length, seeing the vain attempt giuen by himselfe vpon the top of the hil; and the desperat danger of the others in climebing the inaccessible mountain, where one might keep down an hundred, despairing to inforce the enemy, he by the Kings command caused a retrait to be sounded, and so againe retired down the mountain, to the great rejoycing of the Turks.

F The next day the winter cold raging, and wants in the armie still more and more increasing, the King with the rest of the great commanders entred into consultation for the hastning of their return out of that rough and barren countrey, into places of greater plentie, before the armie were brought into any greater extremitie. Whereunto Huniades (giuing place vnto neeessitie, which always suffreth not to be regarded that is seemly) now easily yeelded: only the Despot spake ſpake againſt it, blaming them, that hauing taken the Generall, and put their enemies to flight, and victorie now as it were in their hands, they would not proſecute the ſmall remainder of the war, but cowardly turn their backs vnto their vanquiſhed enemies: promiſing that he himſelfe would find money enough for the prouiding of all things needful for the reliefe of the armie. So ſaid the Popes Legat alſo. But foraſmuch as the wants in the army were great, and the ſoldiers preſently pinched with hunger and cold, they could with no hope of any profit, were it neuer ſo great, be perſuaded to ſtay; openly crying out, that it was not their captaines and lieutenants, which wanted nothing, but them the poore ſoldiers that ſtarued for hunger: as for the Deſpot, that he in hope of recouering his kingdome, perſuaded things impoſſible, and no way to be performed; neither to be any thing mooued with the death of their men or cattel. Need (they ſaid) could not be vanquiſhed: but that when Winter was paſt, they would willingly returne again vnto the ſacred war. In the mean time, Winter raging, and hunger commanding, let vs giue ouer (ſaid they) and depart into more fruitfull places, there to refreſh our bodies, ſpent with labor, cold, and hunger. For which reaſons, the King ſending before his baggage, retyred again by the ſame way he came. Which the Turks from aboue beholding, and ſtrengthned with new ſupplies, followed after them, as after men that had fled: oftentimes aſſailing them in the rereward, and ſetting vpon them ſometimes on the one ſide, ſometimes on the other, with often skirmiſhes both did and receiued much harme. Whoſe manner of fight was, to retire when they were themſelues charged, and preſently by great troupes to charge againe their enemies, their backs once turned to them; & ſo troubled the army, that it was conſtrained oftentimes to ſtay; beſides that, loded with the rich ſpoile of the enemie, and much baggage, it could not of it ſelfe make any great haſt. Now was it by the way come into a great thicke wood, full of deep bogs and water-courſes, hard to be paſſed thorow: where the reſt of the army going before, in the rereward, at the entrance of the wood were left certaine ſtrong companies of men at arms, as a wall againſt the purſuing enemie: whom the Turks with their readie light horſemen fiercely charged; where betwixt them, in the wood was fought a great fight, and a great tumult raiſed: vnto the noiſe wherof, they which marched before haſtily returning, in skirmiſhing, many of them fell into thoſe deepe bogs and queachie places, out of which they could hardly rid themſelues againe. Beſides that, there were many crooked and troubleſome turnings and windings, with ſudden deſcents, ſo ſteepe, as that in going down the ſame, their horſes came tumbling heeles ouer head, and there lay ouerthrown together with their riders: in ſuch ſort, as that to auoyd theſe difficulties, they were oftentimes inforced to fight on foot. In which troubleſome skirmiſh about foureſcore of the men at arms were loſt; but of the Turks, beſide them which were ſlain, were taken an hundred and ſeuenty, al whom Huniades cauſed to be preſently ſlaine. In this wood the Chriſtians were more troubled with the difficulties of the place, than the enemies aſſaults. Wherefore wants dayly more and more increaſing in the army, which by reaſon of the multitude of their carriages, abundance of their baggage, and often aſſaults of the Turks, was able to make no way; the King for feare his Armie ſhould in ſo long & ſlow a march thorow thoſe troubleſome & barren countries, be conſumed with hunger and other wants, cauſed all the carriages & baggage to be brought into the midſt of the army, and of it, all ſuch things as ſerued rather for burthen than vſe, to be there burnt; and the arms as wel of ſuch ſoldiers as he had there loſt, as of the enemy, to be buried in the ground; and all the weake beaſts that ſerued for burthen, to be killed. So the armie well diſcharged of ſuch vnprofitable burdens, marched much more ſpeedily, neither was ſo much ſubiect vnto the aſſaults of the Turks, as before. And ſo at length by long journies, Vladiſlaus with his army arriued at Belgrade, where he was of his ſubiects honorably receiued. And hauing there ſtayd certain days, & well refreſhed his armie, departing thence, & paſſing the riuer Savus, came to the royal city Buda, where he was of al his ſubiects joyfully receiued alſo: the Legat and Huniades going on his right hand, and the Deſpot on the left: after whom followed other colonels, captains, and lieutenants, with their companies; who at the firſt meeting with the citiſens, more than a mile out of the citie, in token of their mutual joy, gaue together ſuch joyfull acclamations & outcries, as that the heauens ſeemed to reſound, and the earth to ſhake with the noyſe thereof. Before the King, at his comming vnto the Citie, went a long companie of the notable Turks Captiues; and next before him, Carambey, bound in chaines; vpon whom all mens eyes were fixed. With them were alſo carried the enemies enſignes, and ſuch ſpoyles

A ſpoiles as had bin ſaued. Behind the King came Huniades in a triumphant robe, in the midſt betwixt the Legate on the right hand, and the Deſpot on the left, as he that next vnto the King had beſt deſerued the honor of the triumpth. Next vnto them followed the deuout Chriſtians, that for the zeale of religion had moſt honorably of their owne charges vnluntarie ſerued in thoſe wars: and on both ſides of them the ciuill magiſtrates and beſt of the citizens: behind them came the reſt of the legions, and about them both vpon the right hand and the left, the promiſcuous common people, doubling and redoubling the praiſes of the king, and Huniades. Before all theſe went the prelats and prieſts in ſolemne proceſſion, ſinging hymnes and pſalmes of thankſgiuing vnto almightie God. Vladiſlaus comming to the gate of the citie, acknowledging God to haue bin the author of ſo great a victorie, alighting from his horſe, on B foot went firſt vnto the cathedral church of our Lady; & there giuing moſt heartie thanks vnto almightie God, hanged vp the enemies enſignes, & part of the ſpoile, in perpetual remembrance of ſo notable a victory: which he afterward cauſed to bee moſt liuely depainted in a faire table of moſt curious worke, & there in the ſame church to be hanged vp; as were alſo the arms of al the notable Chriſtians that ſerued in that moſt famous expedition, which there long time after remained. Which ſolemnities ended, he went to his pallace in his caſtle, and there hauing giuen to euery man, but eſpecially to Huniades, his due commendation, gaue them leaue to depart. Thus the Hungarians, with whom alſo the Polonians in moſt part agree, report of this notable expedition of their king Vladiſlaus: howbeit the Turks (notable diſſemblers of their own loſſes) confeſſing the great ouerthrow, call the Baſſa ſo ouerthrowne, not by C the name of Carambey, but of Caſſanes; and the noble priſoner that was taken, by the name of Mechmet Beg, Sanzacke of Ancyra, Amurath his ſon in law, and brother to Cali-Baſſa, Amurath his great councellour, of ſome called Carambey after the name of his father.

Out of this late ſlaughter of the Turks, where Carambey was taken, ſcaped that valiant prince and famous warriour George Caſtriot (of the Turkes called Scanderbeg) as is before declared: whoſe noble minde had long time deſired to breake out of the golden fetters of the Turkiſh thraldom, & to be reuenged of the intollerable iniurie by Amurath don to his country, his parents, his brethren, & himſelf. Although he had always moſt warily diſſembled the ſame, for feare of the old tirant: being oftentimes ſolicited and animated therunto by ſecret letters and meſſengers from his friends in Epirus, knowing right wel that the leaſt fortune therof had bin vnto him preſent death. But finding no fit means for the accompliſhment thereof, wiſely diſ-D ſembled the ſame, with al the ſhews of loue and loyaltie to Amurath that might be: vntill that now in this great ouerthrow of the Turks army, vnder the leading of Carambey, and in ſo great a confuſion, he tooke occaſion to put in practiſe what he had long before in his deepe conceit plotted, for the deliuery both of himſelf & his country from the Turkiſh bondage and ſlauery. At which time Scanderbeg (for ſo from henceforth we cal him) hauing a little before imparted the matter vnto ſome of his truſtie friends and countrymen, no leſſe deſirous of libertie than himſelfe, but eſpecially vnto his nephew Ameſa, the ſon of his brother Repoſius, a yong man of great courage (in great confuſion of the Turkiſh armie, when euery man was glad to ſhift for himſelfe) had euer in his flight a vigilant eye vpon the Baſſaes principal ſecretarie; whom ac-E companied with a few Turks, he with his nephew Ameſa, & other of his faithful friends cloſely followed, as he fled from the ſlaughter: but when he had got the ſecretary with his few followers in place moſt conuenient for his purpoſe, he ſet vpon the Turks and ſlew them euerie one: and carrying the ſecretary away with him faſt bound, when he had brought him whither he thought good, with great threats compelled him (ſore againſt his will) to write counterfeit leters, as from the Baſſa his maſter, vnto the gouernor of Croia, commanding him in Amuraths name, Forthwith to deliuer vnto Scanderbeg, the new choſen Gouernor, the charge of the city with the garriſon there: cunningly enterlacing many other things in the ſame letters, wherby the matter might ſeem more probable. Which letters ſo extorted, he preſently ſlew the ſecretary, & as many more of the Turks as came in his way, of purpoſe that his doings might be F the longer kept from the knowledge of Amurath, who not hearing what was become of him, might reaſonably coniecture that he was ſlain by the Hungarians among the reſt of the Turks.

Whileſt the fame of this great ouerthrow is going to Hadrianople, and there filleth the Turks court with ſorrow and heauineſſe, in the mean time Scanderbeg hauing with him three thouſand Epirot ſouldiers which followed him out of the battell, as men deſirous rather to fight

Scanderbeg wiſely diſſembleth his deſire for the deliuery of himſelfe and his country fight for the libertie of themselues and of their country, than in the quarrell of the Turk, was with incredible celeritie come into the vpper countrey of Dibra, in the borders of Epirus, about seuentie miles from Croia: into which country he was most ioyfully receiued, where he staied but one day, and chose a few of those three hundred which he brought with him, to wait vpon him when hee went to Croia, as if they had bin his domesticall seruants: the rest, with other three hundred lusty soldiers, which were then come vnto him out of Dibra, he appointed to be led by secret by-waies thorow the woods and mountaines by perfect guides, vntill they came so nigh Croia as was possible for them to come, vnperceiued; and there to stay vntil he might find opportunity to conuey them into the city to oppresse the Turkish garrison. So he with a smal company of his followers, as if they had bin his priuat retinew, took the way towards Croia. But when he began to draw neere to the citie, he sent Ameſa before with two Seruitors attending vpon him, as if he had bin his Secretarie, to certifie the Gouernor of his comming. This yong gentleman, as he was of a most sharpe wit, and well spoken, so had hee framed his countenance and attire, that he seemed to be a naturall Turke: who assoon as he was come into the citie, he went vnto the Gouernor, whom after he had saluted according to the Turkish manner, he deliuered his message as from Scanderbeg his master, with so good grace, & words so wel placed, that al he said was verily beleeued for truth. But when Scanderbeg himselfe came, and had deliuered the great commanders letters, the Gouernour made no further question of the matter, but presently deliuered vnto him the gouernment of the citie, and the next day departed out of Croia with all his household towards Hadrianople. Scanderbeg hauing by this policie got the gouernment of the chiefe citie of Epirus, the night following found means in the dead time of the night, to receiue into the city the soldiers of Dibra, who were by this time come, according as he had before appointed: most part of them he placed in most conuenient places of the city, and for the speedy suppression of the Turkish garrison, he with the rest, first set vpon the Turks which kept the watch vpon the wal, and slew them; and afterwards breaking into their priuat houses, slew many of them in their beds: the Christian citizens also taking vp arms at the same time, helped to increase the slaughter of the Turkes, so that in the space of a few houres, there was none of the Turkish garrison left aliue, except some few, which were content to forsake their Mahometan superstition, and to become Christians. Many of the Turks might so haue saued their liues, and would not, chusing rather to die, and (as it is reported) also to kill themselues, than to forsake their damnable superstition: so small is the regard of life vnto resolute minds, in what quarrell soeuer.

The citie of Croia being thus happily by Scanderbeg recouered, wherin appeared both the greatest difficulty, & hope of his good or bad successe in so great an attempt, he presently sent Ameſa backe againe into Dibra, and other speedie messengers likewise into all the parts of Epirus, to disperse the news, and to stir vp the people to take vp arms for the recouerie of their lost libertie: but flying Fame, the speedie post, had preuented the messengers by him sent, and alreadie filled euery corner of Epirus with report of Scanderbeg his comming, and of all that was done at Croia. And the oppressed Epirots which had long wished to see that happie day, were now vp in arms in euery place, wanting nothing but leaders, whose comming although they greatly desired, yet they staied not therupon, but running together by heaps (as the manner of the common people is in all great tumults) they set vpon the Turkes garrisons which lay abroad in the countrey, and slew most part of them: whereby it came to passe, that no Turke could stirre in the country, but that he was snatched vp and slaine, so that in few dayes there was not a Turke to be found in Epirus, but such as lay in garrisons in strong townes. In this furie of the people, the gouernor of Croia, with all his retinue, was by the countrey people by the way as he went set vpon and slaine, and all his goods taken as a prey.

When Scanderbeg had thus recouered Croia, and scoured the countrey, yet to remooue the garrisons, which Amurath had put in euery strong citie; was thought to be a matter of great importance, and more difficultie. For which purpose he commanded those whom he had appointed for capraines, speedily to repaire vnto Croia with all the power they could make. At which time also, diuers noble men his nigh kinsmen, resorted to him with their followers: so that within a few dayes, he had together at Croia twelue thousand souldiers well appointed. With this armie hee marched from Croia to Petrella, a strong Citie 25 miles distant from Croia, and encamped before it. This citie is strongly scituate vpon the top of a steepe rockie mountaine, mountaine, as all the rest of the cities of Epirus be, and was by the Turks well furnished with men, munition, and other things needfull: yet Scanderbeg was in good hope that the Turkish garrison there, terrified with the fortune of the garrison of Croia, and the slaughter of the Turkes in the countery round about, would be glad to hearken vnto reasonable conditions. Which to make proofe of, assoone as he was encamped, he sent one of those souldiers which had followed him out of Hungarie (a faithful and wise fellow) vnto Petrella, to offer vnto the soldiers, That if they would yeeld vp the citie, it should be at their choice, either to continue in seruice with Scanderbeg, with whom they should find most bountiful entertainment, or else to depart in safety with bagge and baggage at their pleasure, with an honorable reward to be diuided among them. The subtil messenger comming thither, and framing his tale according to the present occasion, and necessitie of the time, first declared vnto them, how that Amurath of late vanquished by the Hungarians in a great battel, & looking euery day to be set vpon by diuers other Christian princes, was so busied that he had no leisure to looke into Epirus, or to send them any reliefe: after that, he in the name of Scanderbeg offered them the conditions before rehearsed, setting the same forth with many great words; willing them oftentimes by the way, to consider the dreadfull miserie that but the other day befell to the garrison at Croia, and other their fellows abroad in the country, whose dead bodies as then lay in euery corner of Epirus for a prey to the hungrie dogs and gredie wolues: which thing was easily beleeued of them of the garrison, for that diuers of the Turks lately fled out of the country into the citie, had themselues seene the same to be true. The Gouernor hauing a little considered of the matter, was content to giue vp the city, vpon condition that he with the soldiers might in safetie depart with such things as they had: not couenanting vpon any further reward, because it should not be said that he had sould the city. Which when Scanderbeg had faithfully promised to perform, the Turkish Gouernor comming forth with all his garrison, yeelded vp the city: and Scanderbeg mindfull of his promise, gaue vnto them both meat and mony, and sent them with a sufficient conuoy of horsemen in safetie out of Epirus.

Petrella yeelded vnto Scanderbeg.

When Scanderbeg had thus gained Petrella, he placed therein a conuenient garrison, and set all things in order as he thought good; but suffered none to enter into the city, more than the appointed garrison, although it was then very cold and frostie weather. This done, he presently raised his campe, & following his good fortune, marched towards Petra-Alba in such hast, as if the citie had beene running away from him; well knowing, that though Time be euermore precious, yet neuer more than in martiall affairs, wherein the least moment is oftentimes of such power as to effect or frustrat mens greatest designes. Petra-Alba is a citie in the countrey of Æmathia, distant from Petrella three miles, strongly scituat vpon the top of a mountaine, neere vnto the riuer Æmathus. Scanderbeg had scarcely well encamped himselfe before this citie, but that the Gouernour thereof, terrified with the fortune of Croia, and Petrella, offered to deliuer vp the citie, on the same conditions that were granted at Petrella: which beeing agreed vpon, the citie was forthwith deliuered, and the conditions by Scanderbeg faithfully performed.

Petra-Alba yeelded.

Petra-Alba being thus taken, and all things set in order, Scanderbeg carried with the course of his victorie, without delay came to Stelluſa, which is also a strong citie of Æmathia, fiftie miles distant from Croia, pleasantly (as it were of purpose) built vpon the top of an high hill, standing in the midst of a pleasant & fruitfull vallie, with great plaines round about it. There Scanderbeg encamped a little before the going downe of the Sun, and rested that night. In the morning he sent a messenger to the citie, with like conditions as were accepted at Petrella and Petra-Alba: which most part of the garrison souldiers of the Turkes would gladly haue accepted, but that Deſdrot the Gouernor of the citie, with some few others earnestly withstood the rest; whereupon a great contention arose amongst the garrison souldiers. But the greater part desirous to yeeld vp the citie, when they could by no means persuade the Gouernor and those few which took his part, to yeeld to their desires, they violently set vpon him, & deliuered him with the rest to Scanderbeg, fast bound, and so yeelded vp the city. For which fact, fearing to returne to Amurath, some of them remained with Scanderbeg, and afterwards became Christians: the rest were either honestly prouided for, or else wel rewarded & suffered to depart whether they would. All the other weaker places of Epirus wherein any of the Turkish garrisons lay, hearing that the strongest cities were already deliuered vnto Scanderbeg, in short time yeelded themselues vpon like conditions: onely Sfetigrade (otherwise called the holy citie) remained in the possession of the Turks: which citie is placed in the vpper countrey of Dibra, in the frontiers of Epirus, vpon the top of an high and steepe hill, as if it were an Eagles nest. Vnto this citie came Scanderbeg with all his armie: and hauing placed his tents, he began first to assay if he could gaine it by composition, as he had done the rest: and the rather to moue them by the examples of others, he caused his embassadors to declare vnto them al that had happened at Croia, Petrella, Petra-Alba, and Stellusa, specially how he had vsed the garrison of Stellusa, which yeelded vnto him, with all bountie and courtesie; and how that on the contrary part hee had the gouernour in bands, with all his wilfull partakers, whome they should presently see executed before their faces, if they forthwith deliuered not the citie. This message troubled the minds of al the garrison, but especially of the gouernor, seeing before his eyes in the wofull example of another man, what might by and by happen vnto himselfe. Wherefore fearing to deliuer his own opinion and to giue answer vnto the embassador, for offending the inconstant multitude and vnknown minds of the people, he first entertained the embassadors honourably, and afterwards turning himselfe vnto the citizens and soldiers, said vnto them, Worthie men and most faithfull souldiers, what is your pleasure, or what shall we answer to these our enemies demands? Then one of the souldiers that stood by (a rough bold spirited fellow) vnwilling for his owne part to giue vp the citie, and deeming the gouernor to be of the same mind, in that hee had tearmed them worthie and faithfull, and Scanderbeg by the name of an enemy, drawing out his sword, & with his right hand shaking it on high, answered:

A notable speech of a common souldier to the rest of his fellowes for the holding out of their citie against Scanderbeg.

Most valiant gouernor, this fame and the like, shal make answer for vs. Nothing was to lesse purpose, than with premeditated words to seeke to terrifie valiant minds, first with the diuers fortune of Croia, and then of Stellusa: for as the faces and countenances of men are diuers, so also are their mindes and dispositions. Euery man wisely directeth his owne actions, according to his own proper humer, & by the same plaies the foole or bedlam. We prescribe no lawes to them of Petrella, nor to them of Stellusa, neither let them prescribe any vnto vs. Let neuer so base examples of cowardly slaues euer enter into the thoughts of couragious men: braue mindes disdaine to imitate other men in their honest actions, much lesse in their cowardise. And why? for euery man liueth after his own fashion. Wherfore let Scanderbeg proceed, let him kil the gouernor of Stellusa before our faces, let him sacrifice our fellow soldiers, do you therfore think that we shal die in their bodies? shal our liuing spirits be there extinguished? shall our bloud there be spilt? But ô happie bodies, O ghosts of me euer to be reuerenced, which in worthy defence of your libertie & faith haue indifferently contemned gold, siluer, death, and torture, and whatsoeuer else miserable worldlings hold deare or dismall! Wherefore carry thou back again vnto thy master this answer from a common soldier, if he seek to impose these conditions vpon vs, let him once more bare that arme of his, which men of courage feare not so much as he thinketh. He may peraduenture inforce vs to these conditions of his, if God forsake vs: but assuredly persuade vs vnto them, shall he neuer. And yet for al that, your master Scanderbeg is not the man wee haue long since heard him reported to bee, of an honorable mind, easie to forgiue, & such a one as wil indifferently iudg betwixt the enemy & himself: for why then doth he hold in bonds the gouernor of Stellusa, for that he freely, iustly, and honorably stood in defence of his King, his faith and liberty? Why doth he threaten him with death, whereas he hath not deserued the same, although he hath resolutely offered himselfe thereunto. for defence of his libertie?

All they which were present, listened with great attention to the souldiers speech, neither was hee interrupted by any, vntill he had said what he would. Then the souldiers thronging about him, and beating their swords and targets together, withall gaue a great shout, in token that they all approued his speech for answere. So the gouernour encouraged with the cheerfulnesse of his souldiers, returned the embassadour without other answere than that of the common souldiers, and presently appointed euery man to his charge, and with great carefulnesse ordered all things for the better defence of the citie. But when Scanderbeg had heard the answer that was sent him from the citie, deliuered by the mouth of a common souldier, hee smiled thereat, and said, Hee is vndoubtedly a valiant souldier, if his deeds be answerable to his speeches: but if my force faile me not, I will also make him happie amongst the happie ghosts of them of Stellusa: and by and by commanded the gouernour of Stellusa, with the other captiues, to bee brought before him, and there caused some of them which were content voluntarily to forsake forsake their Mahometan superstition, to be presently baptized, to the great griefe of the other Turks. Dsedrot the gouernor with the rest, to the terror of the defendants, were in their sight put to death: whereupon the garrison souldiers with great indignation gaue a great shout from the wall, and bitterly railed vpon the Christians.

Dsedrot gouernor of Stellusa, executed.

Scanderbeg considering the strength of the citie, with the time of the yeare, vnfit for soldiers to keep the field, for Winter was now grown on, left Moses Golemus, a most valiant captain, with a garrison of three thousand souldiers, to keepe in the Turks garrison at Sfetigrade, and to defend the borders of Epirus, vntill hee might at more conuenient time himselfe returne againe to the siege: and so with the rest of his armie repaired to Croia, when hee had in the space of little more than one month, to his immortall praise, recouered his kingdome, and driuen the Turks out of euery corner of Epirus; excepting only Sfetigrade: which citie also not long after was by composition deliuered vnto him. During all this time, from his first comming into Epirus, he neuer slept aboue two houres in a night, but with restlesse labor prosecuted his affairs. He euer fought against the Turks with his arme bare, and that with such fiercenesse, that the bloud did oftentimes burst out of his lips. It is written, that hee with his owne hand slew three thousand Turkes in the time of his warres against them. But of his great and worthie victories obtained against the two mighty Turkish kings, Amurath, and Mahomet his sonne, more shall be said hereafter in due time and place.

After that Scanderbeg had thus by great force & policie wrung his inheritance out of Amuraths hands, and scoured the Turks out of euery corner of Epirus; he proceeded further, and ouerran part of Macedonia, making sundrie incursions into the heart of that countrey, beeing then in the Turks possession; whereby he so enriched his souldiers, that they desired of him no better pay. Which was so vsuall a thing with this restlesse prince, as that it began to grow into a prouerbe in most princes courts, That the spoile of Amurath his dominions, was Scanderbegs reuenewes. Complaint hereof came daily to Amuraths court, which the craftie aged sire (being then troubled with the Hungarian warres) seemed at the first to make no great account of, but as of that he could easily and at his pleasure remedy; although he was therwith inwardly grieued at the heart. But when the certain report of one mischiefe as it were in the necke of another, continually sounded in his eares, and that he saw no end to be expected of these miseries, he sent Alis Bassa, one of his greatest men of war, with an army of fortie thousand select souldiers, at once to subdue the countrey of Epirus, and to bring it again vnder his obeisance. The setting forth of this great army, vnder the conduct of so famous a captain, replenished the minds of the Turkes with such an assured hope of victorie, that a man would haue thought Scanderbeg had bin already taken, & now brought to execution: yea the common soldiers before their setting forth, were oftentimes at vain contention for the diuision of the spoile they were neuer like to haue: So readie are men to promise wonders to themselues, whilest they confer but with their own desires. And on the other side, Fame, the forerunner of great attempts, had filled all the small country of Epirus, with great terror & feare of Alis Bassaes comming. The countrymen with their families fled into the strong cities, & the citizens within their walls fell to fortifying the same, and kept continual watch and ward, as if the enemy had euen then lien fast by them: the aged men & women commended themselues and al theirs first to God by praiers and then to the courage of the lustie soldiers with tears, as in case of extreme peril & danger. Only Scanderbeg was nothing moued either with the terrible report of the Bassaes comming, or the vain feare of his subiects, but alwaies kept the same cheerfulnes both of countenance & speech, as hee was wont, being well acquainted with the tumult of the Turkish wars, and hauing (as was supposed) certain intelligence before from his secret friends in the Turks court, of all Amuraths designes. So that hauing set all things in order for the safety of his country, he began to leauie an army at Croia: at which time most part of his subiects of Epirus, which were able to beare armes, repaired vnto him: the confederat Christian princes also, his neighbors, and for most part his kinsmen, sent to him great supplies: beside other deuout and warlike minded Christians, which voluntarily resorted vnto him from far, in great numbers. Out of which multitude of people he chose only 8000 horsemen & seuen thousand foot, when as he might haue raised a far greater armie: and placing some few in garrisons in the frontier cities where hee thought most conuenient, al the rest hee sent home again to their dwellings. At which his confidencie, his friends, yea and his enemies also much maruelled, that when he might might haue had so many, he would take the field with so few: with which smal army of fifteen thousand, he marched from Croia, fourscore miles to Dybra: where hearing by his espials, of the approch of his enemies, after he had with cheerfull speech encouraged his soldiers, he encamped with his army in the lower country of Dybra, neere vnto a wood side, right in the way where the Bassa must needs passe. In which wood, he placed Gnee Musachee, and Ameſa in ambush with three thousand men: commanding them to stand close, vntill they saw hee had throughly ioyned battell with the Bassa, and then with al their force to breake forth vpon his rereward. The Bassa marching forward, came and encamped neere vnto Scanderbeg, a little before the going downe of the Sun, and there rested that night, making great shew of mirth and ioy, with great fires in euery corner of the campe, as the Turkish manner of encamping is. Wheras in Scanderbegs campe, all things were silent, and no shew of any fire at all; for so Scanderbeg had commanded: which made the Turks the more careleſſe, deeming therby the Christians as good as already discouraged. The next morning Scanderbeg ranged his army in order of battell, placing Tanusius in the left wing, with fifteen hundred horsmen, and as many foote: and Moses in the right with like number: and leading the main battell himselfe, the rereward was committed to Vranacontes a man renowned in those dayes, both for his grauitie in counsel & for his valour in armes, fit to command or be commanded; but afterwards, amongst the rest most famous, for the worthie defending of Croia against Amurath, being then there himselfe in person. Alis Bassa contemning the smal number of Scanderbegs armie, seeing nothing therein to be feared more than the good order thereof, gaue the first charge with a small troupe of horsemen: who at the first incounter retired, as if they had fled, of purpose that the Christians hastily pursuing their vntimely hope, might disorder their battell, & so giue occasion to their owne ouerthrow. But by the commandement of Scanderbeg, who easily perceiued the Bassaes meaning) their dangerous forwardnes was warily waied, & all with safety kept in good order. So both armies comming on, the wings began the battel a fresh, and Scanderbeg with great courage bringing on his maine battell in the face of the Bassa, valiantly charged him. But by that time that the battels were throughly ioyned, Musachee and Ameſa suddenly issued out of the wood, & fiercely set vpon the rereward of the Turks army, where they made great slaughter, and forced many of the Turks for feare to fly. Thus was the Bassaes great army driuen to fight both before and behind, being hardly beset and laid vnto with a small number. The Bassa had placed his best souldiers neerest vnto himselfe in the main battell, as his most assured strength and last refuge: these valiant men stood fast, and renewed the battell, before almost lost. And here Scanderbegs fortune was euen at a stand: vntill that the well aduised and valiant captaine Vranacontes hauing receiued the wearied soldiers into the rereward, and setting al things there in safety, accompanied with certain troups of fresh soldiers which he brought out of the rereward, brake through the Bassaes army with such slaughter of the Turks, that he made way for Scanderbeg and all the rest of his armie. The Turkes discomfited with the inuincible courage of these old soldiers, & the slaughter of their fellows, which lay by heaps wallowing in their own blood, betooke themselues to flight; whom the Christians fiercely pursued, and slew of them two and twenty thousand: at which time were also two thousand others taken prisoners, with foure and twentie of the Turkes ensignes: wheras of the Christians were slain not past an hundreth & twenty. The enemies tents with all their carriages, were at the same time taken also. After this great victory, when Scanderbeg had made all his seuen thousand footmen, horsmen, by giuing vnto them the horses of the slain Turks, he brake into the enemies country, & entred farre into Macedonia, where he filled the desires of his souldiers with the wealth and spoile thereof, sparing nothing that fire and sword could deuoure: and so with victorie returned to Croia, where he was of his subiects ioyfully receiued. Alis Bassa with the remainder of his discomfited armie, returned to Hadrianople, and there by Amurath was hardly charged of cowardise & want of discretion, for that he had lost so puissant an army to so weake an enemy. Whereof when he had cleared himselfe by the modest rehearsal of his former victories, and the testimonie of all the other captaines present with him in that battel, he was pardoned, and so againe receiued into fauour, and that great ouerthrow imputed to the chance of warre.

Macedonia spoiled by Scanderbeg.

Alis Bassa with an army of fortie thousand sent against Scanderbeg.

Amurath hauing receiued two so great ouerthrows, first from Huniades and the Hungarians, and now from Scanderbeg, and seeing himselfe elsewhere beset with so many mischiefs, as that hee could not tell which way to turne himselfe; tormented with despaire, and desire of reuenge,

A great slaughter of the Turks Amurath in despaire.

A uenge, whereof he saw small possibilitie, fell into such a melancholie passion, that ouercome with the darke conceits thereof, he was about to haue become the bloudie executioner of himself, had not Caly Bassa by his graue aduice comforted vp his dying spirits: by whose persuasion (contrary to his naughtie nature) he yeelded by his Embassadors sent for the same purpose, to desire peace of Vladislaus King of Hungarie; vsing the exiled Despot of Seruia (his father in law) then present with the King, as a mean therein. Who at the first gaue small credit vnto the Embassadors, or vnto such things as they told him, vntil that at length better persuaded of the true meaning of the Turke, he so wrought the matter both with the King and the rest of the nobilitie, and especially with Huniades, that there was an honorable peace concluded. The capitulations whereof were, first, That Amurath withdrawing all his forces & garB risons, should clearely depart out of Seruia, and restore the same vnto the possession of George the Despot, the right lord and owner thereof; deliuering also freely vnto him his two sonnes, Stephen and George, who bereft of their sight, he had long time kept in strait prison. Also, That from thenceforth he should make no claime vnto the kingdome of Moldauia, nor to that part of Bulgaria which he had in the last wars lost. And finally, That he should not inuade or molest the Hungarians, or any part of their kingdome, during the whole time of that peace: and to pay 40000 duckats for the ransome of Carambey. Vnto which hard conditions, when the Turkish tyrant had full sore against his will condiscended, a peace for ten yeres was forthwith on both parts concluded, and the same by solemne oath confirmed: King Vladislaus taking his oath vpon the holy Euangelists, and Amurath (by his Embassadors) vpon their Turkish Alcoran. This was the most honorable peace that euer Christian Prince had before that time made with any of the Turkish Kings, and most profitable also, had it beene with like sincertie kept, as it was with solemnitie confirmed.

Amurath by the persuasiõ of Caly Bassa, seeketh for peace of king Vladislaus

The capitulations of the ten yeres peace concluded betwixt Vladislaus and Amurath.

Amurath inuadeth Caramania

Amurath with this peace deliuered of his greatest feare, conuerted all his forces against the Caramanian king, in reuenge of the iniuries by him done whilest he was occupied in the Hungarian wars. This King of Caramania knowing himselfe vnable to withstand so great an enemie, durst neither meet him in the field, nor trust himselfe to the strength of any his cities or strong castles, but fled into the mountaines, there fortifying himselfe more sure than in any other his strong holds. Amurath entring into Caramania, made great spoyle in the countrey as he went, and tooke great booties. At last comming to Iconium, he layd hard siege to the same. D The poore King seeing his kingdome thus spoyled, and his chiefe citie in danger to be lost, sent embassadors, and with them his wife also, which was Amuraths sister, to intreat for peace; offering to pay vnto him yerely the double tribute which he before payd, and for the performance thereof to giue his sonne in hostage. Vpon which conditions Amurath granted him peace, and so returned. In this warre, Aladin, Amuraths eldest sonne, died, to the great griefe of his aged father, being slaine with a fall from his horse as he was hunting.

Old Amurath thorowly wearied with continuall warres and other troubles incident vnto restlesse roomes, resolued now to retire himselfe to a more priuat and quiet kind of life: and therefore sent for his son Mahomet, being then but fifteene yeres old, to whom he voluntarily E resigned his kingdome, appointing Caly Bassa his tutour, with one Chosroe a learned Doctor of their law, to be his trustie councellors and chiefe directors. And so taking with him Hamze-Beg one of his noblemen in whom he tooke greatest pleasure, departed to Magnesia, and there as a man wearie of the world, gaue himselfe to a solitarie and monasticall kind of life, in the companie of certaine religious Turkish Monks, as they accounted of them.

Many great Kings and Princes, as well Mahometans as Christians, glad before of the Hungarian victorie, were now no lesse sorrie to heare of the late concluded peace betwixt King Vladislaus & the old Sultan Amurath: as being of opinion, that the prosecution of this war so happily begun, would haue bin the vtter ruin & destruction of the Turkish kingdom. Wherefore they sought by all possible meanes to induce the young King Vladislaus to breake the F league he had so lately and so solemnly made with the Turke: especially Iohn Palæologus the Emperor of Constantinople, did by letters importune the King to remember the confederation he had made with the other Christian princes, for the maintenance of the wars against the common enemie of Christianitie: which Princes were now prest, and readie (as he said) to assist him with their promised aid: adding moreouer, That whereas Amurath had diuers times sought to joyne with him in amitie and friendship, he had vtterly reiected that offer of peace, preferring the vniuerſall profit(like to inſue to al Chriſtendome by that religious war)before his own proper ſecuritie and profit, being for his part in readineſſe to joine his forces with the Kings,if he would preſently enter into armes: which he could neuer doe in better time than now,whileſt Amurath,terrified with his late ouerthrow,and ſtil beſet with doubtful war, had drawn his greateſt forces out of Europe into Aſia,in ſuch diſordred haſt, as that it ſhould ſeem he rather fled for feare of his enemies in Europe, than marched to incounter his enemies in Aſia,and now being wearie of all,had betaken himſelfe to a priuat kind of life. To conclude, he requeſted the King,not to leaue him and the other Chriſtian Princes of ſmall power, as a prey to the Turk,who would aſſuredly with all hoſtilitie inuade them,ſo ſoon as he thought himſelfe ſafe from the danger of the Hungarians. At the ſame time alſo, and vpon the departure of the Turks Embaſſadors,for the performance of ſuch things as they had promiſed, letters came from Francis the Cardinall of Florence, Generall of the Chriſtian fleet, declaring how that Amurath hauing left almoſt none in Europe, was with all the power he could make, gon ouer into Aſia againſt the Caramanian King,leauing a moſt faire occaſion for the Chriſtians,eaſily to recouer whatſoeuer they had before loſt in Europe: & that he was in good time come with his fleet vnto the ſtraits of Helleſpontus,according to promiſe,and there lay ready to imbar the Turks paſſage backe again out of Aſia. Both theſe letters being read in the councell,ſo much moued the King,with all the reſt of the Nobilitie of Hungary there preſent,as that they were neuer more ſorrie or aſhamed for any thing they had done in their liues, than for the league ſo lately with Amurath concluded: for why, they ſaw that all the plot they had laid for their immortal glory,was now by this haſty peace that they had made with the Turk, without the good liking and knowledge of their confederats,brought to nought; & that they had thereby moſt ſhamefully deceiued the generall expectation that the Chriſtian commonweale had conceiued of them; & that they,of long time called the protectors of the Chriſtian faith,the defenders of true religion,the reuengers of Chriſts name, & deliuerers of the faithfull nations; ſhould now be accounted the breakers of the Chriſtian league,men forgetfull of their confederation both with the Latines and the Greeks,contemners of immortality,& louers of their own profit onely. In this doubtfulnes of minds whileſt they ſtood yet thus wauering, Iulian the Cardinal & Legat,always an enemie to the peace, and by reaſon of his place,a man in greateſt authoritie next to the King,tooke occaſion to diſſuade the ſame as followeth:

The cunning Speech wherewith Iulian the Cardinall perſuadeth K. Vladiſlaus to breake the League hee had before made with Amurath.

If any of you,right Worthie (ſaid he) ſhall haply marueil that I ſhould ſpeake of breaking the league, and violating our faith, let him firſt vnderſtand, That I at this preſent am to perſuade you to nothing elſe but the faithfull obſeruing both of the one and the other: led with like repentance with you; repentance, I ſay, not ſorrow, when as I, as from a watch-tower foreſeeing all theſe things which were decreed againſt my will, to ſort alſo contrary to your expectation, am now for the dutie of my legation, and the zeale vnto the Chriſtian religion, inforced with you to doubt: and ſo much the rather, for that at this preſent the queſtion is of the loſſe and hazard of all our honors and credit in common: which except we by common conſent, and wonted valour, endeauour to amend, ô how much is it to be feared, leſt for ſhame neither may you go out of Hungarie, or I returne to Rome, where all things are with moſt deepe judgement cenſured. Conſider, I pray you, into what miſeries this haſtie reſolution hath caſt vs. We haue entred into league with the Turke, an Infidel, to violate our faith with the Chriſtians; and to breake the holy league before made with the great Biſhop and the other Chriſtian Princes our confederats. And that for what, for what profit I ſay? Forſooth, that ſo we might againe recouer Seruia, long before deſtroyed. Verily a ſmall and wofull profit, which may againe in ſhort time be cut off, and depriueth vs of others far greater, and of much longer continuance. For, what can be more fond and inconſiderat, than in our conſultations to haue regard to our priuat profit only, and not to the publicke, without reſpect of religion, honeſtie, or conſcience? It is not demanded of you at this preſent, (right Honourable) what you owe vnto the periured Turke; but you are by me Iulian, the great Biſhops and the confederat Chriſtian Princes Legat, and Agent, before the tribunall ſeat of your owne conſciences, accuſed of breach of faith, breach of league, and breach of promiſe; and thereof euen by your owne iudgement, rather than by the iudgment of God, or other men, I wil condemne you. Anſwer me, you noble Worthies: After you had happily ſix months made wars againſt the Turks in Bulgaria and the borders of Thracia; and after that triumphantly returing into Hungarie, receiued you not honorable embaſſages from almoſt all Italy, & from the great Emperor, with common rejoycing for your ſo glorious a victorie, and exhortations to continue the

the warre? We receiued them. Did not you in my preſence, and I the authour thereof, willingly make a moſt holy league with the Italians and Greeks; That the one ſhould with their aid and power meet you out of Thracia; and the other with a great fleet ſhould come into the Helleſpontus? We made it. If you made it, why breaking this, made you another with the Turks? or by what right can you keepe the ſame, being made? Wherefore if the laſt yeare you made a league with the great Biſhop, (God his Vicar here on earth) if you be men, if you be in your wits, if you be Chriſtians, this ſecond league is to be broken, leſt you ſhould violate the firſt, and that a moſt Chriſtian league: which except you do, I feare leſt that as Iudas betrayed Chriſt, ſo you may ſeeme to betray his Vicar; or that God, whom hitherto you haue alwayes found preſent, propitious, and fauourable, you ſhall hereafter find him angrie, and an enemie to your proceedings. And now I pray you tell me, What will you anſwer vnto the Conſtantinopolitan emperor; who according to your appointment, hath now with the firſt taken the field, and in ſo great an opportunitie expecteth but your comming? What will you anſwer the great Biſhop? What the Venetians and Genowaies, who haue their great fleet readie, as was appointed? What the Burgundians, who for their zeale vnto the Chriſtian faith and Religion, haue long ſince paſſed the Ocean, and ſo by many dangers of the ſea now flote in the Helleſpont? Deuiſe (I pray you) if you can, ſome excuſe and colour, that we may not ſeeme altogether vnlike our ſelues: if out of your hidden skill you can coyne any thing, ſhew it. You promiſed with the firſt of the Spring, that you would be in the field: and now your ſoldiers both the Spring and Summer, play; ſo great and ſo wholeſome occaſion paſſing away, thorow your woful ſloth and negligence. O the great blindneſſe of mens minds! O groſſe cowardiſe! O deteſtable League, made to the deſtruction of the Commonweale! Some man happily will blame me, and aske, why I ſuffered it with the reſt? I was preſent, I muſt confeſſe; but as much as in me was I intreated it might not be. I diſliked it; and (as many of you here preſent can teſtifie) I vtterly condemned it. I was ouercome by the wiſedome and authoritie of Huniades, and the compaſſion of the Deſpot, leſt (vnhappie man) he ſhould by my interceſſion ſeeme longer to want his Kingdome: and leſt any man ſhould call me a contemner or impugner of your good; I, full of ſorrow, and vnwillingly, gaue way: not ignorant, the health of the Chriſtian Commonweale to be therein weakened, the hope of your immortall glorie extinguiſhed, and vs all (by your leaue may I ſay it) accounted breakers both of diuine and humane Leagues, forſworne men, and traitors vnto all good Chriſtians. Wherefore except before the report of our perfidiouſneſſe be further bruted, we deliuer our ſelues from this infamie, nothing can be greater, or more miſerable, than our ſhame or villanie. If we will ſo doe, we may not ſo eaſily, as juſtly and religiouſly doe it: Hauing made reſtitution of Seruia and the captiues, what remaineth elſe for you to doe, (Noble Worthies) but to repaire your Armie, to prepare what ſo is needfull for warre, and to keepe your firſt League with the Chriſtian Princes? And to ſay, That King Vladiſlaus, after his league made with the Greek and Latine Princes, could not without the conſent of theſe his Confederates and Allies (vnder whoſe good fortune that Common warre was vndertaken) conclude any thing, eſpecially with the enemies of the Chriſtian Religion? And that therefore, if any thing were agreed vpon betwixt him and the Turke, it was fruſtrate, and the firſt league to be ſtood vpon. Who is ſo partiall an eſteemer of mens actions, that would not eaſily judge, That in caſe faith were giuen to both, it were rather to be kept with a Chriſtian, than with a Turke; with a Beleeuer, than with an Infidel? Againſt a perfideous enemie it is lawfull (as they ſay) for a man to vſe all cunning, force, and deceit, deluding craft with craft, and fraud with fraud. By craft the Turke firſt paſſed ouer into Europe, by little and little he crept into that kingdome, he neuer kept faith with any, he grew to this height rather by cunning than by ſtrength: and are you become ſo blind, as to thinke it better to keepe your promiſe with the Turke, deuoyd of all faith and humanitie, rather than with the faithfull Chriſtians, and eſpecially the moſt holy Biſhop. All great things are done by deuice and policie: the Romanes our anceſtors vprightly and religiouſly alwayes kept their leagues with their confederates, but deluded the deceitfull with their cunning. Cæſar was of opinion, that for ſomeraigntie the Law was ſometimes to be broken. And Philip (the father and maſter of him that conquered Aſia) oftentimes vſed cunning and deceit for the deſire of rule: yet were not theſe men called traitors. It is ſometime lawfull for the commonweale ſake, neither to ſtand to our leagues, neither to keepe our faith with them that be themſelues faithleſſe. Lawfull it is to breake vnlawfull oathes, and eſpecially ſuch as are thought to be againſt right, reaſon and equitie. Was it lawfull for Diomedes, vowing for to ſacrifice vnto the gods whomſoeuer he firſt met at his returne into his countrey, to kill his ſonne by that his vow and oath? Verily it was a great impietie. Wherefore a juſt and lawfull oath is in the judgement of all men to be religiouſly kept, but ſuch an oath as tendeth not onely vnto priuate, but publique deſtruction, that ought to be vaine and fruſtrate. Wherefore before our faithleſſe dealing be further ther spread abroad, I beseech you, worthie men, and thee especially, most glorious King, not in any point to violate your faith, for the good of the Christian commonweale, giuen vnto the most holy Father and the other Christian Princes. The league you haue made with the Grecks and the Latines, faithfully and religiously keepe; the expedition by common consent taken in hand, by the example of your confederates, prosecute; the foundation of immortall glorie by you layd, build vp. Deliuer the Christian Prouinces, oppressed with the Turkish seruitude; satisfie the hope conceiued of you; and deceiue not the expectation the world hath now conceiued of you, than which, nothing can be more dishonorable: make no conscience of the league you haue made with the Infidell, but thinke it a great impietie and wickednesse, to violate the holy league made with the great Bishop and the other Christian Princes: thinking, that if you should do otherwise, God (which he of his mercie forbid) would become of that your falsified faith a most seuere and sharpe reuenger: and that you can do nothing more acceptable vnto our Sauior Christ, or more glorious to your selues, than to deliuer the oppressed Christian countries from the cruell slauerie & bondage of the Turke. Suffer not this so fit an occasion to slip away, than which, a fitter can neuer be giuen. Europe is vnfurnished of the Turkes, busied in the Caramanian warre; their returne is imbarred by the Christians fleet, now in the sea of Hellespontus; you need but to go see, and as it were to take a view of Thracia, Macedonia, Grecia, and Epirus, there is no enemie there left to oppose himselfe against you. Wherefore for God his cause, I request you aboue al things to continue the Christian league, and with your happie and victorious forces, to march forward into Macedonia and Thracia, as is before by you with the other Christian Princes your confederates agreed.

In conclusion, hauing much spoken of the authoritie and power of the great Bishop, he in his name disannulled the league whatsoeuer, by the King made with the Turke; and absolued him, with the rest whom it might concerne, from the oath they had giuen, and the promise they had made. Which so well contented both the King and the rest, that there was now no more question of the oath, or of the lawfulnesse of the war, but a decree made for the continuation of the league with the other Christian Princes their confederats, and for the prosecution of the wars against the Turks, as was with them before agreed: whom, they could now say, they were not to forsake, and to leaue them as a prey vnto the Turke their greedy enemy; now for nothing more in danger, than for that, at their request they had taken vp armis in their quarrell. Vnto which vnfortunat Decree, both the Despot and Huniades (the chiefe authors of the late peace betwixt the King and Amurath) easily consented: the Despot, induced with the great hope he had conceiued of the good successe of the war; and Huniades, with the desire of the kingdom of Bulgaria, promised vnto him by Vladislaus, and by faire Charter also (as some said) assured vnto him.

Of this the Kings resolution for the breach of the peace with the Turks, notice was with all speed giuen vnto the Constantinopolitan Emperour, and Francis the Florentine Cardinall, then lying with a fleet of seuentie gallies at the straits of Hellespontus: for feare lest they hearing of the former concluded peace, should alter also, or else quite desist from their former purposes. In the mean time, whilest these things were yet in plotting, the Turke ignorant hereof, according to his promise had withdrawne all his garrisons out of Seruia, and other places before agreed vpon in the late concluded peace, restoring the same vnto the Despot & others the lawfull owners, although it was not done at the verie prefixed day at which it should haue been done. In which time also he set at libertie great numbers of captiues, and amongst the rest, the two blind sons of the Prince of Seruia; faithfully performing whatsoeuer he had before vpon his religion promised in the league with the Christians before concluded, so desirous he was of peace with the Hungarians. Howbeit Vladislaus, by the councel of Huniades, detained to his own vse certain of the strong Holds in Seruia: for which cause, George the Despot euer afterwards bore a secret grudge against Huniades.

Now as King Vladislaus (hauing by the persuasion of Iulian the Cardinall, renounced the league betwixt him & Amurath) was preparing his forces, the fame of the Epirot Prince Scanderbeg was also (by the recouerie of his fathers kingdome of Epirus out of the Turks hands, and by the late ouerthrow of Alis Bassa) grown great, euery one speaking of him honour and praise. Wherewith Vladislaus moued, & reasonably perswaded what a furtherance it would be vnto his haughty designes (aiming at no lesse than the vtter ouerthrow of the Turks kingdome in Europe) if he might vnto his owne great preparations joyne also the strength of that so fortunate

A tunate a Prince, by the consent of his Nobilitie, with all speed dispatched away his Embassadors with letters vnto him, certifying him of his honorable purpose for the rooting out of the Turks; and in that common cause praying his aid against such a dangerous and dreadful enemie. The purport whereof here followeth:

Vladislaus King of Hungarie and Polonia, vnto the noble Scanderbeg Prince of Epirus, greeting.

The Letters of king Vladislaus to Scanderbeg.

It may be that some good hap hath deferred this our late congratulation vntill this present, to the intent we might at this time, together with you, rejoyce in the double successe of your prosperitie: first, for B the happie recouerie of your estate; and then, for that the same hath by your wisedome and valor, of late been so notably defended. Wherefore in this we rejoyce, not only in your behalfe, but in the behalfe of all good Christians, that it hath pleased God of his goodnesse, by your valour to haue giuen so great an increase and comfort vnto the Christian commonweale: for as much as amongst others our great euils, the losse of the Albanian people hath not bin to be accounted the least, at such time as Iohn Castriot, a worthie Prince, your father, oppressed by Amurath, and by the vngrateful Destinies taken out of this world, had neither the means to leaue vnto you his kingdome and scepter, (as vnto his sonne, then liuing in his enemies power) either was able yet otherwise to prouide for his affaires. And would to God this your father, most happie in such a sonne, might haue liued now: whose felicitie had in that surmounted all others, if he might haue seene you before his death. For as you seeme vnto me aboue all other Princes in the world (without offence be it said) most accomplished with all the good graces and perfections both of
C bodie and mind; so are you indowed also with a certaine diuine and wonderfull fortune: vnder the good conduct whereof, not onely the whole kingdome of Epirus may thinke it selfe in securitie, but all the rest of the other nations also, lately by the detestable fraud and violence of the Othoman Kings dismembred from the realme of Macedon, may also recouer the former beautie of their antient lawes and liberties. For (to say nothing of those things which euen from your childhood hauing continually made you enuied haue heretofore purchased vnto you an immortall fame and glorie euen amongst the Barbarians themselues) what can be more glorious than this victorie which (as we haue heard, and beleeue) you, to your singular admiration, haue obtained, by the ouerthrow and vtter discomfiture of Alis Bassa, with his so great and mightie a power? But now ô Scanderbeg (God so appointing it, who in his deepe and D secret wisedome hath reserued you vnto these so dangerous times, for the Publique good, and comfort of the Christian Commonweale) there offers it selfe vnto you an object of farre greater glorie, with a faire and fit occasion for you to reuenge your selfe of all the wrongs and iniuries both new and old, by Amurath the Turkish Sultan done, not in priuate to the person of your selfe onely, but vnto the whole State and Kingdome of Epirus also; and not the domesticall and ciuile miseries of your owne Countrey onely, but the publique calamities also, and those opprobrious disgraces done against the Christian Faith and Religion in generall, now oppressed (I will not say extinguished:) and that is, if you with your victorius Forces will succour vs in this extreamitie of our affaires, not yet altogether desperate. Hereunto doe all the Princes of Hungarie and Polonia, and all other men of courage inuite you, Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angell intreateth you; with all those deuout and couragious Christians, which long since here with vs, and readie in armes, wish for nothing more than the presence of your victorious en- E signes. Which so faire an occasion (by God himselfe now offered) if you refuse not, will in all mens iudgment be a sure meane to vanquish and ouerthrow our common enemie the Turke, and to driue him quite out of Europe, wrongfully by him of so long time possessed. I need not therefore (as I suppose) to vse any kind of persuasion vnto you in this cause and quarrel, the defence whereof doth purchase vnto vs health, light, and libertie: but being neglected, I feare and abhorre to forbode what may ensue thereof. We Christians haue been too too slacke and backward in helping one another: the flame hath now well neere consumed vs all, whilest no man thought it would haue come neere himselfe. What do we see of the Greek Empire? What of the Bulgarians and Seruians? yea, myne owne losses, and many calamities alreadie, and yet also to be endured, who is able to recount? The braue and most valiant Princes, the surest Bul-
F warkes and defences of the Kingdome of Hungarie, from time to time lost; and the puissant Armies with one and the same fatall chance of warre consumed and brought to nothing, who is able to reckon vp? In so much that there is no house, wife, nor Matrone, in all Hungarie, which is not in some measure partaker of this heauinesse. All this doe the Christian Princes heare of, and yet the miserable estate and condition of their allies can nothing moue any one of them, but suffer vs thus as a sacrifice sacrifice for the rest, to be on all parts exposed to the rage and furie of the common and mercilesse ene-mie. Only Eugenius the most holy Bishop of Rome, and Philip Duke of Burgundie, haue not refused to beare a part of the burthen of this our afflicted fortune: the one hath sent hither his Legat Iulian the Cardinall, with notable and puissant succors; and the other with his fleet at sea, and come as far as Hel-lespontus, so much as in him lieth, doth notably hinder the Turks passage into Europe. And one other hope there is, not now far from vs, and that is your helpe, whereof we are so desirous: which wee require of you, mouea thereunto partly by your valour so well knowne, and partly in regard of the imminent peril and common danger of vs all. And albeit we are not ignorant, how euill you may be at leisure to take such an expedition in hand, for the late troubled estate of your affaires, and your new recouered Kingdome, as yet scarcely well established: yet notwithstanding, let it not withhold you, or keepe you backe; assuring you, that as this expedition cannot be but vnto you most honorable, euen so this your present desert shall not be bestowed vpon vngratefull and thankelesse men; but that which you shall now first begin and vndertake for our preseruation and dignitie, we will from henceforth and euer continue for your glorie, and for the increase of your greatnesse. Fare you well. From our regall citie of Buda the fourth of Iuly, 1444.

Of this the Kings motion Scanderbeg liking well, and thinking it farre better now in so fit a time, with his own forces ioined vnto the Hungarians his friends, thorowly to busie Amurath, than in short time after, himselfe alone to sustaine his whole power; by the general consent of the Albanian Princes his confederates and allies, yeelded vnto his request; in liberall termes promising him by his letters, in good time to be present with him with thirtie thousand good soldiers. The copie of which letters I thought it not amisse here to set downe also.

Scanderbeg Prince of the Epirots, vnto Vladislaus King of Hungarie and Polonia, greeting.

Scanderbeg his answere by Letters vnto King Vladislaus.

Your Letters, most inuincible King, I haue with like ioy and contentment receiued: which I in the generall assemblie of my Chieftaines hauing caused publiquely to be read, there was not any one of them which was not of opinion, but that so just an occasion of warre by you offered, was forthwith to be joyfully on our behalfe also embraced. And so euery man doth both publikely and priuatly affirme, That nothing could haue hapned vnto them more acceptable from God, than that they might by some notable seruice testifie their gratefull minds, and bind vnto them so excellent a Prince; as also to giue so fit succors vnto the Christian Commonweale. In which forwardnesse of my people I my selfe tooke great contentment and pleasure, both in regard of your selfe, and in the behalfe of the publike & common cause: seeing my men of warre and al other my subiects, of what state or degree soeuer (without any persuasion vsed on my part) to be so cheerefully and couragiously minded in defence of the faith, and of the Christian Religion; and so well affectioned towards your most royall Majestie. And to say the truth, Who is he (if he be not hatefull vnto God and man) albeit there were no question of Religion, or of the Common danger, that would refuse so just and lawfull a war? for such a King, as vnto whom alone we may and ought to attribute, That we Christians do not only raigne, but euen liue, breath, and enjoy the liber-tie of our speech. Who would not willingly take vp armes, and aduenture himselfe into most manifest and certaine danger for the people of Hungarie; by whom in all ages the Christian Commonweale hath with their so many trauels, and so much of their bloud, beene so mightily supported and defended? who euen from the verie cradle haue been continuall enemies vnto our enemies, and haue as it were euen vowed themselues for the honour of the Christian Religion and name. Would God (most mightie and redoubted Vladislaus) it had beene in my power to haue brought vnto you such forces to this honourable warre, as were answerable vnto my courage and desire: then happily Europe should not longer lie in this ignominious estate, oppressed by Amurath; neither should the fields of Varna or Basilia so often smoke with the bloud of the Hungarians; nor euerie corner of Macedonia with the bloud of the Epirots: both nations being as it were become the expiatorie sacrifices of others sinnes and offences; wee all now by turnes perish, whilest euerie man thinketh himselfe borne but for himselfe alone. But why doe I vnto my selfe poure forth these vaine complaints. Truly, it neither repenteth mee of my Forces, neither (as I suppose, if it shall please God that our Forces may once meete and ioyne together in so happie a warre) shall the Christian Commonweale haue any cause to sorrow or be a-grieued with the issue and euent of our fortune. For vnto those fifteen thousand good soldiers which lately

ly discomfited Alis Bassa on the borders of Macedonia, my purpose is to ioyne as many moe vnto them:
with all which strength as soone as conueniently they may, I wil begin to set forward, ready to follow your ensignes in all euents whatsoeuer. And so fare you well. from Croia the third of August 1444.

These letters being dispatched away vnto the king, Scanderbeg forthwith began to leuy his forces. And first of all hee caused with new supplies to bee made strong, all those companies wherwith hee had ouerthrowne Alis Bassa, not suffering any one of them to absent himselfe from this expedition. Vnto whom being in number fifteen thousand, al men of approued valor, he ioyned other fifteen thousand moe, no lesse valiant than they: such a power as he neuer either before or after raised for the recouerie, or defence of his kingdom. And so furnished with all things necessarie for so honourable a warre, cheerfully set forward, accompanied with the vows and hope of all his most faithfull and louing subiects. But being come to the borders of Seruia, he found the strait and difficult passages of that rough country shut vp by George the Despot, (Lord thereof, a man adorned with all the graces of nature, but otherwise a wicked damned Atheist, and a Christian but in name onely) who but lately before restored vnto his kingdom by the helpe of King Vladislaus, hauing changed his mind, did now mightily cleaue vnto the Turke his son in law (by whom he had bin before himselfe exiled) and in fauour of his querrel, and despight of the Hungarians, but specialy of Huniades, had stopped vp the ways and passages wherby Scanderbeg was with his armie to passe: who by his embassador sent of purpose vnto the Despot, complained to him of that wrong, putting him in minde of the periurious dealing of Amurath with him, notwithstanding he had maried his daughter: and of the great pleasures the Hungarians had done him; of both which he had good proofe: requesting him if it were but in regard of the common cause of Christianity to giue vnto him (as vnto his friend by whom he was neuer in any thing wronged) passage; and not to staine himselfe with the perpetuall note of infamie, That hee being a Christian Prince, and of late so mightily oppressed by the Turke, should now to the great hinderance of the Christian common weale take part with him, against his friends and deliuerers. But what auaileth praiers or requests, be they neuer so reasonable, with a man set downe to mischiefe? Scanderbeg out of hope by any other meanes to open his way, but by plaine force, resolued so to doe: although it much grieued him to spend those forces vpon a Christian Prince, which hee had prepared against the capitall enemie both of himselfe and all good Christians, old Amurath the Turkish Sultan.

NAWAB SALAR JUNG BAHADUR

But whilest hee thus discontented, spendeth his time with his armie vpon the borders of Seruia, beset with many difficulties; Vladislaus prickt forward by the continual solicitation of Iulian the Cardinall, or else drawne on by his owne ineuitable destinie, hauing assembled a great armie of valiant and couragious souldiers out of Hungarie and Polonia (yet in number far inferiour to that he had in the yeare before, for that most of the voluntarie souldiers were returned home) set forward from Segedinum; and in the beginning of Nouember (a time vnfit for warres) passed ouer Danubius, and entring into Bulgaria, came to Nicopolis, the Metropoliticall Citie of that kingdome (but then in possession of the Turkes) where hee burnt the suburbs thereof, and in that fruitfull countrey thereabouts refreshed his people three or foure dayes, where hee also mustered his armie, and tooke a view thereof: At which time Dracula Vayuod of Valachia, a man of great experience in martiall affaires, being then present, and considering the small number of the Kings armie, began to persuade him to retire; saying, He had sufficiently learned by his owne harmes, to deeme aright of the power of the Turkish Sultan: who (as hee sayd) was wont many times to carrie more men with him into the fields into his disport of hawking and hunting, than was there in the Kings campe: wherefore hee should doe well, not to expose those his small forces vnto so manifest perill, in such vnseasonable time of the yeare, but to reserue them vnto a more fit opportunitie, when hee might with greater power encounter his puissant enemie. This his counsell most men of greatest experience, and not carried away with other priuate respects, thought wholesome: but the Cardinall, author of this fatall warre, extolling with great words the last yeares victorie obtained against the Turke, with glorious promises of great aid, as well by sea from the Pope, and the Venetians, as by land from the Emperour of Constantinople and other Christian Princes; augmenting also the great troubles in Asia, and promising an easie and happie

King Vladislaus setteth forward against the Turke.

succesſe

succeſſe vnto theſe warres in Europe: perſuaded the King that Dracula his ſpeech proceeded either of ignorance, vpon a ſuperficiall iudgement which hee made of the Kings power there preſent, without regard of further ſtrength from his friends; or elſe of the priuat reſpect of his owne ſecuritie, in regard of a commodious league made a little before betwixt him and the Turke. So that the poore Prince ſeeing his counſell mightily impugned by the Cardinal, and not ſo well taken, as it was meant by him, ſtood in a doubt whether to leaue him to his owne fortune, and himſelfe to his quiet peace, or caſting off the Turkiſh league, to ioyne with the King in this chance of war: but at length reſolued as a martial minded man, preferring the vncertaine glorie of the field before his owne aſſured reſt, ſaid vnto the King:

Seeing that either your princely fortune, which hath euer hitherto fauoured your high attempts; or elſe the hope of friends helpe, which I pray God faile you not at your need; or the ſecret deſignement of your deſtinie, vnable to be auoyded, doth draw your maieſtie into a different opinion from me: that your reſolution, which I cannot by reaſonable perſuaſion alter, I will as the ſuddennеſſe of time, and my ſmall abilitie will permit, moſt gladly further.

Dracula aideth Vladiſlaus with his ſonne and 4000 horſe.

And therewith preſented vnto the king, his ſon, with foure thouſand horſemen wel appointed, to ſerue him in thoſe wars; wiſhing vnto him ſuch good ſucceſſe as he himſelfe deſired. Afterward when he was about to take his leaue of the King, he preferred vnto him two luſtie yong men, perfect guides for that country, with two horſes of incredible ſwiftneſſe, and with teares ſtanding in his eyes ſaid vnto him:

His laſt farewel vnto the King.

Take this ſmall gift in good part, as a poore refuge to flie vnto, if your fortune hap to faile you, which I tremble to thinke vpon: I pray God they be giuen in vain, and ſo they ſhall if my praiers may preuaile. Yet if neceſſitie ſhall inforce you to vſe them, you ſhall find them ſeruiceable at your need.

And ſo taking his laſt farewell of the King, returned into Valachia. Vladiſlaus marching on from Nicopolis toward Thracia, tooke many townes and forts by the way, which the Turks for feare yeelded vnto him: at laſt he came to Sumium and Pezechium, where the Turkiſh garriſons truſting as much to the ſtrength of the places, as to their owne valour, ſtood vpon their guard: but the king layed ſiege to both the ſaid places, and took them by aſſault; where he put to ſword fiue thouſand of the Turkes.

The Turks Baſſaes terrified with thoſe vnexpected troubles, aduertiſed Amurath thereof, requeſting him to leaue his obſcure life, and to leuie the greateſt power he could in Aſia, for the defence of the Turkiſh kingdome in Europe, which otherwiſe was in ſhort time like to be loſt: blaming alſo his diſcretion, for committing the gouernment of ſo great a kingdom to ſo young a Prince as was Mahomet his ſonne, vnto whom many of the great captaines did halfe ſcorne to yeeld their due obedience. Amurath heerewith awaked, as it had beene out of a dead ſleepe, left his cloiſter, and with great ſpeed gathered a ſtrong armie in Aſia, and came to the ſtraits of Helleſpontus, where hee found the paſſage ſtopped by the Venetian and Popes Gallies, and was therefore at his wits end. But marching alongſt the Sea ſide vnto the ſtraits of Boſphorus, hee there found meanes to conuey ouer his whole armie: vſing therein (as ſome write) the helpe of the Genoway marchants ſhips, paying vnto the Genoways for the paſſage of euery Turke a ducat, which amounted to the ſumme of an hundred thouſand duckats: or as ſome others affirme, corrupting with great bribes them that were left for the defence of this paſſage. And being now got ouer, ioyned his Aſian armie with ſuch other forces as his Baſſaes had in readineſſe in Europe: and ſo marching on ſeuen dayes, encamped within foure miles of Varna, a citie pleaſantly ſtanding vpon the Euxine ſea ſide in Bulgaria, where the Chriſtian armie lay: for Vladiſlaus hearing of Amurath his comming with ſo great an armie, had retired thither, hauing but a little before taken the ſame Citie of Varna from the Turkes, with Calachrium, Galata, Macropolis, and others vpon the ſea coaſt.

Vpon the firſt report that Amurath was with ſuch a mightie armie come ouer the ſtrait of Boſphorus, Vladiſlaus who before was in good hope that hee could not poſſibly haue found any paſſage, entered into counſell with the commanders of his armie, what courſe was now beſt to take: where many which before had bin moſt forward in that action (preſuming that Amurath could by no means haue tranſported his army) was now ſo diſcoraged with the fame of his comming, that they aduiſed the king in time to retire home, & not to oppoſe ſo ſmal an army againſt ſuch a world of people as was reported to follow the Turke. But other captains of of greateſt courage, and eſpecially Huniades, ſaid, It was not for the Kings honor firſt to inuade his enemies dominions, and preſently to turn his back vpon the firſt report of their comming; wiſhing him rather to remember the good fortune of his former warres, and that hee was to fight againſt the ſame enemie whom he had victoriouſly ouerthrowne the yere before: as for the multitude of his enemies, he had learned by experience (as he ſaid) not to be moued therewith, for that it was the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, more to terrifie their enemies with the ſhew of a huge armie, than with the valour of their ſouldiers, which were nothing to be accounted of, but as effeminate, in compariſon of the Hungarians. Whereupon the King reſolued to trie the fortune of the field.

Vladiſlaus vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that Amurath the night before encamped within foure miles, was now putting his armie in order of battell; committed the ordering of all his forces vnto the valiant captain Huniades: who with great care and induſtrie diſpoſed the ſame, garding the one ſide of the battell with a fen or mariſh, and the other ſide with cariages, & the rereward of his army with a ſteepe hil. Therein politickly prouiding, that the Chriſtian army being far leſſe than the Turks in number, could not be compaſſed about with the multitude of their enemies, neither any way charged but afront. The Turks armie approching, began to skirmiſh with the Chriſtians, which manner of fight was long time with great courage maintained and that with diuers fortune, ſometime one partie preuailing, and ſometime the other; but with ſuch ſlaughter on both ſides, that the ground was couered and ſtained with the dead bodies and bloud of the ſlaine. At length the battell being more cloſely ioyned, the victorie began to incline to the Chriſtians, for Huniades had moſt valiantly with his Tranſiluanian and Valachian horſemen, put to flight both the wings of the Turkiſh army, and made great ſlaughter whereſoeuer he came. Inſomuch that Amurath diſmaied with the flight of his ſouldiers, was about to haue fled himſelfe out of the maine battell, had he not bin ſtaied by a common ſouldier, who laying hands vpon the raines of his bridle, ſtaied him by force, and ſharpely reproued him of cowardiſe. The captaines and prelates about the King (whome it had better beſeemed to haue bin at deuout praiers in their oratories, than in armes at that boudie battell) encouraged by the proſperous ſucceſſe of Huniades, and deſirous to be partakers of that victorie, fooliſhly left their ſafe ſtations, where they were appointed by him to ſtand faſt, and diſorderedly purſued the chaſe, leauing that ſide of the battell where they ſtood, open vnto the Turks: but they were not gone far, before they were hardly encountred by a great part of the Turks armie, for ſuch purpoſe placed in a vallie faſt by. In which fight Leſco one of the moſt valiant captaines of the Hungarians was ſlaine; and the Biſhop of Veradium, a better churchman than ſouldier, and the firſt man that diſordered the battell, ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe by flight thorow the fenne, was there ſtrangled in the deepe mud, after hee had with his horſe therein ſtruggled a great while. The Biſhop of Agria, a man of greateſt authoritie with the King, was at the ſame time alſo loſt, with many other churchmen more. The Cardinall, with ſome other of the expert captains retiring toward their former ſtandings, were hardly aſſailed by the Turks, who by the comming in of the king and Huntades, were with great ſlaughter forced to retire, and euen ready to flie. Amurath ſeeing the great ſlaughter of his men, and all brought into extreme danger, beholding the picture of the crucifix in the diſplaied enſignes of the voluntarie Chriſtians, pluckt the writing out of his boſome, wherein the late league was compriſed, and holding it vp in his hand with his eyes caſt vp to heauen, ſaid:

Amurath praieth vnto Chriſt.

Behold thou crucified Chriſt, this is the league thy Chriſtians in thy name made with me: which they haue without cauſe violated. Now if thou be a God, as they ſay thou art, and as the dreame, reuenge the wrong now done vnto thy name, and mee, and ſhew thy power vpon thy periurious people, who in their deeds denie thee their God.

The King with Huniades furiouſly purſued the chaſed Turks, with bloudie execution a great ſpace: when as the King in his heat hardly perſuaded by Huniades to returne againe vnto his campe, at his comming thither found the Cardinall Iulian, with Franke, one of his chiefe captaines, and others, quercharged with the Turks, which had againe made head againſt that part of the Chriſtian armie: and there yet fought couragiouſly, by reaſon of their multitude, being alſo backt by the Ianizaries, which all this while had ſtood faſt with their old King, as his laſt and moſt aſſured refuge, but were now come in. There began a moſt cruel and fierce fight: in the ſucceſſe whereof, the Turks wel ſaw the whole ſtate of their kingdom in Europ to conſiſt,

A cruell fight.

The great battell of Varna, fought between king Vladiſlaus and Amurath.

many were there slain on both sides: the Turks feeling their losse lesse than indeed it was, by reason of their multitude, and the Christians, by reason of their courage. A great while the victorie stood doubtfull, insomuch, that at length the Turks began to shrinke backe, in that part of the battel where the King and Huniades fought. But in the left side they preuailed so vpon the Christians, that they were euen readie to haue fled. Which when Huniades (hauing a vigilant eye vnto euery part of the armie) perceiued, he with speed made thither, and there again with his presence restored the battell almost before lost. Which done, he returned again towards the King, who in the meane time had most valiantly repulsed a great number of the Turks, & now was come vnto the Ianizaries, Amurath his laſt hope. There was to be seene a thousand manners of death, whilst both the armies fought more like wild beasts in their rage and fury, than wary and politick soldiers. In this confused medly, the yong king Vladislaus with greater courage than care of himselfe, brake into the battell of the Ianizaries: at which time, Amurath himselfe was by a valiant Frenchman a Knight of the Roads, first wounded with a pike, and after assailed with his sword, and had there ended his days, but that he was speedily rescued by his guard, by whom this worthy knight after great proofe of his valour was there slain in the midst of his enemies. Vladislaus being got also in among them, valiantly performed all the parts of a worthie soldier, till such time as his horse being slain vnder him, he was forthwith oppressed by the multitude of his enemies and slain: his head being strucke off by Ferizes, one of the old Ianizaries, was by him presented vnto Amurath, who commanded it presently to be put vpon the point of a launce, and proclamation to be made, that it was the head of the Christian king: which was afterwards so caried thorow the principal cities of Macedonia, and Grecia, as a trophey of the Turks victorie. Huniades after he had in vaine giuen diuers braue attempts, to haue rescued the Kings bodie, retired with a few Valachian horsemen, and seeing no hope of better hap (for all the Christians being discouraged with the death of the king, had now taken themselues to flight) gaue place to necessitie, and reseruing himself to his future fortune, fled ouer the mountains, into the thicke woods, from whence with much difficultie he got ouer Danubius into Valachia, and was there (as some write) by Dracula Prince of that country taken prisoner: In reuenge wherof, after he was inlarged by the Hungarians, he so aided Danus against Dracula, that in fine, Dracula & his son were both slaine, and Danus placed in his roome. Iulian the Cardinall flying out of the battell, was found by that worthie man Gregorie Sanose, lying in the desart forrest by the way side, mortally wounded, and halfe stripped, by whom he was in few words sharply reproued, as the wicked author of that perfidious war, and there left giuing vp the ghost. Many of the Christians which fled out of that battel, fel into the enemies hands, & so were slain: but greater was the number of them which were drowned in the fens, or that by hunger and cold perished in the woods, or else after long and miserable trauell, finding no passage ouer Danubius, fell at length into the Turkish slauery. This great and mortall battel, as it was with diuers fortune fought, so was also the present report thereof most vncertaine: for the Turks that were at the first put to flight, reported in the townes there by as they fled, that the battel was lost: & they which had al the day endured the fight, not altogether assured of the victory, & not knowing whether the Hungarians had retired themselues, whilst they suspected some deceit in the Kings campe, by reason of the great silence therin, staid two daies before they durst aduenture to take the spoile therof. The number of them that were slain in this battell, as wel on the one side as the other, was great; as the mounts and little hils, raised of the bones & bodies of them that were there buried, do yet at this day declare. Howbeit, the certaine number was not knowne, some reporting moe, some fewer. Yet in this most agree, that of the Christian armie, being not great, scarce the third part escaped: and that the Turks bought this victorie with a farre greater losse, although it was of them lesse felt, by reason of their multitude; made lesse by that slaughter, as they that report least thereof affirme, by thirtie thousand. Which may well seem rather to be so, for that Amurath after this victorie, neither farther prosecuted the same, nor shewed any tokens of ioy at al, but became very melancholie & sad, and being of them about him demanded, Why after so great a victory, he was no merrier; answered, That he wished not at so great price, to gain many such victories. Yet in memoriall thereof he erected a great pillar, in the same place where the king was slain, with an inscription of all that was then don: which, as they say, is yet there to be seen at this day. This bloudie battel was fought neere vnto Varna (in antient time called Dionisio-

Amurath in danger.

King Vladislaus slaine.

Huniades flieth

A Dionisiopolis (a place fatall vnto many great warriours, and therefore of them euen yet abhorred) the tenth day of Nouember, in the yeare of our Lord Christ 1444.

Some maliciously impute the losse of the battel of Varna, and the death of the King, to Huniades, who (as they said) fled out of this battell with ten thousand horsemen: but this report agreeth not with the noble disposition of that couragious and valiant captaine, but seemeth rather to haue beene deuised, to excuse the foule dealing of the clergie; who as most histories beare witnesse, were the chiefe authors both of the warre, and of the lamentable calamitie ensuing thereof.

From the battell of Varna Amurath returned to Hadrianople, hauing lost the greatest part of his best souldiers, and there with great solemnitie buried the bodie of Carazia, vice-roy of B Europe, slaine in that battell: and then calling together all his nobilitie, againe resigned vp his kingdome vnto his sonne Mahomet, retiring himselfe vnto Magnesia, where he liued a solitarie and priuate life, hauing before vowed so to doe, in the great feare he was in, in the battell against Vladislaus: but after he had a short time performed these his vowes in that obscure & melancholie life, he weary thereof, as some suppose, as not a little reuiued with the late victorie, or else solicited by Cali Bassa and other great counsellors, returned againe to Hadrianople, resuming vnto himselfe the gouernment of the kingdome, to the great discontentment of his ambitious sonne Mahomet.

Amurath to performe his vow, resigneth his kingdome to his son Mahomet, which he in short time after taketh again vpon him.

Scanderbeg yet sticking in the borders of Seruia, and hearing what had happened vnto king Vladislaus with the Hungarians, was therewith exceedingly grieued: and hauing now lost the hope whereupon hee had vndertaken that so great an expedition, resolued to returne home
C againe into Epirus. Neuertheless, to be in some part reuenged of the wicked Despot, he with his armie forcibly brake into his countrey, and there did exceeding great harme. In his returning homewards, great numbers of Hungarians and Polonians, lately escaped from the slaughter at Varna, repaired vnto him, whom he (according to the extremitie of their fortune) courteously relieued: and furnishing them with such things as they wanted, prouided them shipping to Ragusa, from whence they might in safetie returne into their owne countries. Thus by the disloyaltie and trecherie of the faithlesse Despot of Seruia, was Scanderbeg staid from being present at the bloudie battell of Varna, to the vnspeakable losse of the Christian common-weale: for it could not be, but that so many thousands of most resolute and expert souldiers, vnder the leading of so worthie a chiefetaine, must needs haue done much for the gai-D ning of the victorie. And what more glorious sight could a man haue wished for, than to haue seene so puissant an armie in the field against the sworne enemy of Christendome, directed by two such valiant and renowned chiefetaines, as neuer, either before or since their time, was seene the like in one battell against the enemie of Christ and the Christian religion? They were both men of inuincible courage, of exceeding strength and agilitie of bodie, wise, prudent, and subtill; both of long time exercised in the Turks warres, the greatest terror of that nation, and most worthie champions of the Christian religion, beeing therein both very zealous. Of the two, Huniades was at that time accounted the better commander, and the more politicke, as a man of greater experience in martiall affaires, by reason of his greater yeares: which was wel counteruailed by Scanderbeg his perpetuall good fortune, still as it were attenE ding vpon him, and by his experience afterwards gotten, as in the course of his Historie well appeareth.

The comparison betwixt Huniades and Scanderbeg.

Amurath aduertised of these proceedings of Scanderbeg, as also of the great harmes by him done in Macedonia, and that the frontiers of his dominions bordering vpon Epirus, were by his furie vtterly wasted and spoiled, and his people there for most part slaine, and that the rest had for feare forsaken their dwellings, and left the country desolate and vnpeopled: was therwith exceedingly moued. Yet for so much as he still stood in dread of the Hungarians, and was now himselfe clogged with yeares, and therefore more desirous of rest; considering also the young yeares of his eldest sonne Mahomet, as yet vnfit for the gouernment of so great and troublesome a kingdome; with the perpetuall good fortune of Scanderbeg, and malice of F Huniades: he thought it not best to conuert all his forces vpon him, but to proue if he could cunningly draw him into some dishonourable peace for a time, that so he might afterwards at leisure bee the better reuenged of him. For which cause he writ vnto him letters, mixt with grieuous threats, and some feigned courtesies, as follo yeth:

Amurath

Amurath Othoman, King of the Turks, and Emperour of the East, to the most ingratefull Scanderbeg, wisheth neither health nor welfare.

The sullen and craftie letters of Amurath to Scanderbeg.

I neuer wanted honourable preferments to bestow vpon thee all the while thou diddest liue in my court, of all others most vnkind Scanderbeg, but now I want wordes wherewith to speake vnto thee, thou hast so highly offended my minde, and touched mine honour, that I know not in discretion what words to vse vnto thee, but of late one of my domesticall seruants. For neither will hard speech mollifie the naturall fiercenesse of thy proud disposition, neither art thou worthie of better, which hast farre exceeded all hostilitie. And because thou wouldest omit no occasion to prouoke mee, hast of late proceeded to that point of follie, that thou hast had thine owne affaires, and the welfare of thine owne subiects, in small regard, by confederating thy selfe in armes with the Hungarians against mee. It grieueth mee to rehearse other thy vnkindnesse, and as it were to touch those sores, if my minde would euer suffer mee to forget the same, or that thine so manifold and horrible treasons, and strange examples of a most vnthankfull mind, were to be couered with silence. Yet I thought good to aduertise thee (although perhaps too late) least that thy vnstaied heat doe vntimely ouerthrow thee, with thy vnluckie kingdom: and then thou wouldest make humble confession of thy long transgression, when thou hast lost thy selfe, and left no hope of refuge in thy desperate estate. Wee haue hitherto sufficiently suffered thy manifold iniuries: thou hast sufficiently prouoked the maiestie of the Othoman Empire, with wrong and contumelious despight; and I with patience haue born all these thy contempts. Thinkest thou that my armie by thee betraied vnto the Hungarians shall bee vnreuenged? Thinkest thou that so many cities and townes in Epirus, by thee rent from the bodie of my Empire, with my garrisons there slaine, shall bee forgotten? Or thinkest thou with thy late committed outrages to escape my reuenging hands? Remember the destruction of mine armie vnder Alis Bassa; the wasting and burning of my dominions; and lately, the Hungarian warres, by thee so farre as in thee was, countenanced; with the territories of George, the Despot of Seruia, my father in law by thee spoiled. At length amend thou graceless man, and expect not further, whether my indignation will breake out. Let not these trifling allurements of thy good fortune, so puffe vp thy foolish desires, and sharpen thy conceits, that thy miserable fortunes afterwards may moue euen thy greatest enemies, or my selfe to compassion. I would thou shouldest at length remember my courtesies (if any sparke of humanitie remain in thy sauage nature) and make me not longer sorrie, that I haue so euill bestowed the same. And although it is not the part of an honorable mind, to rehearse those things which we haue in bountie bestowed vpon any man; yet is it the token of a most vnthankful nature, so easily to forget all kindnes past, as to need to be put in remembrance therof: wherfore Scanderbeg, I cannot but bewaile thy hap, and lament thine estate: For to let passe the health of thy soule (which thou a very reprobate, esteemest as nothing) not to speake of the lawes of Mahomet by thee despised, and the holy Prophet by thee contemned, for the zeale thou hast vnto the Christian superstition: what hast thou (which now holdest thy poore and base kingdome in such price) euer wanted in my hands of all those things which most delight the desires of men? Diddest thou euer want armour, horses, a great traine of followers and seruants, mony, or other superfluities, the allurements of al ages? Or diddest thou want matter to exercise thy valour, for encrease of thine honour? Wast thou euer denied preferments, dignities, and honours of all sorts fit for thine age, both at home and abroad? Was any man in my court dearer vnto mee, than thy selfe? what growing wit, not of strangers only, but of them that were neerest vnto my selfe, was better welcome vnto me than thine? With what carefull instruction did I cause thee to be brought vp? When thou wast deliuered vnto mee almost a child, I daily cherished and encreased thy hoped towardlinesse, with learning and nurture: I haue at all times honoured thee with rich rewards, magnificall praises, and honours of the field (which of all worthie things is most glorious) so that in all feats of armes no souldier was to me better knowne, or captaine of mee more honoured. For all these great benefits, Scanderbeg, thou now shewest thy selfe such an one, that I may be thought not to haue brought vp such a man as I hoped for, but a very serpent in mine owne bosome. But the loue of thy countrey did moue thee; which if thou hadst asked of me, would I haue denied the same vnto thee? which (if thou doest well remember) I so oftentimes voluntarily profered vnto thee? But thou hadst rather to gaine the same by treacherie, than to receiue it at my hands of courtesie. So thine beit therefore on God his name, and that with my very good will. And verily, according to my accustomed clemency towards all them whom I haue once well knowne, and beene familiarly acquainted with,

with, I now pardon thee all thou hast offended me; not for any thy present deserts, which are none, but because in this publique enmitie it pleaseth me to remember my former kindnesse in priuat towards thee, and thy faithfulnesse sometimes in my affaires; especially for that the time was much longer wherein thou seruedst me, than the time wherein thou hast offended me. Croia and thy fathers Kingdome (although thou hast gained the same by foule treacherie) I giue vnto thee, vpon condition thou willingly restore vnto me the other townes of Epirus, which by no right belong vnto thee, but are myne by Law of Armes, by my selfe honourably woon. Whatsoeuer thou hast taken from my father in law the Prince of Seruia, thou shalt forthwith restore, and make him an honorable recompence for the other harmes thou hast done vnto him; and for euer hereafter, thou shalt as well forbeare to offer violence to any our friends, as to ayd any our enemies. So shalt thou for euer auoyd the displeasure of the Turkes, and stand in my good grace and fauour, as thou hast done before: except thou haast rather (being taught by thine owne harmes) then in vaine crie for mercie, when thy furious outrage shall haue me in person an implacable reuenger. Thou knowest thy Forces, thou knowest the strength of myne Armes; thou hast before thyne eyes the fresh example of the Hungarian fortune, so that thou needest no further admonitions. Yet I would thou shouldest write at large, what thou intendest to do. Thou mayst also confer with Ayradin our seruant, our trustie and faithfull messenger, of whom thou shalt vnderstand more than are in these letters comprised. Farewell if thou be wise. From Hadrianople.

To these letters Scanderbeg gaue small credit, and lesse to the messenger, but least of all to the old Fox himselfe, whome hee well knew to haue written nothing simply of good meaning, but onely to gaine a cessation from warres, vntill he might at better leisure set vpon him with all his Forces. Wherefore calling Ayradin the messenger vnto him, whom he rather held for a craftie Spie, than an honourable Embassadour, after he had many times both publiquely and priuately discoursed with him, so farre forth as was possible to sound the depth of his comming, and had also further entertained him with all honourable courtesies, he shewed him all his campe, with the strength thereof; which he did, because he would not haue the craftie messenger to thinke, that hee was any thing affraid of his Masters greatnesse. And at last, greatly complaining of Amurath his cruell and perfideous dealing against his father, his brethren, and himselfe, he sent him away with such answere in writing, as followeth:

The Souldier of Christ Iesus, George Castriot, syrnamed Scanderbeg, Prince of Epirus, to Amurath Otheman King of the Turks sendeth greeting.

The resolute answer of Scanderbeg to Amurath his letters.

Thou hast in times past, as thou writest, exceeded me in many kinds of courtesies; and at this present I will exceed thee in modest and temperate speech: for I thinke there is no greater token of a base mind, than not to be able to forbeare to giue railing and opprobrious words, euen vnto our most mortall enemies. Wherefore we haue with patience receiued and seen both thy letters and messenger; and to confesse a truth, they haue ministred vnto me greater occasion of smile, than choler: whilest at the first thou shamest not to accuse me of much ingratitude and treason: and presently following a milder passion, feemst carefull of my soules health, being ignorant of thyne owne estate, as a studious defender of a most damnable errour. And at last, keeping neither law of armes, nor orderly course answering to our affaires, doest most insolently and vnaduisedly, as a valiant conqueror to his vanquished enemie, propound many conditions of peace, of such qualitie and condition, that myne eares scorne to heare the same. Truly Amurath, although thy immoderate rayling might moone a man of greatest patience to intemperate speech; yet I impute the same partly to thy great age, and partly to the waiwardnesse of thy nature; and the rest, to thy conceined griefe, which I know thou canst hardly moderate: and the rather, for that I haue not set downe my selfe to contend with thee in foule and vnseemely language, but with armes, and the just furie of war. Yet I pray thee, wherefore dost thou so exclaime against me before God and man? as though thou hadst first suffered wrong and injurie from me, and that thou hadst not in truth first done the same. Dost thou call my necessarie departing, a perfideous treachery? my native country by my policie and valour recouered, dost thou obiect to me as a villanie? obiect the same still and spare not; charge me with such crimes for euer, I care not. The long catalogue of thy kindnesse towards me, which thou rehearsest, I could willingly remember, if it drew not with it the wofull remembrance of my greater miseries: which if

If they were to be compared together, the greatnesse of thy good deserts would be ouerwhelmed with the multitude of thy greater tyrannies; which I had rather thou shouldest count with thy selfe, than blush whilest I repeat them. Euery man that knoweth them, may maruell how I had power to endure them, or that thou wast not wearie at last of thy crueltie and secret hatred. Thou tookest away my fathers Kingdome by force; thou diddest murther my brethren, and my selfe thou didst most wickedly vow to death; when I little feared any such cruelty: & doth it now seeme strange to thee, ô Amurath, that an inuincible mind, desirous of libertie, should seek to break out of the bonds of so great & insolent slauerie? How long at length didst thou thinke I would endure thy proud bondage? which for all that, I many yeres endured, and refused not thy command. I exposed my selfe to publique and priuat dangers, both voluntary, and by thy designement: speeches were giuen out dayly by thy selfe, and the admonition of my friends concerning thy deepe treacherie, was rife in myne eares: Yet for all that, of long time I simply beleeued both thy words and deeds to haue been denoyd of all fraud, vntill thy cankered malice began too too apparently to shew it selfe; then began I also to glose with thee, wholly metamorphosed into thyne owne conceits, vntil I found occasion to recouer my libertie. Wherefore there is no cause thou shouldest now grieue, if thou be wel beaten with thyne owne rod. But these are but trifles, Amurath, in comparison of those things which I haue layd vp in hope and resolution of mind. Therefore hereafter surcease thyne angrie threats, and tel not vs of the Hungarian fortune: euery man hath his own resolution, and euery man a particular gouernor of his actions; and so will we with patience endure such fortune as it shall please God to appoynt vs. In the meane time, for direction of our affaires we will not request councell of our enemies, nor peace of thee, but victorie by the helpe of God. Farewell. From our Campe.

When Amurath had read these letters, and further conferred with Ayradin, he was filled with wrath and indignation, wondering at the great resolution of so small a Prince, presently casting in his mind (as was thought) the difficultie of that warre. Yet because he would giue no token of feare, oftentimes stroking his white beard, as his manner was when he was thorowly angrie, with a dissembled cheerefulnesse of countenance sayd, Amurath his passionat speech in his rage, against Scanderbeg.

Thou desirest (wicked man) thou desirest the title of some honorable death: We will giue it thee (beleeue vs) we will giue it thee; we our selues will be present at the buriall of our foster child, and in person (though vnbidden) honour the funerall pompe of the great King of Epirus, that thou shalt neuer complaine among the damned ghosts, that thou diddest die a base or obscure kind of death.

And for because at that time, by reason of many great occurrents, he could not conuert his whole power into Epirus, he sent Ferises one of his best Captaines, with nine thousand choice horsemen, to keepe Scanderbeg in doing, and to spoyle his countrey so much as he could. Which was with such speed done, as it was thought Ferises would haue bin in the heart of Epirus, before Scanderbeg could haue had knowledge of his comming. But for all his hast, he could not so preuent the flying fame, but that Scanderbeg hearing thereof, and hauing his men alwayes in readinesse, placed fifteene hundred good footmen in ambush vpon the rough mountaines leading into the valley of Mouea, whereby the Turks must needs passe into Epirus; placing also two thousand horsemen, as he thought most fit and conuenient for his purpose. Ferises descending from the high mountaines full of woods and bushes, by the broken and stonie wayes leading into the valley, was in that troublesome and intricate passage fiercely set vpon by Scanderbegs readie footmen, suddenly arising out of ambush, where the Turkes hauing no vse of their horses, but rather by them encombered, were slaine as Deere enclosed in a toyle. In this conflict seuen hundred and sixtie Turks were taken prisoners, and a great number slaine, and Ferises himselfe, with the rest, enforced to flie, crying still out as he fled, Better some saued, than all lost. Scanderbeg hauing thus ouerthrowne Ferises, pursued him into Macedonia, and with the spoyle there taken, rewarded his soldiers, as he had also many times before done.

Amurath grieued with the ouerthrow of Ferises, presently sent Mustapha a politique and hardie captaine, with a new supplie of six thousand soldiers, to take the charge from Ferises; commanding him in no case, nor vpon any occasion to enter farre into Epirus: but onely to burn and spoyle the frontiers thereof, saying, That he would account it for good seruice, if he might but vnderstand, that the trees and fruits of that country had felt the force of his anger.

Mustapha

Mustapha hauing receiued his charge, when he began to draw neere the borders of Epirus, continually sent out scouts before his armie, to see if the passages were cleere, & so warily entred the vallie of Mocrea, where Ferizes not long before was ouerthrowne. In this fruitful vallie, being the frontiers of Scanderbegs dominion, Mustapha intrenched his armie, vpon the rising of a hill, and placed espials vpon the top of the high mountains round about, by them to discouer the comming of the enemie, and to haue notice thereof by signes into the campe: then reseruing 4000 horsemen with himselfe, to keepe his campe, he sent forth the rest of his armie, about 9000 horsemen, to forrage and spoyle the country; giuing charge before, That euerie man vpon pain of death should presently retyre to the campe, vpon signe giuen from thence, as to a place of safetie and refuge. The Turkish armie ranging ouer that rich and pleasant vallie, burnt the villages, cut down trees, spoyled the Vineyards, and made hauocke of all things that fire and sword could destroy; in that point executing Amuraths command to the ful. At length Scanderbeg drawing neere to this vallie with 4000 horsemen and 1000 foot, was aduertised of all the enemies doings, by an Epirot soldier, who grieuously wounded, had hardly escaped from the Turks: of him he vnderstood, what number of Turks were burning and destroying the country, of the campe also kept by Mustapha, and how espials were placed vpon the mountains. Scanderbeg hauing well considered Mustapha his warie proceedings, and seeing no policie to be vsed against so caretul an enemie, resolued to vanquish him by plaine force, by assaulting him suddenly in his trenches, before his dispersed soldiers could repaire to the campe: and hauing to this purpose with effectuall persuasions incouraged the minds of his valiant soldiers, readie of themselues to follow him thorow all dangers; when he had set all things in order for the assaulting of the enemies campe, speedily entred the vallie, and was presently discouered by the enemies espials, from the tops of the high hils, and a signe giuen to the camp, from whence also the appointed signe was giuen for the dispersed soldiers to retire: but most of them being strayd from the campe, & busied in taking the spoile of the country, heard not or saw not the signe giuen. Those which were within the hearing therof, retired to the campe, and at their heeles followed Scanderbegs souldiers, terrifying them with calling vpon the name of Scanderbeg. Many of the Turks were by the Christians slain in the entrance of the campe, with their booties in their hands, and presently the Turks trenches were now by Scanderbegs souldiers couragiously assaulted, and the Turks beaten from the top of them. They hauing won the trenches, preuailed stil vpon the Turks, filling all their camp with feare and slaughter. There was no vse of shot in that medly, by reason of the straitnes of the place, for they were now come to pell mell. Mustapha seeing his souldiers put to the worst, and that the campe was not long to be defended, tooke horse and fled by the port which was furthest from the enemie. The rest of the soldiers fled also, making such poore shift for themselues as they could. In this battel 5000 Turks were slain, and but 300 taken; for the Christians inraged with the spoyle of the country, reuenged themselues with the slaughter of the Turkes. Scanderbeg lost in this conflict but 20 horsemen and 50 footmen. The rest of the Turks armie dispersed in the country, hearing the tumult in the camp, misdoubting the fortune of their fellows, fled also; yet many of them were in that flight pursued and slaine.

Scanderbeg his valiant resolution for the assaulting of Mustapha in his campe.

After this ouerthrow, Mustapha returning to Amurath, the better to excuse the misfortune of himselfe and the other captains before sent, greatly commended the inuincible courage of Scanderbeg, and his wonderful skil in feats of arms; persuading Amurath, either to send a greater power against him, or else none at all: saying, That to send such small armies, was but to minister matter to the increase of his glorie, and the infamie of the Turks; and to vse policie against him, the master of policie, was but meere follie. It grieued Amurath to heare the prayses of his enemie, although he knew the same to be true, by the continuall fortune he had alwayes against his great captains, Alis Bassa, Ferizes, and Mustapha: wherefore he determined for a time not to prouoke him further, but to suffer him to liue in peace: yet commanded Mustapha to renew his armie for defence of the borders of his kingdom towards Epirus, against the innouation of Scanderbeg; but straitly commanding him, in no case to inuade any part of Epirus, neither vpon any occasion offered, or conceiued hope of victorie, to joyne battell with Scanderbeg, for feare of such euill successe as before.

At this time also the Grecians of Peloponesus (now called Morea) hauing before fortified the strait of Corinth from sea to sea, with a perpetuall wall which they called Hexamylum, and red, and refused not thy command. I exposed my selfe to publique and priuat dangers, both voluntary, and by thy designement: speeches were giuen out dayly by thy selfe, and the admonition of my friends concerning thy deepe treacherie, was rife in myne eares: Yet for all that, of long time I simply beleeued both thy H words and deeds to haue been deuoyd of all fraud, vntill thy cankered malice began too too apparently to shew it selfe; then began I also to glose with thee, wholly metamorphosed into thyne owne conceits, vntil I found occasion to recouer my libertie. Wherefore there is no cause thou shouldest now grieue, if thou be wel beaten with thyne owne rod. But these are but trifles, Amurath, in comparison of those things which I haue layd vp in hope and resolution of mind. Therefore hereafter surcease thyne angrie threats, and tel not vs of the Hungarian fortune: euery man hath his own resolution, and euery man a particular gouernor of his actions; and so will we with patience endure such fortune as it shall please God to appoynt vs.

In the meane time, for direction of our affaires we will not request councell of our enemies, nor peace of thee, but victorie by the helpe of God. Farewell. From our Campe.

When Amurath had read these letters, and further conferred with Ayradin, he was filled I with wrath and indignation, wondering at the great resolution of so small a Prince, presently casting in his mind (as was thought) the difficultie of that warre. Yet because he would giue no token of feare, oftentimes stroking his white beard, as his manner was when he was thorowly angrie, with a dissembled cheerefulnesse of countenance sayd, Amurath his passionat speech in his rage, against Scanderbeg.

Thou desirest (wicked man) thou desirest the title of some honorable death: We will giue it thee (beleeue vs) we will giue it thee; we our selues will be present at the burial of our foster child, and in person (though vnbidden) honour the funerall pompe of the great King of Epirus, that thou shalt neuer complaine among the damned ghosts, that thou diddest die a base or obscure kind of death.

And for because at that time, by reason of many great occurrents, he could not conuert his whole power into Epirus, he sent Ferises one of his best Captaines, with nine thousand choice horsemen, to keepe Scanderbeg in doing, and to spoyle his countrey so much as he could. Which was with such speed done, as it was thought Ferises would haue bin in the heart of Epirus, before Scanderbeg could haue had knowledge of his comming. But for all his hast, he could not so preuent the flying fame, but that Scanderbeg hearing thereof, and hauing his men alwayes in readinesse, placed fifteene hundred good footmen in ambush vpon the rough mountaines leading into the valley of Mouea, whereby the Turks must needs passe into Epi- L rus; placing also two thousand horsemen, as he thought most fit and conuenient for his purpose. Ferises descending from the high mountaines full of woods and bushes, by the broken and stonie wayes leading into the valley, was in that troublesome and intricate passage fiercely set vpon by Scanderbegs readie footmen, suddenly arising out of ambush, where the Turkes hauing no vse of their horses, but rather by them encombered, were slaine as Deere enclosed in a toyle. In this conflict seuen hundred and sixtie Turks were taken prisoners, and a great number slaine, and Ferises himselfe, with the rest, enforced to flie, crying still out as he fled, Better some saued, than all lost. Scanderbeg hauing thus ouerthrowne Ferises, pursued him into Macedonia, and with the spoyle there taken, rewarded his soldiers, as he had also many times before done.

Amurath grieued with the ouerthrow of Ferises, presently sent Mustapha a politique and M hardie captaine, with a new supplie of six thousand soldiers, to take the charge from Ferises; commanding him in no case, nor vpon any occasion to enter farre into Epirus: but onely to burn and spoyle the frontiers thereof, saying, That he would account it for good seruice, if he might but vnderstand, that the trees and fruits of that country had felt the force of his anger.

Mustapha

A Mustapha hauing receiued his charge, when he began to draw neere the borders of Epirus, continually sent out scouts before his armie, to see if the passages were cleere, & so warily entred the vallie of Mocrea, where Ferizes not long before was ouerthrowne. In this fruitful vallie, being the frontiers of Scanderbegs dominion, Mustapha intrenched his armie, vpon the rising of a hill, and placed espials vpon the top of the high mountains round about, by them to discouer the comming of the enemie, and to haue notice thereof by signes into the campe: then re-seruing 4000 horsemen with himselfe, to keepe his campe, he sent forth the rest of his armie, about 9000 horsemen, to forrage and spoyle the country; giuing charge before, That euerie man vpon pain of death should presently retyre to the campe, vpon signe giuen from thence, as to a place of safetie and refuge. The Turkish armie ranging ouer that rich and pleasant val-B lie, burnt the villages, cut down trees, spoyled the Vineyards, and made hauocke of all things that fire and sword could destroy; in that point executing Amuraths command to the ful. At length Scanderbeg drawing neere to this vallie with 4000 horsemen and 1000 foot, was aduertised of all the enemies doings, by an Epirot soldier, who grieuously wounded, had hardly escaped from the Turks: of him he vnderstood, what number of Turks were burning and destroying the country, of the campe also kept by Mustapha, and how espials were placed vp-on the mountains. Scanderbeg hauing well considered Mustapha his warie proceedings, and seeing no policie to be vsed against so carefull an enemie, resolued to vanquish him by plaine force, by assaulting him suddenly in his trenches, before his dispersed soldiers could repaire to the campe: and hauing to this purpose with effectuall persuasions incouraged the minds of his valiant soldiers, readie of themselues to follow him thorow all dangers; when he had set Scanderbeg his valiant resolution for the assaulting of Mustapha in his campe.
C all things in order for the assaulting of the enemies campe, speedily entred the vallie, and was presently discouered by the enemies espials, from the tops of the high hils, and a signe giuen to the camp, from whence also the appointed signe was giuen for the dispersed soldiers to retire: but most of them being strayd from the campe, & busied in taking the spoile of the country, heard not or saw not the signe giuen. Those which were within the hearing therof, retired to the campe, and at their heeles followed Scanderbegs souldiers, terrifying them with calling vpon the name of Scanderbeg. Many of the Turks were by the Christians slain in the entrance of the campe, with their booties in their hands, and presently the Turks trenches were now by Scanderbegs souldiers couragiously assaulted, and the Turks beaten from the top of them.
They hauing won the trenches, preuailed still vpon the Turks, filling all their camp with feare D and slaughter. There was no vse of shot in that medly, by reason of the straitnes of the place, for they were now come to pell mell. Mustapha seeing his souldiers put to the worst, and that the campe was not long to be defended, tooke horse and fled by the port which was furthest from the enemie. The rest of the soldiers fled also, making such poore shift for themselues as they could. In this battel 5000 Turks were slain, and but 300 taken; for the Christians inraged with the spoyle of the country, reuenged themselues with the slaughter of the Turkes. Scanderbeg lost in this conflict but 20 horsemen and 50 footmen. The rest of the Turks armie dispersed in the country, hearing the tumult in the camp, misdoubting the fortune of their fellows, fled also; yet many of them were in that flight pursued and slaine.

After this ouerthrow, Mustapha returning to Amurath, the better to excuse the misfortune E of himselfe and the other captains before sent, greatly commended the inuincible courage of Scanderbeg, and his wonderful skil in feats of arms; perswading Amurath, either to send a greater power against him, or else none at all: saying, That to send such small armies, was but to minister matter to the increase of his glorie, and the infamie of the Turks; and to vse policie against him, the master of policie, was but meere follie. It grieued Amurath to heare the prayses of his enemie, although he knew the same to be true, by the continuall fortune he had always against his great captains, Alis Bassa, Ferizes, and Mustapha: wherefore he determined for a time not to prouoke him further, but to suffer him to liue in peace: yet commanded Mustapha to renew his armie for defence of the borders of his kingdom towards Epirus, against the F innouation of Scanderbeg; but straitly commanding him, in no case to inuade any part of Epirus, neither vpon any occasion offered, or conceiued hope of victorie, to joyne battell with Scanderbeg, for feare of such euill successe as before.

At this time also the Grecians of Peloponesus (now called Morea) hauing before fortified the strait of Corinth from sea to sea, with a perpetuall wall which they called Hexamylum, and deepe trenches about six miles in length, had also built fiue strong Castles in the same wall, of purpose to take away all passage by land into that rich countrey, and began now not only to denie the yerely tribute they were woont to pay vnto the Turkish King, but also to inuade such Princes of Achaia their neighbors, as were content to remaine still the Turks tributaries; among whom Nerius Prince of Athens, and Turacan gouernor of Thessalia for Amurath, ceased not by continuall complaints to incense him against them of Peloponesus. Who hauing his armie in readinesse, although it was now Winter, and he himselfe very aged, set forward from Hadrianople, and marching thorow Thessalia, came into Achaia, where most of the Grecians were before fled for feare into Peloponesus. So passing on with his armie, he came to the strait commonly called Istmus, where the famous city of Corinth somtime stood; and there incamped his armie neere vnto the strong wal and castles, lately before built, hoping that the Grecians of Peloponesus, terrified with the multitude of his army, would without resistance submit themselues: but when he perceiued them to stand vpon their guard, and to trust to their strength, he laid batterie to the wall foure dayes, and hauing made it faultable, brake thorow the same with his army. The Grecians hauing lost the wal (their chiefe strength) fled, some to one strong hold, and some to another, as their fortune led them; the Turkes at their pleasure spoyling and destroying that rich and pleasant country, sometime the nurse of worthie wits, and famous captaines: where they found wonderfull riches, and tooke prisoners without number; in so much that they were sould among the Turkes at most vile price. There Amurath for his pleasure cruelly sacrificed six hundred Christian captiues, to the hellish ghost of his dead father Mahomet: and afterwards imposing a yerely tribute vpon the Peloponesians, and other Grecian princes now yeelding againe vnto him, as an induction to their further slauerie vnder the Turkish tyrannie, he returned, taking in his way the two famous cities of Patras and Sicyone. Thus the rich country of Peloponesus, and all the rest of Grecia, sometime fountaine of all learning and ciuilitie, became tributarie to the barbarous & cruell Turks, in the yeare of our Lord 1445.

Peloponesus made tributarie vnto the Turke.

Old Amurath now clogged with yeares, and wearied with long wars, was content to take his rest at Hadrianople: during which time, Bajazet the son of Mahomet was borne in the yere 1446; who afterwards of long time with great glorie gouerned the Turkish empire at Constantinople, as in his place shall appeare.

Bajazet borne.

The Hungarians after the calamitie of Varna (wherein they had together with Vladislaus their king, lost most part of their nobilitie also) in a generall assemblie of their States, made choice of Ladislaus the posthumos son of Albertus (and then in keeping of Frederick the emperor) for their king. But forasmuch as he being then but a child of fiue yeres old, & chosen king more for the remembrance of the Emperor Sigismund his grandfather, and Albertus his father, and the good hope conceiued of hm, than for any other thing presently to be expected from him; it was thought more than necessary, to make choice of some notable and worthie man, vnto whom they might, during the time of the kings minoritie, commit the gouernment and protection of that so great and turbulent a kingdome. Many there were in that honorable assemblie well thought of, both of themselues and others; but such was the glorie and valor of Huniades, and so great the remembrance of his worthie deserts, both of the kingdom of Hungarie, & of the Christian commonweale in general, as without his seeking, procured vnto him the general fauor and suffrages of all; yea so far, that euen they which most enuied at his honor (as ouershadowing their own) were glad to hold their peace, for that without him, it was commonly thought the state of that shaken kingdom could not long stand: So by the general consent of al the States there assembled, he was with the great applause of the people chosen and proclaimed gouernor, as of all others most fit for so great & heauie a charge: wherein he quietly spent some few yeres in deciding of ciuil controuersies, in composing the quarrells of the nobilitie; not forgetting in the meane time the indifferent administration of justice to all men, ending many controuersies far from the place of judgment, and that without all suspition of corruption; vsing therein such expedition & neuerwearied patience in hearing euery mans cause, that sitting, going, standing, riding, he dispatched many great and waightie matters: alwayes shewing himselfe affable and curteous, as well vnto them of the poorer sort, as others of greater calling, that had any sutes vnto him. So that it was of him truly said, That no man was than he vnto his friends more friendly, or vnto his enemies more crosse and contrarie.

Huniades in the minoritie of the king, chosen gouernor of all the Kingdome of Hungarie.

In

In time of peace he was alwayes prouiding for war, heaping vp great treasure, and such other things, as without which the wars could not be maintained. But aboue all things, he was carefull of the good agreement of the Nobilitie, taking great paines in reconciling their displeasures conceiued one against another, and that with such dexterity, as that he was both of them and others generally both beloued and feared.

In the meane time, whilest he was thus busied in disposing of the ciuill affaires of the commonweale, & the administration of justice, he was aduertised by his espials, how that the old Sultan Amurath was raising great forces both in Asia & Europe, and that as the common fame went, for the inuasion of Hungarie. For the withstanding whereof, Huniades not vnprouided, as neuer vnmindfull of so dangerous an enemie, or of any thing more desirous, than in some sort to be reuenged of the great losse receiued at Varna; in the fourth yeare of his gouernement, and in the yeare of our Lord 1448, accompanied with most part of the Nobilitie of Hungarie, and the Vayuod of Valachia his friend and confederat, set forward against the Turk with an armie of two and twentie thousand choice soldiers. So hauing passed the riuer Tibiscus, or Teise, and trauelling thorow Valachia, a little beneath where the riuer Moraua running thorow Seruia, falleth into Danubius, he with most part of his armie passed that great riuer; the rest in the meane time taking passage ouer at a towne called Seuerin. Huniades with his armie being thus gotten ouer into Seruia, by his Embassadors requested the Despot, as he had oftentimes before, to put himselfe into that most Christian warre; and remembring the great benefits he had receiued from the Hungarians, not to shew himselfe therefore vngratefull, than which, nothing could be more dishonorable: and to encourage him the more, certified him both of his owne strength, and of the ayd brought vnto him by the Vayuod; & that for the good successe of the warre there wanted nothing but his presence and direction, with such troupes of light horsemen as he knew he had alwayes in readinesse: wherewith hee requested him with all speed to follow him. But he being a man of no religion, and better affected vnto the Turke than Huniades, the more cleanly to withdraw himselfe from this war, pretended many excuses: first, The league he had with Amurath his sonne in law, which he said he might not breake, for feare that if things chanced not wel, he might so fall again headlong into his old miserie: then, The vnseasonableneese of the time, Autumne being now past, which difficulties in those cold countries they had to their cost too much felt in the late war: These with many other such like he alledged in excuse that he came not: but the truth was, the malice of the man, grieued to see Huniades preferred before him in the gouernment of the kingdome, & disdaining to serue vnder his ensignes, being himself Despot and King of Sernia, discended of the royal race, was the cause of his backwardnes: so that blinded with enuie, he could not thereright judge of himself, or what was fit for him in this case to haue done. But Huniades angrie with his vnkinde answer, threatned him with his owne hands to be reuenged vpon him, and to giue away his kingdome to one more worthie thereof than he, if he should with victorie returne. So passing thorow Seruia, as thorow the enemies country, he came into Bulgaria. After whose departure, the false Despot by speedie messengers aduertised Amurath both of the comming of the Hungarians, and of their strength; yea he certified him of euerie dayes march, and how that Huniades was but with a small companie of his owne, and some weake supplies of the Vayuods, come ouer Danubius: whom if he should not presently meet, but suffer him to come on further, and so with his armie to get betwixt him and home, he might so shut him in, as that he should be hardly able to scape his hands. All which he did, partly for enuie, partly to gratifie the Turke, and the better to keepe friendship with him. So Amurath not contemning the Despots councell, suffered Huniades without resistance to enter a great way into his country, and comming two or three days march behind him, so stopped the passage, as that he could not possibly retyre, but that he must needs fight. And now they were both come vnto a great plain in Bulgaria, which the Hungarians call Rigomezu; and the Rascians, the Plaine of Cossoua: through the middest whereof the riuer Schichniza rising out of the mountaines of Illyria, running, at length falleth into Moroua, and so into Danubius. This Plain is about 20 miles in length, & in bredth fiue, enuironed on each side with pleasant mountaines in manner of a Theatre, the riuer and low valleys at the foot of the mountaines being garnished with many countrey villages and towns. Into this fatall Plaine, when as the Hungarians first, and after them the Turkes, were as into a place of combat descended;

In the midst almost of this Plain ariseth a small hill, by the foot whereof the riuer Schichniza runneth, not far beyond which, toward the head of the Plaine, was a certain tower built like a pyramides, in memoriall of Amurath the first of that name, and third king of the Turks, there slain: which tower Amurath fearing lest Huniades marching before him, should take, and so become vnto him ominous, (for in such matters the Turks are verie superstitious) he made hast, of purpose to joyne battell with him before he should come to the foresaid tower. Huniades being come vnto the hill, easily arising in the midst of the Plaine, there incamped, expecting the comming H of Scanderbeg; who was said (according to appointment made betwixt him and Huniades) to be euery houre comming. Wherefore Amurath fearing lest the tower fast by should be taken, and the enemies power strengthned by the comming of the Albanois, prouoked Huniades to battell; who still refused the same in hope of his friends comming: which made the Turke more fierce vpon him, seeking by all means he could to draw him to battell, but especially by cutting him off from water and forrage: for why, he much presumed vpon his multitude, hauing in his armie about foure score thousand fighting men. At length Huniades, for want of water and other necessaries enforced to fight, vpon S. Lukes day, being then Thursday, commanded his soldiers to make themselues readie: and diuiding his Armie into two and thirtie battalions, in such order as he meant to giue battell, the more to encourage them, spake vnto I them as followeth:

The notable speech of Huniades: to encourage his souldiers against the Turks.

At length (valiant souldiers, and fellowes in Armes) the day is come, wherein you may reuenge that dishonour, or disgrace, you receiued in the battell of Varna; and recouer your former credit of constancie, and praise, if you will play the men. The Enemie opposeth against you but these reliques of his armies, by you so often broken and discomfited, who although they be in number more than you, yet are they in hope, quarrell and strength, farre inferiour. For what can they hope for, which fight not for their owne, but for another mans Kingdome? and in conquering, procure vnto themselues nothing but bondage in this life, and torment in the life to come, and in both, perpetuall and endlesse miserie? Whereas you on the other side, howsoeuer the matter fall out, fighting for your owne Kingdome, K your Children, your Countrey, your Houses, your Altars, may assuredly hope for in both, eterhall and vndoubted blisse. You haue also farre greater cause to fight, as they which if they do not valiantly ouercome their enemies, are in danger, with themselues, to lose also all that theirs is. The strength of both is sufficiently tried. Once we vnfortunately joyned battell at Varna, where if we might make exchange of our fortunes there found, haply the Turke would make choice of our flight; rather than of the great slaughter of his owne men: who being not able to ouertake vs, was there notably beaten, with the losse of a great part of his Armie: whose great losse there receiued, might countervaile our dishonour; although the losse, he suffered perforce, but we our flight by choice. But of that our ouerthrow, the angrie Powers from aboue (willing to reuenge our breach of Faith) were, as I verily beleeue, the cause, rather than our cowardise: for euen there, all the authours of that perfideous dealing, euen there I say, enerie L one receiued the just guerdon of their treacherie. Whereas we, against our wills drawne into that woful Warre, by the mercie of God yet liue with you, preserued for the defence of the Christian Commonweale, and especially of Hungarie, that it should not be ouer-runne with the Turkish power and rage. The number of your enemies is not of you to be feared, when as you with few, haue oftentimes learned to fight with their multitudes, and carried away from them the victorie. Hitherto we haue rather fought by the power of God than man, and in the name of Christ Iesus our Sauiour, haue easily ouerthrowne their prophane battels. Which way soeuer we haue turned our selues in his most mightie name, we haue with our victorious Armes opened our way, for that we fought vnder the leading and conduct of the Highest, whose helpe we haue alwayes felt at hand: neither shall we thereof this day faile, if we be mindfull of his forepassed loue towards vs, and of our woonted valour. God is always present with them that M in his just quarrell fight courageously. Hereunto is joyned the safe manner of our fight, by reason of our men at armes, and barbed horses, who like a strong castle cannot easily be ouerthrowne. Our battalions are such as may easily be commanded, and yet strong enough against our enemies: whereas their great multitude breedeth but confusion. We haue many notable and forcible Engines of warre, which they haue

A haue not. Besides that, euery houre we looke for the worthie Scanderbeg his comming. The danger is not so great, as that we should feare it; or so little, as that we should contemne it. Backe againe without victorie we may not goe, for that our armie is hardly by the straits of these mountaines to be led: and if the may were neuer so easie, yet without doing that we came for, and glorie with victorie, we may not retire. Vnto the valiant, all difficulties are propounded. Wherefore sith this your last labour is at hand, wherein the whole strength of the Turks may be for euer cut off, I pray and beseech you (fellow souldiers) by that God vnder whose power and protection wee serue, and by the loue you beare vnto your countrey, your wiues, your children, and wealth, vpon the signall of battell giuen, so to shew your valour, as men resolued to be fully reuenged of the iniuries by that filthie and wicked nation done both to God and man: and especially of the losse receiued at Varna. Wee lost there a deuout King, who for our safetie, and B for the breach of his faith, sacrificed himselfe; by which royall sacrifice, that diuine anger is appeased: vnto whose ghost I beseech you, in this battel to make an honorable sacrifice. Not forgetting withal, to reuenge the death of other worthie men in that battell slaine. This feare of the Turkes, is at once and euen this day to be cut off; and so, as that it should neuer grow againe: and the kingdome of Hungarie, so to be deliuered from the danger of most cruell slauerie, as that it may by this dayes worke gaine perpetuall rest and glorie, vnto the enioying of the pleasures both of this life, and of the life to come. Wherefore (worthie souldiers) we must fight with all our force, for that our honour so requireth, our profit so persuadeth, and necessitie enforceth. As for our selues, howsoeuer the matter fall out, all shall be with vs well: if victorie, perpetuall blisse and happinesse shall thereby be procured vnto our countrey, and immortall fame vnto our selues: but if we shall be ouercome, here we shall be most honourably
C buried in the bed of fame, to liue in heauen with God and his Saints for euer. Wherefore I beseech you so to fight, as men resolutely set downe to ouercome, or if it should otherwise fall out, as men resolued honourably to die.

With this the Generals speech, all the minds of the hearers were greatly enflamed, & they all by his words, and their owne hot desires, sufficiently encouraged: neither did old Amurath on the other side with lesse care or diligence marshal his army, & incourage his Turks, sparing neither cheerful speech, glorious promises, or seuere command: whose armie being brought into the plain, & ranged in order of battel, filled the same from the one side to the other, euen vnto the very mountains, to the great astonishment of the Christians: and so about nine a clock in the morning set forward. Huniades had from the hill where hee lay, sent downe both the D wings of his army, & had a front on both sides before them, stretched out certain long troups of light horsemen to begin the skirmish. In the midst betwixt both he had placed Zechel, his sisters son, with a strong square battel of men at armes: and such as he had kept aloft vpon the hill for rescues, he had compassed about with his waggons, as with trenches. The signal of the battell being giuen, the fierce and couragious souldiers on both sides, with cheerefull minds, began at first to skirmish a far off: but afterwards fortune as it were fawning vpon both sides, and their courage thereupon increasing, they began with greater force to fight foot to foot, & hand to hand. Which hot fight continued about three houres: at length the Turks battel was E put to the worst, by Benedict Losonicus, who had the leading of the right wing; and so likewise in the left also by Stephen Bamffi, who with great slaughter had notably foyled the great Bassa of Europe, still pressing hard & desperatly vpon him. Which discomfiture of his men in both wings Amurath beholding, presently sent in strong supplies, & in both places renewed the battell: wherby the Hungarian and Valachian light horsemen, before wearied, were enforced to retire vnto the men at armes; who serred together, and standing as a strong wall, easily repulsed the greatest assaults of the Turks. In which maner of fight many were on both sides slain, but far more of the Turks, by reason they were neither so well horsed nor armed as were the Christians. Huniades in the meane time with the artillerie from the hill, did the Turkes great harme: which Amurath perceiuing, drew as close vnto the hill as hee could, by that meanes hauing his people (so much as was possible) out of the danger of the artillerie, mounted on high F aboue them in such sort, as that it could little or nothing now hurt them: which Huniades from the hil beholding, came downe to the releefe of his men, sending new supplies to both wings; sometime encouraging them with cheerfull speech, and sometime with his own most valiant hand: vnto the wearie he sent reliefe, the fearful he encouraged, them that were flying he staied, and where he saw the enemies fastest comming on, there was he himselfe present to meet them:

them, omitting nothing that was of a good General or worthy soldier to be done. The valiant G he commended, the coward he reproued, & as a careful Generall, was himselfe in euery place present. Whereby the battell became so fierce and terrible, that in euery place a man might haue seen all fouly soiled with blood and the quarrey of the dead. Amurath in like manner stil sent in new supplies, nothing discouraged with the great losse of his men, presuming vpon his multitude, as fully resolued orderly to fight, & to make vse of all his forces, in hope at length by continuall sending in of fresh supplies, to wearie his enemies, whom he saw he could not by force ouercome. Wherin he was not deceiued, for one battalion of the Hungarians was oftentimes enforced to wearie foure or fiue of the Turks before they could be relieued, they came on so fast. That day they dined & supt in the battell refreshing themselues with such short repast as they could eat standing, going, or riding. The Turks armie was that day in euery place H put to the worst, and oftentimes with great slaughter enforced by the Hungarians to retire almost vnto their trenches, yet was the battell still againe renewed, & so fought on both sides, as well appeared they were resolued either to ouercome, or there to die. This cruel fight maintained all the day, was by the comming on of the night ended, both the armies retiring into their owne trenches, but with purpose the next day to renew the battel, & not to giue ouer or with their backs, til the victory were by dint of sword determined. So with little rest, was that night spent, both armies keeping most diligent watch, all carefully expecting the next day, as The battell be-gun againe the second day. by battel therin to trie whether they should liue or die. It was yet scarce faire day, when both the armies in good order ready ranged began again the battel: which at the first, was not by the Hungarians fought with such force and courage as before, for there was none of them which I had not the day before spent their whole strength, whereas there was yet 40000 of the Turks Huniades encourageth his souldiers. which either had not fought at all, or but lightly skirmished. Yet Huniades exhorted his soul-diers, not by fainthearted cowardise to breake off the course of the victorie by them the day before so wel begun, but couragiously to prosecute the same, beseeching them not to be now wanting vnto themselues & their country, but to remember how they had fought the day before, how many thousands of their enemies they had slain, & not now at last to giue ouer, & so shamefully to frustrat all the pains and dangers by them before endured: for that they (as hee said) were to be thought worthy of honor, not which began, but which ended honorable actions. He wisht them to set before their eyes the calamities like to ensue, if they should as cowards be ouercome: first, the diuers kinds of death and torture; then, the slauerie of their wiues K and children; the rauishment of their virgins and matrons; and last of all, the vtter destruction of their kingdom, with the horrible confusion of all things, as wel sacred as prophane: al which were by that one daies labor (said he) to be auoided. And therfore he besought them for the loue both of God and man, with their wonted valor, that day to set at liberty for euer, themselues, their country, their wiues & children, and whatsoeuer els they held deere. In like manner also did Amurath encourage his soldiers, with great promises and threats, persuading them rather to endure any thing, than by that days ouerthrow to be driuen out of Europe. He carefully viewed his army, ordered his battels, & with many great reasons persuaded them to play the men. But after that some light skirmishes being past, both the armies were fuly ioined, the battel was fought with no lesse force & fury than the day before. Of the Christians many then L wounded, came now again into the battell, there either by speedy death or speedy victorie to cure their wounds before receiued, & there did right good seruice. Great was the slaughter in euery place, neither could the force of the Hungarians be withstood; whose furious impression, when the Turks could not by plaine force endure, they began with their fresh horsemen, cunningly to delude their desperat fiercenes: at such time as the Hungarians began most hardly to charge them, they by & by turned their backs, suffering them a while to follow after them, far scattered & dispersed: who allured as it were with the hope of present victory, eagerly pursued them, & in the pursuit slew diuers of them: and they again vpon a signall giuen, closing together, & turning back vpon the dispersed troups, well reuenged the death of their fellowes: & with their often charges & retraits, wonderfully wearied the Hungarians, notably deluding M their furious attempts with that vncertain kind of fight, al the day long. Many of the Hungarians were slaine, and the Turks had that day the better, and so both armies being wearied night and wearines ended the fight; both retiring into their trenches, there keeping most carefull watch. The next morning by the dawning of the day, the battel was again begun, Huniades his houres, the battell was hardly fought with like hope on both sides, & a great slaughter made, but specially of the Hungarians; who wearied with the long fight, & most part of them wounded, were now al to endure this third daies labour. Zechel (Huniades his fisters sonne) valiantly fighting in the front of the battell, was the first of the leaders there slain in the thickest of the Turks. Emericus Marzalus and Stephen Bainffi, both great commanders, enclosed by the Turks, there died also. Amurath seeing the formost ensignes of the Christians, which stood in Zechels regiment, taken, and his souldiers (discomfited with the death of their colonell) turning their backs, presently commanded al the companies, which were many (yet left in the trenches, for B fresh supplies) to issue forth, & at once to ouerwhelm the Christians, being (as he said) but few and ouerwearied with three dayes continuall fight. Vpon which the Kings command, they fiercely breaking out, presently ouerthrew both the wings of the Christians, before wauering; and in a great battell (wherin most of the chiefe commanders were slaine, and their ensignes taken) discomfited the rest, and with a great slaughter put them to flight. Huniades seeing his brother now slaine, the ensignes taken, and the battel quite lost, betook himselfe to flight also; Huniades flieth leauing behind him his tents and baggage, al which shortly after became a prey to the Turks: who from noon vntill night furiously followed the chace, with most cruell execution; but at length, staid by the comming on of the darknes, they returned again vnto their trenches. The rest of the Turkes army that followed not the chace, compassing in the Hungarian campe, were there by the wounded souldiers, the waggoners, & other drudges of the army, kept out so C long as they had any shot left; but yet were in the end euery mothers son slain, though not altogether vnreuenged, two or three of the Turks in many places lying dead by the bodie of one Hungarian. Amurath to couer the greatnes of the losse he there receiued, commanded the bodies of his captains there slain, to be forthwith buried; and the bodies of his common souldiers, to be for the most part cast into the riuer Schichniza: for which cause the inhabitants of the country there by, of long time after abstained from eating of any fish taken in that riuer.

The plain by this great battell made once againe famous, lay neuertheless many yeares after couered with dead mens bones, as if it had bin with stones: neither could be ploughed by the countrey people, but that long time after armour and weapons were there still in many places turned vp and found. Thus albeit that this bloudy victorie fel vnto the Turks, yet was their D losse far greater than the Hungarians; hauing lost (as was reported by them that say lest) foure and thirtie thousand of themselues, for eight thousand of their enemies. Howbeit they them- The number of the Turks and Christians slain in the battell of Cossouo.

seuenteen thousand, and of themselues fortie thousand: which in so long and mortal a fight, is not vnlike to haue bin true. In this vnfortunate battell, fell most part of the Hungarian nobi-litie: all men worthie eternall fame & memorie, whose names we for breuitie wil passe ouer.
Many in the chace taken, and the next day brought to Amurath, where by the commandement of the angry tyrant slaine. Such as escaped out of the slaughter by the way of Illyria, returned in safety: but such as thought to saue themselues by returning back again through Seruia, the Despots countrey, found the same so troublesome as that few of them escaped, but that they were by the way either slaine, or quite stripped of all they had.

Neither was the fortune of the noble Huniades much better than the fortune of the rest, L who hauing on horseback all alone by vncouth and vntract waies trauelled three daies without meat or drinke, and the fourth day tyred his horse and cast him off; being on foot and disarmed, fel into the hands of two notable theeues, who in dispoiling him of his apparel, finding a faire crucifix of gold about his neck, fell at strife betwixt themselues for the same: whereby he tooke occasion to lay hand vpon one of their swords, & with the same presently thrust him through; and then suddenly assailing the other, put him to flight also. So deliuered of this danger, trauelling on, and almost spent with thirst and hunger, the next day he light vpon a shep-maiestie of the man, stood at gaze vpon him; as also did Huniades, fearing in his so great weaknesse to haue to do with him. Thus a while hauing the one well regarded the other, they began to enter talke, the sheepheard bluntly asking him of his fortune; and he for Gods sake craing

them, omitting nothing that was of a good General or worthy soldier to be done. The valiant G he commended, the coward he reproued, & as a carefull Generall, was himselfe in euery place present. Whereby the battell became so fierce and terrible, that in euery place a man might haue seen all fouly foiled with blood and the quarrey of the dead. Amurath in like manner stil sent in new supplies, nothing discouraged with the great losse of his men, presuming vpon his multitude, as fully resolued orderly to fight, & to make vse of all his forces, in hope at length by continual sending in of fresh supplies, to wearie his enemies, whom he saw he could not by force ouercome. Wherin he was not deceiued, for one battalion of the Hungarians was oftentimes enforced to wearie foure or fiue of the Turks before they could be relieued, they came on so fast. That day they dined & supt in the battell refreshing themselues with such short repast as they could eat standing, going, or riding. The Turks armie was that day in euery place H put to the worst, and oftentimes with great slaughter enforced by the Hungarians to retire almost vnto their trenches, yet was the battell stil againe renewed, & so fought on both sides, as well appeared they were resolued either to ouercome, or there to die. This cruel fight maintained all the day, was by the comming on of the night ended, both the armies retiring into their owne trenches, but with purpose the next day to renew the battel, & not to giue ouer or turn their backs, til the victory were by dint of sword determined. So with little rest, was that night spent, both armies keeping most diligent watch, all carefully expecting the next day, as uing of him something to eat. When as the shepheard hearing of his hard hap, mooued with his estate, and hope of promised reward, brought him vnto a poore cottage not far off, causing to be set before him bread and water, with a few oynions. Who in the pleasant remembrance of that passed misery, would oftentimes after in his greatest banquets say, That he neuer in his life fared better, or more daintily, than when he supped with this shepheard. So well can hunger season homely cates. Thus refreshed, he was by the shepheard conducted to Sinderouia: whereof the Despot hauing intelligence (whose country was all layd for the staying of him) caused him by the Captain of the castle to be apprehended, and imprisoned. But after certain daies spent in talke about his deliuerance, it was at length agreed, that all such strong townes in Rascia and Seruia, as had by the Hungarians bin detained from the Despot, at such time as his kingdome was by king Vladislaus restored vnto him, should now be againe to him deliuered; and that Matthias Huniades his youngest sonne, should for the confirmaaion of further friendship, marrie the Despots daughter: with some other such condititions as it pleased the vngratefull Prince for his owne behoofe to set downe. For performance wherof, he required to haue Ladislaus, Huniades his eldest son, in hostage. All which Huniades was glad forthwith to yeeld vnto; for feare the false Despot should haue deliuered him into the hands of Amurath his mortall enemie. So the hostage being giuen, Huniades was again set at libertie. Who vpon Christmas day comming to Segedinum, was there by all the nobilitie of Hungarie, and great concourse of the people, honorably receiued. This ingratitude of the Despots no lesse grieued this worthie man, than the dishonour receiued from the Turke. Wherefore vpon the sudden raising a great armie, he inuaded the territorie, long before giuen to the Despot by the Emperor Sigismund in Hungarie, in exchange of the strong towne of Belgrade, destroying the country before him, and burning the villages, neuer resting, vntil he had got into his power whatsoeuer the Despot had in Hungarie, & not so contented, presently entred into Rascia, where the Despots embassadors met him, bringing with them Ladislaus the hostage, honorably rewarded; & humbly crauing peace at his hands; which he, at the request of the nobilitie easily granted, with forgiuenes of al former wrongs or iniuries: and so hauing with him concluded a peace, returned back again into Hungarie. But fortune neuer suffereth long the valiant man to rest, but still keepeth him busied, least he should at too much ease attaine vnto honors glorie.

The Despot inuaded by Amurath, craueth aid of Huniades

The yeare following, Amurath certainly informed, That George the Despot hauing of late Huniades in his power, had again set him at liberty: was therewith exceeding wroth, blaming him of great ingratitude, That for a kingdom which he had at his hands receiued, he had not deliuered to him his enemy, in ful recompence therof; whom of all others he most feared, & therfore likewise wisht to haue had him perish. In reuenge of which iniurie (as he took it) the melancholie tyrant, sent Fritze-beg and Iose beg, two of his most expert captaines, with a strong power to inuade Rascia, the Despots country: who accordingly entring therinto, strongly fortified Chrysonicum, a town before ruinated, vpon the side of the riuer Moraua, & from thence with fire and sword destroied the country both far and neere. The Despot dismaied with this sudden and vnexpected inuasion, wist not well which way to turne himselfe: the angrie Turk he well knew, was not to be appeased without yeelding vnto some great inconuenience; and to pray aid of Huniades, without which he was not able to withstand the Turkes, hee thought but vaine, for the wrong he had before done him. So that what to do he wist not: yet had he rather to endure any thing, than again to suffer the heauy bondage of the Turk. In this extremitie he thought best to make proofe of Huniades, of whom he humbly, & not without great shame, craued aid. Which the courteous gouernor, according to his honorable nature, forgetting all former iniuries, easily granted: and the rather, for that he desired nothing more, than to be of the Turks in some part reuenged of the ouerthrow from them of late receiued in the plaines of Cossoua: as also for that he wisely foresaw, That the Despots country being lost, he should haue the Turks still brauing him euen as it were in the gates of Hungarie. Wherefore hauing with great speed raised a conuenient power, he forthwith in person himselfe set forward, and at Synderouia passing ouer the riuer Danubius into Rascia, there ioined his power with the Despors, which he found there ready. And so marching forward with such expedition, that he preuented the fame of his comming; and the weather also at the same time as it were fauouring his purpose, and couering the country with a thick mist, he was the fourth day vpon the Turkes before they were aware of him. Who wonderfully dismayed with the

A the sudden comming of the Christians, and vpon the breaking vp of the mist, discouering also Huniades his ensignes (alwaies vnto them dreadfull) thought now no more of resistance, or of the ordering of their battel, but as men discouraged, betook themselues to speedie flight. After whom followed the Hungarian and Seruian light horsemen, with most bloudie execution hauing them in chase all that day; Huniades with his men at armes following stil after in good order, for feare the Turks should againe make head vpon the light horsemen that had them in chase. And had not the comming on of the night ended the slaughter, few of the Turkes had there escaped: but by the approch thereof many of them got into the woods, and so saued themselues. Fritze-beg the Generall, with most part of the Turkes best commanders, were in that flight taken. Huniades after this victory entering into Bulgaria, came to Budina, the metro-
B politicall citie of that countrey, which (as the cause oftentimes of great wars) he burnt downe to the ground. And so hauing well reuenged himselfe, and cleared the countrey of the Turks, he returned backagaine into Seruia, & there gaue to the Despot for a present all the prisoners he had taken; and contenting himselfe with the honor of the victorie, returned with triumph to Buda, there to find no lesse trouble with the Bohemians, and some of the discontented nobilitie of Hungarie, than hee had with the Turks, to the great hurt of the Christian common-weale.

All this while that Amurath was thus troubled with Huniades and the Hungarians, Mustapha lying still vpon the borders of Macedonia, as Amurath had commanded, it chanced that a great quarrell grew betwixt the Venetians and Scanderbeg, about the inheritance of Lech Za- C charie (a noble man of Epirus) then shamefully murdered by his vnnaturall kinsman Lech Duchagne; part of whose inherirance lying in the frontiers of Epirus, the Venetians claimed, as belonging to their seigniorie: and hauing got possession of the city of Dayna, part thereof, by force held the same against Scanderbeg: vpon which quarrell great wars arose betwixt the Venetians and him, who had before been very great friends: insomuch that in the end they ioined in battell at the riuer of Drine, where the Venetians were by him in a great battell ouerthrowne. Of which troubles Mustapha daily vnderstood, and how that Scanderbeg so busied, had left but a small garrison vpon the borders of Epirus. Wherefore being desirous to redeem his former disgrace with some better hap; hee would faine haue taken the opportunitie now presented, but that his great masters command lay so heauie vpon him, as that hee durst not D without his leaue attempt the same; knowing that the danger of his euil fortune, if it should so fall out, would far exceed the vncertaine glorie of his better successe. Yet ceased he not from time to time to giue Amurath intelligence of these troubles and warres in Epirus; earnestly requesting him not to let slip so faire an opportunitie, but to giue him leaue to enter into the country: in manner, assuring him before hand of the victorie. Yet the suspitious old King was long in resoluing what to doe, still fearing the fortune of his enemie. At length discharged of the feare of the Hungarians, and commending Mustapha his forwardnesse, he sent vnto him a messenger with letters of this purport, answerable to his desire.

Amurath his graue letters of aduertisement to Mustapha, concerning his going againe into Epirus.

E The warr thou so greatly desirest, behold Mustapha we grant vnto thee: the glorie thereof (if those things bee true which we heare of the Venetian warre) thine owne valour, and worthy right hand shall giue thee: yet thou must warily deale with that enemie, and not rashly take vp armes, which thou maiest be enforced shamefully to cast away, when thou thinkest least. Peraduenture the counterfeit shew of war and faigned falling out among the Christians, do too much allure thee; for the common saying is, There is no quarrell sooner ended, than betwixt the father and the sonne: we in person absent, can neither aduise thee as present, nor commend a foolish forwardnesse in armes. Thou must before thou put on armes, dispose of all things, and consider of euery particular, which is to be put in execution when thou art in the field. Thou hast a great armie of fresh and lustie souldiers, thine enemies are with continuall wars wearied and spent: in that remaineth, do as thou thinkest good; for I forbid thee the doing of nothing, which F thou thinkest may be for the aduancement of our honour.

Mustapha hauing thus obtained leaue, and well appointed, with all his forces entered into Epirus, hoping in one battell to end that warre: which he (presuming vpon the strength of his armie) many times offered in the plaine field. News herof was brought to Scanderbeg (then lying at the siege of Dayna against the Venetians) from his garrisons lying vpon the frontiers of

of Epirus, to whom hee addressed a speedie messenger: commanding them in no wise to encounter with the enemie, but to keep themselues within the safegard of their strong holds, & to protract the time vntil his comming. Afterwards selecting out of his armie 500 horsemen, and 1500 chosen footmen, all old beaten soldiers, he with that small number marched to the place where he knew lay his garrisons intrenched, in the vpper country of Dibra: leauing Amesa his nephew at the siege of Dayna. Mustapha hauing many times in vaine sought to draw the garrison soldiers out of their trenches by offring them many faire opportunities of aduantage, & now out of hope that way to circumuent them, began to spoile and burne the country round about. But when he vnderstood by his scouts of Scanderbeg his comming, hee speedily called together his armie, and encamped within two miles of Scanderbegs camp, at a place called Oronoche, in the vpper country of Dibra. Scanderbeg had there in his camp, of his garrison soldiers and those he brought with him, fourethousand horsemen, and two thousand foot, all old expert souldiers, where, after hee had made his trenches strong, he left there in three hundreth of them, and brought the rest into the field in order of battel. Mustapha on the other side likewise brought on in good order his armie also. But whileſt both armies thus stood ranged one within the view of the other, expecting nothing but the signall of battell, suddenly a man at armes, in gallant & rich furniture, issued out of the Turks armie into the midst of the plaine betwixt both armies, & from thence with a loud voice challenged to fight hand to hand with any one of the Christian armie. This Turke was called Caraguſa. At the first Scanderbegs soldiers vpon this challenge stood still, one looking vpon another; for as they were all ashamed to refuse so braue an offer, so the danger so suddenly offered, stayd euery mans forwardnesse for a while: vntill that one Paul Manessi, accounted the best man at armes in Scanderbeg his armie (vpon whom euery mans eye was now cast, as if he had bin the man by name called out by the proud challenger) not able longer to endure the Turks pride, with great courage & cheerfull countenance came to Scanderbeg, requesting him that he might be the man to accept that challenge. Who greatly commended him, and willed him on God his name to set forward, first to win honour to himselfe, and then to giue example of his valour for all the rest of the armie to follow. Paul staying a while, vntill he had for that purpose most brauely armed himselfe, mounted presently to horse, & riding forth into the plain, called aloud vnto the Turke, that he should make himselfe ready to fight. Whom Caraguſa required to stay a while, that he might speake vnto him a few words, indifferently concerning them both.

The speech of Caraguſa the Turke, to Manessi.

The victorie (said he) our force and fortune shall determine: but the conditions of the victorie, we are now to appoint our selues. If the Destinies haue assigned vnto thee the honour of this day, I refuse not, but that thou mayest by law of armes, when I am ouercome, carry away with thee my rich spoiles, and at thy pleasure dispose of my dead bodie. But if thou shalt fall vnder my hand, I require that I may haue the same right, and power ouer thy captiue bodie: and that the Generalls will grant that no man shall moue out of either armie, to better the fortune of either of vs in the time of the combat, or after.

Manessi his stout answere to Caraguſa.

Whereunto Manessi answered, That he agreed to those conditions of the combate, which he vpon a needlesse feare had so required to bee kept: saying, That where the fierce soule had yeelded, there of good right all the rest out to be the conquerours; and that therefore he should fight without feare of any more enemies than himselfe: whom so soone as hee had depriued of life, he should haue free power to doe with his dead bodie what he would. Which if thou wouldest giue (said he) vnto the teares of my fellow souldiers, yet would not worthie Scanderbeg suffer the carkasse of a vanquished coward, to be brought backe again into his campe.

Caraguſa maruelled to heare his so braue resolution, & as it was thought, repented him of his challenge. But after that both the Generals had vpon their honors confirmed the laws of the combat before rehearsed, both the champions were left alone in the middest of the plaine betweene both armies, with almens eys fixed vpon them. Now both the armies betwixt feare & hope, stood in great expectation of the euent of the combat, prefaging their owne fortunes in the fortune of their Champions. In which time they both hauing withdrawn themselues one from the other a conuenient distance, for the making of their course, & after with great violence running together, Caraguſa was by Manessi, at the first encounter struck through the head and slain. Manessi alighting, disarmed the dead body, & struck off his head: and so loaded with the armor and head of the proud challenger, returned with victory to the army, where he was ioyfully joyfully receiued and brought to Scanderbeg, of whom he was there presently honorably both commended and rewarded. Scanderbeg seeing his men by this good fortune of Manessi, greatly encouraged, and the Turks as men dismaied with the death of their Champion, hanging their heads, like an inuincible Captaine, himselfe set first forward toward the enemie, as it were in contempt of their multitude: and had charged them as they stood, before they had set one foot forward, had not Mustapha to incourage his soldiers, with certain disordred troups opposed himselfe against him; which the whole armie seeing, faintly followed: but as they set forward with small courage, so were they at the first incounter easily driuen to retire. Which when Mustapha saw, he called earnestly vpon them to follow him, and the more to encourage them by his own example, put spurs to his horse, and fiercely charged the front of Scanderbegs armie, as one resolued either to gaine the victorie, or there to die: after whom followed most of the principall captains of his armie, which would not for shame forsake their General: thus by his valor the battell was for a while renewed. But Moses preuailing with great slaughter in one part of the Armie, the Turkes began to flie: in which flight Mustapha the Generall, with twelue others of the chiefe men in that armie, were taken prisoners, but of the common soldiers few were saued. There was slaine of the Turks armie ten thousand, and fifteen ensignes taken; whereas of the Christians were slaine but three hundred. The Turks tents and campe, with all the wealth thereof, became a prey to Scanderbegs soldiers: wherwith although he had satisfied the desires of them all, yet to keep his old custom, he entred into the confines of Macedonia, and there burnt and spoyled all that he could. And afterwards leauing a garrison of two thousand horsemen and a thousand foot for defence of his frontiers, returned againe with the rest of his armie to the siege of Dayna.

The battell betwixt Scanderbeg and Mustapha.

Not long after, the Venetians made peace with Scanderbeg; and Amurath desirous to redeeme his Captaines, about the same time sent great Presents vnto Scanderbeg, with fiue and twenty thousand duckats for the ransome of Mustapha and the other chieftaines; whom Scanderbeg so honorably vsed, as if there had neuer been any hostilitie betwixt him and them: and so with a safe conuoy sent them out of his country. The ransome of Mustapha and the other Turks he diuided amongst his soldiers. When Scanderbeg had thus made peace with the Venetians, he forthwith led his armie againe into Macedonia, with the spoyle of that country to make his soldiers better pay, as his vsuall manner was. And to do the greater harme, he diuided his armie into three parts, wherwith he ouer-running the country, wasted and destroyed all before him, putting to the sword all the Turks that came in his way. As for the Christians that there liued amongst them, he spared, but left them nothing more than their liues: the buildings of the Countrey he vtterly consumed with fire, so that in all that part of Macedonia which bordereth vpon Epirus, nothing was to be seene more than the bare ground, and the shews of the spoyle by him there made. Which vnmercifull hauocke of all things he made, to the end that the Turks should finde no reliefe in those quarters, whensoeuer they should come either to lie in garrison in that country, or to inuade Epirus. The spoyle he made was so great, that it was thought he left not in all that country, so much as might relieue the Turks armie for one day.

Mustapha ransomed.

Of all these great harms by Scanderbeg done in Macedonia, Amurath was with all speed aduertised, and therwith exceedingly vexed: howbeit he resolued with his great counsellors, no more to send any of his Bassa's or captains, but to go himselfe in person, with such a royall armie as should be sufficient not to conquer Epirus, but if need were, to fil euery corner thereof. Wherefore he commanded Commissions to be speedily directed into all parts of his Kingdomes and prouinces, for the leuying of a great armie for Hadrianople: yet whither he intended to imploy the same, was not known to any in the Turks court, more than to the Bassa's of the councel. Which caused all the bordering Christian Princes to make the best preparation they could for their own assurance, euery one fearing lest that growing tempest should break out against himself. But Scanderbeg of long acquainted with the Turkish policie, easily perceiued all that great preparation to be made against him: which hee was the rather induced to think, by reason of the vnaccustomed quietnes of Amurath, who all that while had neither sent any armie to reuenge Mustapha's ouerthrow, nor so much as a garrison for defence of the borders of his kingdome, but had let all things negligently passe, as if he had bin in a dead sleepe. Besides that, it was also thought that he had secret intelligence from some of his old friends & acquaintance acquaintance in Amuraths court, who probably suspected the matter. Wherefore Scanderbeg G setting all other things apart, gaue himself wholly to the preparing of things necessary for the defence of his small kingdome against so mightie an enemy. First, he by letters & messengers aduertised all the Christian Princes his neighbours & friends, of the greatnes of the danger of that war: wherein Amurath (as he said) sought not only his destruction, but the vtter ruine of them all: exhorting them therefore to consider, how far the danger of so great an armie might extend, and therefore to stand fast vpon their guard. Then he sent Moses and other his expert captains into all parts of Epirus, to take vp soldiers, and all the prouision of corne and victuals that was possible to be had. Wherin he himself also busily trauelled day and night, not resting vntill he had left nothing in the country, whereupon the enemie might shew his cruelty. Most H part of the common people, with their substance, were receiued into the strong cities; the rest took the refuge of the Venetian and other Christian Princes townes and countries farther off, vntill this furie were ouerpast: all such as were able to beare armes, were commanded to repaire to Croia; where when they were all assembled, they were vnow to haue made a right puissant armie. But out of all this multitude, Scanderbeg made choice only of 10000 old expert soldiers, whom he purposed to lead himselfe, to incounter with the Turks great army, as he should see occasion, and placed 1300 in garrison in Croia. The Citizens also themselues were thorowly furnished with all manner of weapons & other prouision meet for the defence of their citie. Then proclamation was made, That all the aged men vnfit for wars, with the women and children, should depart the citie, and none to be therein left, but the garrison soldiers, and such citizens as were willing to tarrie, and able to beare armes. This citie of Croia I was the chiefe citie of Epirus, and of the fortune thereof seemed to depend the state of all the other strong townes and cities, and so consequently of the whole kingdome: for which cause, The lamentable departing of the weake citizens out of Croia. Scanderbeg had the greater care for the defence thereof. It was a miserable sight, to see the lamentable departure of this weake companie out of Croia; all was ful of weeping & wailing; no house, no street, no part of the citie was without mourning: but especially in the churches was to be seen the very face of common sorrow and heauinesse; where all sorts of people in great numbers flocking together, poured forth their deuout prayers, with fountains of tears, ringing their hands; yea, and some in the impatiencie of their grief forgetting themselues, seemed to expostulate their grief with God. But when their sorrow was with tears assuaged, and their hearts somewhat eased, the aged mothers kissing their sons, gaue them many a fearefull K commandment: sometime rehearsing, how louingly and tenderly they had brought them vp, and othersome times shewing vnto them their feeble limmes & hoarie hairs, willing them to be mindfull of them. The wiues presented their children vnto their husbands, bewailing to leaue them as childlesse widowers, & their houses desolate. The old men mute with sorrow, and careful of their children, durst neither incourage them, for feare of making them too forward; neither dissuade them from aduenturing themselues, lest they should seem to loue them more than their native country. In the middest of these passions commandement came from Scanderbeg, that they must now depart, that the souldiers might take their places and charge.

Then began their sorrows afresh, with pittious shriching & tears: a man would haue thought the city had euen then bin presently taken by the Turks. They could hardly be drawne from L the imbracing of their friends, all now desiring to remain stil with them in the city, partakers of their common dangers. But when they saw the officers begin to be earnest vpon them, and to hasten their departure, then with heauy hearts they took as it were their last farewel, & departed out of the citie, setting their feet many times they wist not where, for desire they had to looke backe again vpon the city. This great multitude was conueyed also into the Venetian cities, & other places free from danger: whither al the country people which were not before receined into the strong cities, resorted also, with al their subiects & cattel; leauing nothing in all the country of Epirus, but the bare ground for the Turks to prey vpon. After this multitude was departed, and all wel quieted, & none left in the city but men fit for seruice, Scander- M beg thorowly stored it with all things needful for the defence thereof, and for the induring of a long siege: besides that, he gaue to euery soldier conuenient armor, with some final reward.
Then he placed Vranacontes (a valiant and famous captaine, honorably discended) Gouernor of the citie. And so hauing set all things in order for the safegard thereof, after he had in few words exhorted them couragiously to endure the siege, and not to listen to Amuraths flattering

A ring and deceitful charms, he departed out of the city vnto his armie, then lying within view, and began presently to march towards Dybra. But he was not farre gon, before he met with Moses with a gallant troupe of horsmen comming from Sfetigrade, a strong citie of Dybra, scituate in the confines of Epirus, bordering vpon Macedonia: which citie was Scanderbeg his second care, for that it was like to be the first that should indure the angrie tyrants fury, standing first in his way, as it were the fortresse of that country. Moses had there set all things in like order, as had Scanderbeg in Croia, and had there placed one Peter Perlat (a graue and politique man) Gouernour, with a strong garrison of soldiers chosen out of all the country of Dybra, which were alwayes accounted the best men of war in all Epirus, and was for so doing greatly commended of Scanderbeg. Who deliuering vnto him all the forces he had prepared for B the defence of the other castles and cities of Epirus, sent him with diuers other of his nobili-tie and captaines, to take order for the safetie of those places, appointing vnto euery man his charge. As for himselfe, he with a small troupe of horsmen went to Sfetigrade, careful of that citie aboue measure, as it were before diuining the insuing danger. Being come thither, and all the soldiers assembled by his commandment into the market place, he there in open audience spake vnto them as followeth:

Scanderbeg commeth to Sfetigrade.

The effectuall speech of Scanderbeg vnto the soldiers and citizens of Sfetigrade, to encourage thē against the comming of Amurath.

Almightie God could not this day offer vnto you (worthie souldiers of Sfetigrade) better matter, neither could a fairer occasion be presented vnto braue minds and soldiers desirous of honour, than that C which now hath caused you to take vp most just armes. Wherein you may for euer, by worthie example, make knowne your constant faith and worthie valour, both towards me in priuat, and the people of Epirus in generall. Hitherto we haue borne armes for the honour of our kingdome, but now we must fight for our liues, our libertie, and the walls of our countrey. You must now force your selues, that you doe not by reproch and cowardise staine the worthie praises you haue alreadie deserued by the great victories by you obtained vnder my conduct. The greatest part of the fortune of this war dependeth vpon you: For, the first passage of Amurath into Epirus (that I my selfe may be vnto you the first messenger of that danger) will be this way; the first furie of the Turks will assaile you, that hauing here as it were broken downe the strongest fortresse of Epirus, he may afterwards breake into the country, more subiect to danger. The first fruits of this war is yours, you (if you beare the hearts of couragious men, mindful of your libertie) may beat down the proud strength of the haughtie enemie, and discouer his high conceits. The D Othoman King shall haue the beginning both of his hope and feare, of you: if he shall find you so min- ded, as I now see you gallantly moued, and with joy heare your violent indignation; he will in euery place feare a great force of danger, and thereby learne to abstaine from the other cities of Epirus. Neither will he lie here long at a vaine siege, except the wayward old man will foolishly hereupon gage all his whole forces: for such is the situation and strength of this citie, that it may easily set at nought an angrie enemie. Wherefore resolue with you selues (worthie soldiers and citizens) only by constancie and faithfulnesse, without bloudshed, to gaine vnto your selues an honorable victorie. Of your valour (which I willingly speake of) dependeth for the most part the faithfulnesse of all the rest; they will looke vpon you, whom they may praise or accuse, and whose example they may follow in the fortune of these warres.
But to what purpose should men of worth in their actions pretend the necessitie of faith, or chance af for-E tune? whereas by Reason things are both best begun and accomplished. It seldome chanceth, that fortune faileth the second aduice, or is not obedient to vertue: and you haue all things which most politique care could prouide for your safetie. You want not armor, you want not plentifull prouision of victuals, you want not valiant men: the superfluous multitude of vnnecessary people, the pittifull lamentation of women, and troublesome crying of children shall not withdraw you from your publique charge, from your seruice and defence of your countrey; I haue left you alone to your selues, for defence of your citie, your Religion, and dwellings, that you might be encouraged only with the prouocations of honour and liberty, with the emulation of aduenture and danger, and the verie sight one of another; and I my selfe will not be far off with my couragious soldiers, a silent beholder and encourager of your vertue: where although I may not auert from you all the force of the cruell enemie by rash aduenture, nor trie the whole fortune F of this warre in plaine field; yet will I turne a great part of your dangers vpon my selfe, and trouble the enemies designes with many a hot skirmish. For as much as there is no better manner of fight, nor safer kind of war for us, amongst such a multitude of men, and so many thousands of souldiers, than neuer to offer battell vnto the enemie in plaine field, neither to aduenture all vpon the fortune of one conflict, although a man did see apparent signes of victorie. He will of purpose at the first giue vs the opportunitie of good hap; he will feed our hardineſſe with the bloud of his baſe ſoldiers, the eaſilier to intrap and G oppreſſe our raſhneſſe, allured with the ſweet baits of good fortune: but the craftie deuices of the Othoman King are by great policie and conſideration to be fruſtrated: this mightie enemie is by little & little to be cut off, as time and place ſhall giue occaſion. For truly that victorie ſhould be vnto me lamentable, which I ſhould buy with the bloud of my ſoldiers: and beleeue me, it would be vnto me a more ſor-rowfull than pleaſant ſight, to ſee eight or ten thouſand of my enemies ſlaine, with the loſſe of a few of you. I praiſe and honor my ſubiects of Epirus for valiant conquerors, if they ſhall not ſuffer themſelues to be conquered of the Turkiſh King. The reſt I had rather you courageous ſouldiers of Dybra ſhould conſider with your ſelues, than that I ſhould ſeeme to diſtruſt of your aſſured faith, by giuing you a care-full and tedious admonition.

When Scanderbeg had with cheerefull perſuaſion thus encouraged the minds of them of H Sfetigrade, he departed thence, and viſited diuers other cities of Epirus; where finding all things politiquely ordered by Moſes and the other captaines, whom he had put in truſt, he returned to his armie, then lying neere vnto Croia.

Whileſt Scanderbeg was with great carefulneſſe yet thus prouiding for the ſafegard of his Kingdome, in the meane time Amurath his armie was aſſembled at Hadrianople, to the number of a hundred and fiftie thouſand men, whereof many were pioners, and men appointed for other baſe ſeruices neceſſarie at the ſiege of townes. Of this great armie Amurath ſent fortie thouſand light horſemen before him to Sfetigrade; who according to his command came and incamped before the citie. The newes of their comming, with a great deale more than I truth, was forthwith brought to Scanderbeg, then lying with his ſmall Armie neere Croia: whereupon he with foure thouſand horſe, and a thouſand foot, tooke the way toward Sfetigrade, and ſtrongly incamped his armie within ſeuen miles of the citie. Where hauing ſet all things in good order, he, accompanied with Moſes and Tanuſius, went by certaine blinde wayes thorow the mountaines and woods, vntill he came ſo neere vnto the citie, that from the place where he ſtood, he might eaſily diſcouer in what ſort the enemie lay incamped: and ſo returning backe againe to his campe, roſe with his armie in the night following, and drawing as neere vnto the Turks armie as he could, vndiſcouered, placed all his armie in the co-A notable ſtratagem of Scanderbeg for the intrapping of his enemies. uert of the woods and ſecret vallies, vnperceiued of his enemies. After that, he ſent forth Moſes and Muſachi his nephew, with thirtie of his beſt horſemen, apparelled as if they had K been but common ſouldiers, but paſſing well mounted, driuing before them certaine horſes laden with corne, by a by-way, as if they had ſecretly purpoſed to haue got into the citie. The day then breaking, they were diſcouerrd by the Turks ſcouts, and ſet vpon: where at the firſt Moſes and the reſt began of purpoſe to flie; but when he ſaw that they were purſued but with like number to themſelues, he turned backe vpon the Turks, and ſlew fiue of them, and chaſed the reſt vnto the campe. The Generall ſeeing what had happened, ſent forth foure thouſand horſemen to purſue theſe ſuppoſed victuallers: whom they quickely recouered the ſight of, for that Moſes of purpoſe had made ſmall haſt to flie: but when the Turks began to draw nigh, Moſes left the horſes laden with corne, and fled; yet ſo, that he ſtill drew on the Turkes with hope to ouertake him, vntill he had brought them where Scanderbeg with his armie lay L in wait: by whom they were ſuddenly aſſailed on euerie ſide, and with great ſlaughter put to flight. In this conflict two thouſand of the Turks were ſlaine, and a thouſand of their horſes taken: of the Chriſtians were loſt but two and twentie. This was the firſt welcome of the Turks armie to Sfetigrade.

1449. About eight dayes after came Amurath with all his armie, in the beginning of May, Anno Amurath commeth to Sfetigrade with his armie. Dom. 1449, and hauing made the greateſt ſhew he could with his huge army to terrifie the defendants; he incamped the baſer ſort of his footmen at the foot of the hill whereon the citie ſtood, and lay himſelf with his Ianizaries, & other his moſt valiant ſoldiers, about three quarters of a mile further off: where after he had lien ſtill one day, & well conſidered the ſtrength of the place, toward euening he ſent a meſſengers to the city, who requeſted to ſpeak with the M Gouernour Perlat. Wherof he hearing came to the wall: of whom the meſſenger requeſted, That he would command the ſouldiers ſtanding by, to go further off, for as much as he had ſomething in ſecret to ſay vnto him from his maſter. Vnto whom Perlat merrily anſwered; It is like indeed to be ſome great ſecret, that you would haue kept not onely from the hearing

A ring of my ſoldiers, but from the verie light of the day, and therefore haue I choſen the night: but I haue not learned of myne elders, to reaue my ſelf of rage from mine enemies by night, neither at any time elſe out of the hearing of the garriſon ſoldiers, to whom Scanderbeg hath committed the defence of this Citie, and I the regard of my perſon. You muſt therefore at this time pardon me, and to morrow if your Maiſter ſo pleaſe, I will heare your meſſage. And therewith commanded him to depart from the walls. So he returned for that time without audience as he came. It grieued Amurath not a little, to ſee his meſſenger ſo lightly regarded: yet for as much as he had more hope to gaine the citie by large offers, or ſome reaſonable compoſition, than by all his great force, he diſſembled his wrath, and the next day ſent the meſſenger againe, with one of his Baſſa's, a graue and well ſpoken man, himſelfe borne in Epirus. This B Baſſa, with three ſoldiers, and two ſeruitors, was by the Gouernors commandement, by one of the ports receiued into the citie, and brought into Saint Maries church. Where after he had with great eloquence ſought to inſinuate himſelf into the minds of the Gouernor & the hearers, and afterwards augmented the terror of Amuraths power beyond all meaſure, laying before them the great victories by him obtained againſt the Hungarians and the other Chriſtian Princes: in fine, he exhorted them to yeeld the citie vnto him; in whoſe name hee promiſed firſt, That the citizens ſhould in all reſpects vnder his gouernment liue as they had before done vnder Scanderbeg: then, That the gouernour ſhould receiue at Amurath his hands moſt honorable preferments, with many rich and princely gifts: and, That it ſhould be lawfull for the garriſon ſoldiers to depart in ſafetie whither they would, & to haue three hundred thouſand Aſpers diuided amongſt them in reward. But when the Baſſa had ended his ſpeech, the C Gouernor in this ſort replied:

If you had not deliuered this ſpeech vnto reſolute men, denoted vnto the defence of their libertie, it The reſolute answere of Perlat the Gouernour vnto the Baſſa.
might perhaps haue wrought ſome effect; and we (ſaid he) might peraduenture liſten vnto your offers, if we were either affraid of the Othoman King, and the vaine threats of our enemies, or elſe were wea- rie of the gouernment of the noble Scanderbeg. But foraſmuch as no euill deſert of his, nor good de- ſert of your maſters, hath yet paſſed, for which we ſhould preferre a ſtranger before our naturall Souraigne, an enemie before a friend, a Turke before a Chriſtian; let your maſter proceed firſt in his action begun, let him proue his fortune, let him by force terrifie vs, beat downe our walls, make hauocke of our D men, and by ſtrong hand driue vs to humble our ſelues at his feet, and to ſue for peace. But it were a great diſhonour, yea a thing almoſt to be laughed at, if we ſhould cowardly accept of theſe conditions by him offered, before any aſſault giuen, before one drop of bloud ſpilt, before any ſoldier did ſo much as once groan for any wound receiued, before one ſtone were ſhaken in the wall, or any ſmall breach made. But your maſter ſhall do better to raiſe his ſiege, and get him backe againe to Hadrianople, there to ſpend the ſmall remainder of his old yeares in quiet, and not to prouoke vs his fatall enemies, whoſe courage in defence of our liberties, and fidelitie towards our Prince, he hath ſo oftentimes prooued to his great diſhonor, & loſſe of his armies. The faith I haue once giuen to my Soueraigne, for the defence of this citie, I wil neuer forget, vntill the effuſion of the laſt drop of my bloud. It ſhall be vnto me reward and honour enough, if I either liuing defend this citie, or with loſſe of my life ſhall leaue my guiltleſſe ſoule at libertie, & my carkaſſe amongſt the dead bodies of worthie ſoldiers, when I ſhall find a way into a far better place.

The General hauing giuen this reſolute anſwer vnto the Baſſa, bountifully feaſted him that E day at dinner, and afterwards led him thorow the midſt of the citie; where he ſaw great ſtore of victuals, by the gouernor commanded of purpoſe to be ſet in ſhew, to put Amurath out of hope of winning the citie by long ſiege. And ſo ſent the Baſſa out by the ſame port whereby he came in, much diſcontented with the anſwer he was to returne to his Maſter.

When Amurath vnderſtood by the Baſſa, of the gouernors reſolution, he was therwith exceeding wrath, and thereupon with his great Ordnance battered the citie three days without intermiſſion. And hauing by the furie of his artillerie made a ſmall breach, he forthwith gaue Sfetigrade aſſaulted.
thereunto a moſt terrible aſſault, laboring firſt to win the ſame by the force and multitude of F his common ſoldiers, which the Turks call Aſapi, whom he forced by great numbers to that ſeruice. Of theſe ſouldiers the Turke in his wars maketh no great reckoning, but to blunt the ſwords of his enemies, or to abate their firſt fury, therby to giue the eaſier victory to his Ianizaries and other his better ſoldiers: which the Othoman Kings hold for good policie. Whilſt these forlorne soldiers, without respect of danger pressing forward, are slaine by heapes at the G breach, the Ianizaries at the same time in another place attempted to haue scaled the walls of the citie: but whilst they with much labor & difficultie first crawle vp the steep rock wheron the citie was built, and afterward desperatly mount vp their scaling ladders, they were by the defendants, with huge stones and weightie pieces of timber cast vpon them, beaten downe, wherewith they were driuen headlong to the bottom of the rock, and so miserably slain. Manie of them together with their skaling ladders, were by the Christians thrust from the wall, and tumbling from the rocke, violently carried with them others comming vp behind them.

Some few got to the top of the ladders, and taking hold of the battlements of the walls, lost some their fingers, some their hands, but most their liues, being beaten downe as the other were. Many of them which stood farther off, were then wounded also, & with shot from the H wals slain. With this miserable slaughter, & no hope to preuaile, the Turks discouraged, began to withdraw themselues from the assault: but the Bassa's and captains standing behind them, forced them again forward, exhorting some, threatning others, and beating the rest forward with their trunchions. By which means the assault was again renewed, but not with such courage as before, though with no lesse slaughter: which the defendāts seeing, gaue from the wals great tokens of joy & triumph. Amurath perceiuing his discouraged soldiers readie of themselues to forsake the assault, presently sent Feri-Bassa (one of his most valiant captains) with a new supplie of 3000 chosen soldiers to renew the fight. The Christians well aware of their comming, ceased not with continuall shot to beat them from the walls: but such was the for-wardnes of that fierce captain, that without regard of danger, he brought his men to the wals, I where the defendants from aboue ouerwhelmed them with stones, timber, wild-fire, and such other things as are vsually prepared for the defence of towns besieged. For all that, Feri-Bassa gaue so great an assault, that he slew diuers of the defendants vpon the wals, and had there forcibly entred, had not the gouernor, perceiuing the danger, with a companie of fresh souldiers come with speed to the defence of that place; wherby the enemie was presently repulsed, and The Turkes repulsed, retyre. driuen again from the walls. Amurath seeing the great slaughter of his men, and no hope of succesſe, caused a retrait to be sounded, and so leauing the assault, retyred again into his camp.
The great losse and dishonor at this assault receiued, much troubled his waiward minde; who for all that yet ceased not to giue the like vaine attempts. At length, the captain of the Ianiza-ries perceiuing that part of the citie which was fartheſt from the campe, to be commonly but K slenderly manned, by reason that it seemed a place impregnable, both for the height & steep-to attempt by that place to enter the city; whereas they thought nothing was more to be feared, than the height thereof, which they, supported with the wings of desire, doubted not to mount vnto. This his deuice exceedingly pleased the King, and was the next night with great silence put in execution. But such was the carefulnesse of the gouernor ouer euery part of his charge, that nothing could be done against the same, but that it was forthwith by him discouered. The gouernor aduertised by the Watch, of the Turks attempt; with great silence presently repaired to the place with a great companie of the garrison soldiers, and standing close, from the top of the wall beheld the Turks, as it had bin a swarme of Emmets, climing vp the L high rocks, and one helping vp another, by such desperat way, as was in reason to haue beene thought no man would haue attempted. But when they were come to the top of the rock, and now euen readie to enter, they were from aboue suddenly ouerwhelmed, as it had been with a shoure of shot, and so violently forced down that high rocke, that most part of them which The Ianizaries repulsed. had got vp to any height, were miserably crushed to death, either with the weight of themselues, or with others falling vpon them, and many of the rest slaine with shot from the top of the rocke: whereof Amurath presently vnderstanding, was therewith exceedingly grieued.

During the time of this siege, Scanderbeg neuer lay long still in one place, but remoued continually from place to place, as best serued his purpose, breaking somtimes into one quarter of the Turks campe, & sometime into another, & straitway so suddenly gon again, and as it were M vanished out of sight, that Amurath many times wondered what was become of him. At this time, being the latter end of Iune, he was come with his army within eight miles of Amuraths campe: and from thence sent Moses his greatest captaine, in the attyre of a common souldier, with two other, to take view how the enemie lay incamped. By which trustie espials he was informed,

A enformed, That the Turks lay in great securitie, as men without feare, keeping but negligent watch. Of which opportunitie, Scanderbeg reioycing, the night following suddenly assaulted one quarter of the Turks camp. Whose comming, although it was a little before by the Turks scouts discouered, yet his furious assault was so sudden and so forcible, that he slew two thousand of the Turks, and filled euery corner of that great campe with feare and tumult, before they could well arme themselues or make resistance. After which slaughter he safely retired, carrying away with him two hundred and thirtie horse, with seuen of the Turks ensignes, hauing in this skirmish lost of his men but two and fortie: whose dead bodies the Turkes the next morning in reuenge of their slaine friends hewed into small pieces.

Vpon these great disgraces one following in the neck of another, Amurath hauing no other B obiect but the citie to shew his furie vpon, gaue three fierce assaults vnto the same, one after another, & was alwaies with losse both of his men & honor repulsed. But the more he lost, the more he burnt with desire of reuenge, persuading his soldiers, That as the strongest cities and fortresses were but by mens hands, so were they to be ouerthrowne and laied euen with the ground by resolute and valiant men incouraging them to a fresh assault, with greater promises of reward than euer he had done before in all his wars, from the first beginning of his raigne.
And because he would with more safety giue this his last & greatest assault, he appointed Fe- ri-Bassa, with twelue thousand horsemen and six thousand foot to attend vpon Scanderbeg, if he should hap to come (as he thought he would) to trouble the assault, by assailing of his camp.
Feri-Bassa glad of this charge, wel hoping now to redeeme his former ouerthrow with some great victorie, and leading forth his armie a little from the camp, as he was commanded, so lay; C wishing for nothing more than the comming of Scanderbeg; vainely boasting, That he would seek him in the field, and there trie his force and fortune with him hand to hand: which he did shortly after to his cost. When Amurath had thus set in order all things requisit, as wel for the siege, as for the safegard of his campe, the next morning he compassed the citie round about with his army, & couered the ground with his men of war, purposing at that time to gage his whole forces vpon the taking therof. The wals he had before in some places battered, so much as was possible; & yet but so, as that they were not without scaling laders to be assaulted: partly for the naturall strength of the place, & partly for that the defendants had with great diligence continually repaired & filled vp with earth what the fury of the cannon had throwne down. This assault Amurath began first with his archers and smal shot, which deliuered their D arrows and bullets vpon the top of the wall, & into the city, as if it had bin a shower of hayle, therby to trouble the stationary soldiers. In this heat, ladders were clapped to the wals in eue-ry place where any could be possibly reared, and the Turks began desperatly to scale the wals; but the Christians nothing dismaid therat, with great courage resisted them, & with shot from their safe standings wounded and slew many of them: yet others stil pressed vp in the places of them that were slain, so that the assault began most terrible in many places at once, but especially neere to the great gate of the citie; where the Turks had vpon the sudden with ladders, timber, and plancks clapt together, raised close vnto that tower, as it had bin a wooden tower, equall in height to the wall; from whence the Turks greatly distressed the Christians in that E place, fighting with them as if it had bin vpon euen ground, still sending vp fresh souldiers in stead of them that were slain: & thereby preuailed so far, that they had set vp certain of Amu- raths ensignes vpon the wall, to the great comfort of the Turkes, & astonishment of the besieged Christians. The Gouernor seeing the eminent danger, hasted to the place with a company of fresh and valiant souldiers, by whose force the Turks were quickly repulsed from the wal, their ensignes taken and sent into the market place: the tower of wood with many ladders and much timber by the Turks brought to that place, was quickly consumed with wilde fire cast vpon the same from the wals. Perlat hauing deliuered the citie of this feare, presently placed fresh souldiers in stead of them which were slaine or hurt, and so worthily defended the citie.

Whilest Amurath was giuing this great assault to Sfetigrade, Scanderbeg to withdraw him F from the same, came with nine thousand soldiers to assaile the Turks campe, as Amurath had before suspected, & was now come very neere the same. Feri-Bassa glad of his comming, opposed his armie against him: which Scanderbeg seeing, retired a litle of purpose to draw the Bassa farther from the campe, and then forthwith began to ioyne battell with him. The Bassa consydering the smal number of his enemies, & his own greater power, withdrew foure thouſand horſmen out of his armie to fetch a compaſſe about, & to ſet vpon the rereward of Scanderbegs army: hoping ſo to encloſe him, that he ſhould neuer eſcape thence, but there either to be ſlaine or taken aliue, and his army vtterly defeated. But the expert captaine perceiuing his purpoſe, to meet therwith, left Moſes to lead the main battel, and he himſelfe with two thouſand horſmen, ſo valiantly charged thoſe foure thouſand of his enemies before they were wel departed from the reſt of the Baſſaes army, that they had now more cauſe to look to their own ſafety, than how to circumuent others. In this conflict Feri-Baſſa hand to hand, as he had oft times before deſired, encountring with Scanderbeg, was by him there ſlain. All this while that Scanderbeg was in fight with Feri-Baſſa in the right wing of the army, and Muſachy in the left, Moſes ſtood faſt, receiuing the aſſault of the enemy without mouing any thing forward, expecting the ſucceſſe of the wings. But Scanderbeg hauing diſcomfited the right wing, and ſlaine the General, comming now in, he ſet forward with ſuch force & courage, that the Turkes not able longer to abide his force, turned their backs and fled: of whom many were ſlaine in this chaſe, though Scanderbeg doubting the great power of his enemy ſo nigh at hand, durſt not follow them far; but ſounding a retrait, put his army again in good order, for feare of ſom ſudden attempt from the campe, and after appointed ſome of the meaneſt of his ſouldiers to take the ſpoile of the ſlain Turks. When Amurath had vnderſtood what had hapned to Feri-Baſſa, hee was ſo ouercome with anger and melancholy, that for a while he could not ſpeake one word: but after the heat was a little paſt, he commanded certain ſmall pieces of ordnance, which he had before vſed againſt the citie, to bee remoued into the campe, and there placed vpon that ſide which was moſt in danger to, the enemie. He alſo preſently ſent thither foure thouſand ſouldiers to ioyne with the remainder of Feri-Baſſaes armie, for defence of the campe, with ſtrait charge that they ſhould not iſſue out of the trenches. Neuertheleſſe he himſelfe continued the aſſault of the citie all that day: but when night drew on, & no hope appeared for him to preuaile, he cauſed a retrait to be ſounded; and leauing the aſſault, he returned again into his campe. At this aſſault Amurath loſt ſeuen thouſand men, beſide many that died afterwards of their wounds; but of the garriſon ſouldiers were ſlaine but ſeuentie, and ninetie moe hurt.

The terrour of the Turkiſh armie began now to grow in contempt throughout Epirus; and Scanderbeg was in good hope, that Amurath after ſo many ouerthrowes and ſhameful repulſes, would at length raiſe his ſiege and be gone: yet hee ſent ſpies continually to diſcouer what was done in the Turks campe, and he himſelfe with two thouſand ſoldiers would oftentimes ſhew himſelfe vpon the ſides of the mountaines neere vnto Amurath his campe, of purpoſe to draw the Turkes out, that he might take them at ſome aduantage. But the old King had giuen commandement vpon paine of death, That no man ſhould goe out of the trenches without leaue, or once to ſpeake of giuing battell or aſſault: ſo that he lay certaine dayes in his camp, not like a King beſieging of a citie, but more like a man beſieged himſelfe: the which his ſtill lying, Scanderbag had the more in diſtruſt, fearing greatly that hee was hatching ſome miſchiefe, which ſo ſoone as it was ripe would violently breake out.

Amurath by great promiſes ſeeketh to corrupt the gariſon of Sfetigrade.

Amurath conſidering with what euill ſucceſſe he had many times aſſaulted the city, & holding it for a great diſhonour to raiſe his ſiege and depart, hauing done nothing worth the remembrance; thought good once againe to proue, if it were poſſible to ouercome the mindes of the garriſon ſoldiers with gifts, whom he was not able to ſubdue by force. For which purpoſe he ſent an embaſſador vnto the city, offering vnto the beſieged and garriſon ſoldiers eaſie conditions of peace, with ſuch large gifts & rewards as had not bin heard offered to any garriſon in former time. Al which his magnificall promiſes were lightly reiected by the common conſent of al the whole garriſon, preferring their faithful loyalty before al his golden mountains. For all that, Amurath was in good hope, that amongſt ſo many, ſome would be found, into whoſe minds his large offers might make ſome impreſſion; wherein he was not deceiued. For one baſe minded fellow amongſt the reſt, corrupted with the Turks great promiſes, preferring his owne priuat wealth, before the welfare of his country, waiting his time had ſecret confrence with the Turks eſpials, promiſing vpon aſſurance of ſuch reward as was before by Amurath profered, to find means that in few daies the citie ſhould be yeelded into his power. This corrupted traitor, had laid many miſchieuous plots for the effecting of this horrible treſon: but the firſt deuice he put in practiſe, which of al others a man would haue thought to haue bin of leaſt moment, ſerued his wicked purpoſe in ſtead of all the reſt. All the garriſon ſouldiers

A diers of Sfetigrade were of the vpper country of Dibra, put into that citie, by Moſes, for their approued valor aboue all the other ſoldiers of Epirus. But as they were men of great courage, ſo were they exceeding ſuperſtitious both in their religion and manner of liuing, putting nice difference betwixt one kind of lawfull meat and other: accounting ſome clean, ſome vnclean; abhorring from that, which they fondly deemed vncleane, with more than a Iewiſh ſuperſtition, chuſing rather to die than to eat or drink thereof: ſuch is the ſtrong delufion of blind error, where it hath throughly poſſeſſed the minds of men. The citie of Sfetigrade (as is aforeſaid) is ſcituate vpon the top of a great high rock, as moſt of the cities of Epirus now bee, and was then watred but with one great well in the midſt of the citie, which ſunke deepe into the rock, plentifully ſerued both the publick and priuat vſe of the inhabitants. Into this common well the malicious traitor in the night time caſt the foule ſtinking carrion carkaſſe of a dead

B dod, knowing, that the conceited garriſon ſouldiers of Dibra, would rather indure the paines of death, & ſtarue, or els yeeld vp the citie, vpon any condition, than to drink of that polluted water. In the morning when that ſtinking carion was eſpied, and drawne out of the well, the report therof was quickly bruted in euery corner of the citie, & that the wel was poiſoned: ſo that al the people were in maner in an vprore about the finding out of the traitor. The citizens were exceeding ſorrie for that had hapned, but the garriſon ſoldiers deteſted that loathſom and vnclean water (as they accounted it) more than the Turkiſh ſeruitude, proteſting, that they would rather periſh with thirſt, than drink therof. Wherupon ſome of them deſired to ſet fire vpon the citie, and whileſt they had yet ſtrength, to break through the enemies camp or there manfully to die. And they which thought beſt of the matter, requeſted, that the city might be

C yeelded vp; for now, they diſcouraged with a ſuperſtitious vanitie, could be content to hearken to the former conditions of peace, yea they were ready enough of themſelues to ſue to Amurath for peace, though it had bin vpon harder tearmes. The Gouernour troubled with that had hapned, and aſtonied to ſee ſo great an alteration in the minds of his ſoldiers vpon ſo ſmal occaſion: could not tell whether he might thinke it to proceed of a ſuperſtitious conceit, or of ſome ſecret compact made with Amurath. But the better to pacifie the matter, he came into the market place, and there in the hearing of al the garriſon, with many effectuall reaſons, exhorted them to continue faithful vnto their Prince and country in that honorable ſeruice; and in a matter of ſo great conſequence to make ſmall reckoning to vſe that water, which

D would eaſily in ſhort time be brought again to the wonted puritie and cleanneſſe: and to perſuade them the rather, he went preſently to the wel himſelf, and in the ſight of them al drunk a great draught of the water, whoſe example the citizens following, drank likewiſe. But when it was offered to the captains and ſoldiers of the garriſon, they all refuſed to taſt therof, as if it had bin a moſt loathſome thing, or rather ſome deadly poiſon, & with great inſtance cried vnto the Gouernor, to giue vp the citie: for which cauſe many thought they were corrupted by Amuraths great promiſes. Howbeit none of the garriſon (except that one traitor) did euer afterwards reuolt to the Turkiſh king, or yet appeared any thing the richer for any gift receiued, whereby ſuch ſuſpition might be confirmed. When the Gouernor ſaw that the obſtinate minds of the garriſon were not to be mooued with any perſuaſion or reward (whereof he ſpared not to make large promiſe) nor by any other means which he could deuiſe; he called vnto him his chief captains, with the beſt ſort of the citizens, & reſolued with them ful ſore againſt his wil, to yeeld vp the city to Amurath, on ſuch conditions as they themſelues there agreed

E vpon: which were, That it ſhould be lawfull for all the captains and ſoldiers to depart in ſafetie with their armor and al other things; and that ſo many of the citizens as would ſtay, might there ſtil dwel in the city, in ſuch ſort, as they had done before, vnder the gouernment of Scanderbeg; the reſt that liſted not to remain there ſtil, might at their pleaſure with bag & baggage depart whether they would. Glad was Amurath when this offer was made vnto him, & granted them al that was deſired, ſauing that he would not conſent that the citizens ſhould continue in the citie, yet was he content that they ſhould liue vnder him as they had don before, quietly enioying all their poſſeſſions, but to build their houſes without the wal of the city:

F which condition ſome accepted, & ſome forſaking al, went to Scanderbeg. When all was thorowly agreed vpon, the keys of the gates were deliuered to Amurath, & the gouernor with the captains, & al the garriſon ſoldiers ſuffered quietly to paſſe through the Turkiſh camp, as the King had promiſed. Howbeit, Mahomet the ſon of Amurath, a Prince of a cruell diſpoſition, earneſtly earnestly perswaded his father, to haue broken his faith, and to haue put them all to the sword: saying, it was one of their Prophet Mahomets chiefe commandements, to vse all crueltie for the destruction of the Christians. But the old king would not therin hearken vnto his son, saying, That he which was desirous to be great among men, must either be indeed faithful of his word and promise, or at least wise seeme so to be, therby to gain the minds of the people, who naturally abhor the gouernment of a faithlesse and cruel Prince. The traitor which corrupted the water, remained still in the city, and was by Amurath rewarded with three rich suits of apparell, and fiftie thousand aspers, and had giuen vnto him besides a yearely pension of two thousand duckats. But short was the ioy the traitor had of this euil gotten goods: for after he had a few daies vainely triumphed in the midst of Amurath his fauors, he was suddenly gone, and neuer afterwards seen or heard tell of; being secretly made away (as was supposed) by the commandement of Amurath: whose noble heart could not but detest the traitor, although the treason serued well his purpose. Amurath entring into Sfetigrade, caused the wals to be forthwith repaired, and placed one thousand two hundred Ianizaries in garrison there. And raising his campe the first of September, departed out of Epirus, hauing lost thirtie thousand of his Turks at the siege of Sfetigrade; much grieued in mind for all that, that he could not vanquish the enemie, whom he came of purpose to subdue. In his returne, the viceroy of Asia marched before him with the Asian souldiers; in the rereward followed the viceroy of Europe with his European souldiers: in the middest was Amurath himselfe, compassed about with his Ianizaries and other souldiers of the court. Scanderbeg vnderstanding of Amurath his departure, followed speedily with eight thousand horsemen, and three thousand foot, and taking the aduantage of the thicke woods and mountaine straits (to him well knowne) whereby that great armie was to passe, oftentimes skirmished with the Turks, charging them sometime in the vaward, and somtime in the rereward, sometime on the one side, and somtime on the other, and slew many of them: whereby he so troubled Amurath his passage, that he was glad to leaue the viceroy of Romania, with 30000 to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he himselfe might in the meane time with more safety march away with the rest of his army. Scanderbeg perceiuing the stay of the viceroy, ceased to follow Amurath further, fearing to be enclosed betweene those two great armies. The viceroy seeing that Scanderbeg was retired, after hee had staid a few dayes, followed his master to Hadrianople, and so Scanderbeg returned to Croia.

A traitor worthily rewarded according to his treason.

Sortly after the departure of Amurath out of Epirus, Scanderbeg left two thousand souldiers vpon the borders for defence of the country against the Turks. These souldiers so straightly kept in the Ianizaries left in garrison at Sfetigrade that they could not looke out of the citie, but that they were intercepted and slaine. And within a few daies after came himselfe with an army of eighteen thousand, and laid siege to Sfetigrade the space of a month, which was from middle of September vntill the middle of October. In which time he gaue two great assaults to haue recouered the citie, but was both times repulsed, with the losse of fiue hundred men. Amurath vnderstanding that Scanderbeg lay at the siege of Sfetigrade, sent with al speed to recall his armie, but lately before dispersed. Whereof Scanderbeg hauing intelligence, considering also the difficultie of the enterprise, with the approch of Winter, raised his siege, and returned to Croia: where he set all things in the same order he had done before the comming of Amurath to the siege of Sfetigrade, and put two thousand of his best souldiers there in garrison, vnder the charge of the famous captaine Vranacontes, and stored his citie with sufficient victuall for a yeares siege, wherein he had great helpe from the Venetians and other Christian Princes, for that there was then great scarcitie of all things in Epirus, by reason of the late warres. The like care he had also of all the rest of his cities, being continually aduertised from his secret friends in the Turks court, of the great preparation intended against him by the Turkish King, against the beginning of the next Spring.

Amurath vnderstanding that Scanderbeg was departed from Sfetigrade, changed his former determination for the calling backe againe of his armie, and appointed it to meet againe at Hadrianople, in the beginning of March following: whether the Bassaes, and other great commanders, at the time appointed, assembled with their companies, according as Amurath had before commanded. So that by the latter end of March, he had there in readinesse an army of an hundred and threescore thousand men strong. Of which great multitude, he after the manner of the Turkish wars, sent forty thousand horsemen, vnder the leading of Sebalyas a politick captaine,

A captaine, as his vauntcourriers into Epirus, in the beginning of Aprill, in the yeare 1450. The valiant captaine with great speed and no resistance entred into Epirus, as was giuen him in charge, and without let came to Croia: where, after he had aduisedly considered of the scituation thereof, and of the places thereabouts, he strongly encamped himselfe neere thereunto in the pleasant plaine called Tyranna: and there within his trenches kept his souldiers close, attending nothing more, but that no new supplie of men, munition, or victuals, should be conueied into the citie, more than was therein before his comming. For he was not able with his horsemen to doe any thing against the citie: and Scanderbeg had left nothing abroad in the countrey subiect to his fury. Besides that, he was expresly by Amurath forbidden, to attempt any thing against Scanderbeg himselfe.

B After Sebalyas had twentie dayes thus lyen encamped before Croia, neither doing nor taking harme; Amurath by reason of his great age, hauing marched oftentimes but fiue miles a day, came thither also with his whole armie, wherewith he filled al the country round about: the very sight whereof, had bin enough to haue discouraged the small garrison in Croia, had they not bin men both of great experience and resolution. Where after he had spent foure dayes in settling of his campe, he sent two messengers vnto the Gouernour (as the manner of the Turks is) offering him if he would yeeld vp the citie, that it should be lawful for him with all his souldiers in safetie with bag and baggage to depart; and the Gouernor himselfe to receiue in reward two hundred thousand aspers, with an honourable place amongst the great Bassaes of his court, if it would please him to accept thereof: and further, that the citizens should enioy all their antient liberties as in former time, without any alteration; with promise

C also of greater. These messengers comming to the gates of the citie, could not be suffered to enter, but standing without, were commanded there to deliuer their message: which when the Gouernor had heard, he scornefully reiected their offers, and returned the messengers shamefully derided by the souldiers which stood vpon the wall. Amurath more offended with this contempt, than the refusall of his offers; and seeing no other means to gaine the citie, conuerted all his deuices vnto the siege thereof. Wherefore he first commanded ten great pieces of artillerie to be forthwith cast, for he had brought with him none readie made, because of the difficult passage ouer the high mountaines into Epirus; whereby it seemed to be a matter of infinit trouble to haue brought his great ordnance: and therefore carried with him great store

D of mettall in masse, whereof at his pleasure to make his great artillerie as he saw cause. In fifteen daies this worke was brought to perfection, and ten pieces of huge greatnesse were ready mounted vpon carriages. Six of them hee placed against the East side of the citie, towards the plaine of Tyranna, and the other foure against the gate: in which two places onely, Croia was subiect to batterie, being on all other parts naturally defended with impregnable rocks, vpon the tops whereof were built faire battlements, more for beautie than needfull defence. These two places Amurath battered foure dayes continually, and with the fury of his artillery had in both places beaten downe halfe the wall, & sore shaken the rest. Wherewith the Turks were exceedingly encouraged, & with great cheerfulnes made all things ready to assault these breaches, whensoeuer Amurath should command, striuing among themselues who shoud shew himselfe most forward in that dangerous enterprise. And Mahomet the yong Prince, the more to encourage the soldiers, besides the great rewards by his father proposed, promised of himselfe to giue an hundred thousand aspers vnto him that should first set vp an ensigne vpon the Croia battered.

E wals of the citie. The garrison soldiers on the other side, considering that the whole state and welfare of Epirus was reposed in their valour; and that the eyes of most part of Christendome were as it were fixed vpon them, were nothing dismayed with the breaches made, but manfully comforted and encouraged one another to endure all manner of perill and danger that might possibly chance: but especially the worthie Gouernour Vranacontes, who going through the middest of his souldiers, and shaking some of them by the hands, with all said:

F These, these are the fortresses of our citie, these are the inuincible bulwarkes, these are the irremoouable stones and surest sement. What honour? what praise? what triumph should we hope for? if these wals standing whole and strong, wee should lie shrouded vnder the defence of them, and not they defended by vs? So can cowards defend cities, and sheepe feare not the wolues rage, when they are safely shut vp within the wals of their sheepecoats: But that is the praise of the walls, and not of the men.

The cheerefull speech of Vranacontes the Gouernour to encourage his souldiers.

Worthie

worthie Castriot our Prince hath commended this his city to be defended by vs, and not vs by it. Honor is attended vpon with danger, and fostered vp amongst perils: euery base mariner may be a master in faire weather: and firme things stand of themselues, and need not our vpholding. Wherefore, men of worth shun such things, which being kept or lost, yeeld like praise. Things readie to fall, need shoaring, and thither hasteth honour, and there (worthie souldiers) appeareth courage and valour. Wherefore let our valiant right hands defend these broken breaches, and in stead of these dead wals, couragiously oppose our lustie and liuely armed bodies against the force of our enemies. If these wals stood still firme, and vnbattered, you should then fight from the top of them like women; but now that they are something shaken, you shall as men stand vpon somewhat more euen ground, and encounter your enemies hand to hand, the better to satisfie your furious desire. Where I also in the thickest, shall easily view and iudge of euery mans priuate courage in particular, and of all your valour in common. And yet if wee well consider of the matter, the place it selfe doth yet notably make for vs; and our former good hopes are little or nothing by these small breaches diminished: for, this rising of the hil (not possible to be taken from vs) although it be not so high as it is in other places, yet, doth it not serue vs sufficiently at great aduantage to charge our enemies, and hinder their assault? The steepnesse whereof, as it wil bee troublesome vnto them, so will it keepe vs most fresh in strength, and make our shot more forcible. Wherefore this had beene a thing of vs to haue beene wished for, if wee desire the slaughter of our enemies at this siege; or if we wish for perpetuall honour and glorie by this warre. For this breach of the wals will encourage these Barbarians, and allure their armed men to clime vp in greater multitude than if the wals were whole; whereof so many shall on euery side be easily slaine, as we shall but aime at: except you had rather sit still, holding your hands together in your bosomes as cowards. Their dead bodies shall fill vp the breaches againe, if you be men mindfull of your libertie. What is there (worthie captaines and souldiers) that letteth our victorie? or memorable slaughter of our enemies? by whom onely these two places of the citie can be assaulted: all the rest is out of danger, and feares no enemies force. Here onely is the pains to be taken, this onely is left for you to defend, and here shall you all be: the courage, force, and strength of you all shall in this place appeare. How will you so many worthie captains, and valiant souldiers, in so little roome bestow your selues? We are too many defendants for so small breaches. Yet let vs play the men, & doe our endeuour: let vs in one conflict weaken the tyrants strength, and burst his proud heart; he will forsake this city, and raise his siege vnfortunatly begun, so soone as he shall see his first assault to cost him the liues of so many thousands of his men.

Croia assaulted

When Vranacontes had with this comfortable speech thus encouraged his souldiers, against the assault which he expected the next day; and had with great care & diligence set al things in order for the same, & repaired the breaches as wel as was possible in that case, he gaue them leaue for that night to take their rest. In the morning Amurath commanded the assault to be giuen to both the breaches, which was forthwith by the Turks cheerfully begun, and euery man busie to perform the seruice he was appointed vnto. But by that time that the assault was well begun, a sudden alarum was raised throughout all the Turks campe: for Scanderbeg with fiue thousand valiant souldiers, had suddenly broken in vpon one side of the Turkes great camp, and at the first encounter had slain six hundred of the Turks, and was now spoiling their tents. The rumor wherof, troubled the whole campe, and made the Turks with lesse courage to assault the breaches, for feare of the danger behind them. Amurath although he had great confidence in them whom he had before left for the safegard of his tents, yet for more surety sent Seremet one of his greatest captains, with forue thousand soldiers back into the camp, for more surety; saying, that nothing could be too sure, against that wild beast: meaning the fury of Scanderbeg. Mahomet also the yong prince, hasted thither in great choler with his guard, much against his fathers wil. But Moses, Scanderbegs lieutenant, knowing himselfe too weak to withstand the multitude that was swarming thither (contenting himself with that which was already don) had before Mahomets comming, speedily retired with all his army into the safegard of the mountains, from whence he came: hauing done great harme in the Turks campe, Scanderbeg in danger.

with the losse but of ten men. Scanderbeg in the heat of this skirmish, forgetting himself, had so far engaged himself among the Turks, that he was by them on euery side enclosed, & in great danger to haue bin slaine or taken: yet valiantly breaking through them, he escaped the danger, and recouered the mountains, and with much ado came at length to his camp, to the great ioy and comfort of them all, being before in great feare he had bin lost. This was accounted the

A the greatest ouersight of Scanderbeg in all his wars; for so much as the office of a good Generall consisteth not in aduenturing of his person to manifest danger, but in the politick gouernment of his charge. During the time that Scanderbeg thus assailed the Turks campe, Amurath but faintly assaulted the breaches, expecting the successe in the campe: but when he vnderstood that Scanderbeg was retyred, and all quieted, he brought all his forces to the walls, and first with the multitude of his archers and small shot laboured to driue the defendants from the wals, ouerwhelming them with arrows falling as thicke as haile. And likewise at the same time other common soldiers of baser account, brought scaling ladders and other things needfull for the scaling of the walls. After whom also followed the Ianizaries and other chosen soldiers, readie to mount the ladders so soon as they should be set to the wals. But whilst they

B climbe vp the high hills in this order, the garrison soldiers made such slaughter of them with shot from the wals and out of the citie, that they would haue presently retyred, had they not bin forced forward by their captaines, who spared neither stripes nor wounds, when words would not serue. By this tyrannicall means, the scaling ladders were with great slaughter of the common soldiers set vp against the walls, and the Turks climing vp, came to handy blows with the defendants at the breaches: nothing was to be heard but the crying of people, the clattering of armor, & the instruments of war, which was terribly redoubled with the eccho's from the mountaines round about. The Turks doing what they might to win the breaches, were by the Christians worthily repulsed, & with their ladders tumbled headlong down the mountain, with such horrible slaughter and discomfiture, especially of the common soldiers, that none of them would set one foot forward again toward the wals, although they had small

C hope to saue themselues by retyring back: for the fierce yong prince Mahomet euen then making shew of his cruell disposition, caused them that returned, to be slain, by the terror thereof to driue others forward. These common soldiers, whom the Turks make small reckoning of, are for the most part miserable Christians, which liue in such countries as had somtimes receiued the faith of Christ, but are now vnder the Turkish slauerie; of which sort of wretched people the Turkish tyrants draw with them great multitudes in their warres, most commonly vnarmed, because they dare not wel trust them in wars against the Christians: these carry all the baggage of the campe; these serue to fetch wood and water for other soldiers of better account; these serue in stead of pioners, to cast trenches and raise bulwarks; and when battell is

D to be giuen, if it be in plain field, these haue then weapons put into their hands, and thrust into the fore front of the battel, to blunt the enemies swords: but if a city be to be besieged, these serue as fit matter to fill vp the breaches with their dead bodies, or to make bridges for other soldiers to passe ouer vpon: and if they shrink to attempt any thing they are commanded, then are they more cruelly vsed by their commanders than by their enemies. When Amurath saw his soldiers so discouraged, he stood in doubt whether it were better for that time to sound a retrait, or to send a new supplie: but being inraged with the losse of his men, and desirous to be in some part reuenged, he sent diuers companies of his better souldiers, for the incouragement of them which were before discouraged, and so gaue a fresh assault: but with as euill or worse successe than before; for Vranacontes had withdrawn from the breaches all those soldiers which had indured the former assault, and placed other fresh & lustie men in their stead; who incouraged with the former victorie, and loth to be accounted inferior to their fellows,

E repulsed the Turks with double slaughter: vntil that the aged King, not able longer to behold the endlesse losse of his men, caused a retrait to be sounded; which al his soldiers were glad to heare, and so returned into his campe, hauing lost in those two assaults eight thousand men, without any notable harme done vnto the defendants worth the remembrance.

This shameful repulse much grieued all the captains & commanders of Amuraths army, but especially Mahomet the young Prince, whose violent nature vnacquainted with mishap, burnt impatiently with reuenge. Wherefore vnderstanding that Scanderbeg lay intrenched vpon the mountain of Tumenist, not far from his fathers army, he drew most of the best & readiest soldiers of all the whole camp, into that quarter which was neerest vnto Scanderbeg: of purpose

F that if he should again assaile the campe in that place (as it was most like he would) he should be incountered with so many braue and valiant men there in readinesse, as that it should be hard for him either to do any great harme, or for himselfe to escape. Of all which, Scanderbeg by certaine fugitiues had intelligence, as also in what order the campe lay: whereupon hee left Moses with fiue hundred ſoldiers in the place where he lay; taking order with him before his departure, that he at a certaine appointed houre in the night following, ſhould aſſaile the Turks campe in the quarter next vnto him where Mahomet lay; and hauing there raiſed ſome tumult, ſpeedily to retyre again to his aſſured ſtrength in the mountaine. Scanderbeg himſelfe with the whole ſtrength of his armie, in number about 8000, in the meane time tooke a compaſſe, and by certaine ſecret by-wayes through the woods and mountaines, came vnto the farther ſide of the Turks campe, to a place called Mountocle. The night following, Moſes at the appointed houre with his 500 ſouldiers aſſailed that part of the Turks campe next vnto him, with ſuch noyſe and tumult as if it had been ſome great armie. By occaſion whereof, all the Turks camp was in alarm, and drew in haſt to that place where they heard that great tumult, as was before by Mahomet commanded. When at the ſame inſtant, Scanderbeg with all his Armie brake into the other ſide of the Turks campe, where he was leaſt feared or looked for, and from whence the beſt ſoldiers were before drawne by Mahomet; and there made ſuch ſlaughter and hauocke of the reſt (not knowing which way to turne themſelues) that the loſſe a little before receiued vnder the walls of Croia, was now forgot, as a ſmall thing in compariſon of this. Moſes hauing raiſed a great feare, and done little harme, returned in ſafetie to his well known ſtrength; and Scanderbeg hauing made great ſpoyle in the campe, fearing to be oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies, if he ſhould there longer ſtay, returned in good time, hauing ſcarce loſt one man.

Amurath after this great loſſe and trouble of his campe, withdrew moſt of his ſmall Ordnance which he had before bent againſt the citie, into his trenches, placing it as commodiouſly as he might, for the defence thereof againſt the ſudden attempts of Scanderbeg. Yet for as much as he could not in that hot ſeaſon of the yeare ſo cloſely incampe his great armie, but that ſome part thereof would ſtill be in like danger as before; he therefore appointed Sebalias with 16000 ſoldiers to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he ſhould no more trouble the campe. After which order taken, he battered the walls of Croia afreſh, and with his great ordnance ouerthrew what ſoeuer the citizens had repaired, making the breaches greater, and more faultable than before, intending once againe by a new aſſault to proue his fortune, and the force of his ſoldiers: which he appointed to be the next day. But when he perceiued no ſigne of courage or good hope in the heauie countenances of them diſcouraged, and that they yeelded to him their conſents, rather for feare and ſhame, than for hope of victorie; he called them cowards, diſcouraged with the leaſt frowne of fortune; and ſaid,

Euerie weake caſtle is able to hold out one aſſault: but if you will draw theſe wilde beaſts out of their dens, you muſt arme your ſelues like reſolute men of inuincible courage, to indure what thing ſoeuer ſhal happen. Great Captains with their puiſſant armies haue growne old vnder the walls of their enemies, vpon light and ſmal diſpleaſures: and will you hauing receiued ſo many diſgraces of theſe perjured Epirots, leaue them all vnreuenged? What great victorie was euer yet by any man gained without bloud-ſhed? Remember the moſt glorious victorie of Varna. It is hard without bloudie hands to put the yoke vpon the fierce enemies necke. All honorable things are brought to paſſe with aduenture and labour; and the end of this war dependeth of the taking of Croia: if it were once woon, all this warre were at an end: which if Scanderbeg loſe (being the ſtrength of his kingdome, he will not tarrie one day longer in Epirus. Wherfore be of good cheere, and courageouſly ſet vpon it: there is not more vncertainty in any thing, than in matters of war: Fortune is to be prooued, and oftentimes prouoked of him that wil wed her. And yet I will not denie, but that we muſt goe more warily to worke againſt this enemie, and hazard our ſelues with better aduiſement, and not without reaſon like wild beaſts to run headlong vpon our owne death. At length we ſhall weare them out, if we kill but ten of them at an aſſault: yet are they dayly to be aſſailed, that they may haue no leiſure to refreſh themſelues, and to make vp their breaches: and peraduenture if force may not preuaile, fortune may find ſome meane that we looke not for, as it fell out at the ſiege of Sfetigrade, beyond all our expectation. Treaſon is ingenious, and mens deſires great, where great rewards are propounded.

With theſe and like ſpeeches old Amurath encouraged his captains & ſoldiers, and the next day early in the morning began the aſſault, which the Turks valiantly attempted; and without regard of danger came to the gates of the Citie, aſſaying, but with vaine and deſperat labour,

A bour to haue broken them open. In this aſſault wild fire was caſt into many places of the city, and the great artillerie oftentimes diſcharged into the breaches: whereby many of the Turks themſelues were ſlain with their owne great ſhot, together with the Chriſtians: for Amurath deſperately ſet, was content to buy the life of one Chriſtian with the loſſe of twenty of his Turks. But the Chriſtians ſtill valiantly repulſed their enemies, ſo that of them that came to the gates, none eſcaped aliue; and of them that aſſaulted the great breach, they which were moſt forward, were firſt ſlaine, and they which ſtood farther off, were ſore wounded with ſhot. Yet for all that, Amurath ſtill maintained the aſſault, by ſending in of new ſupplies, delighting to ſee them goe forward, but grieued at the heart to ſee them ſo ſlaine: vntill at laſt wearie with beholding the ſlaughter of his men, hee cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, and ſo ended the aſſault; perſuaded by his Baſſaes, not wilfully to caſt away his valiant ſoldiers where there was no hope to preuaile, but to reſerue them for his better ſeruice. The Turkes retire.

Amurath now out of hope to win the city by aſſault, thought good to proue what might be don by vndermining of the ſame: during which worke he cauſed ſmall alarums daily to be giuen vnto the citie, to the intent that the defendants buſied therewith, ſhould not perceiue the ſecret worke of the mine. About which time his prouiſion of corn began to faile in his camp; for which cauſe he ſent his purueyors for corne to Liſia, a citie of the Venetians, with whom he was at that time in league, and bought of them great ſtore of corne. But as his officers were conueying it to his campe, Scanderbeg hauing intelligence thereof, ſlew the conuoy, & carried away with him all that prouiſion, diuiding it among his owne ſoldiers. Howbeit, not long after, Amurath receiued great aboundance of corne and other prouiſion out of Macedonia: beſide that, the Venetian marchants afterward furniſhed him with plentie of corne, oyle, hony, and other neceſſaries; which Scanderbeg might well haue hindered, but that he would not in ſo doing offend the Venetians, which were alſo his ſecret friends, conſidering that Amurath might haue had all the ſame prouiſion out of the further part of Macedonia, Thracia, Myſia, and ſuch other places, if he had not otherwiſe had it from the Venetians. Amurath ſeeketh to vnderminе Croia.

Whileſt Amurath thus lay expecting the ſucceſſe of his mine, foure hundred of the garriſon ſouldiers of Croia ſallying out of the citie, chaſed diuers of the Turks that were come forth backe againe vnto the campe: wherof Amurath was glad, hoping, that they encouraged with that good hap, would to their further loſſe giue the like attempt afterwards. But the ſtaid diſcretion of the Gouernour deceiued that his expectation; who conſidering the danger, would not ſuffer his ſoldiers any more to ſallie out of the citie. Scanderbeg alſo at this time hauing encreaſed his army with a new ſupply of two thouſand ſouldiers, diuided the ſame into three parts; deliuering one part to Moſes, another to Tanuſie; and reſeruing the third vnto himſelfe. With this armie of nine thouſand thus diuided, he determined by night at one inſtant to aſſaile the Turks great camp in three diuers places, apointing in which quarter euery one ſhould charge. But as Scanderbeg in the night appointed, was comming towards the Turks campe, hee was diſcouered by their ſcouts: whereupon a ſudden alarum was raiſed in the campe, & al mens minds turned that way, & ſoldiers appointed with al diligence to guard that ſide of the camp. But whilſt the Turks were al at gaze this way for feare of Scanderbeg, Moſes and Tanuſie, in the dead of the night, at one time aſſailed the Turks camp in two diuers quarters, as they were appointed, where they ſlew a number of the Turks, and made great ſpoile. At which time Scanderbeg did alſo what he might: but by reaſon he was before diſcouered, did not much harme. Vpon the approch of the day Scanderbeg retired againe to the hils, & by that time it was faire daylight, ſate down vpon the ſide of a great mountain, about twenty furlongs off; in the open ſight of all the Turks camp: which he did of purpoſe, that Moſes and Tanuſie, which were by night retired into the mountains, might ſee which way to hold, to meet with him again. But the Turks thinking that he ſtood there to braue their whole camp, & as it were to deface them to the great encouragement of the defendants: diuers of them earneſtly craued leaue of Amurath, that they might goe vp to him, & at leaſtwiſe beat him out of ſight: which he granting, 12000 of his beſt ſouldiers, whereof 7000 were horſemen, and the reſt foot, preſently ſet forward to encounter him. Scanderbeg ſeeing them all the way they came, vpon their approch ſoftly retired a little farther vp into the mountaines, ſtil expecting the comming of Moſes and Tanuſie. The Turkes vnacquainted hith ſuch difficult waies, marched vp the ſteepe hils after Scanderbeg with much labour and pain, wel wearied of themſelues: but when they were come a great

a great way into the mountaines, they perceiued by the rising of the dust, that some greater force was comming croste those mountaines; and not long after they might plainely see the formest of their enemies. Wherefore fearing to be enclosed, they began to retyre, in which retrait Scanderbeg hardly pursued them, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, slew many of them but especially with his archers. Moses also comming afresh on another side, caused them to flie down the hill amaine, and beside the slaughter that he made, tooke diuers prisoners. After which victorie by Scanderbeg obtained in the fight of Amurath and his whole Armie, he retyred again into the mountaines.

The late spoyle of the Turks campe, with this ouerthrow of the souldiers but now sent against Scanderbeg, much grieued the old tyrant: but the worke of the mine, wherein he had of long layd vp his greatest hope, forting now to no good purpose, being deemed as wel an endlesse peece of worke, for the naturall hardnesse of the rocke, as also of small importance, for that it was by the defendants discouered, draue him to his wits end. His forces he had to his great losse sufficiently proued, and stil found them too weake: and policie preuailed not. Nothing now remained, but to prooue if by great gifts and glorious promises he could first corrupt the faith of the Gouernor, and afterwards the garrison: wherein he determined to spare no cost. Vpon which resolution he sent one of his Bassa's (a man of great authoritie and dexteritie of wit) vnto Vranacontes, with such rich gifts and presents as might haue mooued a right constant mind: commanding the Bassa (if it were possible) first to fasten the same vpon the gouernor, as presents sent from Amurath of meere bountie, in the honor of his valiant mind; and afterwards to deliuer his message, not sparing to promise any thing for the giuing vp of the citie, yea more than should be desired. The Bassa attended on but with two seruants, came with this rich Present neere to the gates of the citie, and there stayed vntill the gouernors pleasure were known: by whose command he was receiued into the citie, and brought to his presence. Then the Bassa with much reuerence, and many magnifical words, presented vnto Vranacontes the rich gifts sent from Amurath, and would forthwith haue deliuered them vnto him, as the rewards of his valour. But Vranacontes willed him first to declare his message from Amurath, vpon the hearing whereof he would (as he said) as he saw cause, either receiue or refuse them: before which time he would not be beholden to his enemie, by receiuing from him the least courtesie. With which answer the subtill Bassa nothing dismayed, with great constancie thus began to deliuer his message:

The craftie speech of the Bassa sent from Amurath to corrupt the Gouernour, and to perswade the souldiers to yeeld vp the citie.

Howsoeuer we agree (said he) vpon other matters we come for, we brought not these gifts of purpose to deceiue any: for so men vse to deale with their children and seruants, and not with men of courage and valour. And albeit that enemies gifts are euer to be suspected, (as you haue right wisely said, and we our selues know) yet we durst not for shame come vnto so worthie a Gouernour (as the common saying is) emptie handed: neither ought you, if you be the man you seeme to be, and whom men report you are, to refuse our courtesie. Take these Presents in good part, which shall no way inforce or binder you to determine or dispose of your affaires otherwise than shall seeme vnto you good: neither shall we once obiect vnto you these gifts, which we so franke and freely offer in the great Sultans name, whether you reject or admit our demaunds and message; wherein there is (perhaps) no lesse regard had of your good, than of ours. For there is no greater token of a base mind, than to giue, in hope to receiue againe. We come vnto you frankely, (worthie Gouernour) I speake it from my heart: we goe not about with filed speech and rich rewards to circumuent thee, whose inuincible mind we haue so often in vaine proued with our Forces and power. That is it for which Amurath loueth thee; he doth wonderfully admire the vertues of his enemies, and if it were possible, desireth to haue them with himselfe. There verily with so mightie a Monarch might thy inuincible mind and pregnant finde a better way vnto the highest type of Fortunes blisse. Not that I condemne Scanderbeg, whom we his enemies doe highly commend, for his Countrey so well recouered, and so oftentimes worthily defended, yet chiefely by your helpe: but you are worthie of another maner of Soueraigne, and of another maner of Calling, and not to spend all the dayes of your life, and such heroicall vertues, in obscuritie, and (without offence be it sayd) in contemptible baseneſſe. Besides that, Scanderbeg his estate is but mementarie, the Destinies haue assigned vnto him too too mightie an Enemie; his destruction may well be deferred, but not by any means auoyded. Amurath hath conceiued against him an implacable displeasure, and prepared his forces accordingly: he hath sworne to spare no cost, no labour, no danger: and that he will

wilnever whilst he liueth depart out of Epirus before he haue imposed a deadly yoke on his neck. And behold, the first of this miserie beginneth at this citie, and vpon your selues. We dayly heare his pauilions sound with these and such like speeches, That he will neuer depart out of the place before he haue taken this citie, and satisfied his angrie mind with the torture of your bodies; no, not if he should therefore lose Hadrianople, yea, and that more is, his whole kingdome. And verily he will do it, which I feare to diuine or thinke vpon: For although I with others, beare against you the mind of an enemie; yet am I a man, and moued with humane compassion: beleeue me (ye men of Croia) beleeue me, my eyes would scarcely endure to behold the horrible spectacle of your miserable fortune. I tell you againe, he will do it, except you change your purpose, and now receiue health, life, libertie, and peace, whilest it is so freely offered. For albeit that this notable strong place, these impregnable walls, and especially your own valor, do yet defend you; how long will it hold out? Verily no longer than you haue victuall, no longer than you haue meat to sustaine your bodies. Do you thinke that Amurath will raise his siege in the middle of the heat of this war, and be gon? No, no, if force will not preuaile, if all his attempts faile, yet shall you see and feele these enemies continually to your hurt; you shall always haue these tents in your eyes, and at your gates, vntill long famin, which mastereth all things, tame your courage also. I pray you, what hope haue you left? from whence ariseth in your resolute minds such desperat contempt of danger? Can Scanderbeg victuall you, being so straightly besieged? which hideth himselfe (poore man) in the woods all day, and flieth ouer the tops of the mountaines, loaden with trauell and care, scarce able to relieue his owne miserie. Or will the Venetians relieue you, which dayly bring vnto vs and store vs with too too great plentie of all things necessarie for this war against you. Wherefore repent your too much hardinesse, and gather your wits together: behold, I your enemie aduise you: you haue long enough continued in your obstinacie: your countrie and libertie is not so far to be defended, as that you should therefore fight against God. But wherefore do I call this, libertie? you must giue place vnto your fortune, and learne to obey them that be too strong for you. You shal find assured libertie, rich rewards, perpetual rest with Amurath. Prouide for your selues, if you be wise, whilest all things are yet whole for you to determine of; whilest we your enemies exhort and request you, and had rather haue you our voluntary companions and friends, than our enforced seruants and slaues.

This the Bassa spake with great grauitie, and no lesse vehemencie, expecting some great motions to haue risen in the minds of the souldiers. But when he perceiued that his speech had rather filled them with indignation, than with feare; and that it was but a vaine thing to go about to terrifie them with words, whom all the power of Amurath could not make afraid with weapons, he requested to talke alone with the gouernor in secret: which was also granted. For all men had no lesse good opinion of the worthie Gouernours fidelitie, than of his great wisedome and valour. The craftie Bassa hauing him by himselfe, began with great cunning to deliuer his more secret message: when Vranacontes perceiuing by a little, what the whole tale meant, interrupted him in the middle of his speech, and without more adoo commanded him to depart: straitly charging him, That neither he nor any other should after that time presume to come from his Master to the citie, to speake with him about any such dishonourable matter; for if he did, he would in detestation thereof cause their hands, their nose, their eares to be cut off, and so returne them dismembred, in stead of answer. And so the Bassa was with his Presents againe turned out of the Citie, and no man suffered to receiue any thing of him in reward, although the souldiers could haue beene well content to haue eased him and his Seruants of that carriage, if the Gouernour whould but haue winked thereat.

Great was the expectation in the Turks camp, of the Bassa's returne: but when they saw the Presents were not receiued, they easily guessed that all went not as they wished. But when Amurath himselfe vnderstood the gouernors resolute answer, he in great rage commanded all things to be made readie for a fresh assault: which he did rather to satisfie his anger, than vpon any hope he had to preuaile therein. The next day he caused a furious assault to be giuen to the citie, but with greater losse to himselfe than before; the Christians still valiantly defending the citie against the Turkish furie. In this assault many of the Turkes were slaine at the breach with their own great shot: for whilest Amurath sought therewith to driue the Christians from the defence of the breach, he slew a great number more of the forwardest of his own men, than he did of the defendants. But wearied at length to behold the endlesse slaughter of his

Croia againe in vaine assaulted his men, he gaue ouer the assault, and returned into his camp, as if he had bin a man halfe frantick or distract of his wits; and there sate downe in his tent, all that day full of melancholie passions, sometimes violently pulling his hoarie beard and white locks, complaining of his hard and disaster fortune, that he had liued so long to see those daies of disgrace, wherein all his former glorie and triumphant victories were obscured, by one base towne of Epirus. His Bassaes and graue counsellors labouring in the meane time with long discourses to comfort him vp: sometimes recounting vnto him his many and glorious victories, and other whiles producing antient examples of like euent. But darke and heauy conceits had so ouerwhelmed the melancholie old tyrant, that nothing could content his waiward mind, or reuiue his dying spirits: so that the little remainder of naturall heat which was left in his aged bodie now oppressed & almost extinguished with melancholie conceits, & his aged body dried vp with sorrow, he became sick for griefe. Wherupon by the counsell of some of his Bassaes, he sent an embassador to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, if he would yeeld to pay to him a yeerely tribute of ten thousand duckats: thinking by that means his honor to be wel saued, if before his departure out of Epirus, he could but make Scanderbeg his tributarie. This embassador was by Scanderbeg honourable entertained in his campe, but the offered peace at the same time vtterly refused. The embassador returning to Amurath, declared vnto him the euill successe of his embassage, which greatly increased his melancholie sicknesse. And Scanderbeg to grieue him the more, vnderstanding that he was dangerously sicke, and that the great Bassaes were more carefull of the Kings health, than of the successe of the warres; diuers times assailed the Turkes campe. Which thing though the Bassaes kept from his knowledge with all carefulnesse; yet he oftentimes suspected the matter, by the often alarums and tumults in the campe, and with the griefe thereof languished. So feeling his sicknesse daily to encrease, and that he could not longer liue, lying vpon a pallet in his pauillion, grieuously complained to his Bassaes, That the destinies had so blemished all the former course of his life, with such an obscure death, that hee which had so often represt the furie of the Hungarians, and almost brought to nought the pride of the Grecians together with their name, should now bee enforced to giue vp the ghost, vnder the walls of an obscure castle (as he termed it) and that in the sight of his contemptible enemie. After that, turning himselfe to his son Mahomet, he earnestly commended him to the faithfulnesse of his Bassaes, and gaue him many graue aduertisements, sometimes in secret betwixt themselues, & sometimes in the hearing of others: want of strength, & abundance of teares running downe his aged face (vpon the sight of his son) oftentimes interrupting his speech. Yet sicke vnto death as he was, and drawing fast vnto his end, he forced himselfe, to warne his son of such things as now at his death grieued him most.

The last speech and admonition of Amurath to his sonne Mahomet vpon his death bed.

Let mine example (quoth he) be a warning vnto thee my sonne, neuer to contemne thine enemie, bee he neuer so weake: of which one thing aboue all others, I haue repented my selfe of long, and shall doe after my death, if any feeling of humane things remaine in the dead. And that I was so foolish, and inconsiderate, as to foster vp as it were in my bosome this my domesticall and neglected enemie, whereby I haue purchased vnto my selfe this calamitie, and for euer blemished the honour of the Othoman kings: whilest I so basely end my daies vnder the wals of Croia, shall become a by-word vnto the world, and all posteritie for euer. This traitour should euen then haue beene oppressed, when hee by great treacherie, first recouered his wicked kingdome: in that newnesse of his estate, and before the mindes of the people were assured vnto him, then it had beene an easie matter, without bloudshed to haue vtterly extinguished the wretch, together with his name. Alis Bassa, whose euill fortune was the first beginning of his good: Nor the other Generals, who by him slaine or taken prisoners, increased his strength and credit vnto his subiects, should not haue beene sent against him: a thing which I haue oftentimes thought vpon, but could scarce haue beleeued, that euer I should haue thereby receiued such disgrace, together with the ignominious renting of my kingdome, if I had not beene taught the same by mine owne experience, to my great losse and hearts griefe. Wee entered into Epirus, and here encamped an hundred and threescore thousand men strong: now if leisure serue you, take view of them, examine the matter, you shall find a great want of that number. The fields could not containe our regiments and the multitude of our men: but now, how many tents stand emptie? how many horses want riders? You shall goe to Hadrianople with our forces much impaired. As for me, the Destinies haue vowed my spirits to this countrey of Epirus, as vnto me fatall. But wherefore do I impute vnto my selfe these impediments and chances of fortune? for then first began this seed of mischiefe in Epirus, when the Hungarians

Hungarians with other the Christian Princes, rose vp in armes against vs: at which time we fought not with them for souerainetie, but for the whole state of our kingdome: as the bloudie battels of Varna and Cossoua still witnesse vnto the world. So whileſt I had neither leisure nor sufficient power to take order for all my important affaires at once; in the meane time this enemie grew as you see. But how, or in what order you are hereafter to wage warre against him, you may not looke for any direction from mee, which haue in all these matters so euill directed my selfe: Fortune neuer deceiued my endeuours more than in this. But happily thou Mahomet my sonne, maiest proue a more fortunat warriour against him: and for so many honours alreadie giuen vnto me, the Destinies haue reserued the triumph of Epirus for thee Wherfore my sonne, thou shalt receiue from me this scepter, and those royall ensignes: but aboue all things, I leaue vnto thee this enemy; charging thee not to leaue my death vnreuenged. It is all I charge thee with, for so great and stately a patrimonie as thou art to receiue from me: it is the only sacrifice that my old departing ghost desireth of thee.

Amurath his death.

Shortly after he became speechlesse, & striuing with the pangs of death halfe a day, he then breathed out his gastly ghost, to the great ioy and contentment of the poore oppressed Christians. He died about the middle of Autumne, in the yeare of our Lord 1450, when he had liued 85 yeares, as most write: and thereof raigned 28 (or as some others report 30;) about fiue moneths after the siege laid before Croia.

Amurath an example of the vanitie of worldly honor.

Thus lieth great Amurath, erst not inferiour vnto the greatest Monarchs of that age, dead almost in despaire: a worthie mirror of honors frailty; yeelding vnto the worldly man in the end, neither comfort nor reliefe. Who had fought greater battels? who had gained greater victories, or obtained more glorious triumphs than had Amurath? who by the spoiles of so many mightie Kings and Princes, and by the conquest of so many proud and warlike nations, againe restored and established the Turks kingdome, before by Tamerlane and the Tartars in a manner cleane defaced. He it was that burst the heart of the proud Grecians, establishing his empire at Hadrianople, euen in the center of their bowels; from whence haue proceeded so many miseries and calamities into the greatest part of Christendome, as no tongue is able to expresse. He it was that first brake downe the Hexamile or wal of seperation on the strait of Corinth, and conquered the greatest part of Peloponesus. Hee it was that subdued vnto the Turks so many great countries and prouinces in Asia; that in plaine field and set battell ouerthrew many puissant kings and princes, and brought them vnder his subiection: who hauing slain Vladislaus the King of Polonia and Hungarie, and more than once chased out of the field Huniades that famous and redoubted warriour; had in his proud and ambitious heart, promised vnto himselfe the conquest of a great part of Christendome. But ô how far was he now changed from the man he then was! how far did these his last speeches differ from the course of his fore passed life! ful of such base passionat complaints and lamentations, as beseemed not a man of his place and spirit; but some vile wretch ouertaken with despaire; and yet afraid to die. Where were now those haughtie thoughts, those loftie lookes, those thundering & commanding speeches; whereat so many great commanders, so many troupes and legions, so many thousands of armed souldiers were wont to tremble and quake? Where is that head, before adorned with so many trophies and triumphs? where is that victorious hand that swaied so many scepters? where is the maiestie of his power and strength, that commanded ouer so many nations and kingdomes? O how is the case now altered; he lieth now dead, a gastly filthie stinking carkas, a clod of clay vnregarded, his hands closed, his eyes shut, and his feete stretched out, which erst proudly traced the countries by him subdued and conquered. And now of such infinit riches, such vnmeasurable wealth, such huge treasures, such stately honors and vaine glorious praises as hee in his life time enioyed; his fraile bodie enioyeth nothing, but left all behind it. O the weake condition of mans nature! O the vaine glorie of mortall creatures! O the blind and peruerse thoughts of foolish men! Why do we so magnifie our selues? why are we so puft vp with pride? why do we so much set our minds vpon riches, authoritie, & other vanities of this life? wherof neuer man had yet one days assurance, and at our most need, and when we least think, quite forsake vs; leauing euen them that most sought after them, and most abounded in them, shrowded oft times in the sheet of dishonour and shame.

That his death is otherwise by some reported, I am not ignorant: The Turks saying, that he died maraculously forewarned of his death at Hadrianople: and some others, That hee died in in Asia, stricken with an Aploplexie proceeding of a surfet taken of the immoderat drinking of wine. But Marinus Barletius, who liued in his time in Scodra fast by Epirus, whose authoritie, in report of the warres betwixt him and Scanderbeg wee follow, setteth it downe in such manner as is aforesaid.

Amurath buried at Prusa.

Presently after his death, Mahomet his sonne, for feare of some innouation to bee made at home, raised the siege and returned to Hadrianople: and afterward with great solemnitie buried his dead body at the West side of Prusa, in the suburbs of the citie, where he now lieth in a Chappell without any roofe, his graue nothing differing from the manner of the common Turks: which (they say) he commanded to bee done in his last will; that the mercie and blessing of God (as he tearmed it) might come vnto him by the shining of the Sunne and Moone, and falling of the raine and dew of heauen vpon his graue.

He whilest he liued, mightily enlarged the Turkish kingdome, and with greater wisedome and policie than his predecessors, established the same: insomuch that some attribute vnto him the first institution of the Ianizaries, and other souldiers of the court (the greatest strength of the Turkish empire) before indeed begun in the time of Amurath the first, his great grandfather (as is before declared) but by him greatly augmented, & the policy of that state, wherby it had euer since in his posterity flourished, euen by himselfe plotted. For the better establishing wherof in his owne house, and to cut off all occasion of feare, as also to leaue all such as might haue the heart to arise against him, naked & bare of forces to resist; but especially the other antient and noble families of the Turks, still secretly repining at the great honor of the Othoman Kings: he as a man of great wisedome and iudgement, to keep them vnder in the beginning of his raign, by manifold fauors began to bind vnto himself men of strange & forrain countries, his seruants, & by ordering of his most weightie affaires by their authoritie, so by little and little to cast off the seruice of his naturall Turks: they in the mean time little or nothing at all looking into this his practise. And wheras the Othoman kings his predecessors, had for the most part, or rather altogether raised their Ianizaries & other soldiers of the court, of such children of the Christians as were taken in the warres; he, seeing by experience how seruiceable those new kind of souldiers were, began forthwith to plot in his head, how to make himselfe an army altogether of such able persons, his owne creatures, & so to bring in a new kind of warfare, wholly depending of himself. And to that end, by his officers appointed for that purpose, took from the Christians throughout his dominions, euery fift child: the faireſt and apteſt of whom, he placed in his own Seraglio at Hadrianople, and the rest in other like places by him built for such purpose: where they were by sufficient teachers, first instructed in the principles of the Mahometan religion, & then in all maner of actiuity and feats of arms. Of these, when they were grown to mans state, he made horsemen, gaue them great pensions, and sorting them into diuers orders, appointed them also to guard his person; honouring the better sort of them with the name of Spahi-Oglani, that is to say, his sons the Knights; and of these he began to make his Bassaes, his generals of his armies, & the gouernors of his prouinces & cities, with all the great offices of the state. The rest, and far the greatest part of these tribute children, taken from their Christian parents, & not brought vp in the Seraglios, he caused to be disperſed into euery city and country of his dominion in Asia, there for certain yeres to be brought vp in all hardnes & painful labor, neuer tasting of ease or pleasure: out of which hard brood so enured to pains, he made choice of so many of the most lusty & able bodies fittest for seruice, as he thought good; who kept in continual exercise, & by skilful men taught to handle all manner of weapons, but especially the bow, the peece, and the scimitar, were by him as occasion serued added to the other Ianizaries, and appointed for the guarding of his person: calling them commonly by the names of his sonnes. The remainder of these tribute children, as vnfit for the warres, he put vnto other base occupations and ministeries. But vnto those martiall men of all sorts so by him ordained, he appointed a continual pay, according to their degrees and places: and by great benefits & liberties bestowed vpon them, bound them so fast vnto him, as that he might now account himselfe to haue of them so many sons, as hee had soldiers: For they together with the Christian religion, hauing forgot their parents and countrey, and knowing no other lord and master but him, & acknowledging all that they had to come and proceed of his free grace only, remained euer bound and faithful vnto him; and so kept others also, as wel the natural Turkes themselues, as the other oppressed Christians within in the bounds of obedience and loyaltie. A great policie proceeding from a deep iudgement, first to weaken the Christians by taking from them their best children, and of greatest hope; and then by them depending wholly of himself, to keep in awe and dutifull obedience his naturall subiects also: hauing them alwaies as a scourge ready to chastise the rebellious or disloyal. Now the other Othoman Kings and Emperours, the successors of Amurath, keeping this custome, and also increasing it one after another, haue thereby not only kept the empire still in their house and family, where it was first gotten: but also so maintained the maiestie of their state, as that they are of their subiects feared, obeyed, and honored, not as Kings, but as Gods. For the naturall Turks their subiects losing courage continually, & daily growing more base and dastardly, by reason they are not suffered to practise the knowledge of armes; and the soldiers in whose power all things are, knowing nothing of their owne, but holding and acknowledging all that they haue to come of their Lord, account them as Lords and Kings of all: ruling much after the manner of the Pharaohs the ancient Kings of Ægypt; who were absolute Lords and masters, both of the publicke and priuate wealth of their subiects, whom they kept vnder as slaues and villaines. And hereof commeth it to passe, that the better part of them whom we call Turks, (but are indeed the children of Christians, and seduced by their false instructors) desire to be called Musulmans (that is to say, right beleeuers) holding it a reprochfull and dishonorable thing to be called Turks, as it were peculiarly and aboue other people: For that they knowing right well, that there is not one naturall Turke among all those that beare authoritie and rule, and are had in greater honor and reputation than the rest (such as are the men of war and courtiers) but he is borne a Christian either of father, or at the least of his grandfather: auouch those onely to bee Turks which liue in Natolia, all of them either marchants, or of base and mechanicall crafts, or poore labourers with the spade and pickaxe, and such like people vnfit for the wars, the rest (as I say) holding it for a title of honor to bee descended of Christian parents. Yea the Grand Seignior himselfe, although by the fathers side he be come of progenitors such as were naturall Turks borne, yet many of them had Christian mothers, which they accounted in the greatest part of their nobilitie and honor. Thus by the wisedome of Amurath was the order of the Ianizaries, and other souldiers of the court greatly aduanced, though not by him begun, and the politick state of the Turks kingdome (to say the truth) quite altered; the naturall Turks (more than the Sultan himselfe) now bearing therein no sway: but onely these new souldiers, all of them descended from Christian parents and by adoption as it were become the sons of the Turkish Sultans, and vnder them commanding all: by whom they haue euer since managed their estate, and by their good seruice wonderfully, euen to the astonishment of the world, increased and extended their empire. But of them more shall be said hereafter.

A great policie.

This great King was whilest he liued, of his subiects wonderfully beloued, and no lesse of them after his death lamented. Hee was more faithfull of his word than any of the Turkish kings either before or after him: by nature melancholy & sad, and accounted rather politicke than valiant, yet was indeed both: a great dissembler, and painful in trauell, but wayward and testie aboue measure, which many imputed vnto his great age. He had issue six sonnes, Achmetes, Aladin, Mahomet, Hasan (otherwise called Chasan) Vrchan, and Achmetes the yonger, of some called Calepinus: three of whom died before; but the two youngest were by their vnnaturall brother Mahomet, who succeeded him in the Turkish kingdome, euen in their infancie, in the beginning of his raigne most cruelly murdered.

Paulus Iouius Illust. virorum Eclog. lib. 3.

Qui vici innumeros populos, tot regna, tot vrbes: Solus & immensi qui timor orbis eram:
Me rapuit quæcunque rapit mors improba, sed sum Virtute excelsa, ductus ad astra tamen.
Major Alexander non me fuit, Annibal & non,
Fuderit Ausonios tot licet ille duces.
Vici victores Danaos, domuiq; feroces Caoniæ populos, Sauromataſq; truces: Pannonius sensit, quantum surgebat in armis Vis mea: quæ latio cognita nuper erat.
Arsacidæ sensere manus has, sensit Arabsque: Et mea sunt Persæ cognita tela duci.
Mens fuerat bellare Rhodum, superare superbam Italiam, sed non fata dedere modum.
Hei mihi, nam rapuit mors aspera, quæque sub alto Pectore condideram, vertit & hora breuis.
Sic hominum fastus pereunt, sic stemata, sicque Imperium, atque aurum, quicquid & orbis habet.

In Englifh thus.

I that ſo many nations, townes, and kingdomes, haue brought low;
And haue alone diſmaied the world, and fill'd the earth with woe: Am now by death (which all deuoures) brought downe from high degree; Yet doth the glorie of my name ſurmount the ſtarrie skie.
The great King Alexanders fame, the world no better fil'd: Nor worthie Hannibal, whoſe force ſo many Romans kil'd.
I vanquiſht the victorious Greekes, and tam'd with mightie hand, The warlike people of Epire, and fierce Tartaria land.
My force in field Hungaria felt, my greatneſſe is there knowne: Which of late time through Italie, to their great ruth is blowne.
Th'Aſſyrians felt my heauie hand:
ſo did th'Arabians wild:
The Perſian King with all his force, I driue out of the field.
I purpoſed to win the Rhodes, and Italie t'vndoe;
If that the fatall Deſtinies had granted leaue thereto.
But woe is me, for griſly death hath brought all this to nought:
And in the twinckling of an eye is periſht all I thought.
So periſheth the pride of man, his honour, wealth, and power, His gold, and whatſoeuer elſe, it fadeth as a flower.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, SECOND OF THAT NAME, SEVENTH KING AND FIRST EMPEROR OF THE TVRKS, FOR HIS MANY VICTORIES SYRNAMED THE GREAT.

C THE report of the death of old Amurath the late king, was in ſhort time blown thorow moſt part of Chriſtendome, to the great joy of many; but eſpecially of the Greeks and other poore Chriſtians which bordered vpon the tyrants kingdome; who were now in hope, together with the change of the Turkiſh King, to make exchange alſo of their bad eſtate and fortune: and the rather, for that it was thought, that his eldeſt ſonne Mahomet, after the death of his father, would haue imbraced the Chriſtian Religion, being in his childhood inſtructed therein (as was ſuppoſed) by his mother the daughter of the Prince of Seruia, a Chriſtian. But vaine was this hope, and the joy thereof but ſhort, as afterward by proofe it appeared: For Mahomet being about the age of one and twentie yeares, ſucceeding D his father in the kingdome in the yeare of our Lord 1450, embraced in ſhew the Mahometan Religion, abhorring the Chriſtian; but indeed making no great reckoning either of the one or of the other, but as a meere Atheiſt, deuoyd of all Religion, and worſhipping no other god but good Fortune, derided the ſimplicitie of all ſuch as thought that God had any care or regard of worldly men, or of their actions: which graceleſſe reſolution ſo wrought in him, that he thought all things lawfull that agreed with his luſt, and making conſcience of nothing, kept no league, promiſe, or oath, longer than ſtood with his profit or pleaſure. 1450. Mahomet of no Religion.

Now in the Court men ſtood diuerſly affected towards the preſent ſtate: the mighty Baſſa's, and others of great authoritie, vnto whom the old Kings gouernment was neuer grieuous, inwardly lamented his death; doubting leſt the fierce nature of the yong King ſhould turn to the hurt of ſome of them in particular, and the ſhottning of their authoritie in generall, as indeed it ſhortly after it fell out. But the luſtie gallants of the Court weary of the old king, who in hope of preferment had long wiſhed for the gouernment of the yong Prince, were glad to E ſee him ſet vpon his fathers ſeat. And the vulgar people (neuer conſtant but in vnconſtancie, and always fawning vpon the preſent) exceedingly rejoyced in their yong King. The Ianizaries alſo at the ſame time (according to their accuſtomed manner) took the ſpoile of the Chriſtians and Iews that dwelt amongſt them, and eaſily obtained pardon for the ſame: whereupon he was by the ſame Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the Court; with great triumph ſaluted King. Which approbation of theſe men of war, is vnto the Turkiſh Kings a greater aſſurance for the poſſeſſion of their Kingdome, than to be borne the eldeſt ſon of the King, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall appeare: ſo great is the power of theſe maſterfull ſlaues, in promo-F ting to the kingdome whichſoeuer of the Kings ſons they moſt fauour, without much regard whether they be the eldeſt or not.

This yong tyrant was no ſooner poſſeſſed his father's kingdome, but that he forgetting the lawes of nature, was preſently in perſon himſelf about to haue murthered with his owne hands, Mahomet murdereth his brethren.

hands, his youngeſt brother, then but eighteene moneths old, begotten on the daughter of Sponderbeius. Which vnnaturall part, Moſes one of his Baſſaes, and a man greatly in his fauour, perceiuing, requeſted him, not to embrue his own hands in the bloud of his brother, but rather to commit the execution thereof to ſome other: which thing Mahomet commanded him the author of that counſell forthwith to do. So Moſes taking the child from the nurſe, ſtrangled it, with pouring water downe the throat thereof. The young lady vnderſtanding of the death of her child (as a woman whom furie had made paſt feare) came, and in her rage reuiled the tirant to his face, ſhamefully vpbraiding him for his inhumane cruelty. When Mahomet to appeaſe her furie, requeſted her to be content, for that it ſtood with the policie of his ſtate: and willed her for her better contentment, to aske whatſoeuer ſhe pleaſed, and ſhe ſhould forthwith haue it. But ſhe deſiring nothing more than in ſome ſort to be reuenged, deſired to haue Moſes (the executioner of her ſonne) deliuered vnto her, bound: which when ſhe had obtained, ſhe preſently ſtruck him into the breaſt with a knife (crying in vaine vpon his vnthankful maſter for helpe:) and proceeding in her cruell execution, cut an hole in his right ſide, and by peece-meale cut out his liuer, and caſt it to the dogs to eat. At the ſame time alſo he cauſed another of his brethren, committed by his father to the keeping of Caly Baſſa, and now by him betraid into his hands, to be likewiſe murthered.

A cruell reuenge of an angry woman.

Mahomet reformeth the Turkiſh common-weale.

Thus beginning his tyrannous raign with the bloudy execution of them that were in bloud neereſt vnto him, & whom of all others he ought to haue defended, he preſently after began to frame a new form of a common weale, by abrogating & altering the old laws and cuſtoms, and publiſhing of new, better fitting his owne humor, and more commodious for himſelfe: impoſing alſo new taxes and ſubſidies vpon his ſubiects, neuer before heard off: thereby to increaſe his treaſures, and ſatisfie his auaritious deſire: which amongſt many other his vices, ſo much raigned in him, as that he was thought ouer-ſparing vnto himſelfe, as wel in his apparel as in his diet. And proceeding further, he called vnto ſtrait account all the great officers of his kingdome: of whom ſome hee put to death, and confiſcated their goods: others hee put to great fines, or quite remoued them from their offices. In like maner he dealt alſo with his great Baſſaes, admitting many falſe and ſurmiſed accuſations againſt them: whereby to bring them within his danger, where little mercie was to be looked for. By which meanes he became no leſſe terrible vnto his ſubiects, than he was afterwards vnto his enemies: & ſo was of them exceedingly feared, but more hated. Among other things, he much miſliked in his court the exceſſiue number of faulconers and huntſmen; which was grown ſo great by the immoderate delight which his predeceſſors tooke in the pleaſures of the field, that there were continually maintained of the Kings charge, ſeuen thouſand faulconers, and not many fewer huntſmen; ſaying, that he would not be ſo much a foole, as to maintain ſuch a multitude of men to attend vpon ſo meere a vanity. And therefore tooke order, that from thenceforth there ſhould be allowance made for 500 faulconers only, and 100 huntſmen: the reſt he appointed to ſerue as ſoldiers in his wars. At the ſame time alſo he entred into league with Conſtantinus Palaologus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, and the other Ptinces of Grecia: as alſo with the Deſpot of Seruia, his grand father by the mothers ſide, as ſome wil haue it; howbeit, ſome others write, that the Deſpot his daughter, Amurath his wife, was but his mother in law, whom he, vnder the colour of friendſhip ſent backe againe vnto her father after the death of Amurath, ſtill allowing her a princely dowre. But if ſhe were not his mother (as like enough it is that ſhe was not) much more happie was ſhe that ſhe neuer groned for ſo graceleſſe a ſonne.

Mahomet goeth againſt the king of Caramania.

Whileſt Mahomet was thus occupied about his ciuill affaires, Ibrahim King of Caramania, who long before had maried Amuraths ſiſter, and yet for all that, had (as his anceſtors had before him) alwaies enuied the proſperous ſucceſſe of the Othoman Kings, tooke occaſion in the firſt yeare of Mahomet his raigne, with fire and ſword to inuade his dominions in Aſia. Which thing when Mahomet vnderſtood, he diſplaced Iſa his lieutenant in Aſia, as a man not ſufficient to mannage ſo great warres, and appointed Iſaac Baſſa in his roome, a moſt valiant man of war, vpon whom not long before hee had vpon ſpeciall fauour beſtowed in marriage the faire daughter of Sponderbeius, one of his fathers wiues, of whom we haue ſpake before. This great Baſſa paſſing ouer into Aſia, raiſed a great army. After whom followed Mahomet in perſon himſelfe with a greater, out of Europe: and hauing all his forces together, entered with great hoſtilitie into Caramania. But the Caramanian King perceiuing himſelfe vnable to withſtand ſo ſo puiſſant an enemie, fled into the ſtrength of the great mountaines, and by his embaſſadours offered vnto Mahomet ſuch reaſonable conditions of peace, as that hee was content to accept thereof. Which after they had by ſolemne oath on both parts confirmed, Mahomet returned with his armie to Pruſa: but when hee was come thither, the Ianizaries preſuming that they might be bold with the young King: putting themſelues in order of battell, came and with great inſolencie demanded of him a donatiue or largious, as a reward of their good ſeruice done. With which ſo great preſumption, Mahomet was inwardly chafed: but for ſo much as they were his beſt ſoldiers, and alreadie in armes, he wiſely diſſembled his anger for the preſent, hauing a little before had warning thereof by Abedin Baſſa, and Turechan-beg, two of his great captains, who had got ſome ſuſpition of the matter: wherefore to content them, he cauſed ten great bags of aſpers to be ſcattered among them, and ſo pacified the matter. But within few dais after, he cauſed Doganes (the Aga or chiefe captain of the Ianizaries) to be brought before him, and to be ſhamefully whipt: and ſo preſently diſcharging him of his office, placed one Muſtapha in the ſame. The like ſeuerity he vſed againſt the reſt of the vnder-captains, cauſing them to be cruelly ſcourged and beaten like ſlaues: which in that tyrannical gouernment is an vſuall puniſhment, vpon the leaſt diſpleaſure of the king to bee inflicted vpon any man, without reſpect of degree or calling, if he be not a natural Turke born. Preſently after he ſent Iſaack his lieutenant againſt Elias Prince of Menteſia or Caria, by whom the poore Prince was driuen out of his countrey: euer ſince which time it hath remained in ſubiection to the Turkiſh Kings, as part of their Kingdome and Empire.

Menteſia ſubdued by the Turkes.

When Mahomet had thus ended the Caramanian war, and was determined with his army to returne to Hadrianople, he was aduertiſed, That the ſtraits of Helleſpontus were ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed by the Chriſtian fleet, that he could not there poſſibly paſſe ouer but with moſt manifeſt danger: wherefore he tooke his way through that part of Bythinia which lyeth aboue Conſtantinople, and came to the caſtle which the Turkes call Acce-Chiſar, and the Grecians λευκὸς πύργος, or white caſtle, ſtanding vpon the narrow ſtrait of Boſphorus on Aſia ſide, and there paſſed ouer into Europe at the ſame place where his father Amurath had not many yeares before in like manner found paſſage. Where when he was ſafely got ouer with his armie, he by the aduice of his Baſſaes encamped faſt by the ſea ſide, and there preſently began to build a great ſtrong caſtle cloſe vnto the ſtraits of Boſphorus, neere vnto Propontis, on Europe ſide, directly ouer againſt the other caſtle in Aſia. For the ſpeedie accompliſhment of which work, he aſſembled thither all the workmen he could poſſibly get out of Europe and Aſia, apportioning vnto his captaines and ſouldiers of his armie part of the worke alſo: by whoſe induſtrie and labour, that great building was in ſhorter time brought to perfection, than was by any man at the firſt expected. This caſtle which for the greatneſſe thereof is of moſt writers reputed for a citie, was by the Turks named Genichiſar, and of the Grecians Neocaſtron, or New caſtle, and alſo Lamocaſtron, or caſtle vpon the ſtraits; and was there by the Turkes built, as well for the ſafetie of their owne paſſage too and fro, as for to hinder the paſſage of the Chriſtians through thoſe narrow ſtraits, they now poſſeſſing the ſtrong forts on both ſides: and therby alſo to diſtreſſe the citie of Conſtantinople, from whence this caſtle was not aboue fiue miles diſtant. When Mahomet in the ſecond yere of his raign had finiſht this great caſtle, with ſome other ſmall forts about the ſame, and alſo repaired the other caſtle in Aſia ouer againſt it, hee placed therein ſtrong garriſons, and furniſhed the ſame with artillerie; in ſuch ſort, that no ſhip could paſſe through the ſtrait of Boſphorus into the great Euxine, or blacke ſea, but ſhee was in danger to be ſunke: whereby the rich trade which the marchants of Venice, Genua, & Conſtantinople, had to Caffa, and other places lying vpon the Euxine, were almoſt quite cut off, to the great hinderance of thoſe eſtates. Now Mahomet by nature ambitious, and withall deſirous to doe ſome ſuch thing as the glorie whereof might farre paſſe the fame of his predeceſſors, thoght nothing more anſwerable to his high conceits, than to attempt the winning of Conſtantinople, and the vtter ſubuerſion of the Greeke empire: Whereupon his father Amurath, and his great grandfather Baiazet, had before in vaine ſpent their forces. Beſides that, it grieued him to ſee that goodly citie, the antient ſeat of the Chriſtian empire, to bee ſo commodiouſly ſcituated, as it were in the middeſt of his kingdome, and not to bee at his command. Hereunto the ſmall power of the Greeke Emperour himſelfe, and the other Chriſtian Princes at the ſame time at mortall diſcord amongſt themſelues, miniſtred vnto his greedie deſire desire no small hope of successe, and serued as spurs to prick him forward vnto so great an enterprise. Wherefore al the Winter he caused great preparation to be made of shipping & other warlike prouision both for sea and land: and gaue out commissions for the leuying of a mightie army, to be in readinesse against the next Spring. But whither he would imploy the same, no man could certainly tel: some ghessing one thing and some another, as the manner of men is, when such extraordinarie preparation is at hand. Constantinus the eight of that name, then Emperor of Constantinople, a Prince of a mild and soft spirit, fitter for the Church than for the field, hearing of the great preparation made by the Turkish King, and fearing least that tempest then growing, should vpon the sudden break forth vpon himselfe, first made such preparation as his owne small abilitie would extend vnto. And then sent his embassadours vnto other Christian Princes, earnestly craving their aid and assistance in that his dangerous estate. But that labour was lost, and all his suit vaine: for they beeing at variance ore with another, and hauing more care of priuate reuenge, than how to repulse the common enemie of Christianitie, could not, or would not affoord him any helpe at all. Nicholas the fifth of that name, then Bishop of Rome, with Alphonsus King of Naples, and the State of Venice, promised to haue sent him thirtie gallies, but none for all that came.

Constantinus the Emperor in vaine craueth aid of the Christian Princes.

There were by chance at Constantinople certain ships and gallies of Venice, Genua, Crete and Chios, of whom the Emperour made stay: at which time also it chanced, that Ioannes Iustinianus, an aduenturer of Genua, who had beene scouring those seas, came to Constantinople with two tall ships, and foure hundred souldiers: where he was entertained by the Emperour. And forasmuch as he was a man honorably descended, and supposed to be both of great courage and direction, was by the Emperour appointed Generall of all his forces next vnto himselfe. He also entertained six thousand Greekes: which, with three thousand Venetians, Genowaies and others, whom he had made stay of, ioyned vnto the citizens, was al the weak strength he had to relie vpon, for the defence of his state and empire.

1453 Against the beginning of the Spring, the Turkish king had in readinesse a great and puissant army of three hundred thousand men, of whom, the greatest part were taken out of Bulgaria, Seruia, Rascia, Thessalia, Macedonia, & Grecia, which as yet were called the Christian countries, and were themselues either indeed Christians, or else such renegates as had not long before forsaken the Christian faith: vnto these also were ioyned diuers other Christians which came out of Germanie, Bohemia, and Hungarie, to serue the Turke in his wars. This hath bin none of the least means, whereby the Turkish Kings haue growne so great, and their kingdome so mightily inlarged, by inforcing and alluring Christians to fight against Christians, to the vtter confusion of themselues. Among the great multitude of the European Christians, were mingled his effeminate souldiers of Asia, and his naturall Turks and Ianizaries, which were in number fewest, and yet commanded all the rest.

Mahomet encampeth before Constantinople.

With this great army, well appointed with all warlike prouision, came Mahomet the Turkish King from Hadrianople: and the ninth day of Aprill, in the yeare 1453, encamped before Constantinople, and with the multitude of his armie filled all the maine land before the citie, from the seaside of Bosphorus, vnto the place where the same sea compassing in the city on two parts, and running far into the land betwixt Constantinople and Pera, maketh there a goodly hauen betwixt them.

The situation of Constantinople.

This citie of Constantinople (called in antient time Bizantium) is in forme of a Triangle, scituated in Europe in the pleasant countrey of Thracia, vpon a point of the maine land shooting out towards Asia, called of Plinie and Solinus, the promontorie Chrysoceras; where the sea of Propontis ioyneth vnto that strait of sea, which diuideth Asia from Europe, called in antient time Bosphorus Thracius; sometime the straite of Pontus; and the mouth of Pontus; and of the moderne writers, the strait of Constantinople; and about two hundred yeares past, or more, S. George his arme. This point of the maine, whereon the citie standeth, lyeth about two Italian miles more Northward than doth the auntient citie of Calcedon, on the other side of the strait in Asia: more than thirtie miles distant from the Euxine or blacke Sea, lying from it Northward: And two hundred miles from the strait of Hellespontus or Calipolis, from thence South. Which noble Citie (of all others most fitly seated for the Empire of The World, and with great maiestie ouerlooking both Europe and Asia) is by the Cosmographers accounted to stand in the height of 43 degrees, vpon seuen little hils, of no

A no great and easie ascent: and was there first built by Pausanias the Lacedemonian King, and called Bizantium, and so many yeares flourished as a populous and rich citie, vntill the ciuill wars betwixt Seuerus the Emperor, and Niger: what time it indured the siege of the Romans vnder Seuerus, three yeres, with such obstinacie, that it yelded not vntil it was brought to such extremitie, that the citizens did eat one another; and then yeelding, had the wals ouerthrown by Seuerus, and the citie it selfe destroyed, and brought to the low estate of a poore countrey village, and so by him giuen to the Perinthyans. In which base estate it continued vntill the time of Constantine the Great, the son of Helena (whom some will needs haue to haue beene an English woman) by whom it was new built, and beautified with buildings so stately and sumptuous, that vnto the strange beholders it seemed a dwelling place for heauenly wights, rather rather than for earthly men. And to grace it the more, translated his imperiall seat thither, and called it Noua Roma, or New Rome; and all that pleasant part of Thracia alongst the sea coast of Hellespontus, Propontis, and Bolphorus, by the name of Romania, of the faire Romane colonies there by him planted; which name it at this day retaineth, and is of the Turkes called Rumilia and Rum-Ili, that is to say, the Romane countrey. But as for the citie it selfe, the glorious name of the founder so preuailed, that the citie was and yet is of him called Constantinople, or Constantine his citie: and now of the barbarous Turks commonly, but corruptly, Stamboli. It is (as we said) built in the forme of a Triangle, whereof the longest side, which runneth from Northeast to Southwest, is on the South side washed with the Propontis; and towards the ending of the point, which is about the seuen towers, is somewhat indented; being commonly reputed to be eight miles long. The other side lieth East and West fiue miles Constantinople built by Pausanias, destroyed by Seuerus, reedified by Constantine the Great, & now taken by Mahomet the Turke.

C in length, being washed with the hauen, which is somwhat more than eight miles long before it meet with the fresh water, and about a quarter of a mile broad: on the further side whereof standeth the citie of Pera, commonly called Galata, sometimes a colonie of the Genowaies. This hauen is very deepe, & by that reason as commodious as deep, bearing ships ful fraught close to the shoare, so that they may discharge their burthens with the least trouble that may be; and is of Strabo called Cornu Bizantij, or the Horne of Bizantium. The third side of this citie towards the Continent, lieth almost North and South fiue miles also in length: those two sides that lie vpon the sea, and the hauen, are enuironed and girt in with a single wal, built after the antique maner, with many high towers, which strongly defend and flanke the same. Without which wals (especially towards the hauen) there lieth a street between them and the shore.

D But the other side, which is the third, & regardeth the maine land (beside the ditch, which is also fenced) is defended with three wals: the first wal standing vpon the ditch being but low; and the second not far distant from the first, raised somwhat higher; but the third ouerlooketh and commandeth both the other; from whence as from an high fortresse both the other wals and al the ditch without may easily be defended. But the two vtter wals, with the whole space betwixt them, are now by the Turks but slenderly maintained, lying full of earth and other rubbish, euen as they were in the time of the Grecians: som cause why they with lesse heart & courage defended the same against their barbarous enemies. In the East part of the city, on that point which in the raigne of the Grecians was called the cape of S. Demetrio, distant from Asia not much more than halfe a mile, stands the Seraglio or pallace of the great Turk, containing in it selfe a great part of an hil, enclosed round with a wall, as if it were it selfe a citie, in circuit more than two miles: wherein amongst other stately buildings, neere vnto the sea standeth a

E very faire and sumptuous gallerie, built for pleasure, with a priuy gate wel fortified and planted with great ordnance, and other munition, whereby the great Turke at certaine times passeth, when he is disposed in his gally to take his pleasure vpon the sea, or to passe ouer the strait vnto his houses or gardens of delight, on the other side in Asia. In this great city are also many other most stately and sumptuous buildings, as well of late erected by the Turkish Sultans, since they became Lords therof, as before by the Greeke Emperours: amongst all which the Temple of S. Sophia standing on the East side of the citie, not far from the Seraglio (now reduced vnto the form of a Mahometan Moschie, & whither the great Turke goeth oftentimes to

F heare seruice, being indeed but the sanctuarie or chancel only of the great, stately, & wonderful church built by Iustinian the Emperor) is most beautifull and admirable. That which standeth of it now, is both round and very high, built after the fashion of the Pantheon in Rome, but much greater, fairer, and not open in the top as is that: the wals thereof being of the finest marble, and the floore al paued with faire marble also. In the middest there is a very great and large circle, compassed in with high and huge pillars of most excellent marble of diuers sorts, and these support a mightie vault that beareth vp as many mo pillars aboue, standing after the very same order, and in a downe-right line, almest of the like greatnesse and goodnesse of the marble with the other below: vpon which, aboue the second vault in manner of a loouar, resteth the great round roofe which couereth all that space of the Church which is compassed with the aforesaid pillars: being all enameled and fillited, with the pictures of Saints, after the antient manner of some great Churches in Christendome: but that the Turks, who like not to haue any pictures in their churches, haue put out their eies only, as loth to spoile such a rare peece of work, and vtterly to deface it. In like maner the wals of the vpper vault are wrought, painted, or portraied after the same order, though in some part decaied, by reason of their long continuance and standing. About this church are eightene or twentie coores of brasse, right faire and costly, well declaring the magnificence and greatnesse thereof in more antient times, when as it had (as is reported) more than two hundred doores of like making and greatnesse: and beside the hugenesse of the frame and building it selfe, had also diuers faire monasteries and houses of religion ioined vnto it: wherunto belonged six thousand Priests, whose houses and lodgings extended almost all ouer the place where now the Turkes pallace standeth, and the other places adioining to this great church, which is now their chiefe Moschie, & called by them by the proper name of S. Sophia, because they hold euen as we doe, the wisdome of God to be incomprehensible & infinit. The next in magnificence vnto this, is the Moschie of Solyman, wherin he lieth buried, & his welbeloued wife the faire Roxolana: a work wel beseeming the maiesty of so mighty a Monarch. There are beside these also many other faire Moschies, Seraglioes for the Turke his wiues and concubins, Bezastanes or Burses for marchants, Obeliskes, Bathes, & other publick edifices and buildings of great maiestie and state, all well worth the beholding: wherin consisteth al the beauty of this so antient and renowned a city; far vnlike to that it was in the time of the first Greek Emperors, and before it was spoiled by the Latines. For the Turks priuat houses in this so great and imperiall a citie, so much renowned through the world, are for the most part low & base, after the Turkish fashion, built some of wood, some of stone, and some of vnburnt brick, laid with clay and dirt, which quickly decaieth again: they after their homely manner (by long custome receiued) neuer building any thing sumptuously for their own priuat vse, but contenting themselues with their simple cottages, how mean soeuer, commonly saying them to be good enough for the short time of their pilgrimage: and yet not sparing for any cost vpon the publick buildings and ornaments of the common weale, which they build with great maiesty & pomp; but specially their Moschies, wherein they excell. Neuertheless, there yet are in Constantinople some other houses also built high and comely enough; but these be few, and very old, all inhabited by the Christians and Iewes, and not by the Turks; but of this enough. And so againe to our purpose.

The fragilitie of the Turks in their priuate buildings.

The Turks fleet

Mahomet with his puissant armie thus encamped before the citie, placing his Asian soldiers on the right hand towards the Bosphorus; his European soldiers on the left hand, toward the hauen; lay himselfe with 15000 Ianizaries and other soldiers of the court, in the middle betwixt both, against the heart of the citie. On the farther side of the hauen also by Pera, he placed Zoganus, one of his chiefe counsellors, with another part of his army. At which time also Pantologes his Admirall came to the siege, with a fleet of 30 gallies: and 200 other small ships, and a number of other lesser vessels, which were rowed with three, or fiue oares a peece, ful of Turkish archers, fitter for shew than seruice. But for defence of the hauen, and so of the city on that side, the Emperor had caused the hauen to be strongly chaind ouerthwart from the citie to Pera: and within the chaine had orderly placed his strong fleet, the greatest strength wherof was seuen great ships of Genua, with three gallies, and two galliots of Venice, three of Creet, and a few others of the Island of Chios; all which were there, rather by chance vpon marchants affaires, then that they were prouided for any such seruice: yet by this means the Turks fleet was shut out of the hauen, and so the citie put in good safetie on that side.

When Mahomet had thus conueniently encamped his armie, and surrounded the citie both by sea & land: he first cast vp great trenches as neere as he possibly could vnto the wals of the citie, & raised mounts in diuers places as high as the wals themselues, from whence the Turks with their shot greatly annoied the defendants. After that, he placed his battery against one of the

A the gates of the city called Calegaria, and terribly battered the same, specially with one peece of ordnance of a wonderfull greatnesse, which with much difficultie was brought from Hadrianople with an hundred and fiftie yoke of oxen, and carried a bullet of an hundred pound weight, made (as his other shot was) of a kind of hard blacke stone brought from the Euxine sea: for as yet (as it seemeth) so soone after the inuention of that fatal engine, the vse of bullets of mettall was vnknowne. There with continuall batterie, hee terribly shooke the wals, which although they were very strong, yet were they not able to withstand the furie of so great a batterie. The Christians also out of the citie discharged their great artillerie vpon the Turks, but so sparingly, as if they had bin afraid to shake their owne wals, or loth for good husbandrie, to spend shot & poulder, which was to the canoniers very sparingly allowed: yet that B which was spent, was so well bestowed, that the Turks were therewith greeuously annoyed. The breach also which they had made at the aforesaid gate, was by the defendants with great and dangerous labour againe repaired with faggots and earth, and such like matter best seruing for that purpose, and so made stronger than before. In which most dangerous worke, they were altogether directed and greatly encouraged by Iustinianus the Genoway, the Emperors lieutenant generall for defence of the citie.

Constantinople vnfortunately besieged by the Turkes.

Yet for all this dilligence of the Christians, Mahomet continued his batterie with no lesse furie than before: but reposing greater hope to finde a way into the citie, by the spade and mattocke, than by batterie; he employed his pioners, whereof he had great store, to digge a mine: being altogether directed by Christians skilfull in that kind of worke, whom hee had for that purpose entertained. By whose cunning direction, with the industrious labour of the C poore pioners, the mine was brought to such perfection, that part of the wal, with one of the strong towers in the same, was quite vndermined, and stood supported, but with such vntrusty staies as the pioners had left for the bearing vp thereof til such time as it should be by the tyrants appointment blown vp. This dangerous work was neither perceiued, neither yet feared by the Constantinopolitans, as a thing not possible to haue bin done: forasmuch as Baiazet & Amurath had both with great labour before in vaine attempted the same, at such time as they hardly besieged the city. But that which those great kings had with much vaine labor by vnskilfull men made proofe of, Mahomet had now by men of greater deuice, brought to passe; although it took not such effect as he wished: for one Io. Grando, a German captaine, and a man D of great experience, suspecting the matter, had caused a countermine to be made, whereby the labour of the Turks was in good time discouered, and they with fire and sword driuen out of the mine, and the same strongly filled vp againe, and so the citie for that time deliuered of a great feare and danger. Mahomet perceiuing that it auailed him not to continue his batterie against that place, which was againe so strongly repaired, remoued the same, and planted it against a tower called Bactatina, neere vnto the gate called Porta-Romana, or, Romane gate. Which tower shaken with continuall batterie, at length fell downe, and filled the ditch before the vtter wall, euen with the ground. But this breach was also speedily and with great courage made vp againe by the defendants, although the Turkes did what they could, with continuall shot, to haue driuen them from the same. At which time they also erected certaine high towers of timber, couered with raw hides to defend the same from fire, out of which they with their shot slew many of the Christians vpon the wals, & in making good the aforesaid breach: but Mahomet seeing this valiantnesse of the defendants, openly said, That it was E neither the Grecians skill, nor courage, but the Frenchmen that defended the citie: for the Turks commonly call all the Christians of the West by the name of Frankes or Frenchmen.

Seuentie of the Turks galliots brought eight miles ouer land (by the deuice of a Christian) into the hauen of Constantinople.

The cheerefulnesse and industrie of the Christians in defending and repairing the aforesaid breach, was so great, that the Turkish King beganne almost to despaire of winning the citie; which he could no way assault but on one side. When as a bad Christian in his camp, put him againe in good hope, by shewing vnto him a deuice how to bring a great part of his fleet ouer land into the heauen, & therby to assault that part of the city by water, which the citizens lest feared: by which ingenious deuice, and by the great strength of men, Zoganus Bassa (to whom F that charge was committed) brought seuentie of the lesser ships & galliots, with al their sailes abroad (to the great admiration of all that saw them) vp a great hil, and so by dry land, out of the Bosphorus behind Pera, the space of eight miles, into the hauen of Constantinople, which running in betweene the citie and Pera, runneth into the maine Land (as we haue said) about eight

eight miles. The Christian that discouered this deuice vnto the king, is supposed to haue learned it of the Venetians, who not long before had done the like at the lake of Bennacus. Glad was Mahomet to see so many of his ships and gallies in the hauen, and the Christians with the sight thereof no lesse discouraged. Neuertheless, they attempted to haue burnt those vessels as they were in launching, but the Turks had so commodiously placed certain pieces of great Ordnance for their defence, that the formost of the gallies of the Christians, approching the Turks fleet, was presently sunke; wherewith the rest dismaied, returned backe from whence they came. Certaine of the Christians of the lost gallie, whom the Turks tooke vp swimming in the hauen, were the next day cruelly slain in the sight of the Christians: in reuenge whereof, certaine Turks before taken prisoners into Constantinople, were forthwith brought to the top of the wals, and there in the sight of the campe with like crueltie put to death.

A wonderfull bridge made by the Turks ouer the hauen of Constantinople.

Mahomet thus possessed of the hauen, shortly after caused a wonderfull bridge to be made quite ouer the hauen, from Zoganus his campe which lay by Pera, vnto the wals of Constantinople: which bridge was built with timber and plankes, borne vp with small boats and emptie caske, after a most strange manner, and was in length more than halfe a mile: by which bridge his armie came ouer the hauen, to assault the citie on that side also.

A notable fight betweene foure of the Christians ships, and the Turks fleet.

In the meane time, three tall Genoway ships laded with men and munition from the Iland of Chios, with one of the Emperours laded with corne from Sicilia, came with a faire winde for Constantinople. The Turks great fleet then lying not far off, within the sight of the camp, set vpon them, and after a great fight, wherein an exceeding number of the Turks were slaine with shot, the gallies boorded the ships: but beeing much lower, were so far from doing any good, as that the Turks could not well looke out, but they were from aboue slaine or wounded. Mahomet from the shore beholding the vnequal fight, and slaughter of his men, cried out aloud, swearing and blaspheming God, and in great rage rid into the sea as far as he durst; and comming backe againe rent his clothes, faring with himselfe like a mad man. The whole army of the Turkes beholding the same fight at sea, was filled with like indignation also, but could nothing remedie the matter. The great fleete ashamed in the sight of their King to be ouercome of so few ships, did what they might desperatly to enter: but all in vaine, being continually ouerwhelmed with shot and stones from aboue, and valiantly beaten downe by the Christian souldiers. At length wearie of their losse, they were glad with dishonour to fal off again, and to get them farther off. The report of the losse the Turks sustained in this fight, is almost incredible: some of the Turkes fugitiues reported, almost ten thousand Turks to haue there perished: but certaine it is, that such was the losse, as filled the whole armie with indignation and sorrow, many hauing there lost their kinsemen or friends. Three of these ships that had made this fight, arriued in safetie at Constantinople, the other was lost. Mahomet vpon this ouerthrow conceiued such displeasure against Pantogles his Admirall, who in that fight had lost one of his eyes, that he neuertheles thrust him out of his office, confiscated his goods, and was hardly by the great Bassaes intreated to spare his life.

Whilest Mahomet thus lay at the siege of Constantinople, and had thereunto giuen many great attempts, with more losse vnto himselfe than to the defendants, a rumor was raised in his camp, of great aid that was comming out of Italie by sea, and out of Hungarie by land, for the reliefe of the besieged. This report (although indeed it was not true) with the due consideration of the danger of the siege, filled the Turks camp with feare: so that the souldiers commonly murmured amongst themselues, saying, That to satisfie the ambitious humour of their young King, they were led to fight against impregnable wals & fortresses, yea against the bars of nature it selfe, without all reason: Whereupon Mahomet entered into consultation with the three great Bassaes his counsellors, Whether it were best for him to continue the siege or not. When Caly Bassa, sometime his tutor, a man of greatest authority among the Turks, both for his long experience and high place, and withall secretly fauouring the distressed Emperour; after hee had with long & graue discourse declared the difficulty or rather impossibilitie of the wished successe in that present war; & confirmed the same, by producing the examples of Baiazet his great grandfather, and of Amurath his father, who had both in vaine made proofe of their strength against that city: at length concluded, that in his mind it were best for him to raise his siege, & to depart before he had sustained any further losse or disgrace: but Zoganus the second Bassa, in great fauor also with Mahomet, and secretly enuying the greatnesse of Caly Bassa, perswaded

A suaded the K. to proceed in his honorable enterprise: assuring him of the good successe thereof, and with all the reasons he could deuise, impugned that which Caly Bassa had said. And of the same opinion with Zoganus was also the third Bassa, rather of purpose to crosse Caly-Bassa, and withal to fit the Kings humor, than for any great hope he had in the good successe of that he so much desired. Howbeit the speech he & Zoganus deliuered, so wel agreed with the kings affection, that he resolued to continue the siege: and thereupon gaue full authority to Zoganus to appoint a day for a great and generall assault to bee giuen, resoluing at once to gage all his forces vpon the winning of the city. Which charge Zoganus gladly took vpon him, & with his good liking, appointed the 29 day of May for the general assault, being then the tuesday next following. In the meane time he sent one Ismael, the son of Alexander Prince of Sinope, embassador vnto the Emperour, to offer him peace: but vpon such hard conditions, as were no lesse
B to be refused than death it selfe. Which thing he did, partly to satisfie the minds of his Turks (who are for most part of opinion, That God will not prosper them in their assaults, except they first make vnto their enemies some offer of peace, how vnreasonable soeuer it forceth not) and partly to make proofe what confidence the enemy yet had in himself, for the holding out of the siege. But that dishonorable peace so offered, together with the intolerable conditions, was by the emperor honorably refused: who no lesse feared the Turks faith (if he should haue accepted therof) than he did the hardnes of the conditions. Three daies before this fatal assault was to be giuen, the Turks (according to their maner) kept their solemne fast, eating nothing al the day vntil night; and then making the greatest cheare & ioy they could deuise, and in the winding vp of the same, took their leaue one of another, with such kissing & imbracing C as if they should neuer haue met againe. At the same time Mahomet to encourage his soldiers, caused proclamation to be made thorow his camp, That he would freely giue all the spoile of the citie for three daies vnto his souldiers, if they could win it: and for confirmation thereof, solemnly swore the Turks great oath, By the immortall God, and by the foure hundred Prophets, by Mahomet, by his fathers soule, by his owne children, and by the sword wherewith he was girt, faithfully to performe whatsoeuer he had to them in his proclamation promised.

Whilest these things were in doing, Caly-Bassa disdaining that his counsel was reiected, and the opinion of his aduersaries followed; by secret letters aduertised the Emperour of the day appointed for the generall assault, together with all the preparation made against him: perswading him not to be afraid of them, who were themselues no lesse afraid of him; but carefully D to prouide to haue al things in readinesse for the defence of his city, and valiantly to withstand the rash and last attempt of his enemies.

The citizens of Constantinople without cause murmur against the Emperour.

This wofull Emperour had already done what he could to the vttermost of his power for defence of the citie, all the time of the siege: but such was the disloyaltie of the citizens his subiects, that many times they could hardly be drawne from their priuate trades and occupations, vnto the wals to withstand the enemie; foolishly affirming, That it was to no purpose for them to fight against the Turks at the breaches, & to starue for food at home in their houses. For which cause, the Emperor commanded a view to be taken of all the corne in the citie (which then began to grow very scarce;) but vpon diligent search made, such store was found E in many mens hands, (which was by them either altogether kept in to sel afterwards at vnreasonable prises; or els so sparingly vttered, as if they had none to spare) as that it appeared, the dearth and scarcitie which then began to increase, to proceed rather of the couetousnesse of men, than of any true want of graine: this store the Emperour caused to bee proportionably diuided vnto euery family at reasonable prises, according to their spending; and so eased the great murmuring and grudging of the common people for bread. The Grecian mercinarie souldiers also, regarding more their owne priuat profit than the publicke seruice, refused any longer to go to the wals, than they were sure of their daily pay: which the poore Emperour, otherwise vnable to giue them, was glad to conuert the church plate & jewels into money, to content them. For he had many times before with teares, in vaine requested to haue borrowed money of his couetous subiects, to haue beene employed in defence of the citie; but they F would still sweare, that they had it not, as men growne poore for want of trade: which in few daies after, their enemies found in such abundance, that they wondered at their wealth, & derided their follie, that possessing so much, they would bestow so litle in defence of themselues and their countrey. But this had beene their vsuall manner of dealing with their Emperours,

A hard shift for money.

in that declining ſtate of the empire : as well appeared in the time of the Emperour Baldwin, G who for lack of money was glad firſt to ſell away many of the goodly ornaments of the citie, and afterwards to pawne his owne ſon vnto the Venetian marchants, for money to maintaine his ſtate, as in the former part of this Hiſtorie is declared.

But to returne againe to the courſe of our Hiſtorie. The Emperour certainly aduertiſed of the enemies purpoſe, for the generall aſſault ſhortly to be giuen, firſt commended the defence of himſelfe and the citie to the protection of the almightie, by general faſting and prayer: and afterwards appointed euery captaine and commander, to ſome certaine place of the wall for defence thereof: which was done by the direction of Io. Iuſtinianus his Generall, in whoſe valour the Conſtantinopolitans had repoſed their greateſt hope.

But the citie being on euery ſide now beſet with the Turks great armie, and the defendants H in number but few, for ſo great a citie (in compaſſe eight miles) the wals could but ſlenderly in many places be manned, and eſpecially on both ſides toward the ſea, where indeed leaſt danger was. The greateſt ſtrength and beſt ſouldiers, were placed for defence of the vtter wall, where the breach was, and the aſſault expected by land. Iuſtinianus the Generall himſelfe, with three hundered Genowayes well armed, and certaine choſen Greeks vndertook the defence of that part of the battered wal, neere vnto the Roman gate, where the fall of the tower Bactatina had filled the ditch as is aforeſaid: againſt which place Mahomet himſelfe lay encamped, with his Ianizaries and beſt men of war. Neere vnto Iuſtinianus lay the Emperor himſelf, for defence of another part of the wall: and ſo other captains orderly with their companies, all alongſt the vtter wal: and becauſe the defendants ſhould haue no hope to ſaue their liues, more I than their own valour, the Emperor cauſed all the gates of the inner wal to be faſt ſhut vp: and in this ſort they lay all the night, expecting continually when the aſſault ſhould be giuen: all which time they might heare great hurly burly and noiſe in the Turks campe, as they were putting things in readineſſe for the aſſault.

Conſtantinople aſſaulted by the Turks.

A little before day, the Turkes approched the wals, and begun the aſſault, where ſhot and ſtones were deliuered vpon them from the wals, as thicke as haile; whereof little fel in vain, by reaſon of the multitude of the Turks, who preſſing faſt vnto the wals, could not ſee in the darke how to defend themſelues, but were without number wounded or ſlain: but theſe were of the common and worſt ſoldiers, of whom the Turkiſh king made no more reckoning than to abate the firſt force of the defendants. Vpon the firſt appearance of the day, Mahomet gaue K the ſigne appointed for the generall aſſault, whereupon the citie was in a moment & at one inſtant on euery ſide moſt furiouſly aſſaulted by the Turks: for Mahomet, the more to diſtreſſe the defendants, and the better to ſee the forwardneſſe of the ſouldiers, had before appointed which part of the city euery Colonel with his regiment ſhould aſſaile. Which they valiantly performed, deliuering their arrows and ſhot vpon the defendants, ſo thicke, that the light of the day was therewith darkened: others in the mean time couragiouſly mounting the ſcaling ladders, and comming euen to handie ſtrokes with the defendants vpon the wall; where the formoſt were for moſt part violently borne forward by them which followed after. On the other ſide, the Chriſtians with no leſſe courage withſtood the Turkiſh furie, beating them down again with great ſtones and weighty peeces of timber, and ſo ouerwhelmed them with L ſhot, darts, and arrowes, and other hurtfull and deadly deuices from aboue; that the Turkes diſmaied with the terrour thereof, were readie to retire.

Mahometreuoketh the aſſault.

Mahomet ſeeing the great ſlaughter and diſcomfiture of his men, ſent in freſh ſupplies of his Ianizaries and beſt men of war, whom he had for that purpoſe reſerued as his laſt hope and refuge: by whoſe comming on his fainting ſouldiers were againe encouraged, and the terrible aſſault begun afreſh. At which time the barbarous King ceaſed not to vſe all poſſible meanes to maintaine the aſſault: by name calling vpon this and that captaine, promiſing vnto ſome whom he ſaw forward, golden mountains; and vnto others in whom he ſaw any ſigne of cowardiſe, threatning moſt terrible death: by which means the aſſault became moſt dreadfull, death there raging in the middeſt of many thouſands. And albeit that the Turks lay dead by M heapes vpon the ground, yet other freſh men preſſed on ſtil in their places, ouer their dead bodies, and with diuers euent either ſlew, or were ſlaine by their enemies.

In this ſo terrible a conflict, it chanced Iuſtinianus the General to be wounded in the arme; who loſing much bloud, cowardly withdrew himſelf frō the place of his charge, not leauing any

A any to ſupplie his roome, and ſo got into the citie by the gate called Romana, which he had cauſed to be opened in the inner wal: pretending the cauſe of his departure to be for the binding vp of his wound, but being indeed a man now altogether diſcouraged.

The Chriſtians forſake the wals.

The ſoldiers there preſent, diſmaied with the departure of their Generall, and ſore charged by the Ianizaries, forſooke their ſtations, and in haſte fled to the ſame gate wherby Iuſtinianus was entered; with the ſight whereof, the other ſouldiers diſmaied, ran thither by heaps alſo. But whileſt they violently ſtriue, al together to get in at once, they ſo wedged one another in the entrance of the gate, that few of ſo great a multitude got in: in which ſo great a preſſe & confuſion of mindes, 800 perſons were there by them that followed, trodden vnder foot, or thruſt to death. The Emperor himſelf, for ſafegard of his life flying with the reſt, in that preſſe as a man not regarded, miſerably ended his daies, together with the Greeke empire. His dead B body was ſhortly after found by the Turks among the ſlaine, and knowne by his rich apparel; whoſe head being cut off, was forthwith preſented to the Turkiſh tyrant: by whoſe commandement it was afterward thruſt vpon the point of a lance, and in great deriſion carried about as a trophie of his victorie, firſt in the campe, and afterwards vp and downe the citie.

Conſtantinople woon by the Turke.

The Turks encouraged with the flight of the Chriſtians, preſently aduanced their enſignes vpon the top of the vttermoſt wall, crying victorie; and by the breach entered as if it had bin a great floud, which hauing once found a breach in the banke, ouerfloweth, and beareth down all before it: ſo the Turks when they had won the vtter wal, entered the city by the ſame gate that was opened for Iuſtinianus, and by a breach which they had before made with their great artillerie; and without mercy cutting in pieces all that came in their way, without further reC ſiſtance became lords of that moſt famous & imperial city. Some few there were of the Chriſtians, who preferring death before the Turkiſh ſlauerie, with their ſwords in their hands ſold their liues deare vnto their enemies: amongſt whom, the two brethren Paulus and Troilus Bochiardi Italians, with Theophilus Palaeologus a Greeke, and Ioannes Stiauus a Dalmatian, for their great valour and courage, deſerue to be had in eternal remembrance: who after they had like lions made ſlaughter of their enemies, died in the midſt of them, embrued with their bloud, rather oppreſſed by multitude, than by true valor ouercome. In this fury of the Barbarians, periſhed many thouſands of men, women, and children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition. Many for ſafegard of their liues, fled into the Temple of Sophia; where they were al without pitty ſlain, except ſome few reſerued by the barbarous victors, to purpoſes more grieuous D than death it ſelfe. The rich and beautiful ornaments and iewels of that moſt ſumptuous and magnificent Church (the ſtately building of Iuſtinianus the Emperor) were in the turning of a hand, pluckt down and caried away by the Turks: and the Church it ſelfe built for God to be honored in, for the preſent conuerted into a ſtable for their horſes, or a place for the execution of their abhominable and vnſpeakable filthineſſe: the Image of the crucifix was alſo by them taken downe, and a Turks cap put vpon the head thereof, and ſo ſet vp and ſhot at with their arrows, and afterwards in great deriſion carried about in their campe, as it had beene in proceſſion, with drums playing before it, railing and ſpitting at it, & calling it the God of the Chriſtians. Which I note not ſo much done in contempt of the Image, as in the deſpight of Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion.

But whileſt ſome were thus ſpoiling of the Churches, others were as buſie in ranſacking of priuat houſes, where the miſerable Chriſtians were enforced to endure in their perſons whatE ſoeuer pleaſed the inſolent victors: vnto whom all things were now lawfull that ſtood with their luſt, euery common ſouldier hauing power of life and death, at his pleaſure to ſpare or ſpill. At which time riches were no better than pouertie; and beautie worſe than deformitie. What tongue were able to expreſſe the miſerie of that time? or the proud inſolencie of thoſe barbarous conquerours? where of ſo many thouſands, euery man with greedineſſe fitted his own vnreaſonable deſire: all which the poore Chriſtians were inforced to indure. But to ſpeake of the hidden treaſure, mony, plate, iewels, & other riches there found, paſſeth credit, the Turks themſelues wondered thereat, and were therwith ſo enriched, that it is a proF uerbe amongſt them at this day, if any of them grow ſuddenly rich, to ſay, He hath beene at the ſacking of Conſtantinople: whereof if ſome reaſonable part had in time beene beſtowed vpon defence of the citie, the Turkiſh King had not ſo eaſily taken both it and the citie. But euery man was carefull how to encreaſe his own priuat wealth, few or none regarding the publicke ſtate;

ſtate; vntill in fine, euery man with his priuat aboundance was wrapped vp together with his needy neighbor in the ſelfe-ſame common miſerie. Yea the ſecurity of the Conſtantinopolitans was ſuch, that being alwaies enuironed with their mortall enemies, yet had they no care of fortifying of ſo much as the inner wal of the citie (which for beauty and ſtrength was comparable with the wals of any citie in the world, if it had been kept well repaired) but ſuffered the officers which had the charge to ſee to the fortifying of the citie, to conuert the greateſt part of the mony into their owne purſes: as appeared by Manuel Giagerus, a little before a very poore man; and likewiſe by Neophitus, who then hauing that office to ſee vnto the fortification of the citie, had in ſhort time gathered together ſeuenty thouſand florens, which became all a worthy prey vnto the greedy Turkes

After that the barbarous common ſoldier had thus by the ſpace of three daies without controlment taken his pleaſure in the citie (as Mahomet had before promiſed) and throughly ranſackt euery corner thereof; they then returned into the camp, with their rich ſpoiles, driuing the poore Chriſtian captiues before them, as if they had bin droues of cattell, or flocks of ſheep: a ſpectacle no leſſe lamentable, than was the ſacking of the citie. It would haue grieued any ſtonie heart to haue ſeene the noble gentlewomen and great ladies, with their beautifull children, and many other faire perſonages, who lately flowed in all worldly wealth and pleaſure, to be now become the poore and miſerable bondſlaues of moſt baſe and contemptible raſcals; who were ſo far from ſhewing them any pitie, as that they delighted in nothing more than to heape more and more miſerie vpon them, making no more reckoning of them than of dogs. There might the parents ſee the wofull miſerie of their beloued children, and the children of the parents; the husband might ſee the ſhameful abuſe of his wife, and the wife of her husband, and generally one friend of another: and yet not able to mourne together (the leaſt part of heauie comfort) being in the thraldome of diuers cruel maſters, by whom they were kept in ſunder, like in few daies to be diſperſed into diuers farre countries, without hope that they ſhould euer find releaſe, or one ſee another againe.

Mahomet ſolemniſeth his feaſts in Conſtantinople with the bloud of the Grecian nobilitie.

The ſoldiers being all retired into the campe, Mahomet as a proud conquerour, with great triumph entered into the citie of Conſtantinople, then deſolate and void of al Chriſtian inhabitants; and there after the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, made a ſumptuous & royal feaſt vnto his Baſſaes and other great captains: where after he had ſurcharged himſelfe with exceſſe of meat and drinke, he cauſed diuers of the chiefe Chriſtian captiues, both men and women (of whom many were of the late Emperors line and race) to be in his preſence put to death, as he with his Turkes ſate banquetting; deeming his feaſt much more ſtately by ſuch effuſion of Chriſtian bloud. Which manner of exceeding crueltie he daily vſed, vntil ſuch time as he had deſtroied al the Grecian nobilitie that was in his power, with the chiefe of the late Conſtantinopolitan citizens. At which time alſo diuers of the Venetian Senators, with Baiulus their Gouernour, & many rich marchants of Genua and other places of Italie, were in like manner murthered: ſo that of ſeuen and fortie Senators of Venice which were there taken (whereof moſt part came thither by chance, bound for other places, but there vnluckily ſhut vp) ſome few found the fauour, with exceeding great ranſomes to redeeme themſelues.

Amongſt theſe noblemen thus lamentably executed, was one Lucas Leontares, or Notaras commonly called Kyr-Lucas, or lord Lucas, but of late great Chancellor of Conſtantinople, a man of greateſt account next vnto the Emperor himſelfe: whom the Turkiſh tyrant ſeemed greatly to blame, that he being a man in ſo great credit with the late Emperor, perſuaded him not in time to haue ſought for peace vpon any condition, or els to haue yelded vp the city, rather than to haue run that extreme courſe of wilful miſery. He to excuſe the matter, ſaid, That the late Emperor his maſter was encouraged to hold out the ſiege, by the Venetians & citizens of Pera, from whom he receiued ſecret aid: as alſo by ſome of the greateſt men about his own perſon: for proofe wherof, he drew out of his boſome the letters which Caly-Baſſa had to that purpoſe written vnto the Emperor, & deliuered them to Mahomet, hoping therby to haue found ſome fauour. But when he had ſaid what he could, the eldeſt of his ſons then liuing (for he had loſt two elder in the time of the ſiege) was cruelly executed before his face, & the yongeſt reſerued for the tyrants luſt: and after al this miſerie, had his own head ſtruck off with the reſt appointed for that daies ſacrifice. Out of this generall calamitie eſcaped Io. Iuſtinianus the General, who with al ſpeed fled at firſt to Pera, and from thence to Chios, where in few daies after after he died, of griefe of mind (as was thought) rather than of his wound, being happie if hee had honorably before ended his daies vpon the wals of Conſtantinople. Iſidorus alſo the Cardinal & Legat from the Pope, diſguiſed in ſimple apparel, and being of the Turks vnknowne, redeemed himſelfe for a ſmal ranſome, as if he had bin a man of none account, and ſo eſcaped: whom if Mahomet had knowne, he had vndoubtedly beene made ſhorter by the head.

The glorie of this famous citie of Conſtantinople continued many hundred yeares, commanding a great part of the world, vntill that by ciuill diſcord and priuate gaine, it was by little and little ſo weakened, that the Emperours of latter times, for the maintenance of their eſtate, were glad to relie ſometime vpon one, and ſometime vpon another, yet ſtill holding the title and ſtate of an empire, by the ſpace of 1121 yeres, when as (God his iudgement ſet apart) wonderfull and ſhameful it is to conſider how it was by this Turkiſh King Mahomet ſo quickly taken, and the Chriſtian empire of the Eaſt there vtterly ouerthrowne: which happened on the nine and twentieth day of May, in the yeare of our Lord 1453. Conſtantinus Palæologus, the ſonne of Helena, and laſt Chriſtian Emperour, being then ſlaine, when he had raigned about eight yeares. Since which time it hath continued the imperiall ſeat of the Turkiſh Emperors, and ſo remaineth at this day.

Pera yelded to the Turke.

The poteſtates and citizens of Pera, otherwiſe called Galata, a citie ſtanding oppoſit againſt Conſtantinople, on the other ſide of the hauen, and then vnder the gouernment of the Genowayes, doubting to run the ſame courſe of miſerie with their neighbours, ſent their Orators vnto Mahomet (the ſame day that Conſtantinople was taken) offering to him the keies of their gates, and ſo to become his ſubiects. Of which their offer Mahomet accepted, and ſent Zogranus with his regiment to take poſſeſſion of the city. Who comming thither, according to Mahomet his commandement, there eſtabliſhed the Turkiſh gouernment, confiſcated the goods of all ſuch as were fled, and vſed the reſt of the citizens which ſtaid, with ſuch inſolencie and oppreſſion, as that their miſerie was not much leſſe than theirs of Conſtantinople: and becauſe it was doubted, that the Genowayes might by ſea giue aid vnto the citizens, if they ſhould at any time ſeeke to reuolt, he cauſed all the wals and fortreſſes of the citie which were toward the land, to bee caſt downe and laid euen with the ground. Thus is the fatall period of the Greeke empire run, and Mahomet in one day become Lord of the two famous cities of Conſtantinople and Pera: the one taken by force, the other by compoſition. At which time the miſerie of Pera was great, but that of Conſtantinople iuſtly to be accounted amongſt the greateſt calamities that euer happened to any Chriſtian citie in the world.

Mahomet had of long time borne a ſecret grudge againſt Caly-Baſſa, ſometime his tutor, for that by his meanes Amurath his father, in the dangerous time of the Hungarian warres, had again reſumed vnto himſelfe the gouernment of the Turkiſh kingdome, which he had before reſigned vnto him, then but yong. But foraſmuch as he was the chiefe Baſſa, and had for many yeares ruled all things at his pleaſure, to the generall good liking of the people, during the raigne of old Amurath, and was thereby growne to be of ſuch wealth, credit, and authoritie, as no man had at any time obtained greater vnder any of the Othoman Kings: Mahomet in the beginning of his raigne, before he was eſtabliſhed in his kingdome, durſt not to take reuenge of that iniurie (as he deemed it) but yet ſtill kept it in remembrance, warily diſſembling his deep conceiued hatred, as if he had quite forgot it. Neuertheleſſe ſometime (for all his warineſſe) words fell from him, whereby the warie courtiers (which as curiouſly weigh their Princes words, as the cunning goldſmith doth his fineſt gold) eaſily perceiued the ſecret grudge that ſtuck in his ſtomack againſt the Baſſa: and thereby diuined his fall to be at hand. So it hapned one day that as Mahomet was walking in the court, he ſaw a fox of the Baſſa's tied in a chaine; which after he had a while earneſtly looked vpon, he ſuddenly brake into this ſpeech: Alas poore beaſt, haſt thou no mony to giue thy maſter to ſet thee at libertie? Out of which words, curious heads gathered much matter concerning the Kings diſpoſition towards the Baſſa. This ominous ſurmiſing of the courtiers (which oftimes proueth too true) was not vnknown vnto the Baſſa himſelfe, but troubled him much: wherfore to get himſelfe out of the way for a ſeaſon, more than for any deuotion, he took vpon him to go in pilgrimage to viſit the temple of the great Prophet (as they terme him) at Mecha, which amongſt the Turks is holden for a right religious and meritorious worke: hoping, that the young Kings diſpleaſure might in time bee mittigated, and his malice aſſwaged. But Mahomet perceiuing the diſtruſt of the Baſſa, and whereof it proceeded, ſeemed to take knowledge thereof, and with good wordes comforted him vp, willing him to be of good cheere, and not to miſdoubt any thing; neither to regard the vaine ſpeech of fooliſh people, aſſuring him of his vndoubted fauour: and the more to put him out of al ſuſpition, continually ſent him rich gifts, & heaped vpon him new honours, as if of al others he had eſteemed him moſt. Vntil that now at the taking of Conſtantinople, it was diſcouered by Lucas Leontares, that he had intelligence with the late Emperour of Conſtantinople, and his letters produced. For which cauſe, or as the common report went, for the old grudge that the tiant bare againſt him, as alſo for his great wealth, he was by Mahomets commandement apprehended and carried in bonds to Hadrianople: where after he had with exquiſite torments bin enforced to confeſſe where all his treaſures lay, he was moſt cruelly in his extreame old age executed. After whoſe death, his friends and ſeruants (which were many, for he was a man greatly beloued in court) in token of their griefe, put on mourning apparel: ſo that in the court appeared a great ſhew of common ſorrow; who with Mahomet being offended, cauſed proclamation to be made, That all ſuch as did weare ſuch mourning apparel, ſhould the next day appeare before him: at which time there was not one to be ſeene about the court in that heauie attire, for feare of the tyrants diſpleaſure.

Mahomet placeth his Imperiall ſeat at Conſtantinople, and is worthily accounted firſt Emperor of the Turks.

After that Mahomet was thus become Lord of the imperial citie of Conſtantinople, as is aforeſaid, and had fully reſolued there to place his imperiall ſeat, he firſt repaired the walls and other buildings ſpoiled in the late ſiege, and by proclamations ſent forth into all parts of his dominions, gaue great priuiledges & immunities to all ſuch as ſhould come to dwell at Conſtantinople, with free libertie to exerciſe what religion or trade they pleaſed. Whereby in ſhort time that great & deſolate citie was again well peopled, with ſuch as out of diuers countries reſorted thither: but ſpecially with the Iewiſh nation, which driuen out of other places, came thither in great numbers, and were of the Turks gladly receiued. So when he had there eſtabliſht all things according to his hearts deſire, he took vpon him the name and title of an Emperour: and is from that time not vnworthily reputed for the firſt Emperor of the Turks.

Now among many faire virgins taken priſoners by the Turks at the winning of Conſtantinople, was one Irene a Greeke borne, of ſuch incomparable beautie & rare perfection, both of bodie & mind, as if nature had in her, to the admiration of the world, laboured to haue ſhewn her greateſt skil, ſo prodigally ſhe had beſtowed vpon her, all the graces that might beautifie or commend that her ſo curious a worke. This paragon was by him that by chance had taken her, preſented vnto the great Sultan Mahomet himſelfe, as a iewell ſo fit for no mans wearing as his owne: by the beautie and ſecret vertues whereof, he found himſelfe euen vpon the firſt view not a little moued. Neuertheleſſe, hauing as then his head full of troubles, and aboue all things carefull for the aſſuring of the imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, by him but euen then won, he for the preſent committed her to the charge of his Eunuch, and ſent her away, ſo to be in ſafetie kept vntill his better leiſure. But thoſe his troubles ouerblowne, & his new conqueſts well aſſured, he then began forthwith to thinke of the faire Irene: and for his pleaſure ſending for her, took in her perfections ſuch delight and contentment, as that in ſhort time he had changed ſtate with her, ſhee being become the miſtreſſe & commander of him ſo great a conqueror; & he in nothing more delighted, than in doing her the greateſt honor & ſeruice he could. All the day he ſpent with her in diſcourſe, and the night in dalliance: al time ſpent in her company, ſeemed to him ſhort; & without her nothing pleaſed: his fierce nature was now by her well tamed and his wonted care of arms quite neglected: Mars ſlept in Venus lap, and now the ſoldiers might go play. Yea the very gouernment of his eſtate and empire ſeemed to be of him, in compariſon of her, little or not at all regarded; the care therof being by him careleſly committed to others, that ſo he might wholy himſelf attend vpon her, in whom more than in himſelf the people ſaid he delighted. Such is the power of diſordered affections, where reaſon ruleth not the rein. But whilſt he thus forgetfull of himſelfe, ſpends in pleaſure not ſome few daies or months, but euen one whole yere or two, to the lighting of his credit, & the great diſcontentment of his ſubiects in general: the Ianizaries & other ſoldiers of the court (men deſirous of imploiment, & grieued to ſee him ſo giuen to his affections, & to make no end therof) began at firſt in ſecret to murmur therat, & to ſpeak hardly of him; and at length (after their inſolent manner) ſpared not openly to ſay, That it were well done to depriue him of his gouernment and ſtate, as vnworthie thereof, and to ſet vp one of his ſonnes in his ſtead. Which ſpeeches

A ſpeeches were now growne ſo rife, and the diſcontentment of the men of war ſo great, that it was not without cauſe by ſome of the great Baſſaes feared, whereunto this their ſo great inſolencie would grow. But who ſhould tel the tyrant therof; whoſe frowne was in it ſelfe death? or who durſt take in hand to cure that his ſicke mind? which diſtraught with the ſweet, but poiſoned potions of loue, was not like to liſten to any good counſell; were it neuer ſo wiſely giuen: but as a man metamorphoſed, to turne his furie vpon him which ſhould preſume ſo wholeſomly (but contrary to his good liking) to aduiſe him. Vnhappy man, whoſe great eſtate & fierce nature was not without danger to be medled or tempered with, no, not by them who of all others ought in ſo great a perill to haue bin thereof moſt carefull; but were now for feare all become ſilent and dumb. Now amongſt other great men in the court, was one Muſtapha Baſſa, a man for his good ſeruice (for that he was of a child brought vp with him) of Mahomet greatly fauoured, and by him alſo highly promoted; and hee againe by him as his Soueraigne no leſſe honoured than feared: who no leſſe than the reſt, greeued to ſee ſo great a change in the great Sultan, of whome they had conceiued no ſmall hope of greater matters than were by him as yet performed; and mooued alſo with the danger threatned vnto him, by the diſcontented Ianizaries and men of war: eſpying him at conuenient leiſure to be ſpoken vnto, and preſuming of the former credit he had with him, aduentured thus to break with him, and to giue him warning thereof.

You haue giuen your ſelfe ouer (as they ſay) for a ſpoile and prey vnto a poore ſimple woman, your ſlaue and vaſſale, who with her beautie and allurements hath ſo bewitched your vnderſtanding and reaſon, as that you can attend nothing but her ſeruice, and the ſatisfying of your moſt paſſionat and inordinat deſires; which how much the more you cheriſh them, ſo much the more they torment and vex you. Enter but a little into your ſelfe (I pray you) and compare the life you now lead with*

E the like time heretofore by you ſpent in treading honours ſteps, and you ſhall find a notable difference betwixt the one and the other. Had the noble Othoman*, the firſt raiſer of your houſe and family ſo giuen himſelfe ouer vnto pleaſure, you had not now inhabited the countries of Bythinia and Galatia, with others moe alongſt the Euxine, by him conquered. Neither had his ſonne Orchanes (the liuely image of his father, and follower of his vertues) by leading this kind of life triumphed ouer Licaonia, Phrygia, and Caria, or extended the bounds of his empire ſo farre as vnto the ſtraits of Helleſpontus. What ſhould I ſpeake of* Amurath his ſonne, and ſucceſſour in the empire? who in perſon himſelfe, firſt of the

F Othoman Kings, paſſed ouer into Europe, placed his imperiall ſeat at Hadrianople, conquered Thracia, Bulgaria, and Raſcia. Yea Baiazet your great grandfather is in his misfortune to be more than you commended, as vanquiſhed in field by the mightie Tamerlane with foure hundred thouſand horſemen and ſix hundred thouſand foot, and not by a fillie woman: comforting his miſhap with the honour and greatneſſe of him by whom he was ſo ouercome. Neither may I with ſilence paſſe ouer your worthie grandfather the Noble Mahomet*, who not contented to haue reſtored the ſhaking empire, conquered alſo a great part of Macedonia, euen to the Ionian ſea, and carrying the terrour of his armes ouer into*

Asia, did great matters against the Caramanians and others. As for your father Amurath (of worthie memorie) I cannot but to my great griefe and sorrow speake of him, who by the space of thirtie yeares made both the sea and earth to quake vnder his feete, and with strong hand more than once vanquished the Hungarians, and brought vnder his subiection the countries of Phocis, Beotia, Aitolia, with a great part of Morea; and to speake of him truely, brake euen the very heart and strength of the Grecians, and other his fierce enemies. Let all these most famous conquests of your noble progenitors, whose worthie praises (as eternall trophies of their honour) are dispersed into euery corner of the world, awake you out of this heauie Lythargie wherein you haue too long slept, yea, let the remembrance of the conquest of this imperiall Citie by you to your immortall glorie woon, stirre you vp to greater things: and let it neuer be said of you, That you were able with your sword to ouercome your greatest enemies, and not with reason to subdue your inordinate affections: Thinke that your greatest conquest, and suffer not your selfe, so great a conquerour, to be led in triumph by your slaue. What auaileth it you to haue woon Constantinople, and to haue lost your selfe? Shake off these golden festers wherein the wilie Grecke hath so fast bound you: which at the first though it seeme vnto you hard and painfull, yet shall time digest it, and make you to thinke it both good and necessarie for your state. Weane your selfe from your desires, and giue rest vnto your troubled thoughts: which if you cannot do at once, striue by little and little to doe it: pleasure groweth greater by the seldome vse thereof, and satietie bringeth loathsomnesse. Moderate your selfe therefore, and againe take vp armes. Your souldiers if they bee not employed abroad, wil to your farther trouble set themselues to worke at home: Idlenesse maketh them insolent, and want of martiall discipline corrupteth their manners. Hereof proceedeth their intemperate and disloyall speeches, That if you will not lead them forth for the honour and inlargement of the Othoman empire, as did all your most noble progenitors, they will set vp another that shall, euen one of your owne children. And what the common souldier foolishly saith, their great commanders malitiously purpose: which what a confusion it would bring vnto the whole state of your empire, together with the danger of your royall person, I abhorre to thinke. Wherefore it is time, it is now high time for you to shew your selfe, and with the maiestie of your presence to represse their tumultuous insolencie, before it breake farther out. Rebellions are by farre more easily preuented, than in their heat appeased. The discontented multitude is a wild beast with many heads, which once enraged, is not a little to be feared, or without danger to be tamed: yet doe you but shew your selfe master of your owne affections, and you shall easily master them also. But what is fit for you to doe, beseemeth me not for to say: yea, pardon mee I beseech you, that I haue thus much (contrary perhaps to your good liking) alreadie said; prouoked (by what diuine inspiration I know not) euen halfe against my will, so discouer vnto you the secrets of my heart, and to lay open vnto you those things, which others knowing as well as I, do yet for feare keep the same from you. And if I haue gon too far, or in any thing that I haue said, forgot my selfe, impute the same (my dread Soueraigne) vnto the zeale of my loue and loyaltie towards you, or vnto my fidelitie so often by you tried, or to our antient education (the ground of your affection towards me) or to what else shall please you, rather than to my presumption, from which, how farre I haue alwaies been, I appeale euen to your maisties owne knowledge.

Hauing thus said, he fell down at his feet, as there to receiue his heauie doome of his so free speech, if it should be otherwise than well taken of the angrie Sultan: who all this while with great attention and many a sterne looke had hearkned vnto all that the Bassa had said: for well he knew it to be all true; and that in so saying, he had but discharged the part of a trustie and faithfull seruant, carefull of his maisters honour. But yet the beautie of the Greeke was still so fixed in his heart, and the pleasure he tooke in her, so great, as that to thinke of the leauing of her, bred him many a troubled thought. He was at war with himselfe, as in his often changed countenance well appeared; reason, calling vnto him, for his honour; and his amarous affections, still suggesting vnto him new delights. Thus tossed too and fro (as a ship with contrary winds) and withall considering the danger threated to his estate, if he should longer follow those his pleasures, so much displeasing to his men of war, he resolued vpon a strange point whereby at once to cut off all those his troubled passions, and withall to strike a terror euen into the stoutest of them that had before condemned him, as vnable to gouerne his owne so passionate affections. Whereupon with countenance well declaring his inward discontentment, he said vnto the Bassa, yet prostrate at his feet.

Although thou hast vnreuerently spoken, as a slaue presuming to enter into the greatest secrets of thy thy Soueraigne (not without offence to be of thee once thought vpon) and therefore deseruest well to die; yet for that thou wast a child brought vp together with me, and hast euer bin vnto me faithfull, I for this time pardon thee: and before to morrow the Sunne goe downe, will make it knowne both to thee, and others of the same opinion with thee, whether I be able to bridle mine affections or not. Take order in the meane time that all the Bassaes, and the chiefe commanders of my men of warre be assembled together to morrow, there to know my farther pleasure: whereof faile you not.

So the Bassa being departed, he after his wonted manner went in vnto the Grecke, and solacing himselfe all that day and the night following with her, made more of her than euer before: and the more to please her, dined with her; commanding, that after dinner she should be attired with more sumptuous apparrell than euer she had before worne: and for the further gracing of her, to be deckt with many most precious iewels of inestimable value. Whereunto the poore soule gladly obeyed, little thinking that it was her funerall apparrell. Now in the mean while, Mustapha (altogether ignorant of the Sultans mind) had as hee was commanded, causfed all the nobility, and commanders of the men of war, to be assembled into the great hal: euery man much maruelling, what should be the Emperors meaning therein, who had not of long so publikly shewed himselfe. But being thus together assembled, and euery man according as their minds gaue them, talking diuersly of the matter: behold the Sultan entered into the pallace leading the faire Greeke by the hand; who beside her incomparable beautie and other the greatest graces of nature, adorned also with all that curiositie could deuise, seemed not now to the beholders a mortall wight, but some of the stately goddesses, whom Poets in their extasies describe. Thus comming together into the midst of the hal, & due reuerence to them done by all them there present; he stood still with the faire Lady in his left hand, & so furiously looking round about him, said vnto them: I vnderstand of your great discontentment, & that you all murmur & grudge, for that I, ouercome with mine affection toward this so faire a paragon, cannot withdraw my selfe from her presence: but I would fain know which of you is so temperat, that if he had in his possession a thing so rare and precious, so lonely and so faire, would not be thrice aduised before he would forgo the same? Say what you think: in the word of a prince I giue you free liberty so to do. But they all rapt with an incredible admiration to see so faire a thing, the like wherof they had neuer before beheld, said all with one consent, That he had with greater reason so passed the time with her, than any man had to find fault therwith: wherunto the barbarous prince answered, Well, but now I will make you to vnderstand how far you haue bin deceiued in me, & that there is no earthly thing that can so much blind my senses, or bereaue me of reason, as not to see and vnderstand what beseemeth my high place and calling: yea I would you should all know, that the honor & conquests of the Othoman Kings my noble progenitors, is so fixed in my breast, with such a desire in my selfe to exceed the same, as that nothing but death is able to put it out of my remembrance. And hauing so said, presently with one of his hands catching the faire Greeke by the haire of the head, and drawing his falchion with the other, at one blow struck off her head, to the great terror of them al: and hauing so done, said vnto them: Now by this iudge whether your Emperor is able to bridle his affections or not. And within a while after, meaning to discharge the rest of his choler, caused great preparation to be mrde for the conquest of Peloponesus, and the besieging of Belgrade.

At the same time that the barbarous Turkes tooke the imperiall citie of Constantinople, Thomas and Demetrius Palæologi, brethren to the late vnfortunat Emperor Constantinus, gouerned a great part of Peloponesus, one of the most famous prouinces of Grecia, which in forme of a leafe of a Plane tree, is almost in manner of an Iland, enuironed with the seas Ionium and Ægeum, which running farre into the land on either side therof, seperateth the same from the rest of Grecia, by two great bayes; leauing but a strait necke of land, called of the Greekes Istmos, in breadth about fiue miles, which was sometimes by the Grecians, and afterward by the Venetians, fortified by a strong wall, and fiue great castles: neere vnto which place stood the great and famous citie of Corinth. This Prouince is in length 175 miles, and almost as much in breadth; wherein are contained the countries of Achaia, Messenia, Lacedemonia, Argolica, and Archadia; with many famous cities and goodly hauens, wherein it farre exceedeth all the other prouinces of Grecia. These two Princes Thomas and Demetrius, dismaied with their brothers disaster fortune, began now so farre to despaire of their owne estate, that vpon the first bruit thereof, they were about presently to haue fled by sea into Italy. And as it commonly falleth out, That one euill happeneth not alone; so at the same time it fortuned, that that the Albanians rise in arms against the said two Princes their Soueraignes : and vnder the leading of their rebellious captaine Emanuel Catecuzenus, grieuously troubled both the poore Princes. These Albanians were a rough and hardy kind of people, which liuing after the manner of the rude Scithian heardsmen, by feeding of cattel, had of long time planted themselues in Peloponesus ; differing from the naturall Greekes, both in their manner of liuing and language : which diuersitie was no small cause that they oftentimes spurned, as now, against the 1454 gouernment of the Grecian Princes. In this extremitie, the two distressed Princes (not well knowing which way to turne themselues) sought for peace at Mahomets hands, offering to become his tributaries. Of which their offer he willingly accepted, as an induction to the full conquest of that country, & sent Turachan Gouernor of Thessalia, one of his greatest men of war, with an armie into Peloponesus, to aid those princes against the Albanians : by whose instire the masterful rebels were in short time discomfited, and the country of Peloponesus quieted ; yet so, that it was now become tributarie to the Turkish King.

These two princes Demetrius and Thomas, the last of all the Christian princes that raigned in Peloponesus, hauing thus lost their libertie, liued for a few yeares as the Turks vassals, paying such yearely tribute as they had before promised. During which time many displeasures arose betwixt the two brothers, being both iealous of their estate, and desirous by all plausible meanes to win the hearts of their subiects one from another: whereby it came so to passe, that whiles they both desired to become popular, they weakned their owne credit, and had not their subiects at such command as best stood with the safetie of their estate. Neuertheles, as soone as they vnderstood that the Christian Princes of the West were making great preparation against the Turke; and that Calixtus the third of that name (then the Bishop of Rome) had already put a fleet of gallies to sea, which did great spoile vpon the borders of the Turks dominions, they vainly persuading themselues that the Turks would in short time be againe driuen out of Grecia, refused to pay any more tribute to the Turkish King, or to keepe league any longer with him. Vpon which occasion, Mahomet with a puissant armie came downe and first besieged Corinth, and afterwards entering into Peloponesus, tooke diuers strong townes, and destroied the country before him : and forced the two princes for safegard of their liues to flie, the one to Mantinia, and the other into the strong citie of Epidaurus, now called Ragusium. The poore princes destitute of such aid as they expected, and altogether vnable to withstand the power of the mightie tyrant, began againe to sue for peace: which he, hauing now spoiled their country, granted vpon condition, That all such places as he had alreadie taken, should be still his own; and also that the citie of Patras with the country adioyning, should be deliuered vnto him; and that for the rest, the said princes should pay vnto him a yerely tribute: which hard conditions the poore princes, now in danger to lose all, were glad to accept of; whereupon a peace was for that time againe concluded.

In his returne he tooke the citie of Athens in his way, which he not long before had taken from Francus Acciauoli by composition (by meanes of Omares the son of Turachan, one of his great captaines) promising to giue him the country of Beotia with the citie of Thebes, in lieu thereof. This Francus was nephew to Nerius, sometime prince of Athens, and had of long time beene brought vp in the Turks court, as one of Mahomet his minions ; and was of him (as was supposed) entirely beloued. But when he had receiued the dukedom of Thebes, in exchange for his princely state of Athens, he was shortly after, as if it had beene in great friendship sent by Mahomet to Zoganus, his lieutenant in Peloponesus: by whom he was at first courteously entertained, but afterward being about to depart, he was (according as Mahomet had before commanded) suddenly staied, and when he least feared, cruelly murdered.

About three yeres after the peace before concluded betwixt Mahomet & the two brethren, Mahomet vnderstanding that the Christian kings and princes had combined themselues against him, with a purpose to driue him againe out of Grecia ; thought it now high time, and much for the assurance of his estate, to root out the small reliques of the Grecian empire, which yet remained in Peloponesus in the two princes of the imperiall bloud, Thomas and Demetrius : whereunto hee saw a faire occasion presented. Forasmuch as those two brethren were at that time at great variance betwixt themselues, neither paied him such tribute as they had before promised : hereupon hee with a strong army came to Corinth, where Arsanes a noble man of great authoritie and power in that country, whose sister Demetrius had maried, came to him from from the Prince his brother in law, attended vpon with many gallant gentlemen his followers, of purpose to aid him against the other Prince Thomas, nothing fearing any harme to haue bin by the Turke intended against himselfe or his brother in law Demetrius, whom they both reckoned of as of a friend. But when Mahomet was entred into Peloponesus, and come to Tegea, he caused the the same Arsanes, with all his chiefe followers, to be laid hold vpon, and cast into bonds : knowing (as it should seeme) no man for friend, which might any way hinder his ambitious designes.

Demetrius hearing what was happened vnto Arsanes, fled to Sparta, now called Mizithra : whither Mahomet in few dais after came and laid siege to the citie. But the poore prince considering, that he must needs at length fall into his hands, went out of the citie, and humbly submitted himselfe with all that he had into his power. Which so well pleased the Turkish tyrant, that he courteously receiued him, comforted him, and promised him in stead of Sparta to giue him other lands and possessions of like value elsewhere : neuertheless he committed him to safe custodie, and carried him about with him as his prisoner; vntil he had finished those wars. After he had taken Sparta, he besieged Castria, where hee lost diuers of his Ianizaries : for which cause, when he had taken the citie, he put all the souldiers therein to the sword, and cut the captaines ouerthwart in two peeces. From thence he marched to Leontarium, called in antient time Megalopolis, which he tooke ; with another citie called Cardicea, whither they of Leontarium had before conueied their wiues and children, as to a place of more safetie: There he cruelly put to death all the inhabitants of those cities, men, women, and children, in number about six thousand, of whom he left not one aliue: and yet not so satisfied, commanded the very beasts and cattell of those places to be killed. Many cities of Peloponesus terrified with the dreadfull example of their neighbours, forthwith yeelded themselues : and amongst others Saluarium, a great and strong citie of Archadia ; where he caused all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, to the number of ten thousand to be cast into bonds, looking for nothing but present death : all which afterwards he commanded to be sent captiues to Constantinople, and with them peopled the suburbs of that citie. After that, he by the counsell of Demetrius, sent one of his captaines called Iosua, with certaine companies of Greeke souldiers, vnto the strong citie of Epidaurus, to command them in the name of the Prince, to deliuer vnto him the citie, with the Prince his wife and daughter, which lay there. But the Gouernor trusting vnto the strength of the citie, refused to deliuer the same : yet suffered the Princesse with her daughter to depart out of the citie, beeing willing to goe to her husband; whom the captaine hauing receiued, returned, and presented them to Mahomet. By whose commandement they were presently sent into Beotia, there to attend his returne to Constantinople, and an Eunuch appointed to take charge of the yong Ladie, who had so warmed Mahomets affection, that he tooke her afterwards to his wife. At the same time he also subdued the most part of Achaia and Elis, by Zoganus Bassa his lieutenant : whither he came not long after himselfe, and laied siege to the citie of Salmenica, which for lacke of water was at length yeelded vnto him : but the castle was by the space of a whole yeare after valiantly defended against the Turks left to besiege it, by Thomas the prince of whom Mahomet afterwards gaue this commendation, That in the country of Peloponesus he had found many slaues, but neuer a man but him. This valiant Prince seeing the miserable ruine of his country, and the state thereof vtterly forlorne, after he had most notably endured a yeares siege in the castle of Salmenica, got to sea, and so arriued in Italie : where trauelling to Rome, hee was honorably receiued by Pius Secundus, then Bishop there : who during his life, allowed him a large pension for the maintenance of his state. Thus Mahomet hauing thrust both the Grecian Princes out of their dominions, and subdued all Peloponesus (excepting such strong townes and castles, as bordering vpon the sea coast were yet holden by the Venetians) left Zoganus Bassa his lieutenant to gouern that new conquered prouince, & with great triumph returned himselfe towards Constantinople, carrying away with him Demetrius the Prince, with his wife and daughter, & many other noble prisoners. But after he was come to Hadrianople, and placed in his royall seat, he remoued the Eunuch from the faire yong Lady, and tooke charge of her himselfe. As for Demetrius her father, hee gaue to him the citie Ænum, with the custome arising of the salt there made, as a pension for him to liue vpon. Thus this most famous and populous countrey of Peloponesus fel into the Turkish thraldome, about the yere of our Lord 1460, seuen yeres after after the taking of Constantinople. Which I haue here together set downe, as it is reported by them who liued in that time, and in the same countries: omitting of purpose other great occurrents of the same time (which shall in conuenient place be hereafter declared) to the intent that the fall of that great empire, with the common miserie of the delicate Grecians, might appeare vnder one view; which otherwise being deliuered by peece-meale, as it did concurre with other great accidents according to the course of the time, would but breed confusion, and require the Readers great attention.

The Christian Princes, especially such as bordered vpon the dominions of the Turkish tyrant, were no lesse terrified than troubled with the subuersion of the Constantinopolitan empire: for they saw by the continuall preparation of the Turke, that his ambitious desires were rather increased than in any part satisfied with so great & late victories. Wherfore they with all carefulnes fortified their frontier townes, and prouided all things necessary for defence of themselues, & for the repulsing of so mightie an enemie. Among the rest, George the old Despot, or Prince of Seruia (whose dominions of al other lay most in danger of that tempest) speedily mustred his men of war, fortified his strong cities, placed his garisons, & left nothing vndon that he thought needful for the defence of the country: for he had many times before to his great losse, indured the fury of the Turkish kings, although he were ioined to them in the bonds of neerest alliance. And hauing thus politickly set all things in order at home, in p rson himselfe tooke his iourney into Hungarie, from thence to procure aid against such time as he should haue need. But the Hungarians, & especially Huniades (who at that time bare greatest sway in that kingdom) hauing before had sufficient trial of the vncertainty & light faith of that aged Prince, who had so often fashioned himself according to the occurrents of the time, that he was counted neither right Turke nor good Christian: refused to promise him any aid, but left him to his own fortunes: wherwith he returned discontented, & ful of indignation. But shortly after he was come home, he died of a hurt receiued in a skirmish with Michael Zilagi, gouernor of Belgrade: whose brother Ladislaus he had but a little before trecherously murdered, as he was trauelling by wagon to Belgrade with his said brother Michael, who at the same time hardly escaped. This was the end of the Despot of Seruia, when he had liued 90 yeres: in which time of his long life, he had plentifully tasted of both fortunes. A man assuredly of great courage, but of a maruellous vnquiet nature: by profession a Christian, yet a great friend vnto the Turks, whom he many times stood in great stead: a deep dissembler, and double in all his dealings; wherby he purchased vnto himself that credit, that he was not of any his neighbor Princes whilest he liued, either beloued or trusted; & after his death, of his subiects so detested, that the people of that country euen at this day in their country songs, stil term him, the faithlesse & graceless Despot. Lazarus his yongest son, after his death succeeded in his place, hauing depriued both his elder brethren Stephen and George) of the gouernment: for Amurath the Turkish king had long time before put out their eys, of purpose to make them vnfit for the gouernment of so great a country: yet these blind princes found means to flie away from him to Mahomet, carrying with them a great masse of money; and so incited him against Lazarus their yonger brother, that to keep friendship with the tyrant, he was glad to promise vnto him a great yerely tribute, and so to become his tributarie. But within few months after, Lazarus died, the last Christian prince that raigned in Seruia: after whose death, great troubles arose in Seruia for the Soueraignetie: the blind brethren stil craning aid of Mahomet, with whom they then liued; & the desolate widow of Lazarus, putting her selfe with her three sons, Iohn, Peter, and Martin, into the protection of the Hungarians: by which meanes she with much trouble, held her state for a season. Vntill such time as that the Seruians, seeing small assurance in that manner of gouernment, and wearie of the harmes they daily receiued of the Turks; yeelded themselues with their country, vnto the obedience of the Turkish Emperour Mahomet, who for euer vnited the same vnto his empire as a prouince thereof, and so it remaineth at this day.

The death of George Despot of Seruia.

Seruia yeelded to the Turke.

Now was Mahomet by the continual course of his victories, grown to that height of mind, that he thought no prince able to abide his force; neither any enterprise so great, which he was not of power to bring to passe: wherfore hee ceased not on euery side continally to vex and trouble the Princes, whose countries bordered vpon his. But aboue others, his heart was greatest against the Hungarians: for that by them the Turkish Kings his ancestors, had been more troubled, & their state more endangered, than by any or al other the Christian princes. Wherfore

A fore he resolued now to take them in hand; which thing he had from the beginning of his raigne greatly desired. And because the citie of Belgrade standing vpon the great riuer of Danubius, was accounted the key of that country, he determined there to begin his wars; and by taking thereof to make an entrance into the heart of Hungarie. Hereupon he leuied a great armie of an hundred and fiftie thousand of his best souldiers; in whom he reposed such an assured trust and confidence, that he accounted the citie alreadie as good as taken, and a faire way made into Hungarie: so readie are we to promise vnto our selues, the things we earnestly desire. For the better accomplishment of these his designes, he had prouided in readinesse a fleet of 200 ships and galies, which he sent vp the riuer of Danubius from Vidina to Belgrade to the intent that no reliefe or aid should be brought vnto the city out of Hungarie, by the B great riuers of Danubius and Savus, whereupon the city of Belgrade standeth. With this fleet he kept both those riuers so straitly, that nothing could be possibly conueied into the citie by water: and not so contented, sent part of his said fleet farther vp the riuer of Danubius, and so landing his souldiers in many places, spoiled the countries all alongst the riuers side. Shortly after he came with all his forces by land, & encamped before the citie: whereunto at his first comming he gaue a most fierce assault, thinking to haue taken them vnprouided: but finding greater resistance than he had before imagined, & that the Hungarians were readie to skirmish with them without the wals, he begun to proceed more warily, & entrenched his armie: and to prouide for the saferie therof, by casting vp of deep trenches & strong rampiers against the sudden sallies of his enemies: & after, planting his batterie, began most furiously to shake the C wals with his great artillerie. By the fury wherof, he ouerthrew a part thereof, and laid it flat with the ground: which the defendants with great industrie and labour speedily repaired, by casting vp of new fortifications & rampiers, in such sort, that it was rather stronger than before Belgrade besieged.

In the mean time Huniades (not to be named without the addition of a most worthie captain) being then Generall for the Hungarians, sent a fleet of ships and gallies, well appointed with all warlike prouision, downe the riuer of Danubius from Buda: which encountring with the Turks fleet, tooke twentie saile of them, and so discomfited the rest, that they were glad to run themselues on ground neere vnto the Kings camp. All which were by Mahomets commandement presently set on fire, because they should not come into the power of the Hungarians. By this meanes the Christians became masters of both the riuers of Danubius and Savus; and D so at their pleasure, by water conueied into the citie all things needfull for the defence thereof. Huniades also himselfe, with fiue thousand valiant souldiers, and Io. Capistranus a Minorate Frier (by whose persuasion fortie thousand voluntary Christians out of Germanie, Bohemia, and Hungarie, were come to that warre) entered into the citie that way with their souldiers and followers.

The Turks fleet ouerthrowne by the Christians.

Mahomet resolutely set downe for the winning of the citie, had with continuall batterie made the same at length saultable; and so determined the next day to giue a generall assault, appointing which part of the wal euery Colonel with his regiment should assaile. But as they were with great dilligence and greater stir, preparing all things needfull for the next daies ser-E uice, it fortuned, that Carazias Bassa, Mahomets lieutenant general in Europe, and his best man of war, was by chance slaine with a great shot out of the towne. With whose death Mahomet was exceedingly troubled, as with an ominous token of the euill which afterwards ensued vnto him and his whole armie. For all that, prosecuting his former determination, the next day early in the morning hee commanded the assault to be giuen: & with the dreadfull sound of trumpets, drums, cornets, & other instruments of war, brought on his Ianizaries to the breach; who as couragious souldiers fiercely assailed the same, and without any great resistance, entered both there and in diuers other places of the citie; reckoning the same to be now their owne. For Huniades hauing before stored euery corner of the citie with his most valiant and expert souldiers, had taken order that the defendants, vpon the first charge of the Ianizaries, should forsake their stations, and as men discouraged, retire towards the citie, of purpose to draw the fierce enemies faster on, to their farther destruction; & vpon a signe giuen to set vpon them on fresh, & to repaire to their former places of defence; which was accordingly done: so that as soon as the Ianizaries, with other of the Turks most forward souldiers, were in great numbers entred, vpon the retiring of the defendants; & the signe before appointed in the city giuen, the defendants, as men quickly changd, turning again, fiercely charged the Turks which were entred;

The Turks notably repulst.

tred contrary to their expectation: and the valiant Huniades, at the same time issuing out on G euery side with his most resolute souldiers, so oppressed the Turks, that few of them that were entred escaped with life, but were there in the citie either slaine or taken prisoners; and the rest with exceeding slaughter beaten from the wals. Presently after, Huniades in this confusion of the Turks, strengthened with the souldiers which came with Capistranus the Friar, made a sallie out of the town, and set vpon the Turks appointed for the defence of the great ordnance; which was with such resolution performed, that the Turks were glad with great slaughter to forsake their charge, and to leaue the ordnance to their enemies.

The Turkish tyrant sore troubled and throughly chafed with the losse of his great ordnance, couragiously charged the Hungarians afresh, to haue recouered the same againe: but was so valiantly repulsed by Huniades, and so beaten with the murthering shot out of the citie, that he H was glad when he had got him out of the danger thereof into his trenches. Huniades also retiring turned the ordnance hee had lately won, vpon the Turks campe, and with the same did them no small harme.

In this hurle, a great part of the Ghristian armie (which then lay on the other side of Danubius) was speedily transported ouer the riuer; and making no stay in the citie, ioyned themselues with Huniades, then lying without the wals of the citie. Who notably strengthned with this new supplie, assailed the Turkes trenches, as if he would euen presently haue entred their campe: at which his presumption, the proud tyrant (neuer before so braued) disdaining, went out of his trenches, and valiantly encountering him, beat him backe againe to the great ordnance; from whence he was againe by the Christians driuen to his trenches. Which manner I of doubtfull and dreadfull fight, was on both sides notably maintained, vntill the day was almost spent: Victorie with indifferent wings, houering now ouer the one side, now ouer the other.

Mahomet wounded, and carried away for dead.

In these hot skirmishes and conflicts, Chasanes captaine of the Ianizaries, with many other valiant men were slaine. And Mahomet himselfe performing the part as well of a couragious souldier, as of a worthie chiefetaine, was sore wounded vnder his left pap; so that he was taken vp for dead, and so carried into his pauilion, to the great discomfiture of his whole army. But comming againe vnto himselfe, and considering that he had in that siege lost his whole fleet, his great ordnance, with most part of his best souldiers, and yet in no possibilitie of the towne: secretly in the night arose with his armie, and with great silence shamefully departed, K still looking behind him when the Hungarians should haue pursued him into Seruia, or haue troubled him vpon his way towards Constantinople. At this siege (beside many of his best captaines and chiefe commanders) were slaine fortie thousand of his best souldiers. The losse that hee there sustained was so great, and so stucke in his mind, that euer after during his life, when he had occasion to speake of that siege, he would shake his head and sigh deepely, and many times wish, That he had neuer seene that citie, whereat both he and his father had receiued so great dishonor. Many were of opinion, that if Huniades had there had his horsemen on that side of Danubius to haue presently pursued the fearefull enemie, that the whole army of the Turks might haue there bin ouerthrowne. This notable victorie was obtained against the Turke the sixth of Agust in the yeare of our Lord 1456.

The death of the most famous captaine Huniades.

Shortly after, this most valiant and renowned captain Huniades, worthie of immortal praise, L died of a hurt taken in these wars; or as some others write, of the plague, which was then rife in Hungarie: who when hee felt himselfe in danger of death, desired to receiue the sacrament before his departure, and would in any case (sicke as hee was) be carried to the Church to receiue the same; saying, That it is not fit, that the Lord should come to the house of his seruant, but the seruant rather to goe to the house of his Lord and master. He was the first Christian captain that shewed the Turks were to be ouercome; and obtained more great victories against them than any one of the Christian Princes before him. He was vnto that barbarous people a great terror, and with the spoile of them beautified his country: and now dying, was by the Hungarians honourably buried at Alba Iulia, in S. Stephens Church: his death beeing M greatly lamented of all good men of that age.

Mahomet the Turkish Emperour, no lesse desirous to extend his empire with the glorie of his name, by sea than by land; shortly after the taking of Constantinople, put a great fleet to sea, wherwith he surprised diuers Islands in the Ægeum, and hardly besieged the Citie of the Rhodes.

A Rhodes. At which time, Calixtus the third, then Bishop of Rome, aided by the Genowayes (for the grudge they bare against the Turks for the taking of Pera) put to sea a fleet of sixteen tall ships and gallies well appointed, vnder the conduct of Lodouicus, Patriarch of Aquilla; who with that fleet scoured the seas, & recouered again from the Turks the Iland of Lemnos, with diuers other smal Islands thereabout: and encountering with the Turks fleet neere vnto the Island of the Rhodes, at a place called the Burrow of S. Paul, discomfited them, sunke and tooke diuers of their gallies, and forced them to forsake the Rhodes. After which victorie at sea, he for the space of three yeares, with his gallies, at his pleasure spoyled the frontiers of the Turks dominions all alongst the sea coast of the lesser Asia, and wonderfully terrified the effeminate people of those countries: and so at length returned home, carrying away with B him many prisoners and much rich spoyle.

After that Mahomet was thus shamefully driuen from the siege of Belgrade, and his fleet at 1461 sea discomfited (as is before declared) he began with great diligence to make new preparation against the next Spring to subdue the Illes of the Ægeum, specially those which lay neere vnto Peloponesus. But while hee was busie in those cogitations, in the meane time embassadours from Vsun-Cassanes the great Persian King, arriued at Constantinople, with diuers rich presents sent to him from the said King. Where among other things, they presented vnto him a paire of playing tables, wherin the men & dice were of great and rich precious stones of inestimable worth, and the workmanship nothing inferiour to the matter: which the embassadors for ostentation said, That Vsun Cassanes found in the treasures of the Persian King, whom he had but a little before slain and bereft of his kingdome, and had there bin left long C before by the mightie conquerour Tamerlane. Together with these Presents, they deliuered their embassage, the effect whereof was, That those two mightie Princes might ioine & liue together in amitie: and that whereas Dauid the Emperor of Trapezond, had promised to pay vnto Mahomet a yerely tribute, enforced thereunto by George his lieutenant in Asia, he should not now looke for any such thing; forasmuch as that empire after the death of the Emperour then liuing, should of right belong vnto Vsun-Cassanes, in right of his wife, who was the daughter of Calo-Ioannes, the elder brother of Dauid the Emperor, then liuing: and further required him, from that time not to trouble or molest the said Emperor his friend & neere alliance, so should he find him his faithful & kind confederat: otherwise it was (as they said) in his choice D to draw vpon himself the heauie displeasure of a most mightie enemie. Mahomet before enuieing at the rising of the Persian King, and now disdaining such peremptorie requests, little differing from proud commands, in great choller dismissed the embassadors, with this short answer, That he would ere long be in Asia himselfe in person, to teach Vsun-Cassanes what to request of a greater than himselfe. This vnkindnes was the beginning & ground of the mortall wars which afterwards ensued betwixt these two, then the greatest princes of the East, as shall be hereafter more at large declared. The embassadors being departed, and Mahomets fleet of an hundred and fifty saile readie to put to sea, he altered his former determination for the Islands of the Ægeum (which after the losse of Constantinople had for the most part put themselues vnder the protection of the Venetians) and commanded his Admirall with that fleet to take his course through the straits of Bosphorus into the great Euxine sea, (now called the blacke sea) and so sailing along the coast to come to anker before Sinope, the chiefe citie of Paphlagonia, & there to expect his comming thither with his army by land. This great city of Sinope E stands pleasantly on a point of the main which runs a great way into the Euxine, sometime the metropolitical citie of that prouince: but as then, with Castamona and all the country thereabout, was vnder the gouernment of Ismael, a Mahometane prince: vpon whom Mahomet had now bent his forces, for no other cause than that he was in league with Vsun-Cassan, the Persian king. Now with great expedition had Mahomet leuied a strong army, and passing therewith ouer into Asia, was come before he was looked for, to Sinope. Ismael seeing himselfe so suddenly beset both by sea & land in his strongest citie, although he wanted nothing needful for his defence, hauing in the citie foure hundred peeces of great artillerie, and ten thousand soldiers: yet doubting to be able with that strength to indure the siege, offered to yeeld vp the citie to Mahomet, with all the rest of his dominion, vpon condition, That hee should freely giue him in lieu therof the city of Philippopolis in Thracia, with the country therto adioining. Of which his offer Mahomet accepted: and so taking possession of Sinope, with the strong citie of mona, and all the reſt of the Princes territorie, ſent him away with all his things to Philippopolis, as he had promiſed. This Iſmael was the laſt of the honourable houſe of the Iſfendiars, G who had long time raigned at Heraclea and Caſtamona in Pontus. From Sinope he marched on forward with his army to Trapezond. This famous citie ſtandeth alſo vpon the ſide of the Euxine or blacke ſea in the countrey of Pontus, where the Emperors of Conſtantinople had alwaies their deputies, whileſt that empire flouriſhed and commanded the Eaſt part of the world, as farre as Parthia: but after it began againe to decline (as all worldy things haue but their time) one Iſaac (whoſe father, Emperour of Conſtantinople, the Conſtantinopolitanes had for his euill gouernment ſlaine) flying to Trapezond, tooke vpon him the gouernment of that citie, with the countries of Pontus and Capadocia, and many other great prouinces, and H was at firſt called the King of Trapezond: but after he was well eſtabliſhed in that gouernement, both he and his ſucceſſors took vpon them the name and title of Emperors; which they maintained equally, if not better, than the late Conſtantinopolitan Emperours, and therefore are of moſt accounted for Emperors. He that then raigned, was called Dauid Comnenus: which moſt honourable family of the Comneni had long time before raigned in Conſtantinople; and out of the ſame were many other great Princes deſcended, which ruled in diuers places of Trapezond beſieged by Mahomet. Macedonia, Epirus, and Græcia. Mahomet comming to Trapezond, laied hard ſiege vnto the ſame by the ſpace of thirtie daies both by ſea and land, and burnt the ſuburbes thereof, as hee had before at Sinope. The fearfull Emperour diſmaied with the preſence of ſo mightie an enemie, and the ſight of ſo puiſſant an army, offered to yeeld vnto him the city with his whole empire, vpon condition, That he ſhould take his daughter to wife, and deliuer vnto him ſome I other prouince, which might yeeld him ſuch yearly profit as might ſuffice for the honorable maintenance of his ſtate. Mahomet perceiuing the weakeneſſe of his enemie by his large offers, refuſed to accept thereof, and attempted by force to haue taken the citie: which not forting to his deſire, the matter was againe brought to parle: where after long debating too and fro, it was at laſt agreed vpon, That the Emperour vpon the faith of the Turkiſh King for his ſafe returne, ſhould in perſon meet him without the citie, if happily ſo ſome good attonement might be made betwixt them. Whereupon the Emperour following the Turks faith before ſolemnly giuen for his ſafe returne, as was before agreed, went out of the citie to meet him, in hope to haue made ſome good agreement with him: but as ſoone as he was come out, Mahomet according to the damnable and helliſh doctrine of his falſe prophet (That faith is not to K be kept with Chriſtians) preſently cauſed the Emperour to be caſt into bonds, and ſo to bee detained as priſoner. Which when it was bruted in the citie, the citizens vtterly diſcouraged, Trapezond yeelded vnto the Turks. without farther reſiſtance yeelded themſelues with the citie into his power.
Castamona,

Mahomet now Lord of Trapezond, entring the citie, tooke priſoners the Emperors daughter, with all the reſt of his children and kindred, and all ſuch of the nobility as he found in the citie: whom hee cauſed forthwith, together with the Emperor, to be ſent by ſea as it were in triumph to Conſtantinople. Of the reſt of the citizens he choſe out ſo many as he pleaſed for his owne ſeruice, and appointed eight hundred of the Chriſtian children, in whom appeared moſt towardlineſſe, to be brought vp for Ianizaries, many alſo of the other citizens were ſent into captiuitie to Conſtantinople: the beautifull women and virgins he diuided amongſt his L friends and men of war, certain choſen paragons of whom, he ſent as preſents to his ſons. After he had thus taken his pleaſure in the citie, and left none there but the baſeſt of the people, hee put a ſtrong gariſon of his Ianizaries into the caſtle, & a great garriſon of common ſoldiers into the citie, appointing his Admirall to gouerne the ſame. The reſt of the Emperours ſtrong townes, diſcouraged with the taking of Trapezond, and the miſeries therof, in ſhort time ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Turkiſh thraldome, wherein they haue euer ſince moſt miſerably liued. So Mahomet in the ſpace of few months hauing reduced that empire into the forme of a prouince, returned in great triumph to Conſtantinople; when hee had in this expedition ſubdued Paphlagonia, Pontus, and a great part of Capadocia, with ſome other prouinces neere M vnto the Euxine ſea. When he was come to Conſtantinople, he ſent the Emperour with his children priſoners to Hadrianople. But afterwards, vnderſtanding that the Perſian Queene, the wife of Vſun Caſſan, ſought meanes to get ſome one of her vncles children, whom by the power of her husband ſhee might, if it were poſſibly aduance vnto her fathers empire: hee ſent for Dauid the wofull Emperour to Conſtantinople, and there cruelly cauſed him, with all

A all his ſonnes and kinſmen, to be put to death; and to the vttermoſt of his power rooted out al that moſt honourable familie of the Comneni, excepting George the Emperours youngeſt ſon, who at his firſt comming to Hadrianople turned Turke: whoſe ſiſter (the Emperours daughter) Mahomet afterwards tooke to be one of his concubines. This Chriſtian empire was by The ruine of the empire of Trapezond. the Turkiſh tyrant Mahomet thus miſerably ſubuerted and brought to nought in the yeare of our Lord 1461.

The yeare following, which was the yere 1462, Mahomet hauing intelligence, that Wladus Mahomet ſeeketh to entrap Wladus Prince of Valachia. Dracula Prince of Valachia, his tributary, was reſolued to caſt from him his obedience, and to B ioyne himſelfe vnto the Hungarians, his mortall enemies; thought it beſt to proue if he could by policy circumuent him, before he were altogether fallen from him. For which purpoſe he ſent Catabolinus his principall ſecretarie vnto him to bring him vnto the court, promiſing him greater fauors and promotions from the Emperor, than he had as yet at any time inioyed. And by the ſame truſtie meſſenger, he commanded Chamuzes Baſſa, Gouernor of Bidina and the countrey lying ouer againſt Valachia, on the other ſide of Danubius, to do his vttermoſt deuoir for the entrapping of Wladus: promiſing him great rewards if he could bring the matter to effect. Whereupon Chamuzes deuiſed with the ſecretarie, that when he had done his meſſage to the Prince, and with all his cunning perſuaded him to take that iourney vpon him, hee ſhould ſecretly before hand giue notice vnto him of the certain day of his returne back againe from the prince: at which time it was like, that Wladus would in courteſie of himſelf bring the ſecret arie wel on his way, being a man of ſo great account in the court, or at leſtwiſe not refuſe ſo to do, being therto requeſted by the ſecretary: at which time the Baſſa ſecretly paſſing ouer
C Danubius with certain troupes of horſemen, and lying cloſe in ambuſh vpon the way, ſhould ſuddenly ſet vpon the prince, & ſo either take him, or els kil him. The plot thus laid, and euery circumſtance agreed vpon, the ſecretarie held on his way; and comming to the prince, forced his wit to perſuade him to goe to the court: ſometime cunningly extolling the great opinion that Mahomet had of his fidelitie and valor; and otherwhiles feeding him with the hope of greater honors & princely preferments he was to receiue at the Emperors hands. But when he had ſaid what he could, he obtained no more of the wary prince, but good words againe, and that he would in courteſie conduct him on his way to the ſide of Danubius: wherof the ſecretarie by ſpeedy meſſengers gaue Chamuzes intelligence: who ſecretly paſſing ouer Danubius with certain troups of horſemen, and riding a good way into the country, lay in ambuſh vpon D the way wherby the prince & the ſecretarie muſt needs paſſe: according as was before appointed, the ſecretary accompanied with the prince, put himſelf vpon the way, and at the very prefixed time came to the place where Chamuzes lay in ambuſh with his horſmen: who ſuddenly ariſing, & on euery ſide aſſailing the prince, ſlew diuers of his men before they were well aware of his comming. But Wladus being a man of great courage, and better appointed than the Baſſa had ſuppoſed (for he went alwaies attended vpon with a ſtrong guard of valiant & ſtout men) ſo receiued Chamuzes & his Turkes, that he ſlew many of them, & at length after a hard conflict took him with the reſt priſoners: whoſe hands and feet he cauſed to be cut off, & their Chamuzes Baſſa and the Turkiſh ſecretary beaded. bodies afterwards to be thruſt vpon ſharpe ſtakes ſet faſt in the ground, to the terror of all that E ſaw them: and did the Baſſa ſo much honour, as to hang him and the ſecretarie vpon a gibbet a great deale higher than the other Turks. And not ſatisfied with this reuenge, preſently gathred his forces, & paſſing ouer Danubius into the Turkes dominions, burnt all the country before him along the ſea ſide, killing man, woman, & child, without mercy: after which great ſpoile and ſlaughter made, he returned again to Valachia. The report of this news being brought to Mahomet, ſet him in ſuch a choler & rage, that he commanded the great Baſſa Mahomets, which firſt told him therof, to be cruelly whipt: which ſeruile puniſhment in that tyrannical gouernment hath vſully bin inflicted euen vpon the greateſt princes of the court, vpon the leaſt diſpleaſure of the tyrants, eſpecially if they be not naturall Turks borne; accounting the reſt in their anger but as their baſe & contemptible ſlaues, as wel appeareth by the woful end of ma-F ny, euen of the greateſt of them. But when he vnderſtood by moſt ſure aduertiſements that all was as the Baſſa had before reported, or rather worſe, it is not to be in words expreſſed into what a rage he fell: the ſpoile of his country grieued him much, but the ſhameful death of the ſecretary his embaſſador, and of Chamuzes the Baſſa, tormented his heart, and filled him with indignation & deſire of reuenge. Wherefore with all ſpeed poſſible he aſſembled his ſoldiers and men of war, out of all parts of his dominions to Philippopolis: and had in short time raised such an armie, as the like he had not at any time imploied since the winning of Constantinople. At the same time also, he sent his Admiral with 25 gallies, and 150 saile of other small vessels by the Euxine, to enter the riuer Danubius, and there landing his men, to ioyne his forces with the Prince of Podolia: who for a grudge he bare against Wladus, had promised to aid the Turke against him. When all things were now in readinesse, he marched with his army from Philippopolis, and passing ouer Danubius, entered into Valachia; before which time, the Admirall had landed his men, and with the helpe of the Podolian, had burnt the Citie of Prailaba, the greatest Towne of trade in all Valachia; and was besieging Cebium, called in antient time Lycostomos: where after they had lien a while and receiued some losse, they left the siege and departed, the Podolian backe again into his country, and the Admirall to his fleet.

Mahomet himselfe in person inuadeth Valachia.

Mahomet being got ouer Danubius, burnt the villages, draue away the cattell, and made hauocke of all that came in his way. As for prisoners, he tooke but few; for the Valachies before his comming, had retired their wiues and children, and all that were vnfit for wars, either into their strong cities, or into the refuge of great and thicke woods (whereof there is in that countrey plentie) or else into the high and rough mountaines where they were in more safety than in any their strongest holds: and all such as were able to beare armes, followed the Prince, who euer kept the woods and mountaines, still following the Turkes armie so neere as he possibly could with safety; and many times cut off such as straggled any thing far abroad from the armie, into the country: yet neuer durst shew himselfe in plaine field, being indeed but a handfull, in comparison of the Turks multitude. Mahomet to small purpose roaming vp and downe the country at his pleasure, staid neuer long in one place; and making no reckoning of such a weake enemie as durst neuer shew himselfe, pitcht his tents still in the open plaines, and so lay with his armie in great securitie, not entrenched at all. Wladus by his espials vnderstanding of this the manner of Mahomets encamping, came in the dead time of the night, and with al his power furiously assailed that quarter of the Turks camp where the Asian souldiers lay, & slew many of them in their tents; the rest terrified with the suddennesse of the alarum, fled out of their tents for refuge vnto the European souldiers: the prince following them at the heeles, and entring into that quarter of the campe also, did there great harme, and struck such a generall terror & feare into all the Turks army, that they were euen vpon the point to haue wholly forsaken their tents and betaken themselues to flight. Yea Mahomet himselfe, dismaid with the terrour of the night and tumult of his campe, and fearing lest the Hungarians had ioyned their forces with the prince; not knowing which way to turn himselfe, had vndoubtedly fled, had not Mahomet Bassa a man of great experience in martial affaires, perswaded him otherwise, and by generall proclamation made thorow the campe, That no man should vpon paine of death, forsake the place wherein he was encamped, staid the flight; and with much adoo enforced them to make head against the prince. Wladus perceiuing the Turks now to begin to stand vpon their guard, and to make resistance; after great slaughter made, returning, tooke the spoile of the tents forsaken by the Asian souldiers, and vpon the approch of the day, againe retired with victorie into the woods. As soone as it was day, Mahomet appointed Haly-Beg with certain companies of select souldiers, to pursue the Valachies: who ouertaking part of the Princes army, tooke a thousand of them prisoners, and put the rest to flight: all which prisoners were by the tyrants command, presently put to the sword. From that time Mahomet euerie night entrenched his armie, and caused better watch and ward to bee kept in euery quarter of his campe, than before.

A most horrible spectacle.

As he marched along the country, he came to the place where the Bassa and the Secretary were hanging vpon two high gibbers, and the dismembred Turks impailed vpon stakes about them: with which sight he was grieuously offended. And passing on farther, came to a plaine containing in breadth almost a mile, & in length two miles, set ful of gallows, gibbets, wheles, stakes, and other instruments of terror, death, and torture; all hanging full of the dead carkases of men, women, and children, thereupon executed, in number (as was deemed) about twentie thousand. There was to be seene the father, with his wife, children, & whole family, hanging together vpon one gallowes; and the bodies of sucking babes, sticking vpon sharpe stakes; others withal their limbs broken vpon wheeles, with many other strange & horrible kinds of death, death: so that a man would haue thought, that all the torments the Poets feigne to be in hell had beene there put in execution. All these were such as the notable, but cruell prince, iealous of his estate, had either for iust desert, or some probable suspition, put to death; and with their goods rewarded his souldiers: whose cruell manner was, together with the offender to execute the whole familie, yea sometimes the whole kindred. Mahomet, although he was by nature of a fierce and cruell disposition, wondred to see so strange a spectacle of extreme cruelties: yet said no more but that Wladus knew how to haue his subiects at command. After that, Mahomet sent Iosephus, one of his great captaines, to skirmish with the Valachies; who was by them put to the worse: but by the comming in of Omares the sonne of Turachan, they were again in a great skirmish ouerthrowne, and two thousand of their heads brought by the Turks vpon their launces into the Kings campe: for which good seruice Omares was by the King preferred to be Gouernour of Thessalia.

Two thousand of the Valachies slaine.

When Mahomet had thus traced Valachia, and hauing done what harme hee could, saw it to be to no purpose, with such a multitude of men to hunt after his flying enemie, which stil kept the thicke woods or rough mountaines: he returned againe to Constantinople, leauing behind him Haly-beg with part of his armie, to prosecute that warre; and with him Dracula the younger brother of Wladus, who was also called Wladus, as a stale to draw the Valachies into rebellion against the Prince. This Dracula the younger, was of a little youth brought vp in Mahomets court, and for his comely feature of him most passionatly affected: which inordinat perturbation, so preuailed in the intemperat nature of the lasciuious prince, that he sought first by faire words and great gifts to corrupt the youth, and not so preuailing, attempred at last to haue forced him: wherewith the noble youth being enraged, drew his rapier, and striking at him to haue slain him, grieuously wounded him in the thigh, and thereupon fled. Neuertheless being drawne back againe to the court, and pardoned, he was afterwards reconciled to the King, and so became his Ganimede; and was of him long time wonderfully both beloued and honoured, and now set vp for a stale (as is before said) for the Valachies his countreymen to gase vpon.

It fortuned, that after the departure of the King, diuers Valachies came to Haly-beg the Turkish Generall, to ransome such friends of theirs as had bin taken prisoners in those wars, and were yet by him detained: to whom the younger Dracula by way of discourse declaring the great power of the Turkish Emperour, and as it were lamenting the manifold and endlesse miseries of his natiue country; cunningly imputed the same vnto the disordered gouernment of his cruell brother, as the ground of all their woes: assuring them of most happie and speedie redresse, if the Valachies, forsaking his fierce brother, would cleaue vnto him as their Soueraigne, in speciall fauor with the great Emperour. Which speech he deliuered vnto them with such liuely reasons, and in such effectuall tearmes, that they there present, perswaded by him, and others by them, in short time all, as if it had been by a secret consent, forsooke Wladus the elder brother, and chose Dracula the younger brother to be their prince and soueraigne. Who ioyning vnto him the Turks forces, by the consent of Mahomet tooke vpon him the gouernement of that warlike countrey and people; yet holding the same as the Turkish tyrants vsuall, the readiest way to infidelitie. Wladus seeing himselfe thus forsaken of all his subiects, and his yonger brother possessed of his dominion, fled into Transiluania, where he was by the appointment of the Hungarian King, apprehended and laid fast in strait prison at Belgrade, for that he had without iust cause (as it was laid to his charge) most cruelly executed diuers Hungarians in Valachia: yet such was his fortune, after ten yeres hard imprisonment, to be againe enlarged, and honourably to die in battaile against his antient enemies the Turks.

The death of Wladus.

Mahomet returning out of Valachia to Constantinople, sent the same fleet which hee had vsed in his late warres, into the Ægeum, to take in such Ilands as being before vnder the Constantinopolitan empire, had vpon the losse of the citie put themselues vnder the protection of the Venetians; but especially the Isle of Mitylene, called in antient time Lesbos: pretending that Nicholaus Catelusius prince thereof, did harbour the pyrats of Italy, and other places; and also bought of them such prisoners, and other bootie, as they continually tooke from the Turkes at sea, or alongst the sea coast, out of many places of his dominions: pretending also the chastising of the sayd prince, for that he had by treacherie slaine his eldest brother, and so vniustly taken vpon him the gouernment. His fleet thus set forward, hee himselfe with a small small armie passed ouer into Asia, and came by land to Possidium a citie of Ionia ouer against G Mitylene. From whence he embarked himselfe ouer the narrow strait into the Island, where after he had once landed his armie, he in short time ouerran the whole Island, and miserably spoiled the same, leading away all the inhabitants thereof into captiuitie; who shortly after were sold at Constantinople like flocks of sheepe, and from thence dispersed into all parts of his dominions. After he had thus harried the countrie, and left nothing therein vnspoiled, he Mitylene besieged. besieged the Prince in the citie of Mitylene, whereof the Island now taketh name: and with his great ordnance continually battered the same by the space of 27 dayes (in which time ma-Mitylene yeelded to the Turke. ny sharpe assaults were also giuen by the Turks, whereby the defendants were greatly diminished and wasted. The Prince perceiuing himselfe notable long to hold out, offered to yeeld H vp the citie, with all the strong holds in the Isle, vpon condition that Mahomet should therefore giue vnto him some other prouince, of like value to the Island: which his offer Mahomet accepted, and by solemne oath bound himselfe for performance of that hee had promised.

Whereupon the Prince came out of the citie, and humbled himselfe before him, excusing himselfe for the receiuing of the men of war (wherewith he was charged) as done for no other purpose, but that they should forbeare to spoile his owne country, much subiect to their fury: vtterly denying that hee had at any time bought, or shared, any part of such prizes as had by those pirats by sea or land bin taken from the Turks. With which his excuse, Mahomet seemed to be reasonably well contented, and with good words cheered him vp: neuertheless as soon as the citie, with all the other strong holds in the Isle, were by the Princes meanes deliuered I into his hands, he no longer made reckoning of his Turkish faith, but cruelly caused many of the chiefe citizens of Mitylene to be put to death; and three hundred pirats, whom he found in the citie, to be cut in two peeces in the middle, so to die with more paine. And when he had placed conuenient garrisons in euery strong hold in the Isle, hee returned to Constantinople, carrying away with him the Prince, and all the better sort of the inhabitants of Mitylene, that were left aliue, together with all the wealth of that most rich and pleasant Island, leauing it almost desolate, none remaining therein more than his owne garrisons, with a few of the poorest and basest people. Mahomet after he was arriued at Constantinople, cast the Prince Ni- cholaus, with Lucius his cosin (whose helpe he had before vsed in killing of his elder brother) into close prison: where they seeing themselues euery houre in danger of their liues, to winne K fauour in the tyrants sight, wickedly offered to renounce the Christian Religion, and to turn Turke. Which Mahomet vnderstanding, caused them both to be richly apparelled, and with great triumph to be circumcised, and presently set at libertie: yet still bearing in mind his old grudge, he shortly after, when they least feared any such matter, clapt them both fast againe in prison, and there caused them to bee most cruelly put to death. A iust reward for the bloudie murtherers, and Apostacie, who to gaine a little longer life, were content to forsake God.

1464 Shortly after it fortuned, that Stephen King of Bosna (in antient time called Mæsia Superior) who supported by the Turkish Emperor, had wrongfully obtained that kingdome against his owne brethren, refused now to pay such yearely tribute as hee had before promised: for L which cause Mahomet with a strong armie entered into Bosna, and laied siege vnto the city of Dorobiza: which when hee had with much adoe taken, he diuided the people thereof into three parts; one part whereof he gaue as slaues vnto his men of war, another part he sent vnto Constantinople, and the third he left to inhabit the citie. From Dorobiza hee marched to Iaziga, now called Iaica, the chiefe citie of that kingdome, which after foure moneths siege was deliuered vnto him by composition: in this citie he took the Kings brother and sister prisoners, with most of the nobilitie of that kingdome, whom he sent as it were in triumph vnto Constantinople. The other lesser cities of Bosna following the example of the greater, yeelded themselues also. But Mahomet vnderstanding that the King of Bosna had retired himselfe into the farthest part of his kingdom, sent Mahometes his chiefe Bassa with his Europeian soldiers to pursue him: wherin the Bassa vsed such diligence, that he had on euery side so inclosed him M before he was aware, that hee could by no meanes escape, which was before thought a thing impossible. So the King for safegard of his life was faine to take the citie of Clyssa for his refuge: where he was so hardly laid to by the Bassa, that seeing no other remedie, he offered to yeeld himself vpon the Bassaes faithful promise by oath confirmed, that he should be honorably

A bly vsed, and not to receiue in his person any harme from the Turkish Emperor. Whereupon the Bassaes oath to the same purpose was with great solemnitie taken; and for the more assurance conceiued in writing, firmed by the Bassa, and so deliuered to the king: which done, the king came out of the citie and yeelded himselfe. The Bassa hauing thus taken the king prisoner, carried him about with him from place to place, & from citie to city, vntill he had taken possession of all the kingdome of Bosna; and so returning vnto his master, presented vnto him the captiue king: who was not a little offended with him, for that he had vnto him so far engaged his Turkish faith. But when the poore King thought to haue departed, not greatly fearing further harm, he was suddenly sent for by Mahomet: at which time, he doubting the worst, caried with him in his hand the writing wherin the Bassaes oath for his safety was comprised: B neuertheless, the faithlesse tyrant without any regard therof, or of his faith therin giuen, caused him presently to be most cruelly put to death, or as some write, to be slaine quicke. Thus was the Christian kingdome of Bosna, subuerted by Mahomet in the yere 1464: who after he had at his pleasure disposed thereof, & reduced it to the forme of a prouince, to bee (as it is at this day) gouerned by one of his Bassaes; in great triumph returned to Constantinople, carriing away with him many a woful Christian captiue, and the whole wealth of that kingdom.

Mahomet following the example of his father Amurath, had from the beginning of his raigne by one or other of his great Bassaes or expert captains still maintained wars against Scanderbeg the most valiant and fortunat King of Epirus: the greatest part wherof, although it did in the course of time concurre with the things before declared, and might by peecemeale haue bin C amongst the same in their due time and place inserted; yet I haue of purpose for diuers reasons wholly reserued them for this place: first, for that I would not interrupt the course of the historie before rehearsed, with the particular accidents of this war: And then, for that the greatest heat of this hereditarie war, deliuered as it were from hand to hand, from the father to the son, hapned not long after this time; when as Mahomet hauing conquered the kingdom of Bosna, had surrounded a great part of Scanderbegs dominion: wherein I had respect also vnto the Readers ease, who may with greater pleasure and content, and lesse paines also, view the same together, than if it had bin dispersedly scattered & intermedled with the other greater occurrents of the same time. In which discourse I will but briefly touch many things wel worthie of a larger treatise. And if forgetting my selfe, I shall in some places happen to stay D something longer than the Readers hast would require, yet I hope, that the zeale and loue he beares vnto the worthy memorie of most famous Christian Princes, together with the short-nesse of the historie, in comparison of that which is therof written in iust volumes by others, shall easily excuse a larger discourse than this: But againe to our purpose.

Mahomet in the beginning of his raigne sent embassadors to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, so that he would grant to pay vnto him such yearely tribute as his father Amurath had in his life time demanded. Which embassage the craftie tyrant sent rather to proue what confidence Scanderbeg had in himselfe, than for any hope he had to haue his demand granted. This dishonorable offered peace Scanderbeg scornfully reiected, and so returned the embassadors as they came: and presently vpon their departure entered with his horsemen into that part of the E Turks dominion which bordereth vpon Epirus: and when he had wasted the country, returned home laded with the spoile thereof. In reuenge of which despight, Mahomet shortly after sent Amesa one of his best men of war, with 12000 horsemen into Epirus, to requite Scander- beg with the like spoile of his people and country. But Scanderbeg vnderstanding by his espials of the Turks comming, lay close in ambush with 6000 souldiers vpon the great mountaine Modrissa, ouer which the Turks must of necessitie take their way: and as they were about by night to haue passed ouer that rough and steepe mountaine, and were with much difficulty almost got vp to the top thereof, they were suddenly charged by Scanderbeg his footmen, who hauing the aduantage of the place, made great slaughter of the Turks, & draue them down the mountaine amaine; at which time their horses stood them in no stead at all, but were rather F vnto them an hinderance in that vneuen and troublesome ground. Now when the Turks were come to the foot of the mountaine, they were in that great feare and disorder againe fiercely assailed on the one side by Scanderbeg, & on the other side by his nephew, called also Amesa, who before the Turks comming had placed themselues with their horsmen in places of most aduantage: so that the Turkes hardly beset and forced on euery side, were in short time ouer-throwne

The great wars betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, are at large written by Marinus Barletius, in 13. Bookes, De vita, & gestis Scanderbegi. from whence this historie is taken: & were done betwixt the yeres 1450. and 1467 throwne and put to flight. In this conflict seuen thousand of the Turks were slaine, and Ameſa Generall of the Turks armie with diuers other captains taken, whom Scanderbeg sent prisoners to Croia. For ioy of this victorie at Scanderbegs returne, great triumph and feasting was made at Croia: during which time, Scanderbeg caused Ameſa the Turke, with the rest of the Turkish captains, to be enlarged, to be partakers of that ioy, wherof they against their wils had giuen the occasion; and afterwards vsed them with all kinde of courtesie during the time of their abode. This Ameſa requested of Scanderbeg, that he might send a messenger to Constantinople, to certifie Mahomet how the case stood with him and the rest, whom happily he might thinke to haue bin slaine in the battell; and to procure from him their ransom. Which his request Scanderbeg easily granted, and set downe their ransome at thirteen thousand duckats. The newes of this ouerthrow sore greeued the Turkish tyrant, but afterwards when he saw the remainder of his army without their Generall & leaders, hauing for most part lost their ensignes and armour, and also the messenger that was sent from Ameſa; he fell into such a rage, that he denied to giue any thing at all for his ransome: imputing all the losse to his treacherie, follie, or cowardise. Howbeit he was afterwards perswaded by his Bassaes and other great courtiers, Ameſa his friends, to thinke better of the Generall, of whose faithfulnesse and valour he had of long time had great experience, and also to send his ransome: by denying whereof, he should (as they said) discourage his other Generals and captains, who by chance of war might hap to fall into the like danger. By whose persuasion Mahomet sent an embassador to Scanderbeg, with the ransome demanded, and other great presents also. Vpon receit whereof, Ameſa with the other captaines were set at libertie, and sent with safe conuoy out of Epirus. All the mony sent for the Turks ransome, Scanderbeg diuided amongst his captaines and souldiers.

This late receiued ouerthrow filled the proud tyrant with desire of reuenge, so that he determined forthwith to send another armie into Epirus: the leading whereof, diuers of his great and most expert captaines ambitiously sought for. For Mahomet had promised great rewards and most honorable preferments to him whose hap it should be to vanquish Scanderbeg. Among the rest, one Debreas (a man for his forwardnesse & courage, in great fauor with his soueraigne) by great suit obtained to haue that charge: promising with exceeding confidencie vnto Mahomet, to make a beginning of better successe in his wars of Epirus, than others thither by him before sent: for the accomplishment whereof, he required to haue no greater power than was sent the yere before. But after that Ameſa was returned to the court, & had with long discourse set forth the vertues and valour of Scanderbeg, with the inuincible courage of his souldiers, Debreas became more temperate in his speech, and was contented to receiue a new supplie; so that he had vnder his charge fourteene thousand souldiers: with which armie he marched towards Epirus, and was come to a place called Pologus, where he lay with his army encamped in a plaine in great securitie, fearing no danger, for that he was not as yet in the enemies country, neither as he supposed, neere the enemie. Of all this preparation, and of the coming of Debreas, Scanderbeg had intelligence: and being resolued not to expect the comming of the Turks into Epirus, made choice of six thousand of his best horsemen; with whom he marched with as much speed as was possible into the enemies country, and came by night vnto the plaine where the Turks lay, hoping to haue bin vpon them before they were aware, and so to haue ouerthrowne them; wherein he was much deceiued: for by the light of the Moone (which then shined all night) he was by the Turks in time descried, yet the suddennes of his approch with the strangenesse of the attempt, exceedingly dismaied the whole army of the Turks. But Debreas mindfull of the promise he had made vnto his Lord and master, with cheerfull words encouraged his souldiers, and presently sent out certain troops of light horsemen, to receiue the first charge of the enemie, vntill he might set his whole armie in order of battell. Betwixt these troops, and others sent out by Scanderbeg, began a sharpe skirmish; both the armies standing fast, as beholders, carefully expecting the euent thereof. But Scanderbeg doubting, that if his souldiers should in his first encounter be put to the worst, it might tend to the great discouraging of the rest of his armie; seconded his men with other fresh troops vnder the leading of Moſes and Ameſa: by whose comming in, the Turks were forthwith beaten back, and chased euen to their maine battell. In the heat of which chase, Moſes forgetting himselfe, had with great danger in following on too fast, bin inclosed by the Turks, had not his furie bin in good time staid by Ameſa: for which ouersight, he was afterward blamed by Scanderbeg, derbeg, that he could not with greater moderation vse his good fortune, commending such forwardnesse in a priuat souldier, but not in so great a commander. When Moſes and Ameſa had thus put the Turks to flight, Scanderbeg brought on his whole armie, and fiercely assailed the Turks, yet troubled with the discomfiture of their fellowes. Debreas on the other side, with cheerfull speech, & his own valor, so encouraged his soldiers, that Scanderbeg was there notably resisted, and his fortune as it were at a stand: vntill that Muſachius, with certain troupes of resolute men, drawne out of the left wing of Scanderbegs armie, gaue such a fierce charge vpon the side of the Turks armie, that he brake their rankes, and sore disordered that part of the armie: which when Debreas perceiued, he withdrew himselfe out of the front of the battell wherin he had valiantly stood against Scanderbeg, and came to the place where Muſachius had disordered the battell, and with such courage cheared vp his troubled soldiers, that his onely presence and valour seemed to be the very life and heart of his whole armie. Whilest Debreas was thus busied against Muſachius, Scanderbeg in the mean time with might and main stil charged the front of the enemies armie: who now in the absence of the Generall began to loose their order & to giue ground, making no such resistance as before. At which time, Moſes forcibly breaking into the thickest of them, tooke one of their ensignes, which hee threw backe among his followers: wherwith they encouraged, so pressed vpon their enemies, without regard of danger, that the Turks being therewith discouraged, and their battell disordred, were almost ready to turne their backs and to flie. Debreas seeing all in danger to be lost, hasted with all speed vnto the place where he saw most perill, and did what was possible to haue restored the battell, and encouraged his soldiers: where pressing in among the formost, he was by Scanderbeg himselfe encountered hand to hand, and so by him slaine: with whose fall the whole armie discouraged, without further resistance fled. Moſes pursuing them on the one side, and Muſachius on the other, with furious hand slew more in that chase than were slaine in the battell. Of the Turks were slaine in this battell 4120, and some prisoners taken, but of the Christians few or none: so that for the good fortune thereof, Scanderbeg accounted it a victory giuen. All the spoile taken from the enemie, together with the prisoners, was by Scanderbeg equally diuided among the soldiers. Vnto Moſes he gaue Debreas his horse and armor: and vnto Muſachius a prisoner, which by his port and behauiour seemed to bee a man of some account. This Turke agreed with Muſachius vpon a ransome of 200 duckats, and presently vpon agreement made, drew forth the mony out of a little bag which he had kept secretly about him, and offered it to Muſachius for his ransom: who receiuing the mony, told the Turke, that he must prouide another ransome, forasmuch as that mony was his owne before by law of armes, as taken with his person. The Turke on the other side alledged for himselfe, the agreement alreadie made, with the paiment of the full sum agreed vpon. This controuersie was brought before Scanderbeg: who with great pleasure heard them both what they could say: Muſachius laying in hard for another ransome, and the Turke for his liberty vrging the agreement. Who when they had both said what they could for themselues, Scanderbeg smiling, told them, that they both contended for that which was in right his, and neither of theirs: for the prisoner with the mony were both mine (said he) at the first taking of him, since which time I haue giuen to you Muſachius the prisoner, which I knew, but not the mony which I knew not of: neither doth the concealing thereof make it yours (said he to the Turke) who had by law of arms lost your selfe, together with al that you had about you. After he had thus pleasantly discoursed of the matter, and brought them both in doubt, he awarded to Muſachius the mony he agreed for, & to the Turke his desired liberty: who glad thereof, and hauing also receiued his horse and armor of the gift of Scanderbeg, departed, speaking all the honor he could of so noble a conqueror. After this victorie Scanderbeg with great triumph returned againe to Croia.

When Mahomet vnderstood that Debreas was slaine, and his armie ouerthrowne, he became exceeding melancholie: but after he saw so many of his soldiers returned as had bin sufficient to haue restored a lost battell, he was so highly displeased with that cowardise, as that he could not endure the sight of them. The death of Debreas greeued none more than the King himselfe: for the captains generally either enuied at his hardinesse, or els hated his insolencie. Ameſa among the rest tooke no small pleasure, that his proud successour had taken part of his euill fortune, and so in part eased his former infamie. The great Bassaes and men of war seeing their soueraigne so desirous of reuenge, offered to spend their liues in that seruice: whose forwardnesse wardneſſe he ſeemed not to refuſe: howbeit he had in his mind already plotted another manner of reuenge. Hee was not ignorant, what great matters his father Amurath had brought to paſſe, by ſowing diſcord among the Princes of Græcia: which foule practiſe he purpoſed now to put in practiſe himſelfe. There were at that time many famous chiefetaines in Epirus, of Scanderbeg both beloued and truſted; among whom, he was in hope to find ſome one who for deſire of wealth or promotion, might be allured to giue ſome deſperat attempt againſt the life or ſtate of Scanderbeg. Of all others, Moſes Golemus of Dibra (a man honorably deſcended) was moſt inward with Scanderbeg, and for his proweſſe and experience in martiall affaires, of all men accounted the beſt captaine in all Epirus, next vnto Scanderbeg himſelfe: him, the craftie tyrant moſt deſired to alienate from Scanderbeg, as one fitteſt to ſerue his purpoſe, and eaſieſt without ſuſpition to be dealt withall, becauſe he commonly lay with a ſtrong garriſon in Dibra, vpon the very frontiers of Epirus. Wherefore he directed his letters vnto the Gouernor of Sfetigrade, commanding him by al means he could poſſibly deuiſe to withdraw Moſes from Scanderbeg; and not to ſpare for any gold or golden promiſes whereby to allure him: promiſing alſo vnto the Gouernor himſelfe great preferments, if he could win him. Vpon receit of which letters, the Gouernor began forthwith carefully to deuiſe, how he might beſt attempt the matter he had in charge: where after many deuiſes, he at laſt thought vpon a ſhrewd-headed fellow, one of the Chriſtians which dwelt in Sfetigrade; whom for that he was a Chriſtian, hee might without ſuſpect vſe as an inſtrument in ſo dangerous and important an action. This Chriſtian the Gouernor called vnto him, and after he had with great gifts and large promiſes won him to vndertake the matter, he ſent him away, fully before armed with plenteous inſtructions, full of treaſon and deceit. When this ſubtill meſſenger was come vnto Moſes, and vnder pretence of great and ſecret matters of importance, had obtained to ſpeake with him in priuat; he after ſome diſcourſe had of matters well worth the hearing, began at length vnder the couert of faire glozing words, to vtter his poyſon: ſhewing vnto him (as a meſſengr from the Gouernor) the great and good opinion the Turkiſh Emperor had of long time conceiued of his valor and proweſſe: for which cauſe his heroicall nature could not but honor him, although he were his enemie; and therewith alſo maruell, that hee being a man of that worth, could be contented to be commanded by Scanderbeg, whoſe ſtate was by him chiefly vpholden: wheras if he would do wiſely, and changing his affection, follow Mahomet, an Emperor of greateſt magnificence and power, he ſhould quickly in his court find ſuch honorable entertainment, as were to be preferred before the ſtate of Scanderbeg: or if the ſoueraigntie of Epirus his natiue country did better pleaſe him, he might eaſily be therunto aduanced, by ioining his owne endeuor vnto Mahomets great power. It pleaſed Moſes well to heare his owne praiſes (a thing incident vnto hautie minds) and he liked well that he was ſo fauoured of the Turkiſh Emperor: but the hope of the kingdome of Epirus, began to worke in him new conceits, and moued him more than all the reſt. Such is the force of ambitious thoughts, that they make a man forget all things, ſaue themſelues: ſo glorious a thing it is, to ſtand in the higheſt place: for all that, Moſes neither in word or countenance made any ſemblant of liking, or diſliking the meſſage. Which the wily meſſenger taking for a ſecret conſent, and heartily glad that he had bin ſo well heard; not deſiring as then any further anſwer, craued leaue to depart; promiſing in ſhort time to returne to him againe. After the departure of this meſſenger, many troubled thoughts began to ariſe in the mind of Moſes: his mirth was changed into melancholy, & the cheerfulneſſe of his countenance was abated; his hautie thoughts were his ſolitarie companions, and the imagined kingdome the Idol he in ſecret worſhipped; ſo that in ſhort time, he ſeemed to the wiſer ſort as a man altogether metamorphoſed. Some were ſo bold, as for to aske the cauſe of the meſſengers comming: vnto whom he anſwered, That he was one, from whom he receiued intelligence of matters concerning the good of the ſtate: which his anſwer was holden for true; for who durſt once miſtruſt Moſes? Whilſt he thus was toſſed vp and downe with his owne thoughts, as a ſhip with the billowes of a wrought ſea, the ſame ſlie meſſenger, according to his promiſe came againe; and for his more credit, in ſecret brought with him ſuch preſents as well might ſeeme to haue bin ſent from the Great Turke; with his meſſage better framed than before. Of all which that was ſent, Moſes is reported to haue receiued nothing but the worſt, which was, the very treaſon it ſelfe. And ſo returned the meſſenger, with anſwer, that he could not but in good part accept of the Turkiſh Emperors great fauors; and for

A for the reſt of his requeſts, whatſoeuer he ſhould chance to doe therein, he ſhould not from thenceforth find him any great enemie: commanding the meſſenger at his departure, no more to repaire vnto him about that matter, for feare of ſuſpition.

After that, it chanced that Scanderbeg came into Dibra, to ſee how all things ſtood there, and to conſult with Moſes for the beſieging of Sfetigrade; which citie it grieued him to ſee in the poſſeſſion of the Turks. Moſes to auert Scanderbeg from that enterpriſe, wherein he muſt of force be driuen to ſhew himſelfe, told him, That he vnderſtood of late by a certaine meſſenger which came to him out of Sfetigrade, that the citie was ſo well ſtored by the Turks, of all things neceſſarie for the defence thereof, that it were but loſt labor to attempt any thing againſt the ſame: wherefore hee aduiſed him rather to beſiege Belgrade (not that Belgrade B which is ſcituated vpon the riuer of Danubius, but another of the ſame name) in the confines of Epirus, then holden by the Turks, but diſtant from Sfetigrade about an hundred and fortie miles; of the taking whereof, there ſeemed to be more hope. By this perſuaſion, Scanderbeg reſolued with himſelfe to make prouiſion for the beſieging of Belgrade. And foraſmuch as his ſouldiers of Epirus alwaies vſed to the field, were not ſo fit for the beſieging of townes, he thought it good to pray aid out of Italy, from his old friend Alphonſus King of Naples, with whom he had beene of long time acquainted, and vnto him much beholden. Wherefore he ſent two of his noblemen embaſſadors vnto him, with certaine rich Preſents, and familiar letters of this purport.

Scanderbeg ſendeth to Alphonſus King of Naples.

Our ſouldiers of Epirus, know onely how to fight with men, and them to vanquiſh: with walls they C know not how to deale. You Italians (as I vnderſtand) haue skill in that kind of ſeruice, and take pleaſure therein: wherefore now at this preſent, I haue neede of your helpe and cunning. There be certaine townes of our enemies in Epirus, yea almoſt in the heart of our kingdome, which eye-ſore I haue of long deſired (if it pleaſed God) to take out of my ſight: but being occupied with continuall wars, had no leiſure vntill now, happily to attempt any thing againſt them. This time I haue choſen as moſt fit, to ſatisfy my deſire, both for the ſeaſonableneſſe of the time of the yeare, and for that Mahomet ſpareth me leiſure; whoſe furie I haue twice calmed. You vnderſtand in few words, what I haue need of: all other things are almoſt in readineſſe, and we onely looke for your helpe. Lend me ſuch ſouldiers as know how to fight a far D off, I meane harquebuſiers and canoniers, for of others we haue ſtore plentie. But happie is Apulia, my Alphonſus, vnder thy gouernment, from whence men fit for all ſeruices may bee drawne as out of a moſt plentifull treaſurie. Whenſoeuer we haue requeſted men fit for ſeruice, either in peace or warre, you haue beautified both our court and campe. By you the kingdome of Epirus hath beene ſupported with ciuill policie, and warlike ſtrength: all ſort of people, of what condition ſoeuer: yea euery corner of Epirus ſoundeth forth thy praiſe, both at home and abroad. But for mine own part, I doe ſo louingly embrace your kindneſſe, and ſo firmly retaine the remembrance of your deſerts towards me, that ſometime I wiſh you that fortune (although in ſo doing I may ſeeme vnkind) which (as the common ſaying is) proueth, but getteth not friends: to the intent, that you might by ſome more certaine proofe know, how much I am to you deuoted.

When Scanderbeg had ſent away his embaſſadours, he with all diligence began to prouide E things neceſſarie for the ſiege of Belgrade: wherein he had purpoſed alſo to haue vſed the ſeruice of Moſes. But he now in heart a traitor both to his Prince and countrey, and a friend to Mahomet, found many excuſes to ſtay at home in Dibra; alleging firſt, that it was to be thought that ſo ſoone as the Turkiſh King ſhould heare of the ſiege of Belgrade, hee would inuade ſome part of Epirus, thereby to withdraw his enemies from the ſiege: and then, that no part of all Epirus lay neerer vnto the Turks, or more in danger than Dibra; and that therefore hee could not doe any better ſeruice, than to ſee vnto the ſaftie of that country, long before committed to his charge, and in which alſo moſt part of his liuing lay. Theſe his excuſes, proceeding indeed from deep treaſon, were yet neuertheleſſe thought reaſonable, and he for his pro-F uident care highly commended: and authoritie giuen him with new ſupplies to augment the garriſon vnder his command, as time and occaſion ſhould require.

By that time that Scanderbeg had fully made his preparation for the intended ſiege, the embaſſadors before ſent to Alphonſus, were returned into Epirus, and with them ſuch aides Scanderbeg had before requeſted, and a great deale more: For Alphonſus fearing the greatneſſe of diminish the infamy of himselfe, in communicating the same with many, and to appeare with greater credit before the Turkish tyrant, than if he should as a contemptible fugitiue come all alone. Wherefore vpon the bad news from Belgrade, he seemed at the first very pensiue, and much to lament the misfortune of Scanderbeg, and the common miserie of the country of Epirus, with many words amplifying the same: and then on the contrary part, setting forth to the vttermost the force and power of the Turkish Emperour Mahomet, thereby to strike a greater terrour and distrust into the minds of them with whom he was conuersant: but vnto such as were more secret and inward with him, he discouered the great affection and fauour the great Emperor Mahomet had of long born him, with the large offers of his gifts and preferments, assuring them of the like also, if they would conform themselues vnto his appetite; seeking hereby so much as he could, to allure them into the participation of his most execrable treason: yet when he had said what he could, he found none but a few of the baser sort of the common souldiers, which were willing to hearken vnto him or to follow him. When Moses saw how much he had laboured, and how little preuailed, fearing to be discouered, he fled by night to Sfetigrade, accompanied with a few base fellowes, and easily obtained the Gouernours passe, with safe conduct to Constantinople: where he arriued a little before the returne of Sebalias from Belgrade, and was of Mahomet both ioyfully receiued and honourably entertained.

When Scanderbeg vnderstood that Moses was thus reuolted, at the first report thereof he was so troubled with the strangenes of the fact, that he stood speechlesse as a man astonied: but after he had paused a while, & vpon further enquirie had found it out to be true, he according to his heroicall disposition, said no more, but that he could easily haue Moses excused, for that he was carried away with the violence of such fortune as might haue alienated the mind of a right constant man. And when diuers of his friends (according to the manner of the world) with hard speeches seemed to aggraue his offence: he could not abide to heare the same, but commanded them to hold their peace, & no more to vse such speeches: wishing that all treason & euil fortune were together with Moses gon out of Epirus. Vpon this news Scanderbeg accompanied with Amesa his nephew, & a troup of horsmen, presently entred into the country of Dibra, & there with al care caused most diligent inquirie to be made, if any could be found partakers of the conspiracie with Moses. But finding none, he much reioiced in the fidelity of his subiects: & hauing set al things in good order in that prouince, returned himself to Croia.

Moses remaining in the Turks court, ceased not to solicit Mahomet to proceed in his warres against Scanderbeg, promising to do therin great matters, euen to the spending of his life in that seruice. But the craftie tyrant thinking it not good to trust him too farre before he had further triall of him, delaied him off to the next Spring, pretending that the yeare was too far spent to bigin wars. In the mean time he caused al Moses talke, his behauior and actions, to be diligently obserued and nored; and oftentimes himselfe discoursed with him concerning the managing of that war: all which he did especially to sound the depth of Moses his thoughts. And finding nothing in him but the most assured & vndoubted signes of a mind deuoted to his seruice, & altogether estranged from Scanderbeg: in the beginning of the Spring he committed to his charge the leading of fifteene thousand horsemen for the inuading of Epirus, such men as Moses himself should make choice of: for a greater number he required not for the vanquishing of Scanderbeg. These souldiers although they detested (so few in number) to enter that fatal country of Epirus, as men faire warned by other mens harms, yet heartened on by the opinion they had conceiued of their new Generall, and the hope they had by his meanes to find friends in that country to ioyne with them, were the willinger to go. So Moses furnished with a notable army, and all warlike prouision he could desire for the destruction of his country; and blinded with the imagination of a kingdome, set forward, and marching through Thracia and Macedonia, forgetting the loialtie due vnto his Soueraigne, and the loue he ought to haue borne vnto his natiue countrey, came and entered into Dibra.

Scanderbeg by his espials vnderstanding of the comming of Moses, as also what strength he was of, stood not now vpon any policie against him who had of long bin priuie to all his stratagems, but was ready euen at his first entrance with true valor to incounter him. As both the armies stood ranged in order of battell, a messenger came from the the Turks campe, to know of Scanderbeg, if any one of his army durst to proue his fortune hand to hand against one of the Turks, before the beginning of the generall battel. By which messenger answer was returned,

That

A That the challenge should be accepted. The name of the Turke which made this braue challenge was Abemaze, a man for his valour and courage of great name amongst the Turks. Vpon this proud challenge, Zacharias Groppa, a gentleman of no lesse reputation among the Christians, hastily stept forth before Scanderbeg (as it he had bin afraid to haue beene preuented by some other) and requested, that he might be the man to abate the Turks pride. Scanderbeg embracing him, commended his noble mind, and wishing him good fortune, gaue him leaue to carrie with him into the field the first honour of the Christian armie. As he was arming himselfe, his companions and fellowes in armes standing about him, wished vnto him not more courage or strength than he had, but onely the fortune of Manessi. Vpon his armor he put on many rich iewels and ornaments, the allurements or rather the rewards of the enemie, if hee could vanquish him. The Turkish champion was no sooner come into the plaine betwixt both B armies and made shew of himselfe in great brauery, as if his match had yet bin scarcely found, but he saw Zacharias come forth brauely mounted, and readie to charge him: to whom Abemaze calling aloud, said there would be time enough for him to hasten to his death, & therefore requested to talke with him before. So when he had learned of him both his name and place, he propounded such like conditions of the combat, as had bin long before derided by Manessi: whereof Zacharias in no better sort accepted. In few wordes it was agreed vpon betwixt them, That each of them should abide his owne fortune, without any helpe or ayd of others; and that the victor should haue full power ouer the bodie & spoile of the vanquished. Thus agreed, they withdrew themselues one a good distance from another, and with their C Launces charged, ran together with such force, that with the violence of the encounter they brake their Launces one vpon the other, and were both horse and man ouerthrowne. But vnhorsed, they nimbly recouered themselues, and with their scimitars fiercely assailed the one the other on foot. Fortune it should seeme had determined to beautifie that combat with varietie, standing a great while indifferent to both. After many sturdie strokes giuen, without any hurt don, by reason they were so strongly armed, it fortuned that both their swords were beaten out of their hands: then grapling together with their bare hands, as if they had bin two vnarmed wrestlers, after long strugling till they were both almost out of breath, Zacharias ouerthrew the Turke, and lying vpon him, with his dagger, aboue the gorget thrust him into the throat, & slew him: and so rising vp, with the sword that first came to his hands, cut off the D Turks head: at the sight wherof the Christian army gaue a great shout for ioy, to the great discomfiture of the Turks. To be short, Zacharias despoiling the Turke of his armor, & what els he thought good, returned loded with the spoile of his enemie, and presented vnto Scanderbeg the proud Turks head: for which he was of him afterwards most honorably rewarded.

A combat betwixt a Turke and a Christian.

Into this place yet reeking with the bloud of the late slaine Turke, came Moses, and with a loud voice challenged Scanderbeg hand to hand; thinking indeed that he would not haue aduentured his person: but when he saw him readie to come forth, he shamefully forsooke the place, and returned with shame enough into his armie.

Presently after, both the armies vpon signall giuen set forward, and so began to ioine battell: where at the first onset Scanderbeg so valiantly charged the vauward of the Turkes armie, that E they were glad to giue ground: which Moses perceiuing, releeued them with new supplies: and riding now here, now there, with his presence and courage restored the battel, in many places almost lost. Howbeit, the Epirots encouraged with the beginning of their good fortune, still preuailed vpon their enemies, & after great slaughter made, came to the strength of their battell: where Moses had placed most of his best soldiers, as his most assured and last refuge: in this place the Turks fought with exceeding courage, and Moses warily obseruing in what part of the battell Scanderbeg himselfe was, directed his most forces against him, of purpose, if possibly he might, to haue slaine him; whereof he missed but a little: for a couragious soldier of the Turks by chance encountering with Scanderbeg, with his horsemans staffe bare him quite backeward vpon his horse, in such forcible manner, that the Turks for ioy gaue a great shout, F thinking verily that he had bin slaine: but Scanderbeg recouering himselfe again, & chafed with such an vnwonted disgrace, furiously assailed the same Turke with his sword, and after a great fight slew him. A great part of the Turks armie being alreadie ouerthrown by them that had the leading of the wings of Scanderbegs armie, diuers of the common soldiers thrust the heads of the slaine Turks vpon the points of their speares, in token of victorie, to the great astonishment of the Turks: and now ioining themselues with Scanderbeg, more fiercely charged the maine battell of the Turks than before. Neuertheles, Moses encouraging his soldiers, did what was possible for a man to doe, and euen with his owne valour a great while staid the course of the victorie: vntil he seeing the ground about him couered with the dead bodies of his best soldiers; & that there was no remedie but that he must either flie, or there die; turned his back and fled. In which flight, many of the hindermost of the Turks were slaine: as for Moses himselfe, he escaped by waies to him wel knowne, onely with foure thousand men, the poore remainder of so great an armie: the rest, to the number of about eleuen thousand, all choise men, were slaine: whereas of the Christians were not past an hundred lost, and about eightie wounded. Of all the Turks that were taken, only one was saued; who being a man of good account, had yeelded himselfe to Zacharias, and was afterward ransomed; the rest were all by the common souldiers, without pittie tortured to death, in reuenge of the crueltie by them shewed at Belgrade: Scanderbeg himselfe either not knowing thereof, or winking thereat.

Moses with the rest of his discomfited armie, lay still a while vpon the borders of Epirus, and would faine haue persuaded them, after the departure of Scanderbeg, to haue followed him againe into Epirus, to haue surprised the garrison left in Dibra, in number not aboue 2000; promising to bring them vpon the same garrison, before they should bee aware of their coming. But the Turks hauing him now in contempt, were about by generall consent to forsake him, and to returne home. And so Moses seeing no remedie, returned with them to Constantinople, with countenance as heauie as if he had bin a condemned man now carried to the place of execution: and the Turkes which had not long before had him in great admiration, expecting that he should haue ended the warres in Epirus, began now to disgrace him as fast, and to speake all the euill of him they could deuise. Yea the tyrant himselfe (although hee could blame nothing in the man, but his fortune) was so highly offended with him for the losse of his armie, that he had vndoubtedly put him to most cruell death, had not the great Bassaes, & others neere about him, perswaded him otherwise, saying, That in so doing, he should alienate the minds of al others from reuolting vnto him, or attempting any great thing for his seruice. So was he by their mediation pardoned his life; but withall, so disgraced, that he had little or nothing allowed him afterwards for his necessarie maintenance: all which despightfull contumelies he outwardly seemed patiently to beare; but was inwardly so tormented with melancholy and griefe, that he could not neither eat nor drinke: the remembrance of the foule treason committed against his prince and country, was day and night before his eies; and the disgraces of the Turks court inwardly, tormented him with intollerable griefe: the sight of the tyrant (who measured all things by the euent) filled his heart with secret indignation; and to return again to his naturall prince, of whom he had so euill deserued, he was ashamed: sometime the clemencie and princely nature of Scanderbeg, whom he knew of old, slow to reuenge, and easie to be intreated to forgiue, heartned him on to thinke of return; and by & by, the consideration of his foule treason ouerwhelmed him with despaire. Thus with contrarie thoughts plunged too and fro, tormented with the vnspeakable griefs of a troubled conscience, not knowing what to do, purposing now one thing, and by & by another; at last he resolued to forsake the insolent tyrant, & to submit himselfe to the mercie of Scanderbeg; wishing rather to die in his countrey for his due desert, than to liue with infamie, derided in the Turks court. Resting himselfe vpon this resolution, one euening he got secretly out of the gates of Constantinople, and trauelling all that night and the day following before he rested, by long and weary iournies, came at last vnto his natiue country of Dibra. The garison soldiers beholding their old Gouernor all alone, full of heauinesse, as a man eaten vp with cares, moued with compassion, and forgetting the euils he had bin the occasion of, receiued him with many tears and friendly embracings, and brought him to Scanderbeg, who by chance then lay not far off. Moses comming vnto him with his girdle about his neck, in token that he had deserued death (as the manner of that country was) found him walking before his tent, and there with heauie cheere falling downe vpon his knees at his feet, submitted himselfe vnto his mercie, and with great humilitie and signes of repentance, craued his most gracious pardon. Which his request Scanderbeg presently granted, and taking him vp by the hand embraced and kissed him, in token he had from his heart forgiuen him: and within a few daies after, caused all such things of his as were before confiscat, to be again restored vnto him; with all such offices & promotions tions as he had before inioyed: and by open proclamation commanded, That from thenceforth no man should either publikely or priuatly speake of that Moses had trespassed. Mahomet vnderstanding that Moses was returned againe into Epirus, and honoured of Scanderbeg as in former time, was much greeued thereat, and fumed exceedingly: first, for that he had at all trusted him; and then, that he had so let him slip out of his hands: being verily perswaded, that all that Moses had done, was but a fineneſse of Scanderbeg to deceiue him.

Shortly after that Moses was returned into Epirus, Mahomet by like practise allured vnto him Amesa, Scanderbeg his nephew; promising to make him king of Epirus in his vnckles stead. For by that meanes, the craftie tyrant thought it a more easie way to draw the mindes of the people of Epirus from Scanderbeg vnto him descended of the princes bloud, than to Moses, or to any other stranger he should set vp. Amesa vpon this hope of a kingdome, fled to Constantinople: and because he would cleere the mind of the tyrant of all suspition and distrust, he carried with him his wife and children, as the most sure pledges of his fidelitie. This Amesa was of stature low, and the feature of his bodie not so perfect as might sufficiently expresse the hidden vertues of his mind: hee was of courage hautie aboue measure, subtill, and of a pregnant wit; wonderfull painfull, and thereto courteous and bountifull (the chiefe meanes whereby aspiring minds steale away the hearts of men) whatsoeuer he got of himselfe, or had by the gift of his vnckle, he diuided it amongst his souldiers or friends: he was very affable, and could notably both couer and dissemble his affections: for which things, he was aboue all others both beloued and honored of all the people of Epirus, next to Scanderbeg himselfe. At his first comming to Mahomet, he filled not his eares with great promises and vaine praises of himselfe as had Moses; but onely excusing his owne reuolt, labored to perswade him, That he had for iust causes left his vnckle, with a desire now faithfully to serue him. And to that purpose spake vnto him as followeth.

Amesa his first speech vnto Mahomet.

If it should please thee (most noble Mahomet*) to call remembrance the old iniuries, and antient displeasures by vs committed against thine imperiall Maiestie: we might seeme now rather to haue come hither to receiue the iust guerdon of our euill deserts, than vpon any hope of honour or preferment. For what could haue bin done more in disgrace of the* Othoman Empire, than that you haue seene long since done by vs, in the most dangerous time of the Hungarian warre; rather of a malicious and set purpose, than for that we were iust enemies? Whenas in the same perfidious course, I my selfe being a helper and partaker therein (for now no excuse is to be pretended for our doings, more than repentance) your fathers armie was betrayed at Morana, and the kingdome of Epirus by great treacherie wrested out of your fathers hands; the onely cause of so many calamities, and of so much bloudshed. But vaine is this feare, and our suspition needlesse, with so wise and mercifull a Prince; especially for that my yeares then greene, and youth prone vnto the harme of it selfe, and a mind not resting vpon his owne resolutions, deceiued me. I beleeued mine vnckle (for the ignorant beleeue many things) and allured with the desire of soueraigntie (the proper disease of that age) and too much credulous, I forsooke you and followed his promises, but discretion growing with yeares, I haue by little and little perceiued both the slie perfidious dealing of mine vnckle, as also that my reuolt from you was more hurtfull vnto my selfe than to any other. Scanderbeg recouered, and also enlarged the kingdome of Epirus; but not without my great labour and helpe. I expected long time, that he should haue giuen me, if not my fathers whole inheritance, yet at least some part thereof, as a small reward of my so great trauell and danger. Not long after he married a wife, and hath begot a young heire, a new successour in his kingdome: vnto me for shame of the world, because I should not altogether leade a priuate life, he hath assigned a base corner of Epirus; where he enioying the rest, I might lead a poore and contemptible life. In this case I had much adoe to bridle my affections, and could neuer digest that iniurie: yet the iniquitie of the time, with the insolent disposition of the man, compelled me to smother vp my thoughts, and to make faire weather, least finding some suspition, he should craftily haue intrapped me, as he did of late George Strese his sisters sonne; whom wrongfully charged with fained surmises, he hath almost deprined of all his possessions. I would willingly haue fled vnto the feet of your highnesse, I would gladly haue forsaken my ingratefull vnckle with the staines of his infamous kingdome; but that the remembrance of the old rebellion, and many iniuries sithence done, did make me afraid: vntill that now (God I thinke so appointing it) I came most gladly, following your most royall faith and promise. You had scarcely beckned vnto me, you had scarcely inuited me, hauing of long intentiuely waited euery occasion, but straighs way I came with such speed, as if I would haue flowne: I lingred not, I expected not either Scanderbeg or his euill hap, or your more prosperous successe, as of late did Moses; least I might thereby iustly seeme either for feare or regard of some eminent danger, rather to haue prouided for mine owne safetie than to haue embraced your magnificence. Neither haue I left any thing for you in me to suspect, nor any cause wherefore I should desire to returne againe into Epirus: here are present most sure bonds of my loue, and faithfull pledges of my loyaltie. Behold (worthie Mahomet) you haue whatsoeuer is deare vnto me, yea whatsoeuer nature could giue, pleasing vnto men in the course of mans life. These haue I brought vnto thee, which should with violence haue beene taken from an enemie: such pawnes as might assure thee of the faith of a most doubtfull man. More than this, haue I brought nothing: for in so great speed and secret departure, I could not haue regard of my substance. And if I might haue had time to haue trussed vp my trash at leisure; yet I know not how, I should haue thought it a kind of basenesse, to haue brought with me any part of the poore reliques of mine old fortune: especially vnto thee, of all other the richest. Onely my fidelitie I lay downe before thee, for any thing greater I haue not: and if thou desire of me any other bond for more assurance, I refuse not whatsoeuer your highnesse shall appoint: for I came not hither to set downe couenants and agreements of my selfe, but to receiue them from you. I dare not promise to vanquish mine vnckle, and to subdue Epirus with an armie of fifteen thousand men: the misfortune of Haly-Bassa and other your Generals; yea and the late and rare victorie of Sebalias, with great bloudshed gained, may serue for examples. In me you shall neither want diligence nor faithfull seruice: as for other things concerning the euent of this warre, and for the reuenge of the iniuries by you receiued; you being a Prince of power inuincible, and of a most deepe iudgement, are not to be aduised by me your vnskilfull vassaile.

Ameſa honorably entertained by Mahomet.

This speech of Amesa, seemed vnto Mahomet free from all dissimulation, forasmuch as he knew most part thereof to be true; and his wife and children brought vnto his presence, confirmed the rest. Wherefore commending his good affection, he appointed him honourable entertainment, referring other matters vnto a further time.

Vpon the approch of the Spring, Mahomet desiring nothing more than to be reuenged vpon Scanderbeg, entred into consultation with his great Bassaes, concerning the inuasion of Epirus: vnto which counsell Amesa was by Mahomet admitted, and his wicked deuise for the destruction of his countrey, of all others best liked. After the matter had bin long too and fro debated, it was concluded, That Isaac the great Bassa of Constantinople, should with an armie of fifteen thousand be sent against Scanderbeg, and Amesa with him, hauing the charge of fiue thousand horsemen: and the Bassa to proclame Amesa King of Epirus; thereby to perswade the Epirots, that Mahomet inuaded Epirus rather for the displeasure hee bare against Scanderbeg, and for the aduancement of Amesa, than for any ambitious desire he had to take vnto himselfe that kingdome.

Great was the preparation for this warre, and the expectation thereof greater. Flying fame had in short time filled euery corner of Epirus with the report of these newes; adding thereunto (as the manner is) a great deale more than was true. Whereupon Scanderbeg without delay, sent for his great captaines and men of war into Dibra, where that tempest was first to be expected: and when they were all assembled, he declared vnto them the greatnesse of the danger, and what he thought thereof himselfe as followeth.

A notable speech of Scanderbeg vnto his captaines, how the Turks were to be withstood at their coming to Epirus.

Amongst all other things which God hath left to vex and greeue the minds of men in so great varietie of worldly affaires, we see (right worthie souldiers) these two the greatest, Hope, and Feare. The first a more comfortable thing, and proper to courageous minds (I may not say) of light beleefe: the other a thing of more discretion and safetie, which although it vse to deferre the desires of men, yet hath it power at length excellently to cure and season the same. Hereupon is it easily to be gathered, That the great cheefetaines of former times haue gained more honour and greater victories, by fearing all that was to be feared, than others in shew more bardie, which feared nothing. Hereupon the great Carthagientian captaine vsed to call Q. Fabius (whome the Romanes euer thought too slew and too fearefull) his great enemie: But Terentius Varro he called a greater enemie vnto his owne countrey and the people of Rome, than to himselfe. But wherefore do I wrongfully call that Feare, which might more truly be called Discretion, or wholesome Policy? Call it as you will, it is not much materiall: but this one thing no man can deny, That thereof hath risen the antient discipline of warre, and the old and seuere gouernment of martiall affaires. This aduised carefulnesse cherisheth and nourisheth Hope: it selfe, it doth nothing rashly, it hath eyes before, behind, and on both sides; it weigheth in indifferent ballance things past, present, and to come. You may now perceiue to what end my speech tendeth. I would first conferre with you, ond know your opinions, before I determine any thing of the order of this warre; that either I might yeeld vnto your opinion, or else you (as you haue alwaies hitherto done) to mine. You heare now with your eares, what preparation, what warlike prouision is daily made against vs. Loe the great Bassa of Constantinople, all the flower of Europe, and whole strength of the Othoman Kingdome knocketh at our gates. I want not courage (neither euer did) to proone my fortune against him, not without your honour: But I thinke it better to vse policie and warie heed against so great an enemy, than our woonted force and courage. That notable ouerthrow of Haly-Bassa, so many great victories by vs atchieued, our minds by so many good haps confirmed, persuade me to thinke that we haue both courage and strength to encounter him in plaine battell: but the vncertaine euents of warre, and fortune neuer sufficiently knowne, maketh wise men to forget what is past, and to feare that is to come. It was neuer proper to any man, it was neuer giuen by inheritance, alwaies to ouercome; new occurrents require new correspondents: neither may you, for that you conquered yesterday, presume to assure your selfe to diuide the spoile of your enemies to day. Victorie is like a trauellour, and goeth hither and thither, not resting long in a place: and although it be for most part both gotten and kept by courage and discretion, yet oftentimes, when you haue most carefully and politiquely disposed of all things, the fortune and chance of warre haue therein a great sway. I was woont to require (I remember it well) onely valour and courage in my souldiers, contemning all externall accidents and fortunes haps; if you did promise vnto me couragious minds, I assured you of all good hap and prosperous successe: but that losse we receiued at Belgrade (the remembrance whereof my mind feareth, and alwaies abhorreth to thinke vpon) hath much changed my former cogitations, and made me to deeme farre otherwise of worldly matters, and the vncertaintie of fortune. What if that day had bin longer? or Sebalias of more courage? might not the state of Epirus haue that day bin vtterly ouerthrowne? We were then rather by God preserued, than by any thing that was in our selues: What remained more, but that we should like cowards haue yeelded our selues to haue bin bound of the conquerours? The night defended vs, yea euen God himselfe defended vs; who tooke from them both policie and force, and gaue vs time to breath and escape away. We were then but as a prey, expecting but the comming of the victor: Howbeit he tooke nothing from vs, he carried little or nothing away with him, being too much carefull to keepe the honour he had alreadie gained, and peraduenture in feare of them of whom he was not without cause most feared. I speake not this of purpose to terrifie any of you, but rather to admonish you, and to consult with you, how so great preparations may be frustrated and ouerthrowne, and some notable victory by vs atchieued, without the price of our bloud, or the losse of such things as we haue. The number of our enemies is great, and so great, as vntill this day we neuer saw in Epirus greater, except at such times as they came to besiege our cities, and to deuoure vs all. Now if wee shall meet them in the plaine fields in a set battell, the euent thereof will be doubtfull, many of vs must needs fall, many of vs must die (I would I might be a false Prophet) before so great an armie will either flie or be ouercome, your victorie shall be mingled with teares, and the heauinesse of the conqueror not much vnlike the sorrow of the conquered. Was it but a few that we lost at Belgrade? is that losse so to be recouered? What flower of Chiualrie, hardly to be in many yeares restored? How many worthie men were there slaine? Epirus must needs in short time be vnpeopled, if we shall so desperatly onely seeke for such glorious victories. Wherefore if we will do well, we must so fight to day, as that we may fight to morrow also. Neither are our enemies and we in like case. The losse of fortie or fiftie thousand is lesse vnto the Turkish tyrant, than the losse of an hundred of you is to me. We are in all but a few; and therefore carefully to be kept: which if we regard not for our own sakes, yet let vs doe it for our wiues and childrens, whose welfare and libertie dependeth of our liues: I know the number of you, I know your faces and countenances, and almost euery one of your names, which maketh me also more carefull of your health. And yet I would not refuse to try the whole fortune of this battell in plaine field, if we might thereby end all the warres against the Turks for euer; if I were in hope so to find an end of our labours and trauels hereafter, I would gladly aduenture my life with yours, for the perpetuall quiet and peace of our posterity: but a new enemy alwayes ariseth, and we must still looke for new warres. When this Isaac is gone, another Isaac will ere long come in his place: we shall be alwaies exercised with new warres, and inclosed with new dangers: It is the destinie of Epirus (as farre as I can see) and we our selues are borne thereto. Wherefore we must gather our wits together, we must well husband our forces, and so diuide our patrimonie, as that we may alwayes haue something to content our creditors, when they shall chance to come vpon vs. Yet shall G God (no doubt) giue an end also vnto these troubles: for extremities cannot be of long continuance, and you your selues shall at length take rest: yea the strong and puissant enemie, wearied with so many vaine attempts, will at last haue enough thereof, and leaue off his perpetuall hatred against vs: then shall it be to you no small pleasure to remember so many labours and dangers past. Thus haue I declared vnto you the commodities and incommodities ensuing the victorie in plaine battell. But what if we be vanquished? where haue we any hope of reliefe left? From whence may we expect help?

Will the bloudie enemie, inflate with victorie, expect whilest we againe recouer our strength and encounter him againe with new forces? No, he will pursue vs and chase vs so long as any of vs are left: and hauing ouercome vs, will poure out the rest of his furie vpon our townes and countrey, then subiect to his iniurie. But some of you peraduenture will say, that they are by policie to be ouertaken, H and not to be met in open field: of which opinion I also am my selfe; yet happily differ from you in the time of doing the same. Then I thinke it best to deceiue them, when they thinke they cannot be de-ceiued: when as they being as it were in possession of a supposed victorie, like men ouerioyed, shall cast no perill. Now they come euen from the gates of Constantinople, full of distrust, prying into euery corner, as men before warned by others harmes, and so many dreadfull examples of their fellowes: Besides that, they haue with them my graceless nephew and domesticall foe Amesa, who will teach them to foresee and shun such snares as in times past he with vs was woont to lay for them. Wherefore wee must now tower vp vnto the height of some notable and strange policie, whereby both our countrey may be from danger preserued, and also some great victorie, without our owne bloudshed (which seldome chanceth) obtained: which to the maintenance of our antient glorie and renowne, we haue to this day I by many most notable victories gained: But time and space, and the sight of the enemie, shall furnish vs with this deuise. Now (that my discourse may come to the purposed end) first of all, all things subiect either to the furie or victorie of the enemie, are to be remooued out of the way; all people, of what age, sex, or condition soeuer, are to be brought out of the countrey into places of safetie; and then, our townes are to be furnished with strong garrisons and all other necessarie prouision, against all the chances of fortune. Besides, who knoweth the secret designes of the tyrant? or whether he himselfe (of long time desirous of reuenge, and thirsting after our bloud) will follow the Bassa at the heeles, or no? Perhaps I may beleeue and feare more than is needfull; but it is good to feare all that may be feared, that we may indeed feare nothing. If all things shall thus be set in order, if there shall nothing be left in the fields or in the villages, that may enrich, feed, or feare our enemies, and which may withdraw our care and K thoughts from our enemies, vndoubtedly we shall be victors. And if you will be ruled by me, and follow my direction in these wars, I will assuredly deliuer your enemies into your hands to be slaine at your pleasure, and (by the leaue of God) will make the name and valour of the Epirots more terrible vnto the Turke, than euer it hath beene in the time of our ancestors. I flatter not my selfe, I deceiue you not: if any thing may be promised in worldly actions, this I assure you of, and this will I take vpon me. But these things are better done than said. In the meane while, to spend no more time in longer talke and discourse (than which, no greater losse can be to souldiers) let euery one of vs take a part in this charge, for the good disposing of all things, and how to withstand the enemie. I will not command any thing to others which I will not my selfe doe: I will refuse nothing, or reckon any thing base, which may tend to the common honour or profit of vs all. L

This speech of Scanderbeg was well liked and ioyfully receiued of all the hearers, so that many besought him to manifest to them how he purposed to proceed in those wars: whereunto he with cheerfull countenance answered, That it was enough for him, if they did but beleeue him, promising himselfe in person to bee in the most dangerous actions as far as any of them, wherewith they rested contented. And presently dispatching his lieutenants into diuers parts of his kingdome, as he thought most conuenient, prouided, that all things were in short time conueied out of the country into the strong townes and other places of refuge. No corne, no cattell, or other things of any worth was left in the country; but all left desolate, in like manner as was before at the comming of the great King Amurath to the siege of Croia. M

The Epirots remoue all their goods out of the country into strong townes at the comming of the Turke.

By this time Isaac the great Bassa was come into Epirus, accompanied with Amesa: and as he marched, still sent before him his scouts and espials, carefully to view euery corner of the countrey, for feare to be entrapped as others before him had bin; directed in his iourney for most part by Amesa. Scanderbeg had in readines such an armie as he had purposed to vse against his

A his mightie enemie, but lay with six thousand horsemen only in shew, as if he had determined with them to haue giuen them battell, but meaning indeed nothing lesse. For as soone as the Bassa was come in sight, he with those horsemen, according as he had before appointed, as if he had bin discouraged with the very sight of the Turks, turned his backe and fled. And because he would not giue them any occasion to suspect it to bee done for some policie or finesse, and so to make them more carefull, he fled not into the mountains or woods, as his wonted maner was, but directly toward Lyssa, a town of the Venetians standing vpon the sea coast, as if he had quite despaired of the keeping of Epirus, and fled thither for refuge. The Bassa seeing him flie, was glad therof, & sent certaine troupes of horsemen to pursue him, and diligently to marke which way he tooke: but encamped himselfe with his armie in the plaines of Dibra, neere vnto Oronychium, where Scanderbeg lay before: and there rested his armie, wearie of long trauell, expecting the returne of his horsemen, sent after Scanderbeg. But vpon their returne, when it was for a certaintie reported by them, That Scanderbeg with an handfull of men was fled out of Epirus, and not an enemie to be seene, the Turks began to reioyce, and proudly to triumph, that they had without any losse driuen the enemie out of the countrey; yet much greeued, that they could no where find any thing to satisfie their greedie desires: for why, al things were so clen gon, as if the country had bin swept against their comming, which might haue beene a sufficient cause for them to haue distruste d some great matter: but they flattering themselues, supposed all this to be done for feare of them, vpon extreme desperation: such is the fraile condition of men, to lose strength of bodie, common sense, yea, their reason & vnderstanding, when some great mischiefe is appointed for their ouerthrow or destruction. The Bassa seeing the enemie fled, and now no cause of feare, consulted with his chiefe captains, what were now best to be done? Amesa still persuading him not to remoue, but there to stay a time, and to expect the farther euent of matters. But the greater number, whose opinion preuailed, said it was better to go farther into the country, and to take the spoile thereof before the country people should conuey away al their substance into places of safety, as they had done there in Dibra, and leaue them nothing but the bare ground and emptie cottages. By this persuasion, the Bassa earely next morning in good order set forward: commanding by generall proclamation, That no man vpon pain of death should breake his array or straggle from the armie. Yet before hee set forward, he called Amesa vnto him; whom after he had highly D commended, & with great vehemencie inuayed against Scanderbeg, he with the great applause of the whole army in the name of Mahomet created him king of Epirus. That day he marched not far, by reason of the great heat: for it was then about the midst of Iuly. Yet when he had well wearied himselfe with that dayes trauell, finding neither enemie nor any thing else worthie to be accounted in any part of a victorie, he encamped at night, keeping diligent watch, and sending forth his scouts euery way, but especially towards Lyssa. The next day, which was the third day after the Bassaes comming into Epirus, he set forward againe, and came at length into Æmathia, and there encamped that night.

Amesa is by the Bassa created king of Epirus.

When Scanderbeg (flying for feare, as the Turks supposed) was gone a great way out of their E sight towards Lyssa, and come euen to the borders of his kingdome, he there staid all the rest of that day. And a little before the going downe of the Sun, he with a few select horsmen departed from the armie, and with painfull trauell got vp to the top of the high mountains, from whence a man might by day well discouer all the plains of Æmathia. There he appointed one Peleus Emanuel, a politicke and valiant gentleman, with certaine horsemen to marke diligently which way the enemie held, and by certain secret and appointed waftings and signes, to giue knowledge thereof to the armie. After such order taken, he returned himselfe, and came again to the campe after midnight. And presently rising with his armie, and fetching a compasse about, came vndiscouered, and secretly encamped himself as neere as he could vnto the mountains where his scouts lay, with eagles eis waiting for the lest mouing of the enemie. The Bassa desirous to get as far as he could into the country, before the heat of the day, began early in F the morning to set forward, and came to the plains of Pharsalia, through the world spoken of for the great battell in them long time before fought, between the two most famous chiefetaines Cæsar and Pompeius: and now once more to bee made famous, by the slaughter of the Turks. Here the enemy finding some stragling cattel, & other small things which the country people had in their hasty flight left behind them, fel to seeking after booty, &, as men without feare, ſpent that day in roaming vp and downe the country, in hope to find ſomething: and at night encamped without any great watch, but towards Lyſſum, from whence they (in great ſecuritie) looked for the comming of Scanderbeg; & as it were in diſgrace of him, carried Ameſa in triumph vp and downe the campe, as if he had bin alreadie poſſeſſed of the kingdome of Epirus. Scanderbeg lying on the other ſide of the mountaines, perceiued by his eſpials, which way the enemie lay: and with great ſilence vnder the couert of the mountains and woods, ſecretly bent his courſe the ſame way, vntil he came to a mountaine called Tumeniſt, at the foot wherof he encamped that night. The next morning the Baſſa holding on his way, came & encamped not far from the ſame mountain, and there ſtaid himſelfe with halfe his army, and ſent Ameſa with the other halfe to burne & ſpoile the countrey: who about noone returned to the campe with ſuch prey as he had got, with his ſoldiers wel-wearied with trauel, and the heat of the day. Scanderbeg like a carefull houſholder, who being about to entertaine and feaſt ſome honorable perſonages, truſteth not to his wife and ſeruants, but looketh to the beſtowing of his prouiſion himſelfe, carefully ordering and diſpoſing and ſetting forth all things, eſpecially if his prouiſion (for want of abilitie) be ſhort, to welcome ſo great gueſts; and ſetting al things forth to the greateſt ſhew, ſeeketh at leaſt to fil the eies of his gueſts, although he doubt to ſatisfie their appetites: ſo he carefully viewing all the mountaines and thicke woods thereabouts without reſting, ſet Moſes in one place, Tanuſius in another, & all the reſt in places moſt conuenient. He appointeth euery man what to do, and inſtructeth them, & conſidereth of euery particular circumſtance himſelfe: and ſo diuideth his forces, as might beſt ſerue his purpoſe, and make the moſt terrible ſhew to the enemie: for which purpoſe he in euery companie placed moe trumpets, drums, and other inſtruments of war, than he had before at any time vſed. When he had ſo to his moſt aduantage beſtowed ſo many of his captaines and ſoldiers as he thought good, & as the nature of the places would giue leaue, he with 4000 horſmen and the like number of foot, ſpeedily marching vp the rough mountaine of Tumeniſt, from thence plainly beheld in what order the Turks campe lay in the plaines below. The Turks, eſpecially they which were lately returned with Ameſa from the ſpoile of the countrey, lay ſcattered abroad in the fields, with their horſes vnbridled & vnſadled, reſting their weary bodies: ſome got vnder the ſhadows of trees were victualling themſelues; ſome hauing filled their bellies, lay faſt aſleep on the green graſſe; the reſt were paſſing the time, ſome with one kind of ſport, ſome with another, as ſoldiers do in field when they haue little or nothing to do: for it was then the hotteſt time both of the yere, & of the day, being about the midſt of Iuly, and the noone-time of the day. The like negligence was alſo in that part of the camp where the Baſſa himſelf lay; euery man taking his eaſe and pleaſure, with ſmal regard of horſe or armour; for being out of feare of Scanderbeg, whom they thought to haue bin a great way off at Lyſſum, they lay as men without care wrapt vp in ſecuritie, the common deſtruction of great armies and common wealths. Ameſa with the great captaines, were at the ſame time all together in the Baſſa's pauilion, conſulting what courſe they were beſt to take, to do ſomthing to the contentment of Mahomet, and their own commendation: ſome ſaid it were beſt with fire and ſword to deſtroy al they could in Epirus; and ſo hauing laid the country waſt, to returne. Others thought it better to march directly to Croia, to proue if the citizens could be perſuaded to yeeld themſelues & receiue Ameſa for their king; other ſome to threaten them with a continual ſiege, and vtter ruine of the country, if vpon the vaine expectation of helpe from Scanderbeg they ſhould refuſe to ſubmit themſelues. As for Scanderbeg himſelfe, who then lay houering ouer their heads, he was in all that conſultation leaſt feared: who from the top of the mountain, beholding the ſecuritie & diſorder of the Turks campe, & delighted with the ſight therof; encouraged his ſoldiers, & martialed them in ſuch order as they were to follow him, for the charging and terrifying of the enemie. But firſt of all he determined to oppreſſe the Turks ſcouts, which lay at the foot of the mountain: for which purpoſe he himſelf with a few horſmen firſt ſecretly deſcended the mountain, the reſt of his army following ſhortly after, & ſo ſuddenly came on the ſcouts, that he ſlew them all except one, who eſcaping by the ſwiftnes of his horſe, came running to the camp as one half affrighted, crying out that Scanderbeg was comming. The Turks ſuſpecting nothing leſſe than the comming of him that way, at the preſent inſtant hardly beleeued that he was ſo nie: when as he following him at the heels as faſt as he could, with his horſmen & his footmen after them, was in a moment as if it had bin a ſudden tempeſt, broken in amongſt

A amongſt the vnarmed Turks, and there making great ſlaughter of them, filled all the campe with ſudden tumult and feare. Ameſa who at the firſt noiſe had ſpeedily got him to his charge, with his ſouldiers ſome halfe armed, ſome on foot, hauing no leiſure, to bridle their horſes, was the firſt that made head againſt Scanderbeg. The Baſſa alſo did what he might in that ſudden feare and ſhortneſſe of time, to arme his men, and to put them in order: but whileſt thoſe things were in doing, the ſouldiers which lay in ambuſh in the woods, came downe the mountaine with ſuch horrible ſhouts and noiſe of inſtruments of war, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue preſently gone togerher; the hils and vallies with their hollow ecchoes, encreaſing the terror of the alarum. Inſomuch, that the Turks diſmaied, and fearing that all the force of Epirus with the countries adioyning had come vpon them, began to flie on euery ſide, before that B Moſes and the reſt that lay in ambuſh were come into the plaines. Ameſa acquainted with his vnckles ſtratagems, as much as he could encouraged the Turks, crying aloud and telling them, That ſuch vaine tumults and terrors were not to be feared, being but the bare ſhifts and deuiſes of their enemies to couer their owne weakeneſſe: and by his owne valour ſtaied many which before were about to haue fled. In this while, the Baſſa hauing put his men in beſt order he could, was comming to the aid of Ameſa, hardly charged by Scanderbeg: but in his ſetting forward, he was ſo valiantly encountered on the one ſide by Moſes with his horſemen, and on the other by Tanuſius and Emanuel with their footmen, that he was enforced, not without great loſſe, againe to retire vnto his trenches.

All the hope of the battell depended vpon Ameſa, who ſtill with great courage withſtood C his vnckle; exhorting his ſouldiers valiantly as men to endure that firſt aſſault, which ſhould afterwards bring them moſt aſſured victorie: heartening them on with hope of ſpeedie helpe from their fellows if they would but a while endure the furie of their enemies, whoſe hearts (as he ſaid) would preſently be diſcouraged, if they preuailed not in that their firſt and deſperat attempt, hauing nothing elſe to truſt vnto. By which perſuaſion the Turkes were againe encouraged, accounting it a great diſhonour to flie and leaue their Chieftaine in the field. But when they ſaw Scanderbeg ſtill to preuaile vpon them, and that no helpe came as they hoped (for many were by Scanderbegs horſmen ſlaine as they were arming themſelues; many were by the way cut off as they were comming, & the reſt put to flight) they which before fought valiantly with Ameſa, turned their backs and fled alſo. Scanderbegs horſemen purſuing the chaſe, D made great ſlaughter of the Turks, and in the ſame chaſe tooke Ameſa priſoner. Scanderbeg, hauing ouerthrowne that part of the Turks battell, was comming with a thouſand footmen and ſome horſemen, to haue ayded Moſes againſt the Baſſa: but before his comming, Moſes to blot out his former infamie, had with inuincible courage put the great Baſſa with all his armie to flight: and Scanderbeg following the chaſe, gaue him not leaue to looke behind him, vntill he was got out of Epirus. Many were in this chaſe taken priſoners, and amongſt the reſt one Meſites a Sanzacke, a man of great account amongſt the Turks. In this battell beſide the priſoners, were taken twentie of the Turkes faireſt enſignes. As for horſes, armor, and other ſpoiles taken in the field, and in the campe, all which fell to the ſouldiers ſhare, it is almoſt incredible to be told. The number of the ſlaine Turks is of diuers diuerſly reported; they which write of the E moſt, reckon vp thirtie thouſand; and they which ſpeake of the leaſt, account twentie thouſand. Of the Chriſtians were loſt but ſixty. Now if any account it ſtrange, that ſo great a victorie ſhould be gained with ſo little loſſe; not to ſpeake of that is written in holy writ, let him but read the antient hiſtories of the Romans, or the Chronicles of our own Country, and he ſhall in them find victories no leſſe ſtrange. There was to be ſeene the ſudden and ſtrange alteration of theſe worldly things, no more indeed (what ſoeuer we account of them) to be reckoned of, than of things we haue not. Scanderbeg poſſeſſeth the rich pauillion, erſt belonging to the great Baſſa; and other of his captaines enioy tents, with much other rich furniture neuer prepared for their vſe. Ameſa which the ſame day as a victorious conquerour ouerran a great F part of Æmathia with his horſemen, and was carried in triumph with the generall acclamation of many thouſands of valiant ſouldiers, and honoured as a king, and of them ſo called; is now led through the Chriſtian army to his vnckle, with his hands bound behind him as a ſlaue, ſpeechleſſe and confounded, vnable to hold vp his head for ſhame: whoſe miſerie moued moſt of the beholders to compaſſion, and forced teares out of the eyes of many.

The next day after this great victorie, Scanderbeg cauſed the bodies of the ſlaine Turkes to be be buried, together with their horses; which he did not for any regard of them, but that their G loathsome carkases should not infect the country: and after that, returned in great triumph to Croia. By the way as he went, the country people, which were before for feare of the Turks fled into the woods and mountaines in great multitudes met him, as he did others also out of the cities, whose mouthes were all full of his worthie praises. Before him went the captiue Turkes with their hands bound behind them, excepting such as were enforced to carrie the Turks ensignes. Next vnto them followed the great Bassaes rich paunllion, in such maner supported by the souldiers, as if it had bin in the field. Then came Scanderbeg himselfe with the Turkish Sanzacke, and Amesa following him; for Amesa had with great and humble suit obtained of his vnckle, that he might not as he well deserued, be carried bound among the other H captiues. Last of all came Scanderbeg his victorious souldiers in goodly order, euery man leading a spare horse taken from the enemie, and loaded with spoile. So when he was come to Croia, and there of his subiects ioyfully receiued, he brake vp his armie; and gaue euerie man leaue at his pleasure to depart. The Sanzacke, and Amesa, were committed to safe keeping, vntill farther order was taken for them. Amesa afterwards was for his treason worthily condemned to perpetuall prison, and by an Embassadour from Scanderbeg sent vnto king Alphonsus to Naples, there to be kept in durance; and with him was also sent an honourable Present of part of the spoile taken from the Turkes, in token of the victorie. What became afterward of this Amesa, concerneth not much the course of our historie; yet to satisfie the desirous, I thinke it not amisse with him to stray a little out of the way. I

When Amesa had remained a yeare in prison at Naples, Scanderbeg vnderstanding of the death of Alphonsus, by his embassador requested of Ferdinand his sonne, to haue Amesa restored to him againe. By which meanes he was brought backe againe into Epirus, and cast in prison at Croia; but not in such straight manner as before: for Scanderbeg according to his accustomed clemencie, began now to forget the iniurie to him before done; and at last ouercome with the continuall supplication and tears of his nephew, pardoned him his life; and restoring him to his former libertie, receiued him also into his former fauour. But Amesa remembring what pledges of his loyaltie hee had left with Mahomet at Constantinople, and fearing what would become of his wife and children, if he should hastily vse that his liberty, giuing his vnc-kle most humble thanks, brake vnto him his mind concerning that matter, as followeth, K

The speech of Amesa to Scanderbeg.

Whereas you of your owne gracious goodnesse onely, without any desert of mine, haue regarded my life and welfare, it behoueth me also to be carefull for the life of others: least whilest I receiue your exceeding bounty with too much desire of mine owne health and honour, I doe at this present, by this same benefit of yours, cast away them, whom I haue long sithence by mine owne treacherie vndone. Mine vnfortunate and guiltlesse Wife is with Mahomet, my little and innocent Childaen are with him also: these yet liue, and shall liue, so long as the tyrant shall thinke, that I liue in heart his; but when he shall once perceiue by this your gracious dealing that I am fallen from him, the cruell creditor will forthwith cut and rend in peeces the pledges of my faith, and their innocent bloud shall pay the guilt of their Fathers offence. Wherefore the Othoman tyrant is of me by some deuice to be deceiued, that I may L in the meane time preserue those pledges, vntill I may by some fit occasion afterwards redeeme the same. I will by your leaue this night take my flight out of Croia, as if I had broken prison, and escaped against your will, and so flie vnto Mahomet, making the greatest shew I can of my woonted loue and loyaltie towards him: not omitting to heare, or speake vnto that credulous King such things concerning your estate, as I was woont in my better fortune: that hauing so cleared my selfe of all suspition, which he perhaps hath conceiued by reason of my captiuitie and long stay with you, I may at length, with my Wife and Children, so escape from him: Wherein you may helpe me much, if you shall openly make shew as if you were greeued with my escape, and seeme to be highly offended with the keepers of the prison for the same. In the meane time, whilest I shall stay in the tyrants court expecting some fit time for my escape; I will stand you in stead of an intelligencer, so that your enemie shall not to my knowleage either attempt or goe about any thing against you, which shal be kept from your hearing M or knowledge.

Scanderbeg refused not to graunt whatsoeuer he had requested, but said vnto him:

Amesa,

Amesa, sithence we haue granted you life, with all the good things thereunto belonging, we will not A The answer of Scanderbeg to Amesa.
prohibit you to vse that our gift to your most good, and to the preseruation of them who for euer may most iustly call vpon you, as debtor vnto them, for their welfare and libertie. Goe thy waies, proceed, take thy time and occasion as it seemeth vnto thee best; and at length reforme thy selfe, whilest thou yet hast sufficient time and space. We now beleeue you in all things, and well like of this your deuise: Amesa you shall herein deceiue no man but your selfe, if you shall longer follow the faith and court of the barbarous King, whereas like danger is both of body and soule both to thee and thine. Whensoeuer thou shalt returne vnto vs thou canst not doe vs a greater pleasure: and in what regard thou hast heretofore beene with vs in the same thou shalt be with vs againe.

The same night Amesa by secret order from Scanderbeg, escaped both out of prison and out B of Croia: and in the morning it was all ouer the citie, that hee was gone, and the keepers sharply rebuked for their negligence. He comming to Constantinople, easily persuaded Mahomet, that he was by chance escaped, with all things else that he told him: yet was he not for all that, so well graced of him as before; not for any distrust he had in the man, but for the euill successe hee had in the former warres. Now whether Amesa neglected his promised returne, or could find no opportunity to performe the same, is vncertaine: but certaine it is, that shortly after hee died at Constantinople, poisoned as was thought by the commandement of Mahomet, who could no longer indure the sight of him, whom hee reckoned the author of the The death of Amesa. notable ouerthrow receiued in Æmathia. This was the wofull end of this noble and valiant C man, well worthie of remembrance, had not his haughtie thoughts soared too high with the desire of Soueraignetie.

When Mahomet vnderstood in what manner Isaac Bassa was ouerthrowne, and his armie discomfited, hee was therewith much greeued, and iustly blamed the Bassaes securitie: yet such was his credit with his Soueraigne, that the matter was in better sort passed ouer than was supposed it would haue been. Neuertheless, Mahomet in reuenge thereof would willingly haue imployed all his forces vpon Scanderbeg, if his more vrgent affaires would haue so permitted.
For at the same time, besides that great warres began to rise betwixt him and the Venetians (which continued for many yeres after) he was certainly informed, That the Christian Princes were making a strong confederation against him. At which time Mahomet disdaining o-D penly to sue for a peace at Scanderbegs hands, cunningly practised by such as were sent to redeem the prisoners, & also by the Sanzack himself, to persuade Scanderbeg to require peace of him, assuring him, that if he did but aske it, it would for a long time be easily obtained. Which thing Scanderbeg, well acquainted with the Turkish policie, vtterly refused to doe. Wherefore Mahomet for the defence of his countries bordering vpon Epirus, sent two of his most expert captains, Sinam and Hamur, with each of them 14000 soldiers into Macedonia, expressly charging them not to enter at any time or vpon any occasion, into Epirus, or by any meanes to prouoke Scanderbeg: which his commandement they so well obserued, that the Epirots by the space of almost two yeres enioyed the fruits of peace, although there was no peace at all concluded. So that the remembrance of old iniuries wearing out with time, at length by the E mediation of the same captains, a peace for a yere was agreed on betwixt Mahomet & Scander-beg. In which time he passed ouer into Apulia, and there notably aided King Ferdinand against the French, the proceeding wherein, as not pertinent to our historie, I of purpose passe ouer. A peace for a yeare concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

After that the time of the peace before concluded was expired, all things now going well with Mahomet as he desired, he resolued according to his wonted manner to trouble the quiet estate of Scanderbeg: and so sending a new supplie of soldiers to Synam-beg, who then lay with a strong garrison vpon the frontiers of Epirus, commanded him with all his power to make wars vpon Scanderbeg. Synam accordingly, with an armie of 20000 men entered into Epirus, where he was forthwith encountered by Scanderbeg, and his army vtterly ouerthrown, so that but few escaped by flight with Synam himself. Presently after he sent Asam beg, another of his F captains, into the same seruice, with an armie of thirtie thousand, whom Scanderbeg also in plaine battell vanquished at Ocrida; in which battell Asam himselfe was sore wounded, and finding no way to escape, was glad to yeeld himselfe prisoner to Scanderbeg, by whom he was courteously vsed, and afterwards set at libertie. Iussum-beg following Asam with eighteene thousand into Epirus, was set vpon by Scanderbeg also, and hauing lost part of his armie, was glad by ſpeedie flight to ſaue himſelfe with the reſt. After all this, Caraza-beg, an old captaine and a man of great experience (who had bin a great commander, and a companion with Scanderbeg in the time of old Amurath) requeſted of Mahomet, that he might proue his fortune againſt his old acquaintance Scanderbeg, aſſuring him of better ſucceſſe than before. The long and approued experience of this old leader put Mahomet in ſuch hope of good ſpeed, that he gaue preſent order for the leuying of ſuch an armie as Caraza had requeſted, and for ten thouſand mo than he had at the firſt required. With this ſtrong armie, in number almoſt forty thouſand, Caraza ſet forward, hauing before filled the minds of men with the expectation of ſome greater matter to haue bin by him done. Scanderbeg vnderſtanding certainly that Caraza was comming, ſtood more in doubt of the man than of his power: and therefore aſſembled greater forces than he had vſually done before: and to welcome him, ſent two thouſand of his beſt and moſt expert ſouldiers ſecretly into the enemies countrey; who lying in ambuſh amongſt the woods and mountaines, whereby Caraza muſt needs paſſe, ſuddenly ſet vpon foure thouſand horſemen (the forerunners of Caraza his armie) who marching diſorderedly, and fearing no ſuch matter, were in a trice ouerthrowne, and moſt part of them ſlaine: thoſe few that eſcaped fled backe againe to the army, as if they had come in poſt to bring tidings of ſome haſtie news to the Generall. With which ſo vnfortunat a beginning, Caraza was ſo diſcomfited, that if hee might for ſhame, he could haue bin content to haue returned againe and gone no farther: yet for his honours ſake holding on his way, he came into Epirus; where whileſt he was (after the manner of old men) long in reſoluing what courſe to take, he was vpon the ſudden aſſailed by Scanderbeg, before he could well put his men in order of battell. At which time there fell ſuch a vehement ſhower of raine, that both the armies were glad to retire before any great hurt was done. Three daies together it rained continually (for it was about the latter end of Autumne) all which time Scanderbeg ceaſed not in one place or other to trouble the Turks camp: ſo that the old Generall, partly diſtempered with the extremitie of the weather, which for the violence thereof he tooke to be ominous; and more diſcouraged with the reſtleſſe attempts of Scanderbeg, roſe with his armie, and retiring back by the ſame way he came, returned to Conſtantinople. Where he was well derided of Mahomet, that hauing promiſed ſo much, had performed ſo little: yet afterwards was againe by him in ſome ſort commended, for that he had with leſſe loſſe looked vpon Scanderbeg than other his Generals before ſent againſt him.

Mahomet perceiuing that Scanderbeg was not to be ſubdued but with ſuch forces as he was not then at leiſure to imploy on him, thought it not amiſſe to proue if he could by faire ſpeeches & glorious ſhews of fained friendſhip get within him, and ſo bring him to confuſion: for which purpoſe he ſent vnto him an Embaſſador with rich preſents, and letters of this purport.

Sultan Mahomet, Lord and Emperour of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, and of all parts of the world, vnto Scanderbeg, Prince of Albania and Epirus, ſendeth greeting.

The letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg.

I thinke friend Scanderbeg, that no acquaintance can be greater, or friendſhip more firme, than that which hath growne of long and mutuall conuerſing and liuing together and, eſpecially if the ſame haue taken beginning from childhood and tender yeares, as you know it hath done betwixt vs two; who haue of long time, euen from our childhood, liued together in great loue and friendſhip, when as you firſt lay as hoſtage in my fathers court. Wherfore beloued Scanderbeg, when as I call to remembrance all theſe things, with others, wherewith our youthfull yeares were then delighted; and being mindfull alſo of all theſe things which you haue oftentimes done for the aduancement of our Empire and kingdome, and for the glorie of the Othoman familie, I cannot chuſe but embrace thee with ſingular zeale and affection. For I take God to witneſſe, that nothing could chance more welcome or pleaſing vnto me in my life, than to haue thee with me, and for a while to enioy thy company. Neither needeſt thou to feare any thing to come vnto me, for that my ſouldiers without my knowledge or commandement haue of late broken in and ſpoiled thy kingdome: which thing as reaſon required, was vnto me exceedingly diſpleaſing: neither did it any whit offend me, that they were by thy forces vanquiſhed and ouercome, and ſo receiued the iuſt reward of their euill deſerts, and that all things fell out with thee according to the equitie of thy cauſe, and as thy heart could haue deſired. But to let theſe things paſſe, the remembrance of our old loue and friendſhip perſuadeth me to come to agreement, and to ioine together with thee in a perpetuall league of

of amitie: to the intent that our antient acquaintance and familiaritie, which by reaſon of long abſence is almoſt worne out, may againe take life, increaſe, and be confirmed. Of which peace, let theſe be the capitulations, if they ſhall ſeeme vnto you reaſonable: for I know it belongeth vnto him that requireth not the peace, to appoint the conditions of the ſame. Firſt, we require of you freely and peaceably to ſuffer our armies to paſſe through your kingdome for the beſieging of the cities and inuading of the countries ſubiect to the Venetians our enemies: Then, to deliuer vnto vs your ſonne Iohn in hoſtage, whom we will alwaies vſe as one of our owne naturall children: And afterwards, that our Marchants and men of trade, may peaceably come and trauell into all parts of your kingdome with their marchandiſe, and there freely and ſafely vſe their negotiation: Laſt of all, that your ſelfe in perſon may at your pleaſure ſafely and without all feare repaire vnto vs, and in like manner returne againe. In which things if you will yeeld vnto vs, I promiſe in the faith of a King, to grant vnto you and your kingdome ſincere peace, with perpetuall tranquilitie; and that there ſhall not be any more deerer vnto me than your ſelfe; and will neuer to the vttermoſt of our power permit your kingdome to be infeſted or moleſted by any of our ſubiects, or others. Whatſoeuer you ſhall further receiue from vs by the mouth of our Embaſſadour Muſtapha, you may thereto giue full credence. Fare you well. From our imperiall palace at Conſtantinople the 10 of May 1461.

Scanderbeg hauing receiued theſe Letters, and well conſidered of the ſame, returned him anſwer by the ſame meſſenger as followeth.

The ſouldier of Chriſt Ieſus, George Caſtriot, otherwiſe called Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, vnto Mahomet Prince of the Turkes, greeting.

The anſwer of Scanderbeg to the former letters of Mahomet.

Your Letters (moſt magnificent) are deliuered vnto vs, wherein you write of your exceeding loue and ſingular affection towards vs, confirmed as you ſay by old acquaintance: which being growne vp betwixt vs, and by tract of time firmely rooted and as it were into nature conuerted, ſhall alwaies retaine his force and ſtrength. But foraſmuch as it ſeemeth vnto you good to awake the ſame, hauing of long time and many yeares lien as it were aſleepe; and to make a motion that we ſhould enter into a certaine new league and confederation, whereof amongſt other conditions of the league by you propounded, this is one, That your forces may freely paſſe through my kingdome, to inuade the Venetians; Vnto this your requeſt, worthie Mahomet, it ſtandeth neither with equitie nor with mine honour to conſent, for ſo much as the Venetians are my eſpeciall good friends and confederates. As for that you deſire to haue my ſonne Iohn with you in hoſtage for the better aſſurance of the peace betwixt vs, I ſhould peraduenture do it (moſt noble Mahomet*) if fatherly affection would giue me leaue: but ſith hence I haue no moe but him, and he as yet a tender child, it is not for the good either of him or vs, to haue him now taken from vs, whenas he ought of vs to be moſt tenderly cheriſhed, and carefully inſtructed. As for that you requeſted concerning your marchants, that they may freely and ſafely traffique into my kingdome at their pleaſure, I can be content to yeeld thereunto, and wiſh heartily that there might be a free entercourſe for our marchants indifferently with their commodities into both our kingdomes. Further, whereas you earneſtly perſuade me boldly and without feare to come vnto you, that by ſuch enteruiew and perſonall preſence, our great deſire, growne of long abſence, might be the better ſatisfied: in this thing moſt excellent Prince, I cannot but praiſe your moſt honourable diſpoſition, and commend your good nature; and would therefore boldly follow your perſuaſion, if my other vrgent affaires, with the gouernment of my kingdome, would ſo permit. But what ſhall I doe? My ſonne* Iohn (as I ſaid before) but little, and as yet vnfit to gouerne; and my people (as you know) loue alwaies to haue ſomething to doe; being by nature a fierce and reſtleſſe nation, whom I my ſelfe haue much adoe to rule and gouerne: For all that I will come vnto you according to your deſire, expecting onely a more commodious time. So fare you well, and loue me ſtill. From our Campe the 30 of May, 1461.

When Mahomet had receiued theſe Letters, and well peruſed the ſame, hee writ to him againe in manner following.

The letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg for the concluding of a perpetuall peace betwixt them.

Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of all the parts of the World, vnto Scanderbeg Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, greeting.

Your Letters we haue receiued by our embaſſador Muſtapha, wherein you giue vs to vnderſtand, that you you like of none of the conditions of peace by vs propounded, but onely that concerning our marchants and their traffique, that they might haue free and at their pleasure vse their traffique and trades with their marchandize as aforetime, and vpon the same condition ones you grant vs peace. This your offer we accept of, and as the suit of your embassador we willingly admit: wherefore I promise vnto thee, my louing Scanderbeg, and will performe all that thou dost require, and vpon that resolution rest: and will so long as I haue obserued and kept a sincere and inuiolable peace with thee for euer, except thou first giue cause of violating the same. And for that purpose haue we with our vsuall and imperiall seale signed these our Letters, which we by our Embassador Mustapha haue sent vnto thee, as thereby confirming vnto thee this perpetuall peace. Wherefore you also (if you be so content) may subscribe, and with your Seale confirme the same, that in like manner may haue also your like consent and agreement. And would farther, that you would command knowledge thereof to be made by open proclamation through all your kingdoms, as I will in like manner cause to be done through mine. And for the more manifestation of this my loue towards you, I would also that you should vnderstand, That of mine owne meere motion and bountie, I doe freely giue vnto you all those things, which you by force of armes haue taken from my father in Albania and Epirus, so that you may possesse and enioy the same, as if they had alwayes beene yours and your ancestors: Wherefore I giue, grant, and confirme vnto thee and thy heires, all the right, title, or interest, which I heretofore had therein, and from henceforth will alwaies account and repute thee as prince of Albania and Epirus, and so call thee. And as I haue promised thee in the faith of a King, will neuer hereafter with warres molest thee or thine, except thou thy selfe giue cause thereof. Wherefore after you haue with your seale confirmed these things, you may commend them to our faithfull Embassadour Mustapha, to be by him brought vnto vs; vnto whom I would you should in all things giue full credit. So fare you well, and render vs loue for loue. From our Imperiall Palace at Constantinople, the 22 of Iune, 1461.

A peace concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

Vpon receit of these Letters, a peace was concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, and the same by publique proclamations solemnly published through both their kingdomes, to the great reioycing of many. Which peace was for a season faithfully kept on both sides, vntill that the Turks lying in garison vpon the frontiers of Epirus, began after their wonted manner againe to fetch preyes and booties out of the countrey. Of which iniuries, Scanderbeg by Letters complained to Mahomet: who answered that he was altogether ignorant thereof, and seemed in shew to be much offended with the insolencie of the doers thereof: and forthwith caused many things to be againe restored. By which meanes the peace before concluded, was still as before continued.

A little before the conclusion of the aforesaid peace, great warres began to arise betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians, who all this while being in league with the Turke, peaceably followed their traffique and trades of marchandise, little or nothing at all regarding their neighbours harmes and miseries, vntill that now the flame and fire began to take hold vpon their owne houses, and as it were to awaken them out of a dead sleepe. For Mahomet after he had subuerted the Empire of Constantinople, and driuen Thomas and Demetrius the Emperours brethren out of Peloponesus (now called Morea) rested not so contented, but by his lieutenants and other great captaines began to disturbe the quiet of the Venetians, who then held in their possession Methone, Corone, Neapolis, Argos, with diuers other strong townes in Peloponesus, standing vpon the sea coast. And now it chanced, that about this time, Iosue, Mahomet his Lieutenant in Peloponesus, had by the treason of a Greeke Priest, vpon the sudden surprised the citie of Argos: and Omares another of his great Captaines, hauing first spoyled the countrey about Naupactum (now Lepanto) entered farther into the territorie of the Venetians about Methone and Corone, making hauocke of whatsoeuer came in his way. With which iniuries plainly tending to open warre, the Venetian Senators being much troubled, sate oftentimes in counsell, deliberating with much care what course to take in a matter of so great importance. Some being of opinion, that it were best to send Embassadours to Mahomet, so to make proofe if the matter might by faire meanes be redressed: others on the contrary part deeming it to be to no purpose so to do; forasmuch as such great and manifest outrages, nothing differing from plain hostilitie, could not possibly be done without the tyrants knowledge and expresse command: After the Senatours had oftentimes met together, and with many great reasons debated the matter too & fro, and yet for all that concluded nothing (as in consultations of great matters with a multitude, it most commonly falleth out to be a harder matter, and to require longer time, to bring the multitude to some certaine resolution, than it is afterwards to performe the same in action.) In this so great a diuersitie of opinions concerning so weightie a cause, at length one Victor Capella, a noble gentleman and graue Senator, stept vp in the middest of the Senate, and there franckly deliuered this notable speech vnto the rest, concerning the matter propounded, as followeth.

The notable speech of Victor Capella to perswade the Venetians to take vp armes against Mahomet.

I haue before this at other times by long experience often noted (most noble Senatours) that in all our greatest consultations of matters most concerning our common state, some are alwaies so addicted or rather wedded vnto their owne conceits, that they can hardly with patience endure to heare the reasonable opinion of others contrarie to their owne, the chiefe cause of our slow resolutions. Wherefore I haue thought it good, briefly at this time to call vpon you for resolution: forasmuch as I see we must of necessitie take vp armes, be we neuer so loath or vnwilling: For to my vnderstanding, you doe but betray the time, in delaying the time to make present warre vpon the barbarous enemie. Yet many principall men amongst vs, aduise vs to beware, that we doe not rashly or vnaduisedly determine of matters of so great consequence; and thinke it requisite, that we should send Embassadours vnto the tyrant, to expostulate with him his vniust dealing in breaking his faith and league; and withall to request him to obserue the conditions of the peace before agreed vpon, if happily he may rather by persuasion than by armes be moued to change his purpose: and if by this meanes nothing may be obtained, then at length they thinke it necessarie to resolue to make warre vpon him. They alledge further, That if wee shall attempt warre, our cities in the continent, bordering vpon the Ionian to Peloponesus, with diuerse others of ours in the firme land, will not be able to hold out very long, but for want of necessaries must needes perish with the first of the trouble; besides that, if those places shall be wasted and spoiled, great losse (as they say) shall ensue thereby vnto most of vs in priuat: The greatest motiue (perhaps) wherefore they thinke it most conuenient to deferre the warres, and for that purpose to send our embassadors vnto him. Of which embassage, first by your leaue a few words. At such time as these our Embassadours, men of great wisedome and reach; not long since came vnto him, he had them in no regard; but dallying off the time with fraudulent, deceitfull and glosing speeches, did indeed such things to the contrarie as we least hoped: wherefore I cannot well deuise (if we should send them, or such others againe) what especiall thing of all that we then gaue them in charge, they should now propound vnto him, hauing already said what is to be said; except they should say, That whereas we are not of sufficient strength and power to wage war against him, we would be glad to decide the matter by talke, and by that simple meanes to redresse our iniuries; and vpon the matter, to shew our selues prest and ready to fall to agreement with him, according as shall stand with his good pleasure and liking. Truely this were good plaine dealing, but it will not serue our turne. Argos is alreadie taken from vs, and hee maketh open warre vpon vs: wherein he doth but proone our courage, and trie how long we will put vp these iniuries. If we will quietly digest these, he will then confidently and without feare proceed further: but if we shall as best beseemeth vs, valiantly resist him, he shall be glad of such rest as we shall giue him; and when he knoweth not well which way to turne himselfe, shall be as glad as we to lay downe armes, and to seeke for peace: whereas if we shall doe otherwise, I feare we shall repent our selues when it will be too late. It is reported, that as soone as he was come into Peloponesus, he went himselfe in person vnto Euboea, to view the citie of Chalcis: And going a second time out of Peloponesus, sounded the depth of the passage, and came within the sight of the Citie, of purpose to haue assaulted it, if he had found opportunitie: at which time he himselfe rid ouer that strait of the sea betwixt Boetia and Euboea with his horse, and curiously viewed in what place he might most conueniently passe ouer with his armie to besiege the Citie. Verily these are the most manifest signes of warre, whereby any man may sufficiently proone, that he hath long since resolued (so soone as he is readie) to make warre vpon vs. Whilest we are yet dreaming in the middest of our long consultations; he will proceed in the warres he hath begun; and cutting vs short, augment his owne dominions. Then will he blame his Lieutenants and Captaines, as authours thereof: but still be doing that best serueth his purpose. And whilest no man opposeth himselfe against him, his power dayly increasing, he will doe the best he can, suddenly to swallow vs vp, being vnprouided. For he may easily raise great forces, that by sufferance of others, maketh himself great strength there where he had before no footing. Shall we then say that we haue no warres with this enerochment tyrant? Some I know feed themselues and others also, with vaine hopes, saying, That he will neuer turne his forces vpon vs, our reuenge our estate, although he might at ease doe it : Wherefore (say they) let vs refraine from G warres, and vse our peace and quietnesse; yet omitting nothing in the meane time that shall be needfull for our safetie. But foreasmuch as it plainely appeareth vnto all men, by the which is before said, That he hath already raised proclaimed warre against vs, inuading our countries, surprising our cities, and killing our people: Whether thinke you is more expedient or profitable for vs, to fight and suffer our dominions to be taken from vs, or rather by open warre to make the barbarous King know the greatnesse of our power and strength? For if we shall enter into open warre, wee being in armes sufficiently prouided for all euents, and with carefull eye attending all his attempts, shall easily auoide him selfe and all his deuises: who if he be suffered to runne still on forward with his prosperous successe people will daily more and more fall vnto him, in hope to liue the better, as his friends. For which cause, I thinke it better to preserue an honourable warre, before a doubtfull peace. And for asmuch as hath hurt many great States, and our selues most of all: whereby we haue as it were lost the Empire of Grecia, with the woful Emperor himself, when as this tyrant battered the wals of Constantinople; for our traffique was much holpen by the Grecians, whom we then H left to themselues. After that, we despised and reiected the pitifull complaints of the Princes of Peloponesus, who with teares craued our aid: and now we see that famous countrey lost, and fallen into his hands, through our sloath and negligence. Of late, when as the King of Bosna humbly requested our aid, and promised fully to requite our courtesie, and whatsoeuer else we should doe in his behalfe; we suffered his kingdome to be lost, and himselfe to be cruelly murthered of the Turks. For all these things by vs thus neglected, we cannot escape the infamous report of all the rest of the nations in Europe but that they will say, That we for the greedie desire of trade and filthie gaine, haue forsa- I ken, and for our parts betraied whole Kingdomes and Nations, agreeing with vs both in manners and Religion; and to haue stood still looking on, vntill they were subdued and brought into thraldome by the Turkes. Wherefore in few wordes to shut vp the matter, if we should ioyne in league with the Hungarians, and enter into armes, we should so be able to keepe our owne: whereas if we shall vse delayes, and hunt after peace, we shall in short time see, that he will suddenly deuoure vs, being vnprouided, and wrest from vs all our prouinces and territories which border vpon him. And therefore it is (in my opinion) best to send our Embassadours into Hungarie, with a great masse of money, to stirre vp that warlike Nation into the fellowship of this warre. And beside the Nauie we now haue in readinesse, to put to Sea as many more ships and gallies as we are able. The great Bishop also is not to be forgotten, but by all meanes to be drawne as a chiefe man into this warre. Besides all this, we must doe what we can to raise vp rebellion against the Turke in Peloponesus: which will be no hard matter to bring to passe. For if the Peloponesians rise in armes with one of their poore Princes which reuolted from the Turkish King, and forsaking all that they had, aduentured themselues into all manner of perils and danger: what thinke you they will doe, if they shall see so great forces comming both by sea and land against the Turkish king? It were good also, that we should send two thousand Italian horsemen into Peloponesus, to animate the people: who when they shall see vs thus to proceede, will vndoubtedly presently reuolt from the Turks, and yeeld themselues with their countrey vnto vs, from whence we may most commodiously vex and molest this tyrant: For there is no where better entrance into his kingdome, than by the way of Peloponesus. So that ioyning in league with the Hungarians, we shall beset him on euery side: they all along the riuer of Danubius, and we out of Peloponesus. Let vs L not therefore sit still with our hands in our bosomes, suffering our countries to be taken from vs, and our subiects made bondslaues to the Turks: but encouraging them by our example, animate them to take vp armes, and valiantly to resist the cruell and barbarous tyrant.

The Venetians take vp armes against the Turke.

The greater part of the Senate mooued with this graue Senatours speech, decreed without delay to make warres, and to send their Embassadours to the Pope, the king of Hungarie, and other the Christian Princes their neighbours, to pray aid of them in these warres against the Turkes. According to this decree, the Venetians for defence of their territorie sent one Bertholdus Este, a valiant captaine, with an armie into Peloponesus: where at his first comming, M he in short time recouered the citie of Argos, before lost. And departing thence, marched through the countrey with his armie of fifteene thousand men, vnto the strait of Corinth, called Isthmus. At which place Aloisius Lauretanus, Admirall for the Venetians (by appointment before made) met him: and there ioyning their forces together, with great labour in

A in the space of fifteene days fortified all that strait from the Ionian, to the sea Ægeum, with a continuall rampier and double ditch in length about fiue miles. In which work they vsed the helpe of thirtie thousand men; and in doing thereof were much furthered by the ruins of the old wall before destroyed by Amurath. The Venetian Commanders hauing fortified this strait, incamped before Corinth, and layd strait siege vnto it: where at the second assault, Bartholdus the General desirous by his owne forwardnesse to encourage his souldiers, was in that assault grieuously wounded with a stone cast downe vpon him from the wall, of which hurt he shortly after died. Neuertheless the siege was still continued by Betinus Calcinatius, who succeeded in Bartholdus his place. But whilest the Venetians lay thus at the siege of Corinth, suddenly newes was brought vnto the campe, That Mahomet was comming with a great army B himselfe in person, to raise the siege, and to destroy the new fortifications at Isthmus. Whereupon the Venetians left the siege, with purpose to haue defended the late fortified strait: but after that it was certainly knowne, that Mahomet was euen now at hand with an armie of fourscore thousand Turks, Betinus distrusting with his small number to be able to defend the strait against so puissant an armie, left the place so lately before fortified, and with all his armie retired to Neapolis to keepe the sea coast.

Shortly after, Mahomet without any resistance at all entered with a world of men by the strait into Peloponesus; and when he had with the great slaughter of the country people roamed vp and downe about Argos, he came to Neapolis, and in most terrible manner assaulted the citie twice; both which times he was notably repulsed by the Venetians, and many of his C men slaine. Departing thence, he destroyed and wasted the countrey about Methone (now Modon) and Corone, and assaulted the citie of Iuncum, but with no better successe than he had before Neapolis. Wherefore Winter now drawing on, he returned with his Armie to Constantinople.

After his departure the Venetians spoyled all that part of Archadia which was subiect to the Turks, requiting him with like iniuries as he had done them before. Not long after, Laurentanus the Venetian Admirall had the Island of Lemnos deliuered vnto him by one Cominus a famous pyrat, who had surprised the same, and taken it from the Turks; but distrusting how he should be able to keepe the same, deliuered it ouer vnto the Venetians. Shortly after, Vrsatus Iustinianus, a great Magnifico amongst the Venetians, was sent to succeed Lauretanus their D Admirall: but whilest he was scouring the Ægeum with a fleet of two and thirtie great Gallies, Andreas Dandalus Generall of their forces at land, inconsideratly encountering with the Turks horsemen betweene Mantynia and Pytheme, was by them ouerthrowne and slaine, and with him diuers other gentlemen of great account: in which skirmish fifteene hundred of the Venetians were slaine also with their Generall. And as Fortune is neuer more constant, than in mischiefe, so at the same time Vrsatus Generall at sea, landing his men in the Island of Lesbos, besieged the citie of Mitylene, & gaue thereunto two great assaults, wherein he lost fiue thousand men: and vnderstanding that the Turks fleet was comming to relieue the citie, raised the siege, and sailed into Euboœa, and from thence passed ouer into Peloponesus, where he shortE ly after died for sorrow and griefe of mind. In whose place the Venetians sent another famous Captaine called Iacobus Lauretanus.

The Venetians enter into confederation with other Christian Princes against the Turke.

The Venetians well considering the great power of the Turkish Emperour, laboured by their Embassadours, to draw as many of the Christian Princes as they could into the fellowship of this war; but especially the great Bishop, by whose means they were in good hope to be greatly strengthned. Pius the second of that name was then the great Bishop; who at first answered the Venetian Embassadors, That he must take away the little Turke, before he had any thing to doe with the great: meaning thereby, Sigismundus Maletasta Prince of Ariminum, whom he deadly hated, for that he tooke part with the French, against the Aragonians. Howbeit, the warres in Italie being well appeased, Pius still solicited by the Venetians, made F great preparation against the Turks; giuing it out, That he would in person himselfe go vnto those warres: and by his authoritie (then much regarded) procured great aid out of Germanie, France, Spaine, and other countries also further off. At which time also voluntarie men in great numbers resorted out of all parts of Christendome into Italie, readie to aduenture their liues in those religious warres. At the same time also the Venetians had with much adoo by the working of Paulus Angelus Archbishop of Dirrachium, perswaded Scanderbeg to renounce nounce the league which he had before made with the Turke, and to enter into armes againe: G which he presently did, and spoyled the borders of the Turks dominions next vnto him.

Wherewith Mahomet was no lesse troubled, than with all the rest of the great preparation of the Christians against him: fearing that (as it was then reported) he should be made Generall of the Christian armie, which Mahomet feared might tend to the vtter ruin of his Kingdome; so dreadfull was the name of Scanderbeg amongst the Turks. Wherefore thinking it most conuenient for his affaires, to reconcile him if it were possible, by his Embassadour sent for that purpose, wrot vnto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of the East and of the West, vnto Scanderbeg Prince of the Albanenses and of the Epirots, Greeting. H

The Letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg.

I haue alwayes had thy fidelitie and vpright dealing in great admiration, most noble Prince Scanderbeg: for which cause I thought it a thing incredible, that thou being a Prince of such an heroicall and Princely perfection, shouldst so inconsiderately and without any occasion break the faith and league which thou not long since solemnly contractedst with me. For as I am aduertised, thou hast entred into the confines of our dominion with a great armie, and with fire and sword destroying all that thou couldest, hast carried away with thee a great bootie. Of which thing I know right well, that the Venetians are the only cause, by whose counsell and persuasion thou hast beene set on to doe this deed; and seduced by their allurements and subtill persuasions, hast made war vpon me, and art become the faithlesse breaker of thine owne league, and of the sacred law of Nations. Yet doe I little or nothing blame thee therefore, regarding more the cause of the ignominie, than the despight it selfe, and lay the blame vpon them who haue alwayes beene my foes and capitall enemies, rather than vpon thee. But alas, what is this vnto me (Scanderbeg) that thou hast done, which possesse so many and so large Dominions? Diddest thou thinke to doe so great hurt vnto our Kingdome, by spoyling a little peece of our Countrey, and by stealing our Cattell, more like a Theefe and Robber, than an open Enemie? Which thing I yet account not worth the name of an iniurie. But if thou thinke it so good, proceed in these thy doings: for I make more account of thy friendship and loue, than of whatsoeuer is to me deerest; because (as thou knowest) I haue alwayes borne vnto thee an especiall fauour, and loued thee most entirely. And therefore as often as I call to remembrance our tender yeares and old familiaritie whilest we liued together in my fathers court at Hadrianople, I cannot but thinke my selfe bound vnto thee in all courtesie. And therefore my good Scanderbeg, I most heartily request and entreat thee, That we renewing the former conclusions of peace, may of new confirme the same by solemne oath; wherewith if the former peace had bin established, thou wouldest not haue suffered thy selfe to haue been now of the Venetians so circumuented or seduced. It is therefore needfull, that we now againe for euer confirme a league and peace betwixt vs by solemne and sacred oath on both sides: which if thou shalt doe, (as I hope thou wilt, and in this be aduised by me) thou with thy posteritie shalt vnaoubtedly alwayes raigne in peace, and in safetie possesse whatsoeuer is yours. Whereas if thou shalt doe otherwise, beleeue me it will repent thee, and that right quickly. Thou knowest alreadie my force, which whether thou be able to withstand or not, thou wert best to be wel aduised. The poore Princes thy neighbours, the Venetians thy seducers, cannot deliuer thee from my forces and power. Dost thou not see the Grecians almost al rooted out before thy face? the Emperors of Constantinople and Trapezond by vs depriued of their Empires? the Princes of Seruia and Rascia destroyed? the King of Bosna put to death? and all the Kingdomes of Asia, with many other Kings and Princes moe, vanquished, and ouerthrowne, and made subiect vnto me? Wherefore Scanderbeg, I aduise thee in this to follow my counsell, keepe thy promise, and so beleeue me thou shalt not be deceiued. Concerning these matters, we haue giuen further commandement to our Embassadour and seruant Mustapha, which commeth vnto thee: vnto whom doubt thou not to giue credence in any thing. Farewell. From our imperiall citie of Constantinople the seuenth of May, 1463. I K L

Scanderbeg hauing by the aforesaid messenger receiued these letters, and well considered of the same, returned answer as followeth: M

The Champion of Christ Iesus, George Castriot, otherwise called Scanderbeg, Prince of the Albanenses and Epirots, to the most Excellent Mahomet King of the Turks, Greeting.

Scanderbeg his answere to the letters of Mahomet.

You maruell (most Noble Mahomet) that my souldiers (as you say) contrarie to the League and the conditions

A conditions of our peace, haue entered into your confines, and from thence carried a great bootie. Of which thing (you say) the Venetians are the authours, whom you call your mortall enemies: inferring afterward, that you are little therewith offended, for that you are a most mightie Prince, and can easily digest such vnkindnesse, for the great loue you beare vnto me: and the rather, for that I did it deceiued (as it pleaseth you to say) by others. All these things you can easily forgiue and forget, so that I will by solemne oath confirme the same conditions of peace that were in our former league betwixt vs agreed vpon. And thereunto you doe greatly vrge me, you admonish and counsell me to follow your aduise, as tending to the great profit and securitie of me and my posteritie, least happily whilest I seeke to please the Venetians, I incurre your heauie displeasure. Besides this, the more to terrifie me, you reckon vp as it were in a Catalogue, the People, Nations, Kings, and Princes, by you ouercome and subdued. But what

B is that which is so strange (I pray you) and which you so much maruell at (most noble Mahomet:) Is it not for that my souldiers did that in the confines of your dominions, whereof they were (of right) sorrie; and had thereof to me complained, that your souldiers had before done the like in their goods and possessions. Wherefore if they also vpon a militarie brauerie (as is your maner of phrase) haue made themselues whole, and done one shrewd turne for another, reuenging iniurie receiued, and not inferring any of new: there is no cause that you should either thinke it strange or blame me. I would my selfe haue restrained my souldiers, although they were grieuously iniuried (I will plainely confesse vnto you a troth) I would haue appeased their angrie minds, enflamed with desire of reuenge; if you (a Prince of all others most rich and bountifull) would either haue taken order, that full restitution might haue been made vnto them of all such things as they had lost, or else would with condigne punishment haue chastised the in-

C solencie of your souldiers: which you would seeme to couer with the tearme of militarie wantonnesse or brauerie; an excuse scarce currant amongst children. For although offences are in all places grieuous, yet ought they most of all so to be deemed in martiall affairs. What I pray you, would you haue me to take it for a lasciuiousnesse in your men of war? especially when I had receiued so great losse, whenas you might with a word first haue restrained them from doing of it, and at your pleasure corrected them after the deed was done. Wherefore (most excellent Mahomet) take you also in good part these our tearmes, which you haue accustomed hitherto most gloriously to giue and sell vnto vs, whilest you alwaies couer your reach with some excuse or shew of right. As for that in excusing me, vnder colour of old acquaintance and friendship, you inuey against the Venetians, verily you doe them wrong: for why, those good, iust, and vertuous Princes are not to be slandered by you, as seducers of me or others. Beside, what need

D that inuincible state to enter into councell with me, or (as it pleaseth you to say) to allure me to fall at ods with you, or to prosecute you as their enemie? Who of themselues, yea (I say) of themselues alone, when occasion shall require, are able to dare you in plaine battell, and to abate your pride. Furthermore, whereas you aduise me to reiect their friendship, your labour is therein but lost; for what man is so desperat, or hated of his subiects, that would not chuse rather to erre with that most honorable Senat, than to be in the right with you? especially I, who haue of long time bin confederat with them, and am of all others vnto them most deare: which you for all that had no regard of, but (according vnto your vntrustie dealing) breaking in sunder the bonds of peace, spoiled and wasted their territorie in Peloponesus. Neither can your great threats terrifie me, which you after the Turkish maner thunder & poure out against

E me, except I will be ouerruled by you: for it is the part of an Albanese both to endure when need shall require, and also to do such things as beseeme a man of courage. You cannot make me afraid, being but a small Prince, with my honorable friends the Venetians. And what are you? so great an Emperor of the East and of the West, and of all parts of the World, as you vainly tearme your selfe? Truly you make me smile, and other Christian Princes laugh you to scorne, in vsurping falsly to your selfe the stately stile of the Emperour of the World. What possesse you in Asia the greater? verily nothing. Is all yours in Asia the lesser? not so. What haue you in Europe? except Thracia, Mysia, part of Grecia, and Peloponesus with the isle of Mytelene. As for Africke, you neuer set your foot therein. Is this to be Emperour of the World? But suppose, suppose (I say) worthie Mahomet, that all from the farthest part of the Ocean were yours, you ought not therefore so to swell, as to contemne all others. Cease to boast, and learne

F now (if you can) the speciall, but true examples of humaine fragilitie. Where are now the Assyrians, which sometime swayed the World? where be the Medes? Where the Persians? and to be short, where are the Romains, the great commanders of all? Verily, Tamerlane the Sythian King (called the terror of the world) was far greater than you: who in triumph, drew before his chariot thy great grandfather Baiazet in chains: who had before won so many victories, whom neuertheles he ouerthrew in the plaines of Armenia, with three hundred thousand Turkes, hauing in his armie (as is reported) twelue hundred thousand men, greater than Xerxes or Darius, whose armies couered the seas, and dried vp the riuers: C before them as they went, yet for all this (noble Mahomet) they are all cast out by him that casteth out all nations, the power of the highest hath brought them all to nought. Wherefore learne to know your selfe to be a man also. Trust not so much to the multitude of your soldiers, and strength of your armies: for oftentimes great and mighties armies haue beene ouerthrowne with farre lesse, as all histories beare witnesse: wherefore (I say now) let no man but not praise the valor of the Generall, before he be brought to the triumphe. Are not you not thinke Mahomet, that God will fauour the better cause? You know, you well know, that all your kingdome is violently gotten, that it is wrongfully and vniustly possessed: for which cause I am not afraid not onely to withstand you when you shall come, being so great a Prince; but also valiantly and courageously to dare you into the field, and by the power of God, both to hope for and haue a notable victorie ouer you. We haue souldiers also, which know how to vse their weapons, to march H before their enemies, and how to beare themselues in the heat of the battell. Wherefore, to that you say vnto me: for the new confirming of the former league, you labour now but in vaine to circumuent me such fore gloses, I haue your faith in such distrust, and your friendship in detestation: forasmuch as cunningly and subtilly after the manner of your ancestors, whatsoeuer you do, or whatsoeuer you promise vnto me, it tendeth all to no other end than to thrust me out of my kingdome. Yet thus long I haue by Gods helpe well escaped all your policies, all your crafts and deceits. But I hope there will in short time be an end of all these matters, when all your sleights and deuises shall not ease you, neither your worthy head or Turkish pride any thing profit you. It is not I alone that so much stomacke you, there commeth after me a great number of Christian Princes: behold, the whole chiualrie and glorie of the Christian commonweale is in armes, and comming against thee with all their force: all the Kings and Princes of I Christendome haue combined themselues together, with the great Bishop, against thy state, and will in short time be present to destroy thee and thy kingdome. Wherefore (worthie Mahomet) I haue thought it good in regard of our old friendship (although the same hath by you beene greatly empaired and violated) to forewarne you of all these things, that you might gather your wits together, and in time prouide for the safetie of your selfe and of your kingdome. You see the force and power of so many great Princes, from which whether you can escape or no, I know not: yet you may, if you will follow my aduise, you may, I say, make both your name and empire of great, greater, of famous, most renowned, of fortunate, most hap-pie and blessed; if casting off from you the grosse errours of the Mahometan superstition, you will embrace the faith and truth of Christ Iesus, and at length haue regard of your soules health. And you which excel al your predecessors in highnesse of spirit, and pregnancie of wit, suffer not your self and your K subiects as it were by inheritance to be longer blinded in your wilfull errours: but doe that (as a wise Prince) of your owne accord, which otherwise you will shortly of necessitie be constrained to do. To say, Had I wist, hath euer bin accounted a great disgrace from the mouth of an Emperour. At length amend and measure your selfe. Behold, Almightie God doth offer you meanes, whereby you may quiet the whole state of your kingdome, and all our Kings and Princes loue, honor, and reuerence you. Neither let the ambitious desire of soueraigntie or immoderat care of those things you possesse, trouble you from so doing: For whatsoeuer you haue vniustly and vnlawfully vsurped, the Christian Princes will grant, confirme, and establish vnto thee, as if they had bin your owne by antient inheritance. So shall you be a true Monarch indeed, and rule and raigne lawfully, if you shall embrace this Faith, and worship God aright: which so soone as you shall feele the sweetnesse of, you will be sorrie that you knew it no sooner, you will grieue at the L time you haue lost, and vtterly detest and abhorre all that filthie superstition which the most filthie false Prophet Mahomet hath left amongst you. From our Campe the 26 of May, 1463.

With these Letters Scanderbeg dismissed the Turks Embassador. About which time he receiued Letters from the great Bishop, that he, accompanied with the Christian Princes, would without delay come ouer into Epirus with a strong armie of valiant Christians, to ioine their forces with his, against the common enemie of the Christian religion: exhorting him in all their names to denounce war against the Turkish king. Which thing Scanderbeg most ioyfully vndertooke: and without delay with all his power brake into the Turks dominion, burning and destroying the countrey before him as he went: from whence he returned laden with the M spoile there gotten.
